Itea, a daughter of Danaus. Hygin. fab. 170.

Itemales, an old man who exposed Œdipus on mount Cithæron, &c. Hygin. fab. 65.

Ithăca, a celebrated island in the Ionian sea, on the western parts of Greece, with a city of the same name, famous for being part of the kingdom of Ulysses. It is very rocky and mountainous, measures about 25 miles in circumference, and is now known by the name of Iſola del Compare, or Thiachi. Hom. Il. & Od.—Strab. 1 & 8.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

ITHACESIÆ, three iſlands oppoſite Vibo, on the coaſt of the Brutii.—Baiæ was called alſo Ithaceſia, becauſe built by Bajus the pilot of Ulyſſes. Sil. 8, v. 540. l. 12, v. 113.

ITHOBĂLUS, a king of Tyre, who died B. C. 595. Joſephus.

ITHŌME, a town of Phthiotis. Homer. Il. 2.——Another of Meſſenia, which ſurrendered, after ten years ſiege, to Lacedæmon, 724 years before the Chriſtian era. Jupiter was called Ithomates, from a temple which he had there, where games were alſo celebrated, and the conqueror rewarded with an oaken crown. Pauſ. 4, c. 32.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 179.—Strab. 8.

ITHOMAIA, a feſtival in which muſicians contended, obſerved at Ithome, in honor of Jupiter, who had been nurſed by the nymphs Ithome and Neda, the former of whom gave her name to a city, and the latter to a river.

ITHYPHALLUS, an obſcene ſirname of Priapus. Columell. 10.

ITIUS PORTUS, a town of Gaul, now Wetſand, or Boulogne in Picardy. Cæſar ſet ſail from thence on his paſſage into Britain. Cæſ. G. 4, c. 21. l. 5, c. 2 & 5.

ITŌNIA, a ſirname of Minerva, from a place in Bœotia, where ſhe was worſhipped.

ITŌNUS, a king of Theſſaly, ſon of Deucalion, who firſt invented the manner of poliſhing metals. Lucan. 6, v. 402.

ITUNA, a river of Britain, now Eden in Cumberland.

ITŪRÆA, a country of Paleſtine, whoſe inhabitants were very ſkilful in drawing the bow. Lucan. 7, v. 230 & 514.—Virg. G. 2, v. 448.—Strab. 17.

ITUS, a town of Umbria.

ITYS, a ſon of Zetheus, and Ædon, killed by his mother. Vid. Ædon.

ITYRÆI, a people of Paleſtine. Vid. Ituræa.

ITYS, a ſon of Tereus, king of Thrace, by Procne, daughter of Pandion, king of Athens. He was killed by his mother when he was about ſix years old, and ſerved up as meat before his father. He was changed into a pheaſant, his mother into a ſwallow, and his father into an owl. [Vid. Philomela.] Ovid. Met. 6, v. 620. Amor. 2, el. 14, v. 23.—Horat. 4, od. 12.——A Trojan, who came to Italy with Æneas, and was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 574.

JUBA, a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who ſucceeded his father Hiempſal, and favored the cauſe of Pompey againſt J. Cæſar. He defeated Curio, whom Cæſar had ſent to Africa, and after the battle of Pharſalia, he joined his forces to thoſe of Scipio. He was conquered in a battle at Thapſus, and totally abandoned by his ſubjects. He killed himſelf with Petreius, who had ſhared his good fortune and his adverſity. His kingdom became a Roman province, of which Salluſt was the firſt governor. Plut. in Pomp. & Cæſ.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Suet. in Cæſ. c. 35.—Dion. 41.—Mela. 1, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, &c.—Cæſar. de bell. civ. 2.—Paterc. 2, c. 54.——The ſecond of that name was the ſon of Juba the Firſt. He was led among the captives to Rome to adorn the triumph of Cæſar. His captivity was the ſource of the greateſt honors, and his application to ſtudy procured him more glory than he could have obtained from the inheritance of a kingdom. He gained the heart of the Romans by the courteouſneſs of his manners, and Auguſtus rewarded his fidelity by giving him in marriage Cleopatra, the daughter of Antony, and conferring upon him the title of king, and making him maſter of all the territories which his father once poſſeſſed. His popularity was ſo great, that the Mauritanians rewarded his benevolence by making him one of their gods. The Athenians raiſed him a ſtatue, and the Æthiopians worſhipped him as a deity. Juba wrote an hiſtory of Rome in Greek, which is often quoted and commended by the ancients, but of which only few fragments remain. He alſo wrote on the hiſtory of Arabia, and the antiquities of Aſſyria, chiefly collected from Beroſus. Beſides theſe, he compoſed ſome treatiſes upon the drama, Roman antiquities, the nature of animals, painting, grammar, &c. now loſt. Strab. 17.—Suet. in Cal. 26.—Plin. 5, c. 25, & 32.—Dion. 51, &c.

JUDACILIUS, a native of Aſculum, celebrated for his patriotiſm, in the age of Pompey, &c.

JUDÆA, a famous country of Syria, bounded by Arabia, Egypt, Phœnicia, the Mediterranean ſea, and part of Syria. The inhabitants, whoſe hiſtory is beſt collected from the Holy Scriptures, where chiefly governed, after the Babyloniſh captivity, by the high prieſts, who raiſed themſelves to the rank of princes, B. C. 153, and continued in the enjoyment of regal power till the age of Auguſtus. Plut. de Oſir.—Strab. 16.—Dion. 37.—Tacit. Hiſt. 5, c. 6.—Lucan. 2, v. 593.

JUGANTES, a people of Britain. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 32.

JUGARIUS, a ſtreet in Rome, below the capitol.

JUGURTHA, the illegitimate ſon of Manaſtabal, the brother of Micipſa. Micipſa and Manaſtabal were the ſons of Maſiniſſa, king of Numidia. Micipſa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew phew with his two ſons Adherbal and Hiempſal; but, as he was of an aſpiring diſpoſition, he ſent him with a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of Scipio, who was beſieging Numantia, hoping to loſe a youth whoſe ambition ſeemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His hopes were fruſtrated, Jugurtha ſhowed himſelf brave and active, and endeared himſelf to the Roman general. Micipſa appointed him ſucceſſor to his kingdom with his two ſons, but the kindneſs of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha deſtroyed Hiempſal, and ſtripped Adherbal of his poſſeſſions, and obliged him to fly to Rome for ſafety. The Romans liſtened to the well grounded complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the ſenators, and the ſuppliant monarch, forſaken in his diſtreſs, periſhed by the ſnares of his enemy. Cæcilius Metellus was at laſt ſent againſt Jugurtha, and his firmneſs and ſucceſs ſoon reduced the crafty Numidian, and obliged him to fly among his ſavage neighbours for ſupport. Marius and Sylla ſucceded Metellus, and fought with equal ſucceſs. Jugurtha was at laſt betrayed by his father-in-law Bocchus, from whom he claimed aſſiſtance, and he was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after carrying on a war of five years. He was expoſed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a priſon, where he died ſix days after of hunger, B. C. 106. The name and the wars of Jugurtha have been immortalized by the pen of Salluſt. Salluſt. in Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Paterc. 2, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Mar.

Julia lex, prima de provinciis, by J. Cæſar, A. U. C. 691. It confirmed the freedom of all Greece; it ordained that the Roman magiſtrates ſhould act there as judges, and that the towns and villages through which the Roman magiſtrates and ambaſſadors paſſed, ſhould maintain them during their ſtay; that the governors, at the expiration of their office, ſhould leave a ſcheme of their accounts in two cities of their province, and deliver a copy of it at the public treaſury; that the provincial governors ſhould not accept of a golden crown unleſs they were honored with a triumph by the ſenate; that no ſupreme commander ſhould go out of his province, enter any dominions, lead an army, or engage in a war, without the previous approbation and command of the Roman ſenate and people. ——Another, de ſumptibus, in the age of Auguſtus. It limited the expence of proviſions on the dies profeſti, or days appointed for the tranſaction of buſineſs, to 200 ſeſterces; on common calendar feſtivals to 300; and, on all extraordinary occaſions, ſuch as marriages, births, &c. to 1000.——Another, de provinciis, by J. Cæſar Dictator. It ordained that no prætorian province ſhould be held more than one year, and a conſular province more than two years.——Another, called alſo Campana agraria, by the ſame, A. U. C. 691. It required that all the lands of Campania, formerly rented according to the eſtimation of the ſtate, ſhould be divided among the plebeians, and that all the members of the ſenate ſhould bind themſelves by an oath to eſtabliſh, confirm, and protect, that law.——Another, de civitate, by L. J. Cæſar, A. U. C. 664 It rewarded with the name and privileges of citizens of Rome all ſuch as, during the civil wars, had remained the conſtant friends of the republican liberty. When that civil war was at an end, all the Italians were admitted as free denizens, and compoſed eight new tribes.——Another, de judicibus, by J. Cæſar. It confirmed the Pompeian law in a certain manner, requiring the judges to be choſen from the richeſt people in every century, allowing the ſenators and knights in the number, and excluding the tribuni ærarii.——Another, de ambitu, by Auguſtus. It reſtrained the illicit meaſures uſed at elections, and reſtored to the comitia their ancient privileges, which had been deſtroyed by the ambition and bribery of J. Cæſar.——Another, by Auguſtus, de adulterio & pudicitiâ. It puniſhed adultery with death. It was afterwards confirmed and enforced by Domitian. Juvenal. Sat. 2, v. 30, alludes to it.——Another, called alſo Papia, or Papia Poppæa, which was the ſame as the following, only enlarged by the conſuls Papius and Poppæus, A. U. C. 762.——Another, de maritandis ordinibus, by Auguſtus. It propoſed rewards to ſuch as engaged in matrimony, of a particular deſcription. It inflicted puniſhment on celibacy, and permitted the patricians, the ſenators and ſons of ſenators excepted, to intermarry with the libertini, or children of thoſe that had been liberti, or ſervants manumitted. Horace alludes to it when he ſpeaks of lex marita.—— Another, de majeſtate, by J. Cæſar. It puniſhed with aquæ & ignis interdictio all ſuch as were found guilty of the crimen majeſtatis, or treaſon againſt the ſtate.

Julia, a daughter of J. Cæſar, by Cornelia, famous for her perſonal charms and for her virtues. She married Corn. Cæpio, whom her father obliged her to divorce to marry Pompey the Great. Her amiable diſpoſition more ſtrongly cemented the friendſhip of the father and of the ſon-in-law; but her ſudden death in child-bed, B. C. 53, broke all ties of intimacy and relationſhip, and ſoon produced a civil war. Plut.——The mother of of M. Antony, whoſe humanity is greatly celebrated in ſaving her brother-in-law J. Cæſar from the cruel proſecutions of her ſon. ——An aunt of J. Cæſar, who married C. Marius. Her funeral oration was publicly pronounced by her nephew.——The only daughter of the emperor Auguſtus, remarkable for her beauty, genius, and debaucheries. She was tenderly loved by her father, who gave her in marriage to Marcellus; after whoſe death ſhe was given to Agrippa, by whom ſhe had five children. She became a ſecond time a widow, and was married to Tiberius. Her laſciviouſneſs and debaucheries ſo diſguſted her huſband, that he retired from the court of the emperor; and Auguſtus, informed of her luſtful propenſities and infamy, baniſhed her from his ſight, and confined her in a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Campania. She was ſtarved to death, A. D. 14, by order of Tiberius, who had ſucceeded to Auguſtus as emperor of Rome. Plut.——A daughter of the emperor Titus, who proſtituted herſelf to her brother Domitian.——A daughter of Julia, the wife of Agrippa, who married Lepidus, and was baniſhed for her licentiouſneſs.——A daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born in the iſland of Leſbos, A. D. 17. She married a ſenator called M. Vinucius, at the age of 16, and enjoyed the moſt unbounded favors in the court of her brother Caligula, who is accuſed of being her firſt ſeducer. She was baniſhed by Caligula, on ſuſpicion of conſpiracy. Claudius recalled her; but ſhe was ſoon after baniſhed by the powerful intrigues of Meſſalina, and put to death about the 24th year of her age. She was no ſtranger to the debaucheries of the age, and ſhe proſtituted herſelf as freely to the meaneſt of the people as to the nobler companions of her brother's extravagance. Seneca, as ſome ſuppoſe, was baniſhed to Corſica for having ſeduced her. ——A celebrated woman, born in Phœnicia. She is alſo called Domna. She applied herſelf to the ſtudy of geometry and philoſophy, &c. and rendered herſelf conſpicuous, as much by her mental as by her perſonal charms. She came to Rome, where her learning recommended her to all the literati of the age. She married Septimius Severus, who, twenty years after this matrimonial connection, was inveſted with the imperial purple. Severus was guided by the prudence and advice of Julia, but he was blind to her foibles, and often puniſhed with the greateſt ſeverity thoſe vices which were enormous in the empreſs. She is even ſaid to have conſpired againſt the emperor, but ſhe reſolved to blot, by patronizing literature, the ſpots which her debauchery and extravagance had rendered indelible in the eyes of virtue. Her influence, after the death of Severus, was for ſome time productive of tranquillity and cordial union between his two ſons and ſucceſſors. Geta at laſt, however, fell a ſacrifice to his brother Caracalla, and Julia was even wounded in the arm while ſhe attempted to ſcreen her favorite ſon from his brother's dagger. According to ſome, Julia committed inceſt with her ſon Caracalla, and publicly married him. She ſtarved herſelf when her ambitious views were defeated by Macrinus, who aſpired to the empire in preference to her, after the death of Caracalla.——A town of Gallia Togata.

JULIACUM, a town of Germany, now Juliers.

JULIĀNUS, a ſon of Julius Conſtantius, the brother of Conſtantine the Great, born at Conſtantinople. The maſſacre which attended the elevation of the ſons of Conſtantine the Great to the throne, nearly proved fatal to Julian and to his brother Gallus. The two brothers were privately educated together, and taught the doctrines of the Chriſtian religion, and exhorted to be moderate, temperate, and to deſpiſe the gratification of all ſenſual pleaſures. Gallus received the inſtructions of his pious teachers with deference and ſubmiſſion, but Julian ſhowed his diſlike for Chriſtianity by ſecretly cheriſhing a deſire to become one of the votaries of Paganiſm. He gave ſufficient proofs of this propenſity when he went to Athens in the 24th year of his age, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of magic and aſtrology. He was ſome time after appointed over Gaul, with the title of Cæſar, by Conſtans, and there he ſhewed himſelf worthy of the imperial dignity by his prudence, valor, and the numerous victories he obtained over the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. His mildneſs, as well as his condeſcenſion, gained him the hearts of his ſoldiers, and when Conſtans, to whom Julian was become ſuſpected, ordered him to ſend him part of his forces to go into the eaſt, the army immediately mutinied, and promiſed immortal fidelity to their leader, by refuſing to obey the orders of Conſtans. They even compelled Julian, by threats and entreaties, to accept of the title of independent emperor and of Auguſtus; and the death of Conſtans, which ſoon after happened, left him ſole maſter of the Roman empire, A. D. 361. Julian then diſcloſed his religious ſentiments, and publicly diſavowed the doctrines of Chriſtianity, and offered ſolemn ſacrifices to all the gods of ancient Rome. This change of religious opinion was attributed to the auſterity with which he received the precepts of Chriſtianity, or, according to others, to the literary converſation and perſuaſive eloquence of ſome of the Athenian philoſo-

phers. From this circumſtance, therefore, Julian has been called Apoſtate. After he had made his public entry at Conſtantinople, he determined to continue the Perſian war, and check thoſe barbarians, who had for ſixty years derided the indolence of the Roman emperors. When he had croſſed the Tigris, he burned his fleet, and advanced with boldneſs into the enemy's country. His march was that of a conqueror, he met with no oppoſition from a weak and indigent enemy; but the country of Aſſyria had been left deſolate by the Perſians, and Julian, without corn or proviſions, was obliged to retire. As he could not convey his fleet again over the ſtreams of the Tigris, he took the reſolution of marching up the ſources of the river, and imitate the bold return of the ten thouſand Greeks. As he advanced through the country he defeated the officers of Sapor, the king of Perſia; but an engagement proved fatal to him, and he received a deadly wound as he animated his ſoldiers to battle. He expired the following night, the 27th of June, A. D. 363, in the 32d year of his age. His laſt moments were ſpent in a converſation with a philoſopher about the immortality of the ſoul, and he breathed his laſt without expreſſing the leaſt ſorrow for his fate, or the ſuddenneſs of his death. Julian's character has been admired by ſome, and cenſured by others, but the malevolence of his enemies ariſes from his apoſtacy. As a man and as a monarch he demands our warmeſt commendations; but we muſt blame his idolatry, and deſpiſe his bigotted principles. He was moderate in his ſucceſſes, merciful to his enemies, and amiable in his character. He aboliſhed the luxuries which reigned in the court of Conſtantinople, and diſmiſſed with contempt the numerous officers which waited upon Conſtantius, to anoint his head or perfume his body. He was frugal in his meals, and ſlept little, repoſing himſelf on a ſkin ſpread on the ground. He awoke at midnight, and ſpent the reſt of the night in reading or writing, and iſſued early from his tent to pay his daily viſit to the guards around the camp. He was not fond of public amuſements, but rather dedicated his time to ſtudy and ſolitude. When he paſſed through Antioch in his Perſian expedition, the inhabitants of the place, offended at his religious ſentiments, ridiculed his perſon, and lampooned him in ſatyrical verſes. The emperor made uſe of the ſame arms for his defence, and rather than deſtroy his enemies by the ſword, he condeſcended to expoſe them to deriſion, and unveil their follies and debaucheries in an humorous work, which he called Miſopogon, or beard hater. He imitated the virtuous example of Scipio and Alexander, and laid no temptation for his virtue by viſiting ſome female captives that had fallen into his hands. In his matrimonial connections, Julian rather conſulted policy than inclination, and his marriage with the ſiſter of Conſtantius aroſe from his unwillingneſs to offend his benefactor, rather than to obey the laws of nature. He was buried at Tarſus, and afterwards his body was conveyed to Conſtantinople. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings, as well as by his military character. Beſides his Miſopogon, he wrote the hiſtory of Gaul. He alſo wrote two letters to the Athenians; and, beſides, there are now extant ſixty-four letters on various ſubjects. His Cæſars is the moſt famous of all his compoſitions, being a ſatire upon all the Roman emperors from J. Cæſar to Conſtantine. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which the author ſeverely attacks the venerable character of M. Aurelius, whom he had propoſed to himſelf as a pattern, and ſpeaks in a ſcurrilous and abuſive language of his relation Conſtantine. It has been obſerved of Julian, that, like Cæſar, he could employ at the ſame time his hand to write, his ear to liſten, his eyes to read, and his mind to dictate. The beſt edition of his works is that of Spanheim, fol. Lipſ. 1696; and of the Cæſars, that of Heuſinger, 8vo. Gothæ, 1741. Julian.—Socrat.—Eutrop.—Amm.—Liban. &c.——A ſon of Conſtantine.——A maternal uncle of the emperor Julian.——A Roman emperor. [*Vid. JŪNIA LEX Sacrata, by L. Junius Brutus, the firſt tribune of the people, A. U. C. 260. It ordained that the perſon of the tribune ſhould be held ſacred and inviolable; that an appeal might be made from the conſuls to the tribune; and that no ſenator ſhould be able to exerciſe the office of a tribune.——Another, A.U.C. 627, which excluded all foreigners from enjoying the privileges or names of Roman citizens.

JUNIA, a niece of Cato of Utica, who married Caſſius, and died 64 years after her huſband had killed himſelf at the battle of Philippi.——Calvina, a beautiful Roman lady, accuſed of inceſt with her brother Silanus. She was deſcended from Auguſtus. She was baniſhed by Claudius, and recalled by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 4.——Junius Blæſus, a proconſul of Africa under the emperors. *Tacit. JŪNO, a celebrated deity among the ancients, daughter of Saturn and Ops. She was ſiſter to Jupiter, Pluto, Neptune, Veſta, Ceres, &c. She was born at Argos, or, according to others, in Samos, and was entruſted to the care of the Seaſons, or, as Homer and Ovid mention, to Oceanus and Tethys. Some of the inhabitants of Argolis ſuppoſed, that ſhe had been brought up by the three daughters of the river Aſterion; and the people of Stymphalus, in Arcadia, maintained, that ſhe had been educated under the care of Temenus, the ſon of Pelaſgus. Juno was devoured by Saturn, according to ſome mythologiſts; and, according to Apollodorus, ſhe was again reſtored to the world by means of a potion which Metis gave to Saturn, to make him give up the ſtone which his wife had given him to ſwallow inſtead of Jupiter. [Vid. Saturnus.] Jupiter was not inſenſible to the charms of his ſiſter; and the more powerfully to gain her confidence, he changed himſelf into a cuckoo, and raiſed a great ſtorm, and made the air unuſually chill and cold. Under this form he went to the goddeſs, all ſhivering. Juno pitied the cuckoo, and took him into her boſom. When Jupiter had gained theſe advantages, he reſumed his original form, and obtained the gratification of his deſires, after he had made a ſolemn promiſe of marriage to his ſiſter. The nuptials of Jupiter and Juno were celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnity; the gods, all mankind, and all the brute creation, attended. Chelone, a young woman, was the only one who refuſed to come, and who derided the ceremony. For this impiety, Mercury changed her into a tortoiſe, and condemned her to perpetual ſilence; from which circumſtance the tortoiſe has always been uſed as the ſymbol of ſilence among the ancients. By her marriage with Jupiter Juno became the queen of all the gods, and miſtreſs of heaven and earth. Her conjugal happineſs, however, was frequently diſturbed by the numerous amours of her huſband, and ſhe ſhewed herſelf jealous and inexorable in the higheſt degree. Her ſeverity to the miſtreſſes and illegitimate children of her huſband hand was unparalleled. She perſecuted Hercules and his deſcendants with the moſt inveterate fury; and her reſentment againſt Paris, who had given the golden apple to Venus in preference to herſelf, was the cauſe of the Trojan war, and of all the miſeries which happened to the unfortunate houſe of Priam. Her ſeverities to Alcmena, Ino, Athamas, Semele, &c. are alſo well known. Juno had ſome children by Jupiter. According to Heſiod, ſhe was mother of Mars, Hebe, and Ilithya, or Lucina; and beſides theſe, ſhe brought forth Vulcan, without having any commerce with the other ſex, but only by ſmelling a certain plant. This was in imitation of Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brain. According to others, it was not Vulcan, but Mars, or Hebe, whom ſhe brought forth in this manner, and this was after eating ſome lettuces at the table of Apollo. The daily and repeated debaucheries of Jupiter at laſt provoked Juno to ſuch a degree, that ſhe retired to Eubœa, and reſolved for ever to forſake his bed. Jupiter produced a reconciliation, after he had applied to Cithæron for advice, and after he had obtained forgiveneſs by fraud and artifice. [Vid. Dædala.] This reconciliation, however cordial it might appear, was ſoon diſſolved by new offences; and, to ſtop the complaints of the jealous Juno, Jupiter had often recourſe to violence and blows. He even puniſhed the cruelties which ſhe had exerciſed upon his ſon Hercules, by ſuſpending her from the heavens by a golden chain, and tying a heavy anvil to her feet. Vulcan was puniſhed for aſſiſting his mother in this degrading ſituation, and he was kicked down from heaven by his father, and broke his leg by the fall. This puniſhment rather irritated than pacified Juno. She reſolved to revenge it, and ſhe engaged ſome of the gods to conſpire againſt Jupiter and to impriſon him, but Thetis delivered him from this conſpiracy, by bringing to his aſſiſtance the famous Briareus. Apollo and Neptune were baniſhed from heaven for joining in the conſpiracy, though ſome attribute their exile to different cauſes. The worſhip of Juno was univerſal, and even more than that of Jupiter, according to ſome authors. Her ſacrifices were offered with the greateſt ſolemnity. She was particularly worſhipped at Argos, Samos, Carthage, and afterwards at Rome. The ancients generally offered on her altars an ewe lamb and a ſow the firſt day of every month. No cows were ever immolated to her, becauſe ſhe aſſumed the nature of that animal when the gods fled into Egypt in their war with the giants. Among the birds the hawk, the gooſe, and particularly the peacock, often called Junonia avis, [Vid. Argus.] were ſacred to her. The dittany, the poppy, and the lily, were her favorite flowers. The latter flower was originally of the color of the crocus; but, when Jupiter placed Hercules to the breaſts of Juno while aſleep, ſome of her milk fell down upon earth, and changed the color of the lilies from purple to a beautiful white. Some of the milk alſo dropped in that part of the heavens which, from its whiteneſs, ſtill retains the name of the milky way, lactea via. As Juno's power was extended over all the gods, ſhe often made uſe of the goddeſs Minerva as her meſſenger, and even had the privilege of hurling the thunder of Jupiter when ſhe pleaſed. Her temples were numerous, the moſt famous of which were at Argos, Olympia, &c. At Rome no woman of debauched character was permitted to enter her temple, or even to touch it. The ſirnames of Juno are various, they are derived either from the function or things over which ſhe preſided, or from the places were her worſhip was eſtabliſhed. She was the queen of the heavens; ſhe protected cleanlineſs, and preſided over marriage and child-birth, and particularly patroniſed the moſt faithful and virtuous of the ſex, and ſeverely puniſhed incontinence and lewdneſs in matrons. She was the goddeſs of all power and empire, and ſhe was alſo the patroneſs of riches. She is repreſented ſitting on a throne with a diadem on her head, and a golden ſceptre in her right hand. Some peacocks generally ſat by her, and a cuckoo often perched on her ſceptre, while Iris behind her diſplayed the thouſand colors of her beautiful rainbow. She is ſometimes carried through the air in a rich chariot drawn by peacocks. The Roman conſuls, when they entered upon office, were always obliged to offer her a ſolemn ſacrifice. The Juno of the Romans was called Matrona or Romana. She was generally repreſented as veiled from head to foot, and the Roman matrons always imitated this manner of dreſſing themſelves, and deemed it indecent in any married woman to leave any part of her body but her face uncovered. She has received the ſirname of Olympia, Samia, Lacedæmonia, Argiva, Telchinia, Candrena, Reſcinthes, Proſymna, Imbraſia, Acrea, Cithæronia, Bunea, Ammonia, Fluonia, Anthea, Migale, Gemelia, Tropeia, Boopis, Parthenos, Teleia, Xera, Egophage, Hyperchinia, Juga, Ilithyia, Lucina, Pronuba, Caprotina, Mena, Populonia, Lacinia, Soſpita, Moneta, Curis, Domiduca, Februa, Opigenia, &c. *Cic. de Nat. JUNON-

JUNONĀLIA & JUNONIA, festivals at Rome in honor of Juno, the same as the Heræa of the Greeks. Vid. Heræa.

JUNŌNES, a name of the protecting genii of the women among the Romans. They generally swore by them, as the men by their genii. There were altars often erected to their honor. Plin. 2, c. 7.—Seneca, ep. 110.

JUNŌNIA, two islands, supposed to be among the Fortunate islands.——A name which Graechus gave to Carthage, when he went with 6000 Romans to rebuild it.

JUNŌNIS promontorium, a promontory of Peloponnesus.——Laciniæ templum, a temple of Juno in Italy, between Crotona and the Lacinian promontory.

JŪPĬTER, the most powerful of all the gods of the ancients. According to Varro, there were no less than 300 persons of that name; Diodorus mentions two; and Cicero three, two of Arcadia, and one of Crete. To that of Crete, who passed for the son of Saturn and Ops, the actions of the rest have been attributed. According to the opinion of the mythologists, Jupiter was saved from destruction by his mother, and entrusted to the care of the Corybantes. Saturn who had received the kingdom of the world from his brother Titan on condition of not raising male children, devoured all his sons as soon as born; but Ops, offended at her husband's cruelty, secreted Jupiter, and gave a stone to Saturn, which he devoured on the supposition that it was a male child. Jupiter was educated in a cave on mount Ida, in Crete, and fed upon the milk of the goat Amalthæa, or upon honey, according to others. He received the name of Jupiter, quasi juvans pater. His cries were drowned by the noise of cymbals and drums, which the Corybantes beat at the express command of Ops. [Vid. Corybantes.] As soon as he was a year old, Jupiter found himself sufficiently strong to make war against the Titans, who had imprisoned his father because he had brought up male children. The Titans were conquered, and Saturn set at liberty by the hands of his son. Saturn however, soon after, apprehensive of the power of Jupiter, conspired against his life, and was, for this treachery, driven from his kingdom, and obliged to fly for safety into Latium. Jupiter, now become the sole master of the empire of the world, divided it with his brothers. He reserved for himself the kingdom of heaven, and gave the empire of the sea to Neptune, and that of the infernal regions to Pluto. The peaceful beginning of his reign was soon interrupted by the rebellion of the giants, who were sons of the earth, and who wished to revenge the death of their relations the Titans. They were so powerful that they hurled rocks, and heaped up mountains upon mountains, to scale heaven, so that all the gods to avoid their fury fled to Egypt where they escaped from the danger by assuming the form of different animals. Jupiter, however, animated them, and, by the assistance of Hercules, he totally overpowered the gigantic race, which had proved such tremendous enemies. [Vid. Gigantes.] Jupiter now freed from every apprehension, gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasures. He married Metis, Themis, Euronyme, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno. [Vid Juno.] He became a Proteus to gratify his passions. He introduced himself to Danae in a shower of gold, he corrupted Antiope in the form of a satyr, and Leda in the form of a swan, he became a bull to seduce Europa, and he enjoyed the company of Ægina in the form of a flame of fire. He assumed the habit of Diana to corrupt Callisto, and became Amphitryon to gain the affections of Alcmena. His children were also numerous as well as his mistresses. Accordi g to Apollodorus 1, c. 3, he was father of the seasons, Irene, Eunomia, the Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, by Themis; of Venus, by Dione; of the Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia, by Eurynome, the daughter of Oceanus; of Proserpine, by Styx; of the nine Muses, by Mnemosyne, &c. [Vid. Niobe, Laodamia, Pyrrha, Protogenia, Electra, Maia, Semele, &c.] The worship of Jupiter was universal; he was the Ammon of the Africans, the Belus of Babylon, the Osiris of Egypt, &c. His surnames were numerous, many of which he received from the place or function over which he presided. He was severally called Jupiter Feretrius, Inventor, Elicius, Capitolinus, Latialis, Pistor, Sponsor, Herceus, Anxurus, Victor, Maximus, Optimus, Olympius, Fluvialis, &c. The worship of Jupiter surpassed that of the other gods in solemnity. His altars were not like those of Saturn and Diana, stained with the blood of human victims, but he was delighted with the sacrifice of goats, sheep, and white bulls. The oak was sacred to him because he first taught mankind to live upon acorns. He is generally represented as sitting upon a golden or ivory throne, holding, in one hand, thunderbolts just ready to be hurled, and, in the other, a sceptre of cypress. His looks express majesty, his beard flows long and neglected, and the eagle stands with expanded wings at his feet. He is sometimes represented with the upper parts of his body naked, and those below the waist carefully covered, as if to show that he is visible to the gods above, but that he is concealed from the sight of the inhabitants of the earth. Jupiter had several oracles, the most celebrated of which were at Dodona, and Ammon, in Libya.

Libya. As Jupiter was the king and father of gods and men, his power was extended over the deities, and every thing was ſubſervient to his will, except the Fates. From him mankind received their bleſſings and their miſeries, and they looked upon him as acquainted with every thing, paſt, preſent, and future. He was repreſented at Olympia with a crown like olive branches, his mantle was variegated with different flowers, particularly by the lily, and the eagle perched on the top of the ſceptre which he held in his hand. The Cretans repreſented Jupiter without ears, to ſignify that the ſovereign maſter of the world ought not to give a partial ear to any particular perſon, but be equally candid and propitious to all. At Lacedæmon he appeared with four heads, that he might ſeem to hear with greater readineſs the different prayers and ſolicitations which were daily poured to him from every part of the earth. It is ſaid that Minerva came all armed from his brains when he ordered Vulcan to open his head. Pauſ. 1, 2, &c.—Liv. 1, 4, 5, &c.—Diod. 1 & 3.—*Homer. Juſtinus M. Junianus, a Latin hiſtorian in the age of Antoninus, who epitomized the hiſtory of Trogus Pompeius. This epitome, according to ſome traditions, was the cauſe that the comprehenſive work of Trogus was loſt. It comprehends the hiſtory of the Aſſyrian, Perſian, Grecian, Macedonian, Roman empires, &c. in a neat and elegant ſtile. It is repleat with many judicious reflections, and animated harangues; but the author is often too credulous, and ſometimes examines events too minutely, while others are related only in a few words too often obſcure. The indecency of many of his expreſſions is deſervedly cenſured.——The beſt editions of Juſtin are that of Ab. Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1719, that of Hearne, 8vo. Oxon, 1703, and that of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1770.——Martyr a Greek father formerly a Platonic philoſopher, born in Paleſtine. He died in Egypt, and wrote two apologies for the Chriſtians beſides his dialogue with a Jew; two treatiſes, &c. in a plain and unadorned ſtile. The beſt editions of Juſtin Martyr are that of Paris, fol. 1636. Of his apologies, 2 vols. 8vo. 1700, and 1703, and Jebb's dialogue with Trypho, publiſhed in London, 1722.—An Emperor of the eaſt who reigned 9 years, and died, A. D. 526.——Another, who died, A. Juturna, a ſiſter of Turnus, king of the Rutuli. She heard with contempt the addreſſes of Jupiter, or, according to others, ſhe was raviſhed by him, and made immortal. She was afterwards changed into a fountain of the ſame name near the Numicus, falling into the Tiber. The waters of that fountain were uſed in ſacrifices and particularly in thoſe of Veſta. They had the power to heal diſeaſes. Varro de L. L. 1, c. 10.—Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 708. l. 2, v. 585.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 139.—Cic. Cluent. 36.

Juvenālis, Decius Junius, a poet born at Aquinum in Italy. He came early to Rome, and paſſed ſome time in declaiming; after which he applied himſelf to write ſatires, 16 of which are extant. He ſpoke with virulence againſt the partiality of Nero for the pantomine Paris, and though all his ſatire and declamation were pointed againſt this ruling favorite of the emperor, yet Juvenal lived in ſecurity during the reign of Nero. After the death of Nero, the effects of the reſentment of Paris were ſeverely felt, and the ſatiriſt was ſent by Domitian as governor on the frontiers of Egypt. Juvenal was then in the 80th year of his age, and he ſuffered much from the trouble which attended his office or rather his exile. He returned, however, to Rome after the death of Paris, and died in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 128. His writings are fiery and animated, and they abound with humor. He is particularly ſevere upon the vice and diſſipation of the age he lived in; but the groſs and indecent manner in which he expoſes to ridicule the follies of mankind, rather encourages than diſarms the debauched and licentious. He wrote with acrimony againſt all his adverſaries, and whatever diſpleaſed or offended him was expoſed to his ſevereſt cenſure. It is to be acknowledged, that Juvenal is far more correct than his contemporaries, a circumſtance, which ſome have attributed to his judgment and experience, which were uncommonly mature, as his ſatires were the productions of old age. He may be called, and with reaſon, perhaps, the laſt of the Roman poets. After him poetry decayed, and nothing more claims our attention as a perfect poetical compoſition.—The beſt editions are thoſe of Caſaubon, 4to. L. Bat. 1695, with Perſius, and of Hawkey, Dublin, 12mo. 1746, and of Grævius cum notis variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1684.

Juventas or Juventus, a goddeſs at Rome, who preſided over youth and vigor. She is the ſame as the Hebe of the Greeks, and repreſented as a beautiful nymph, arrayed in variegated garments.

JUVERNA, or HIBERNIA, an island at the west of Britain, now called Ireland. Juv. 2, v. 160.

IXIBATÆ, a people of Pontus.

IXĪON, a king of Thessaly, son of Phlegas, or, according to Hyginus, of Leontes, or according to Diodorus, of Antion by Perimela daughter of Amythaon. He married Dia, daughter of Eioneus or Deioneus, and promised his father-in-law a valuable present for the choice he had made of him to be his daughter's husband. His unwillingness, however, to fulfil his promises obliged Deioneus to have recourse to violence to obtain it, and he stole away some of his horses. Ixion concealed his resentment under the mask of friendship; he invited his father-in-law to a feast at Larissa, the capital of his kingdom, and when Deioneus was come according to the appointment, he threw him into a pit, which he had previously filled with wood and burning coals. This premeditated treachery so irritated the neighbouring princes that all of them refused to perform the usual ceremony, by which a man was then purified of murder, and Ixion was shunned and despised by all mankind. Jupiter had compassion upon him, and he carried him to heaven, and introduced him at the tables of the gods. Such a favor which ought to have awakened gratitude in Ixion, served only to inflame his lust, he became enamoured of Juno, and attempted to seduce her. Juno was willing to gratify the passion of Ixion, though according to others she informed Jupiter of the attempts which had been made upon her virtue. Jupiter made a cloud in the shape of Juno, and carried it to the place where Ixion had appointed to meet Juno. Ixion was caught in the snare, and from his embrace with the cloud, he had the Centaurs, or according to others Centaurus. [Vid. Centauri.] Jupiter, displeased with the insolence of Ixion, banished him from heaven; but when he heard that he had seduced Juno, the god struck him with his thunder, and ordered Mercury to tie him to a wheel in hell, which continually whirls round. The wheel was perpetually in motion, therefore the punishment of Ixion was eternal. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 62.—Pindar. 2. Pyth. 2.—Virg. G. 4, v. 484. Æn. 6, v. 601.—*Ovid. LABARIS, a king of Egypt after Sesostris.

LABDA, a daughter of Amphion one of the Bacchiadæ, born lame. She married Ection by whom she had a son whom she called Cypselus, because she saved his life in a coffer. [Vid. Cypselus.] This coffer was preserved at Olympia. Herodot. 5, c. 92.—Aristot. Polit. 5.

LABDACĬDES, a name given to Œdipus as descended from Labdacus.

LABDĂCUS, a son of Polydorus by Nycteis, the daughter of Nyctéus, king of Thebes. His father and mother died during his childhood, and he was left to the care of Nyctéus who at his death left his kingdom in the hands of Lycus, with orders to restore it to Labdacus as soon as of age. He was father to Laius. It is unknown whether he ever sat on the throne of Thebes. According to Statius his father's name was Phœnix. His descendants were called *Labdacides. Stat. LĂBEO, Antistius, a celebrated lawyer in the age of Augustus, whose views he opposed, and whose offers of the consulship he refused. His works are lost. He was wont to enjoy the company and conversation of the learned for six months, and the rest of the year was spent in writing and composing. His father, of the same name, was one of Cæsar's murderers. He killed himself at the battle of Philippi. Horace, 1, Sat. 3, v. 82, has unjustly taxed him with insanity, because no doubt he inveiged against his patrons. Appian. Alex. 4.—Suet. in Aug. 45.——A tribune of the people at Rome, who condemned the censor Metellus to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, because he had expelled him from the senate. naval victory over the fleet of the Cretans. He assisted Terence in composing his comedies, according to some.——Actius, an obscure poet who recommended himself to the favor of Nero by an incorrect translation of Homer into Latin. The work is lost, and only this curious line is preserved by an old scholiast, Persius, 1, v. 4. Crudum manducus Priamum, Priamique Pisinnos.

LĂBĔRIUS, J. Decimus, a Roman knight famous for his poetical talents in writing pantomimes. J. Cæsar compelled him to act one of his characters on the stage. The poet consented with great reluctance, but he shewed his resentment during the acting of the piece, by throwing severe aspersions upon J. Cæsar, and by warning the audience against his tyranny. Cæsar, however, restored him to the rank of knight, which he had lost by appearing on the stage; but to his mortification when he went to take his seat among the knights, no one offered to make room for him, and even his friend Cicero said, Recepissem te nisi angustè sederem. Laberius was offended at the affectation and insolence of Cicero, and reflected upon his unsettled and pusillanimous behaviour during the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, by the reply of Mirum si angustè sedes, qui soles duabus sellis sedere. Laberius died ten months after the murder of J. Cæsar. Some fragments remain of his poetry. Macrob. sat. 2. c. 3 & 7.—Horat. 1, sat. 10. —Senec. de controv. 18.—Suet. in Cæs. 39. ——Q. LABOTAS a river near Antioch in Syria. Strab. 16.——A son of Echestratus, who made war against Argos, &c.

LABRADEUS, a surname of Jupiter in Caria. The word is derived from labrys, which in the language of the country signifies an hatchet, which Jupiter's statue held in its hand. Plut.

LABRON, a part of Italy on the Mediterranean, supposed to be Leghorn. Cic. 2, ad. fra. 6.

LĂBŸRINTHUS, a building whose numerous passages and perplexing windings render the escape from it difficult, and almost impracticable. There were four very famous among the antients, one near the city of Crocodiles or Arsinoe, another in Crete, a third at Lemnos, and a fourth in Italy built by Porsenna. That of Egypt was the most antient, and Herodotus, who saw it, declares that the beauty and the art of the building were almost beyond belief. It was built by twelve kings who at one time reigned in Egypt, and it was intended for the place of their burial, and to commemorate the actions of their reign. It was divided into 12 halls, or according to Pliny, into 16, or as Strabo mentions, into 27. The halls were vaulted according to the relation of Herodotus. They had each six doors, opening to the north, and the same number to the south, all surrounded by one wall. The edifice contained 3000 chambers, 1500 in the upper part, and the same number below. The chambers above were seen by Herodotus, and astonished him beyond conception, but he was not permitted to see those below, where were buried the holy crocodiles and the monarchs whose munificence had raised the edifice. The roofs and walls were incrusted with marble, and adorned with sculptured figures. The halls were surrounded with stately and polished pillars of white stone, and according to some authors, the opening of the doors was artfully attended with a terrible noise like peals of thunder. The labyrinth of Crete was built by Dædalus, in imitation of that of Egypt, and it is the most famous of all in classical history. It was the place of confinement for Dædalus himself, and the prison of the Minotaur. According to Pliny the labyrinth of Lemnos surpassed the others in grandeur and magnificence. It was supported by forty columns of uncommon height and thickness, and equally admirable for their beauty and splendor. Modern travellers are still astonished at the noble and magnificent ruins which appear of the Egyptian labyrinth, at the south of the lake Mœris, about 30 miles from the ruins of Arsinoe. Mela. 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 13.—Strab. 10.—Diod. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 148.—*Virg. LĂCÆNA, an epithet applied to a female native of Laconia, and, among others, to Helen. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 511.

LĂCĔDÆMON, a son of Jupiter and Tay-

geta the daughter of Atlas, who married Sparta the daughter of Eurotas by whom he had Amyclas and Eurydice the wife of Acrisius. He was the first who introduced the worship of the Graces in Laconia, and who built them a temple. From Lacedæmon and his wife, the capital of Laconia was called Lacedæmon and Sparta. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. fab. 155.—Paus. 3, c. 1.——A noble city of Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia, called also Sparta, and now known by the name of Misatra. It has been severally known by the name of Lelegia, from the Leleges the first inhabitants of the country, or from Lelex one of their kings; and Œbalia from Œbalus the sixth king from Eurotas. It was also called Hecatompolis from the hundred cities which the whole province once contained. Lelex is supposed to have been the first king. His descendants, 13 in number, reigned successively after him, till the reign of the sons of Orestes, when the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, about 80 years after the Trojan war. Procles and Eurysthenes, the descendants of the Heraclidæ, enjoyed the crown together, and after them it was decreed that the two families should always sit on the throne together. [Vid. Eurysthenes.] These two brothers began to reign B. C. 1102, their successors in the family of Procles were called Proclidæ, and afterwards Eurypontidæ, and those of Eurysthenes, Eurysthenidæ, and afterwards Agidæ. The successors of Procles on the throne began to reign in the following order: Sous, 1060 B. C. after his father had reigned 42 years: Eurypon, 1028: Prytanis, 1021: Eunomus, 986: Polydectes, 907: Lycurgus, 898: Charilaus, 873: Nicander, 809: Theopompus, 770: Zeuxidamus, 723: Anaxidamus, 690: Archidamus, 651: Agasicles, 605: Ariston, 564: Demaratus, 526: Leotychides, 491: Archidamus, 496: Agis, 427; Agesilaus, 397: Archidamus, 361: Agis 2d. 338: Eudamidas, 330: Archidamus, 295: Eudamidas 2d. 268: Agis, 244: Archidamus, 230: Euclidas, 225: Lycurgus, 219:—The successors of Eurysthenes were Agis, 1059: Echestratus, 1058: Labotas, 1023: Doryssus, 986: Agesilaus, 957: Archelaus, 913: Teleclus, 853: Alcamenes, 813: Polydorus, 776: Eurycrates, 724: Anaxander, 687: Eurycrates 2d. 644: Leon, 607: Anaxandrides, 563: Cleomenes, 530: Leonidas, 491; Plistarchus, under guardianship of Pausanias, 480: Pleistoanax, 466: Pausanias, 408: Agesipolis, 397; Cleombrotus, 380: Agesipolis 2d. 371: Cleomenes 2d. 370: Aretus or Areus, 309: Acrotatus, 265: Areus 2d. 264: Leonidas, 257: Cleombrotus, 243: Leonidas restored, 241: Cleomenes, 235: Agesipolis, 219. Under the two last kings, Lycurgus and Agesipolis, the monarchical power was abolished, though Machanidas the tyrant made himself absolute, B. C. 210, and Nabis, 206, for 14 years. In the year 191, B. C. Lacedæmon joined the Achæan league, and about 3 years after the walls were demolished by order of Philopœmen. The territories of Laconia shared the fate of the Achæan confederacy, and the whole was conquered by Mummius, 147 B. C. and converted into a Roman province. The inhabitants of Lacedæmon have rendered themselves illustrious for their courage and intrepidity, for their love of honor and liberty, and for their aversion to sloth and luxury. They were inured from their youth to labor, and their laws commanded them to make war their profession. They never applied themselves to any trade, but their only employment was arms, and they left every thing else to the care of their slaves. [Vid. Helotæ.] They hardened their body by stripes and other manly exercises, and accustomed themselves to undergo hardships, and even to die without fear or regret. From their valor in the field and their moderation and temperance at home, they were courted and revered by all the neighbouring princes, and their assistance was severally implored to protect the Sicilians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Egyptians, Cyreneans, &c. They were forbidden by the laws of their country, [Vid. Lycurgus,] to visit foreign states, lest their morals should be corrupted by an intercourse with effeminate nations. The austere manner in which their children were educated, rendered them undaunted in the field of battle, and from this circumstance, Leonidas with a small band was enabled to resist the millions of the army of Xerxes at Thermopylæ. The women were as courageous as the men, and many a mother has celebrated with festivals the death of her son who had fallen in battle, or has coolly put him to death if by a shameful flight or loss of his arms, he brought disgrace upon his country. As to domestic manners the Lacedæmonians as widely differed from their neighbours as in political concerns, and their noblest women were not ashamed to appear on the stage hired for money. In the affairs of Greece, the interest of the Lacedæmonians was often powerful, and obtained the superiority for 500 years. Their jealousy of the power and greatness of the Athenians is well known. The authority of their monarchs was checked by the watchful eye of the Ephori, who had the power of imprisoning the kings themselves if guilty of misdemeanors. [Vid. Ephori.] The Lacedæmonians are remarkable for the hon-honor and reverence which they paid to old age. The names of Lacedæmon and Sparta are promiſcuouſly applied to the capital of Laconia, and often confounded together. The latter was applied to the metropolis, and the former was reſerved for the inhabitants of the ſuburbs, or rather of the country contiguous to the walls of the city. This propriety of diſtinction was originally obſerved, but in proceſs of time it was totally loſt, and both appellatives were ſoon ſynonymous and indiſcriminately applied to the city and country. [Vid. Sparta, Laconia.] The place where the city ſtood is now called Paleo Chori, (the old town,) and the new one erected on its ruins at ſome diſtance on the weſt is called Miſitra. Liv. 34, c. 33. l. 45, c. 28.—Strab. 8.—Thucyd. 1.—Pauſ. 3.—Juſtin. 2, 3, &c.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—Diod.—Mela. 2.——There were ſome feſtivals celebrated at Lacedæmon the names of which are not known. It was cuſtomary for the women to drag all the old bachelors round the altars and beat them with their fiſts, that the ſhame and ignominy to which they were expoſed might induce them to marry, &c. Athen. 13.

LĂCĔDÆMŎNII & LĂCĔDÆMŎNES, the inhabitants of Lacedæmon. Vid. Lacedæmon.

LĂCĔDÆMŎNIUS, a ſon of Cimon by Clitoria. He received this name for his father's regard for the Lacedæmonians. Plut.

LĂCERTA, a ſoothſayer in Domitian's age who acquired immenſe riches by his art. Juv. 7, v. 114.

LACETANIA, a diſtrict at the north of Spain. Liv. 21, c. 23.

LACHĂRES, a man who ſeized the ſupreme power at Athens when the city was in diſcord, and was baniſhed B. C. 296. Polyæn. 4.——An Athenian three times taken priſoner. He deceived his keepers, and eſcaped, &c. Id. 3.——A ſon of Mithridates king of Boſphorus. He was received into alliance by Lucullus.——A robber condemned by M. Antony.——An Egyptian buried in the labyrinth near Arſinoe.

LACHES, an Athenian general in the age of Epaminondas. Diod. 12.——An Athenian ſent with Carias at the head of a fleet in the firſt expedition undertaken againſt Sicily in the Peloponneſian war. Juſtin. 4, c. 3.——An artiſt who finiſhed the Coloſſus of Rhodes.

LĂCHĔSIS, one of the Parcæ. Her name is derived from λαχειν, to meaſure out by lot. She preſided over futurity, and was repreſented as ſpinning the thread of life, or according to others, holding the ſpindle. She generally appeared covered with a garment variegated with ſtars, and holding ſpindles in her hand. [Vid. Parcæ.] Stat. Theb. 2, v. 249.

LACIDAS, a Greek philoſopher of Cyrene who floriſhed B. C. 241. His father's name was Alexander. He was diſciple of Arceſilaus whom he ſucceeded in the government of the ſecond academy. He was greatly eſteemed by king Attalus who gave him a garden where he ſpent his hours in ſtudy. He taught his diſciples to ſuſpend their judgment, and never ſpeak deciſively. He diſgraced himſelf by the magnificent funeral with which he honored a favorite gooſe. He died through exceſs of drinking. Diog. 4.

LACĪDES, a village near Athens, where Ceres and Proſerpine had a temple. Pauſ. 1, c. 37.

LĂCĪNIA, a ſirname of Juno from her temple at Lacinium in Italy, which the Crotonians held in great veneration, and where there was a famous ſtatue of Helen by Zeuxis. [Vid. Zeuxis.] On an altar near the door were aſhes, which the wind could not blow away. Fulvius Flaccus took away a marble piece from this ſacred place to finiſh a temple that he was building at Rome to Fortuna Equeſtris; and it is ſaid, that for this ſacrilege he afterwards led a miſerable life, and died in the greateſt agonies. Strab. 6.—Ovid. 15. Met. v. 12 & 702.—Liv. 42, c. 3.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.

LACĪNIENSES, a people of Liburnia.

LACĪNIUM, a promontory of Magna Græcia now cape Colonna, the ſouthern boundary of Tarentum in Italy, where Juno Lacinia had a temple, held in great veneration. It received its name from Lacinius a famous robber killed there by Hercules. Liv. 24, c. 3. l. 27, c. 5. l. 30, c. 20.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 552.

LACMON, a part of mount Pindus where the Inachus flows. Herodot. 9, c. 93.

LACO, a favorite of Galba, mean and cowardly in his character. He was put to death.——An inhabitant of Laconia or Lacedæmon.

LACOBRIGA, a city of Spain where Sertorius was beſieged by Metellus.

LACŌNIA, LACŌNĬCA & LACEDÆMON, a country on the ſouthern parts of Peloponneſus, having Argos and Arcadia on the north, Meſſenia on the weſt, the Mediterranean on the ſouth, and the bay of Argos at the eaſt. Its extent from north to ſouth was about 50 miles. It is watered by the river Eurotas. The capital is called Sparta, or Lacedæmon. The inhabitants never went on an expedition or engaged an enemy but at the full moon. [Vid. Lacedæmon.] The brevity with which they always expreſſed themſelves is now become proverbial, and by the epithet of Laconic we underſtand whatever is conciſe and not loaded with unneceſſary words. The word Laconicum is applied to ſome hot baths uſed among the antients, and firſt invented at Lacedæmon. Cic. 4, Att. 10.—Strab. 8.—Ptol. 3, c. 16.—Mela. 2, c. 3.

LACRĂTES, a Theban, general of a detachment ſent by Artaxerxes to the aſſiſtance of the Egyptians. Diod. 16.

LACRĪNES, a Lacedæmonian ambaſſador to Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 152.

LACTANTIUS, a celebrated Chriſtian writer whoſe principal works are de irâ divinâ, de dei operibus, and his divine inſtitutions, in 7 books, in which he proves the truth of the Chriſtian religion, refutes objections, and attacks the illuſions and abſurdities of Paganiſm. The expreſſive purity, elegance, and energy of his ſtile have gained him the name of the Chriſtian Cicero. He died A. D. 325.——The beſt editions of his works are that of Sparke, 8vo. Oxon. 1684, that of Biineman, 2 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1739, and that of Du Freſnoy, 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1748.

LACTER, a promontory of the iſland of Cos.

LACYDES, a philoſopher. Vid. Lacidas.

LACŸDUS, an effeminate king of Argos.

LADAS, a celebrated courier of Alexander, born at Sicyon. He was honored with a brazen ſtatue, and obtained a crown at Olympia. Martial. 10, ep. 10.—Juv. 13, v. 97.

LADE, an iſland of the Ægean ſea, on the coaſt of Aſia minor, where was a naval battle between the Perſians and Ionians.

LADES, a ſon of Imbraſus killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 343.

LADOCEA, a village of Arcadia. Pauſ.

LADON, a river of Arcadia falling into the Alpheus. The metamorphoſis of Daphne into a laurel, and of Syrinx into a reed, happened near its banks. Strab. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Pauſ. 8, c. 25.—*Ovid. LÆLIA, a veſtal virgin.

LÆLIĀNUS, a general, proclaimed emperor in Gaul by his ſoldiers, A. D. 268, after the death of Gallienus. His triumph was ſhort; he was conquered and put to death after a few months reign by another general called Poſthumus, who aſpired to the imperial purple as well as himſelf.

C. LÆLIUS, a Roman conſul, A. U. C 612, ſirnamed Sapiens, ſo intimate with Africanus the younger, that Cicero repreſents him in his treatiſe De Amicitiâ, as explaining the real nature of friendſhip, with its attendant pleaſures. He made war with ſucceſs againſt Viriathus. It is ſaid, that he aſſiſted Terence in the compoſition of his comedies. His modeſty, humanity, and the manner in which he patronized letters, are as celebrated as his greatneſs of mind and integrity in the character of a ſtateſman. Cic. de Orat.——Another conſul who accompanied Scipio Africanus the elder in his campaigns in Spain and Africa. ——Archelaus, a famous grammarian. Suet.

LÆNA & LEÆNA, the miſtreſs of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. Being tortured becauſe ſhe refuſed to diſcover the conſpirators, ſhe bit off her tongue, totally to fruſtrate the violent efforts of her executioners.——A man who was acquainted with the conſpiracy formed againſt Cæſar.

LÆPA MAGNA, a town of Spain. Mela. 3, c. 1.

LAERTES, a king of Ithaca, ſon of Arceſius and Chalcomeduſa, who married Anticlea the daughter of Autolycus. Anticlea was pregnant by Siſyphus when ſhe married Laertes, and eight months after her union with the king of Ithaca ſhe brought forth a ſon called Ulyſſes. [Vid. Anticlea.] Ulyſſes was treated with paternal care by Laertes though not really his ſon, and Laertes ceded to him his crown and retired into the country where he ſpent his time in gardening. He was found in this mean employment by his ſon at his return from the Trojan war, after 20 years abſence, and Ulyſſes, at the ſight of his father, whoſe dreſs and old age declared his ſorrow, long heſitated whether he ſhould ſuddenly introduce himſelf as his ſon, or whether he ſhould, as a ſtranger, gradually awaken the paternal feelings of Laertes, who had believed that his ſon was no more. This laſt meaſure was preferred, and when Laertes had burſt into tears at the mention which was made of his ſon, Ulyſſes threw himſelf on his neck, exclaiming, "O father, I am he whom you weep." This welcome declaration was followed by a recital of all the hardſhips which Ulyſſes had ſuffered, and immediately after the father and ſon repaired to the palace of Penelope the wife of Ulyſſes, whence all the ſuitors who daily importuned the princeſs, were forcibly removed. Laertes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus, 1, c. 9.—Homer. Od. 11 & 24.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 32. Heroid. 1, v. 98.——A city of Cilicia which gave birth to Diogenes, ſirnamed Laertius from the place of his birth.

LAERTIUS DIOGENES, a writer born at Laertes. Vid Diogenes.

LÆSTRŸGŌNES, the moſt ancient inhabitants bitants of Sicily. Some ſuppoſe them to be the ſame as the people of Leontium, and to have been neighbours to the Cyclops. They fed on human fleſh, and when Ulyſſes came on their coaſts, they ſunk his ſhips and devoured his companions. [Vid. Antiphates.] They were of a gigantic ſtature, according to Homer's deſcription. A colony of them, as ſome ſuppoſe, paſſed over into Italy, with Lamus at their head, where they built the town of Formiæ, whence the epithet of Læſtrygonia is often uſed for that of Formiana. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 233, &c. Faſt. 4. ex Pont. 4, ep. 10.—Tzetz. in Lycophr. v. 662 & 818.—Homer. Od. 9, &c.—Sil. 7, v. 276.

LÆTA, the wife of the emperor Gratian, celebrated for her humanity and generous ſentiments.

LÆTŌRIA LEX ordered that proper perſons ſhould be appointed to provide for the ſecurity and the poſſeſſions of ſuch as were inſane, or ſquandered away their eſtates. It made it a high crime to abuſe the weakneſs of perſons under ſuch circumſtances. Cic. de Offic. 3.

LÆTUS, a Roman whom Commodus condemned to be put to death. This violence raiſed Lætus againſt Commodus; he conſpired againſt him, and raiſed Pertinax to the throne.——A general of the emperor Severus, put to death for his treachery to the emperor; or according to others on account of his popularity.

LÆVI, the antient inhabitants of Gallia Tranſpadana.

LÆVĪNUS, a Roman conſul ſent againſt Pyrrhus, A. U. C. 472. He informed the monarch that the Romans would not accept him as an arbitrator in the war with Tarentum, and feared him not as an enemy. He was defeated by Pyrrhus.——P. Val. a man deſpiſed at Rome, becauſe he was diſtinguiſhed by no good quality. Horat. 1. Sat. 6, v. 12.

LAGIA, a name of the iſland Delos. Vid. Delos.

LAGĬDES. Vid. Lagus.

LAGINIA, a town of Caria.

LAGUS, a Macedonian of mean extraction. He received in marriage Arſinoe the daughter of Meleager, who was then pregnant of king Philip, and being willing to hide the diſgrace of his wife, he expoſed the child in the woods. An eagle preſerved the life of the infant, fed him with her prey, and ſheltered him with her wings againſt the inclemency of the air. This uncommon preſervation was divulged by Lagus, who adopted the child as his own, and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing that as his life had been ſo miraculouſly preſerved, his days would be ſpent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. According to other accounts, Arſinoe was nearly related to Philip king of Macedonia, and her marriage with Lagus was not conſidered as diſhonorable, becauſe he was opulent and powerful. The firſt of the Ptolemies is called Lagus, to diſtinguiſh him from his ſucceſſors of the ſame name. Ptolemy the firſt of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wiſhed it to be believed that he was the legitimate ſon of Lagus, and he preferred the name of Lagides to all other appellations. It is even ſaid, that he eſtabliſhed a military order in Alexandria, which was called Lageion. The ſirname of Lagides was tranſmitted to all his deſcendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra, Antony's miſtreſs. Plutarch mentions an anecdote, which ſerves to ſhew how far the legitimacy of Ptolemy was believed in his age. A pedantic grammarian, ſays the hiſtorian, once diſplaying his great knowledge of antiquity in the preſence of Ptolemy, the king ſuddenly interrupted him with the queſtion of, Pray, tell me, Sir, who was the father of Peleus? Tell me, replied the grammarian without heſitation, tell me, if you can, O king! Who the father of Lagus was? This reflection on the meanneſs of the monarch's birth did not in the leaſt irritate his reſentment, though the courtiers all glowed with indignation. Ptolemy praiſed the humor of the grammarian, and ſhewed his moderation and the mildneſs of his temper, by taking him under his patronage. Pauſ. Attic.—Juſtin. 13.—Curt. 4.—Plut. de irâ cohib.—Lucan. 1, v. 684.—Ital. 1, v. 196.——A Rutulian, killed by Pallas ſon of Evander. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 381.

LAGŪSA, an iſland in the Pamphylian ſea.——Another near Crete. Strab. 10.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

LAGŸRA, a city of Taurica Cherſoneſus.

LAIAS, a king of Arcadia who ſucceeded his father Cypſelus, &c. Pauſ. 8, c. 5.——A king of Elis, &c.

LAIS, a celebrated courtezan, daughter of Timandra the miſtreſs of Alcibiades, born at Hyccara in Sicily. She was carried away from her native country into Greece, when Nicias the Athenian general invaded Sicily. She firſt began to ſell her favors at Corinth for 10,000 drachmas, and the immenſe number of princes, noblemen, philoſophers, orators, and plebeians who courted her embraces, ſhow how much commendation is owed to her perſonal charms. The expences which attended her pleaſures, gave riſe to the proverb of Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum. Even Demoſthenes himſelf viſited Corinth for the ſake of Lais, but when he was informed by the courtezan, that admittance to her bed was to be bought at the enormous ſum of about 200 l. Engliſh money, the orator departed, and obſerved, that he would not buy repentance at ſo dear a price. The charms which had attracted Demoſthenes to Corinth, had no influence upon Xenocrates. When Lais ſaw the philoſopher unmoved by her beauty, ſhe viſited his houſe herſelf; but there ſhe had no reaſon to boaſt of the licentiouſneſs or eaſy ſubmiſſion of Xenocrates. Diogenes the cynic was one of her warmeſt admirers, and though filthy in his dreſs and manners, yet he gained her heart and enjoyed her moſt unbounded favors. The ſculptor Mycon alſo ſolicited the favors of Lais, but he met with coldneſs: he, however, attributed the cauſe of his ill reception to the whiteneſs of his hair, and dyed it of a brown color, but to no purpoſe: Fool that thou art, ſaid the courtezan, to aſk what I refuſed yeſterday to thy father. Lais ridiculed the auſterity of philoſophers, and laughed at the weakneſs of thoſe who pretend to have gained a ſuperiority over their paſſions, by obſerving that the ſages and philoſophers of the age were not above the reſt of mankind, for ſhe found them at her door as often as the reſt of the Athenians. The ſucceſs which her debaucheries met at Corinth encouraged Lais to paſs into Theſſaly, and more particularly to enjoy the company of a favorite youth called Hippoſtratus. She was, however, diſappointed: the women of the place, jealous of her charms, and apprehenſive of her corrupting the fidelity of their huſbands, aſſaſſinated her in the temple of Venus, about 340 years before the Chriſtian era. Some ſuppoſe that there were two perſons of this name, a mother and her daughter. Cic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 26.—Ovid. Amor. 1, el. 5.—Plut. in Alcib.—Pauſ. 2, c. 2.

LAIĂDES, a patronymic of Œdipus ſon of Laius. Ovid. Met. 6, Fab. 18.

LĀIUS, a ſon of Labdacus, who ſucceeded to the throne of Thebes, which his grandfather Nycteus had left to the care of his brother Lycus, till his grandſon came of age. He was driven from his kingdom by Amphion and Zethus, who were incenſed againſt Lycus for the indignities which Antiope had ſuffered. He was afterwards reſtored, and married Jocaſta the daughter of Creon. An oracle informed him that he ſhould periſh by the hand of his ſon, and in conſequence of this dreadful intelligence he reſolved never to approach his wife. A day ſpent in debauch and intoxication made him violate his vow, and Jocaſta brought forth a ſon. The child as ſoon as born was given to a ſervant, with orders to put him to death. The ſervant was moved with compaſſion, and only expoſed him on mount Cithæron, where his life was preſerved by a ſhepherd. The child called Œdipus was educated in the court of Polybus, and an unfortunate meeting with his father in a narrow road proved his ruin. Œdipus ordered his father to make way for him without knowing who he was; Laius refuſed, and was inſtantly murdered by his irritated ſon. His arm bearer or charioteer ſhared his fate. LALĂCE, one of Horace's favorite miſtreſſes. Horat. 1, od. 22, &c.—Propert. 4, el. 7.

LALASSIS, a river of Iſauria.

LAMĂCHUS, a ſon of Xenophanes, ſent into Sicily with Nicias. He was killed B. C. 414, before Syracuſe, where he diſplayed much courage and intrepidity. Plut. in Alcib.——A governor of Heraclea in Pontus, who betrayed his truſt to Mithridates, after he had invited all the inhabitants to a ſumptuous feaſt.

LAMALMON, a large mountain of Æthiopia.

LAMBRĀNI, a people of Italy near the Lambrus.

LAMBRUS, a river of Ciſalpine Gaul, falling into the Po.

LĂMIA, a town of Theſſaly, at the bottom of the Sinus Maliacus or Lamiacus, and north of the river Sperchius, famous for a ſiege it ſupported after Alexander's death. [Vid. Lamiacum.] Diod. 16, &c.—Pauſ. 7, c. 6.——A river of Greece, oppoſite mount Œta.——A daughter of Neptune, mother of Hierophile, an antient Sibyl, by Jupiter. Pauſ. 10, c. 12.——A famous courtezan, miſtreſs to Demetrius Poliorcetes. Plut. in Dem.

LĂMIA & AUXESIA, two deities of Crete, whoſe worſhip was the ſame as at Eleuſis. The Epidaurians made them two ſtatues of an olive tree given them by the Athenians, provided they came to offer a ſacrifice to Minerva at Athens. Pauſ. 2, c. 30, &c.

LAMIĂCUM BELLUM happened after the death of Alexander, when the Greeks, and particularly the Athenians, incited by their orators, reſolved to free Greece from the garriſons of the Macedonians. Leoſthenes was appointed commander of a numerous force, and marched againſt Antipater, who then preſided over Macedonia. Antipater entered Theſſaly at the head of 13,000 foot and 600 horſe, and was beaten, by the ſuperior force of the Athenians and of their Greek confederates. Antipater after this blow fled to Lamia, B. C. 323, where he reſolved, with all the courage and ſagacity ſagacity of a careful general, to maintain a ſiege with about the 8 or 9000 men that had eſcaped from the field of battle. Leoſthenes, unable to take the city by ſtorm, began to make a regular ſiege. His operations were delayed by the frequent ſallies of Antipater; and Leoſthenes being killed by the blow of a ſtone, Antipater made his eſcape out of Lamia, and ſoon after, with the aſſiſtance of the army of Craterus brought from Aſia, he gave the Athenians battle near Cranon, and though only 500 of their men were ſlain, yet they became ſo diſpirited, that they ſued for peace from the conqueror. Antipater at laſt with difficulty conſented, provided they raiſed taxes in the uſual manner, received a Macedonian garriſon, defrayed the expences of the war, and laſtly delivered into his hands Demoſthenes and Hyperides, the two orators whoſe prevailing eloquence had excited their countrymen againſt him. Theſe diſadvantageous terms were accepted by the Athenians, yet Demoſthenes had time to eſcape and poiſon himſelf. Hyperides was carried before Antipater, who ordered his tongue to be cut off, and afterwards put him to death. Plut. in Demoſt.—Diod. 17.—Juſtin. 11, &c.

LĂMIÆ, ſmall iſlands of the Ægean, oppoſite Troas. Plin. 5, c. 31.——A celebrated family at Rome, deſcended from Lamus.——Certain monſters of Africa, who had the face and breaſt of a woman, and the reſt of the body like that of a ſerpent. They allured ſtrangers to come to them, that they might devour them, and though they were not endowed with the faculty of ſpeech, yet their hiſſings were pleaſing and agreeable. Some believed them to be witches, or rather evil ſpirits, who, under the form of a beautiful woman, enticed young children and devoured them. According to ſome, the fable of the Lamiæ is derived from the amours of Jupiter with a certain beautiful woman called Lamia, whom the jealouſy of Juno rendered deformed, and whoſe children ſhe deſtroyed; upon which Lamia became inſane, and ſo deſperate that ſhe eat up all the children that came in her way. They are alſo called Lemures. [Vid. Lemures.] Philoſtr. in Ap.—Horat. Art. Poet. v. 340.—Plut. de Curioſ.—Dion.

LĂMIAS ÆLIUS, a governor of Syria under Tiberius. He was honored with a public funeral by the ſenate; and as having been a reſpectable and uſeful citizen, Horace has dedicated his 26 od. lib. 1, to his praiſes, as alſo 3 od. 17.—Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 27.——Another, during the reign of Domitian, put to death, &c.

LAMĪRUS, a ſon of Hercules by Iole.

LAMPĔDO, a woman of Lacedæmon, who was daughter, wife, ſiſter, and mother of a king. She lived in the age of Alcibiades. Agrippina, the mother of Claudius, could boaſt the ſame honors. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 22 & 37.

LAMPĔTIA, a daughter of Apollo and Neæra. She with her ſiſter Phaetuſa guarded her father's flocks in Sicily when Ulyſſes arrived on the coaſts of that iſland. Theſe flocks were fourteen in number, ſeven herds of oxen and ſeven flocks of ſheep, conſiſting each of fifty. They fed by night as well as by day, and it was deemed unlawful and ſacrilegious to touch them. The companions of Ulyſſes, impelled by hunger, paid no regard to their ſanctity, or to the threats and intreaties of their chief; but they carried away and killed ſome of the oxen. The watchful keepers complained to their father, and Jupiter, at the requeſt of Apollo, puniſhed the offence of the Greeks. The hides of the oxen appeared to walk, and the fleſh which was roaſting by the fire began to bellow, and nothing was heard but dreadful noiſes and loud lowings. The companions of Ulyſſes embarked on board their ſhips, but here the reſentment of Jupiter followed them. A ſtorm aroſe, and they all periſhed except Ulyſſes, who ſaved himſelf on the broken piece of a maſt. Homer. Od. 12, v. 119.—Propert. 3, el. 12.——According to Ovid. Met. 2, v. 349, Lampetia is one of the Heliades, who was changed into a poplar tree at the death of her brother Phaeton.

LAMPETO & LAMPEDO, a queen of the Amazons, who boaſted herſelf to be the daughter of Mars. She gained many conqueſts in Aſia, where ſhe founded ſeveral cities. She was ſurprized afterwards by a band of barbarians, and deſtroyed with her female attendants. Juſtin. 2, c. 4.

LAMPEUS & LAMPIA, a mountain of Arcadia. Stat. 8.

LAMPON, LAMPOS, or LAMPUS, one of the horſes of Diomedes.——Of Hector.——Of Aurora. Homer. Il. 8. Od. 23.——A ſon of Laomedon father of Dolops.——A ſoothſayer of Athens in the age of Socrates. Plut. in Pericl.

LAMPŌNIA & LAMPŌNIUM, a city of Troas. Herodot. 5, c. 26.——An iſland on the coaſt of Thrace. Strab. 13.

LAMPONIUS, an Athenian general, ſent by his countrymen to attempt the conqueſt of Sicily.—Juſtin. 4, c. 3.

LAMPRIDIUS ÆLIUS, a Latin hiſtorian in the fourth century, who wrote the lives of ſome of the Roman emperors. His ſtile is inelegant, and his arrangement injudicious. His life of Commodus, Heliogaba-lus, Alexander Severus, &c. is ſtill extant, and to be found in the works of the Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ Scriptores.

LAMPRUS, a celebrated muſician, &c. —C. Nep. in Epam.

LAMPSĂCUS & LAMPSĂCUM, now Lamſaki, a town of Aſia Minor on the borders of the Propontis at the north of Abydos. Priapus was the chief deity of the place, of which he was reckoned by ſome the founder. His temple there was the aſylum of lewdneſs and debauchery, and exhibited ſcenes of the moſt unnatural luſt, and hence the epithet Lampſacius is uſed to expreſs immodeſty and wantonneſs. Alexander reſolved to deſtroy the city on account of the vices of its inhabitants, or more probably for its firm adherence to the intereſt of Perſia. It was, however, ſaved from ruin by the artifice of Anaximenes. [Vid. Anaximenes.] It was formerly called Pityuſa, and received the name of Lampſacus, from Lampſaces, a daughter of Mandron, a king of Phrygia, who gave information to ſome Phoceans who dwelt there, that the reſt of the inhabitants had conſpired againſt their life. This timely information ſaved them from deſtruction. The city afterwards bore the name of their preſerver. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 13.—Pauſ. 9, c. 31.—Herodot. 5, c. 117.—*C. LANGOBRIGA, a town of Luſitania.

LANŬVIUM, a town of Latium, about 16 miles from Rome on the Appian road. Juno had there a celebrated temple which was frequented by the inhabitants of Italy, and particularly by the Romans, whoſe conſuls on firſt entering upon office offered ſacrifices to the goddeſs. The ſtatue of the goddeſs was covered with a goat's ſkin, and armed with a buckler and ſpear, and wore ſhoes which were turned upwards in the form of a cone. *Cic. pro Mur. de Nat. LAOBŌTAS or LĀBOTAS, a Spartan king, of the family of the Agidæ, who ſucceeded his father Echeſtratus, B. C. 1023. During his reign war was declared againſt Argos, by Sparta. He ſat on the throne for 37 years, and was ſucceeded by Doryſſus his ſon. Pauſ. 3, c. 2.

LĀŏCOON, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba, or according to others of Antenor or of Capys. As being prieſt of Apollo, he was commiſſioned by the Trojans to offer a bullock to Neptune to render him propitious. During the ſacrifice two enormous ſerpents, iſſued from the ſea, and attacked Laocoon's two ſons who ſtood next to the altar. The father immediately attempted to defend his ſons, but the ſerpents falling upon him ſqueezed him in their complicated wreathes, ſo that he died in the greateſt agonies. This puniſhment was inflicted upon him for his temerity in diſſuading the Trojans to bring into the city the fatal wooden horſe which the Greeks had conſecrated to Minerva, as alſo for his impiety in hurling a javelin againſt the ſides of the horſe as it entered within the walls. Hyginus attributes this to his marriage againſt the conſent of Apollo, or according to others, for his polluting the temple, by his commerce with his wife Antiope, before the ſtatue ſtatue of the god. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 41 & 201.—Hygin. fab. 135.

LAODĂMAS, a ſon of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians, who offered to wreſtle with Ulyſſes, while at his father's court. Ulyſſes, mindful of the hoſpitality of Alcinous, refuſed the challenge of Laodamas. Homer. od. 7.——A ſon of Eteocles, king of Thebes. Pauſ. 9, c. 15.

LĀŏDĂMĪA, a daughter of Acaſtus and Aſtydamia, who married Proteſilaus, the ſon of Iphiclus king of a part of Theſſaly. The departure of her huſband for the Trojan war was the ſource of grief to her, but when ſhe heard that he had fallen by the hand of Hector her ſorrow was encreaſed. To keep alive the memory of a huſband whom ſhe had tenderly loved, ſhe ordered a wooden ſtatue to be made and regularly placed in her bed. This was ſeen by one of her ſervants, who informed Iphiclus, that his daughter's bed was daily defiled by an unknown ſtranger. Iphiclus watched his daughter, and when he found that the intelligence was falſe, he ordered the wooden image to be burned, in hopes of diſſipating his daughter's grief. He did not ſucceed. Laodamia threw herſelf into the flames with the image, and periſhed. This circumſtance has given occaſion to fabulous traditions related by the poets, which mention, that Proteſilaus was reſtored to life, and to Laodamia for three hours, and that when he was obliged to return to the infernal regions, he perſuaded his wife to accompany him. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Ovid. Her. ep. 13, Hygin. fab. 104.——A daughter of Bellerophon by Achemone the daughter of king Iobates. She had a ſon by Jupiter, called Sarpedon. She dedicated herſelf to the ſervice of Diana, and hunted with her, but her haughtineſs proved fatal to her, and ſhe periſhed by the arrows of the goddeſs. Homer. Il. 6, 12, & 16.—— A daughter of Alexander, king of Epirus, by Olympia the daughter of Pyrrhus. She was aſſaſſinated in the temple of Diana, where ſhe had fled for ſafety during a ſedition. Her murderer, called Milo, ſoon after turned his dagger againſt his own breaſt and killed himſelf. Juſtin. 28, c. 3.

LĀŏDĬCĒ, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who became enamoured of Acamas, ſon of Theſeus, when he came with Diomedes from the Greeks to Troy with an embaſſy to demand the reſtoration of Helen. She obtained an interview and the gratification of her deſires at the houſe of Philebia the wife of a governor of a ſmall town of Troas which the Greek ambaſſador had viſited. She had a ſon by Acamas, whom ſhe called Munitus. She afterwards married Helicaon ſon of Antenor, and Telephus king of Myſia. Some call her Aſtyoche. According to the Greek ſcholiaſt of Lycophron, Laodice threw herſelf down from the top of a tower and was killed when Troy was ſacked by the Greeks. Dictys. Cret. 1.—Pauſ. 13, c. 26.—Homer. Il. 9.——A ſiſter of Mithridates who married Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and afterwards her own brother Mithridates. During the ſecret abſence of Mithridates, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to her ſervants, in hopes that her huſband was dead; but when ſhe ſaw her expectations fruſtrated, ſhe attempted to poiſon Mithridates, for which ſhe was put to death.——A queen of Cappadocia, put to death by her ſubjects for poiſoning five of her children.——A ſiſter and wife of Antiochus 2d. She put to death Berenice, whom her huſband had married. [Vid. Antiochus 2d.] She was murdered by order of Ptolemy Evergetes, B. C. 246.——A daughter of Demetrius ſhamefully put to death by Ammonius the tyrannical miniſter of the vicious Alexander Bala, king of Syria. ——A daughter of Seleucus.——The mother of Seleucus. Nine months before ſhe brought forth ſhe dreamt that Apollo had introduced himſelf into her bed, and had preſented her with a precious ſtone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to her ſon as ſoon as born. This dream appeared the more wonderful when in the morning ſhe diſcovered in her bed a ring anſwering the ſame deſcription. Not only the ſon that ſhe brought forth, called Seleucus, but alſo all his ſucceſſors of the houſe of the Seleucidæ, had the mark of an anchor upon their thigh. Juſtin.—Appian in Syr. mentions this anchor, though in a different manner.

LĀŏDĬCĒA, now Ladik, a city of Aſia, on the borders of Caria, Phrygia, and Lydia, celebrated for its commerce, and the fine wool of its ſheep. It was originally called Dioſpolis, and afterwards Rhoas; and received the name of Laodicea in honor of Laodice, the wife of Antiochus. Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 12.—Mela. 1, c. 12.—Cic. 5, Att. 15. pro Flac.——Another in Media deſtroyed by an earthquake in the age of Nero. ——Another in Syria, called by way of diſtinction Laodicea Cabioſa, or ad Libanum. ——Another on the borders of Cœleſyria. Strab.

LAOGŪRE, a daughter of Cinyras and Metharme, daughter of Pygmalion. She died in Egypt. Id. 3, c. 14.

LAŎMĔDON, son of Ilus king of Troy, married Strymo, called by some Placia, or Leucippe, by whom he had Podarces, afterwards known by the name of Priam, and Hesione. He built the walls of Troy, and was assisted by Apollo and Neptune, whom Jupiter had banished from heaven, and condemned to be subservient to the will of Laomedon for one year. When the walls were finished Laomedon refused to reward the labors of the gods, and soon after his territories were laid waste by the god of the sea, and his subjects were visited by a pestilence sent by Apollo. Sacrifices were offered to the offended divinities, but the calamities of the Trojans encreased, and nothing could appease the gods, according to the words of the oracle, but annually to expose to a sea monster a Trojan virgin. Whenever the monster appeared the marriageable maidens were assembled, and the lot decided which of them was doomed to death for the good of her country. When this calamity had continued for five or six years, the lot fell upon Hesione, Laomedon's daughter. The king was unwilling to part with a daughter whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, but his refusal would irritate more strongly the wrath of the gods. In the midst of his fears and hesitation, Hercules came and offered to deliver the Trojans from this public calamity, if Laomedon promised to reward him with a number of fine horses. The king consented, but when the monster was destroyed, he refused to fulfil his engagements, and Hercules was obliged to besiege Troy and take it by force of arms. Laomedon was put to death after a reign of 29 years, his daughter Hesione was given in marriage to Telamon, one of the conqueror's attendants, and Podarces was ransomed by the Trojans and placed upon his father's throne. According to Hyginus, the wrath of Neptune and Apollo was kindled against Laomedon because he refused to offer on their altars, as a sacrifice, all the first born of his cattle, according to a vow he had made. *Homer. LAOUS, a river of Lacedæmon.

LAPĂTHUS, a city of Cyprus.

LAPHRIA, a surname of Diana at Patræ in Achaia, where she had a temple with a statue of gold and ivory which represented her in the habit of a huntress. This name was given to the goddess from Laphrius, the son of Delphus, who consecrated the statue to her. There was a festival of the goddess there, called also Laphria, of which Paus. 7, c. 18, gives an account.

LAPHYSTIUM, a mountain in Bœotia, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was called Laphystius. It was here that Athamas prepared to immolate Phryxus and Helle, whom Jupiter saved by sending them a golden ram. Paus. 9, c. 34.

LAPIDEUS, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans.

LĂPĬTHÆ, a people of Thessaly. Vid. Lapithus.

LAPĬTHO, a city of Cyprus.

LĂPĬTHUS, a son of Apollo, by Stilbe. He was brother to Centaurus, and married Orsinome, daughter of Euronymus, by whom he had Phorbas and Periphas. The name of Lapithæ was given to the numerous children of Phorbas and Periphas, or rather to the inhabitants of the country of which they had obtained the sovereignty. The chief of the Lapithæ assembled to celebrate the nuptials of Pirithous, one of their number, and among them were Theseus, Dryas, Hopleus, Mopsus, Phalerus, Exadius, Prolochus, Titaresius, &c. The Centaurs were also invited to partake the common festivity, festivity, and the amusements would have been harmless and innocent, had not one of the intoxicated Centaurs offered violence to Hippodamia, the wife of Pirithous. The Lapithæ resented the injury, and the Centaurs supported their companions upon which the quarrel became universal, and ended in blows and slaughter. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and they at last were obliged to retire. Theseus among the Lapithæ, shewed himself brave and intrepid in supporting the cause of his friends, and Nestor also was not less active in the protection of chastity and innocence. This quarrel arose from the resentment of Mars, whom Pirithous forgot or neglected to invite among the other gods, at the celebration of his nuptials, and therefore the divinity punished the insult by sowing dissension among the festive assembly. [Vid. Centauri.] Hesiod has described the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, as also Ovid, in a more copious manner. The invention of bits and bridles for horses is attributed to the Lapithæ. Virg. G. 3, v. 115. Æn. 6, v. 601. l. 7, v. 305. —*Ovid. Lapithæum, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 3, c. 20.

Lara or Laranda, one of the Naiads daughter of the river Almon in Latium, famous for her beauty and her loquacity, which her parents long endeavoured to correct, but in vain. She revealed to Juno the amours of her husband Jupiter with Juturna, for which the god cut off her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her to the infernal regions. The messenger of the gods fell in love with her by the way, and gratified his passion. Lara became mother of two children, to whom the Romans have paid divine honors according to the opinion of some, under the name of Lares. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 599.

Lares, gods of inferior power at Rome who presided over houses and families. They were two in number, sons of Mercury by Lara. [Vid. Lara.] In process of time their power was extended not only over houses but also over the country and the sea, and we find Lares Urbani to preside over the cities, Familiares over houses, Rustici over the country, Compitales over cross ways, Marini over the sea, Viales over the roads, Patellarii, &c. According to the opinion of some, the worship of the gods Lares, who are supposed to be the same as the manes, arises from the ancient custom among the Romans and other nations of burying their dead in their houses, and from their belief that their spirit continually hovered over the houses, for the protection of its inhabitants. The statues of the Lares resembling monkeys, and covered with the skin of a dog, were placed in a niche behind the doors of the houses, or around the hearths. At the feet of the Lares was the figure of a dog barking to intimate their care and vigilance. Incense was burnt on their altars, and a sow was also offered on particular days. Their festivals were observed at Rome in the month of May, when their statues were crowned with garlands of flowers, and offerings of fruit presented. The word Lares seems to be derived from the Etruscan word Lars, which signifies conductor, or leader. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 129. —Plut. in Quæst. Rom.—*Varro. de L. Latīnius Latiaris, a celebrated informer, &c. Tacit.

Latīnus, a ſon of Faunus by Marica, king of the Aborigines in Italy, who from him were called Latini. He married Amata by whom he had a ſon and a daughter. The ſon died in his infancy, and the daughter called Lavinia, was ſecretly promiſed in marriage by her mother to Turnus king of the Rutuli, one of her moſt powerful admirers. The gods oppoſed this union, and the oracles declared that Lavinia muſt become the wife of a foreign prince. The arrival of Æneas in Italy ſeemed favorable to this prediction, and Latinus, by offering his daughter to the foreign prince and making him his friend and ally, ſeemed to have fulfilled the commands of the oracle. Turnus however diſapproved of the conduct of Latinus, he claimed Lavinia as his lawful wife, and prepared to ſupport his cauſe by by arms. Æneas took up arms in his own defence, and Latium was the ſeat of the war. After mutual loſſes it was agreed, that the quarrel ſhould be decided by the two rivals, and Latinus promiſed his daughter to the conqueror. Æneas obtained the victory and married Lavinia. Latinus ſoon after died and was ſucceeded by his ſon-in-law. Virg. Æn. 9, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, &c. Faſt. 2, &c.—*Dionyſ. LĂTIUM, a country of Italy near the river Tiber. It was originally very circumſcribed, extending only from the Tiber to Circeii, but afterwards it comprehended the territories of the Volſci, Æqui, Hernici, Auſones, Umbri, and Rutuli. The firſt inhabitants were called Aborigines, and received the name of Latini from Latinus their king. According to others the word is derived from lateo, to conceal, becauſe Saturn concealed himſelf there when flying the reſentment of his ſon Jupiter. Laurentum was the capital of the country in the reign of Latinus; Lavinium under Æneas, and Alba under Aſcanius. (*Vid. LATMUS, a mountain of Caria near Miletus. It is famous for the reſidence of Endymion, whom the moon regularly viſited in the night, whence he is often called Latmius Heros. [Vid. Endymion.] Mela. 1, c. 17.—Ovid. Triſt. 2. Art. Am. 3.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 14.—Cic. 1. Tuſ. 28.

LATOBIUS, the god of health among the Corinthians.

LATOBRIGI, a people of Belgic Gaul.

LATOMIÆ. Vid. Latumiæ.

LATŌNA, a daughter of Cœus the Titan and Phœbe, or, according to Homer, of Saturn. She was admired for her beauty, and celebrated for the favors which ſhe granted to Jupiter. Juno, always jealous of her huſband's amours, made Latona the object of her vengeance, and ſent the ſerpent Python to diſturb her peace and perſecute her. Latona wandered from place to place in the time of her pregnancy, continually alarmed for fear of Python. She was driven from heaven, and Terra, influenced by Juno, refuſed to give her a place where ſhe might find reſt and bring forth. Neptune, moved with compaſſion, ſtruck with his trident, and made immoveable the iſland of Delos which before wandered in the Ægean, and appeared ſometimes above, and ſometimes below, the ſurface of the ſea. Latona, changed into a quail by Jupiter, came to Delos, where ſhe reſumed her original ſhape, and gave birth to Apollo and Diana, leaning againſt a palm tree or an olive. Her repoſe was of ſhort duration, Juno diſcovered the place of her retreat, and obliged her to fly from Delos. She wandered over the greateſt part of the world, and in Caria, where her fatigue compelled her to ſtop, ſhe was inſulted and ridiculed by peaſants of whom ſhe aſked for water, while they were weeding a marſh. Their refuſal and inſolence provoked her, and ſhe intreated Jupiter to puniſh their barbarity. They were all changed into frogs. She was expoſed to repeated inſults by Niobe, who boaſted herſelf greater than the mother of Apollo and Diana, and ridiculed the preſents which the piety of her neighbours had offered to Latona. [Vid. Niobe.] Her beauty proved fatal to the giant Tityus, whom Apollo and Diana put to death. [Vid. Tityus.] At laſt, Latona, though perſecuted and expoſed to the reſentment of Juno, became a powerful deity, and ſaw her children receive divine honors. Her worſhip was generally eſtabliſhed where her children received adoration, particularly at Argos, Delos, &c. where ſhe had temples. She had an oracle in Egypt, celebrated for the true deciſive anſwers which it gave. Diod. 5.—Herodot. 2, c. 155.—Pauſ. 2 & 3.—Homer. Il. 21. Hymn. in Ap. & Dian.—*Heſiod. LATOUS, a name given to Apollo as ſon of Latona. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 9.

LATREUS, one of the Centaurs, &c. Ovid.

LAUDĂMIA, a daughter of Alexander king of Epirus and Olympias daughter of Pyrrhus, killed in a temple of Diana, by the enraged populace. Juſtin, 28, c. 3.——The wife of Proteſilaus. Vid. Laodamia.

LAUDICE. Vid. Laodice.

LAVERNA, the goddeſs of thieves and diſhoneſt perſons at Rome. She did not only preſide over robbers, called from her Laverniones, but ſhe protected ſuch as deceived others, or formed their ſecret machi-machinations in obſcurity and ſilence. Her worſhip was very popular, and the Romans raiſed her an altar near one of the gates of the city, which, from that circumſtance, was called the gate of Laverna. She was generally repreſented by a head without a body. Horat. 1, ep. 16, v. 60.—Varro de L. L. 4.——A place mentioned by Plut. &c.

LAVERNIUM, a temple of Laverna, near Formiæ. Cic. 7. Att. 8.

LAUFELLA, a wanton woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 319.

LAVIANA, a province of Armenia Minor.

LĂVĪNIA, a daughter of king Latinus and Amata. She was betrothed to her relation king Turnus, but becauſe the oracle ordered her father to marry her to a foreign prince, ſhe was given to Æneas after the death of Turnus. [Vid. Latinus.] At her huſband's death ſhe was left pregnant, and being fearful of the tyranny of Aſcanius her ſon-in-law, ſhe fled into the woods, where ſhe brought forth a ſon called Æneas Sylvius. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6, & 7.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 507.—Liv. 1, c. 1.

LAVĪNIUM or LAVĪNUM, a town of Italy, built by Æneas, and called by that name in honor of Lavinia, the founder's wife. It was the capital of Latium during the reign of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 262.—Strab. 5.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Juſtin. 43, c. 2.

LAURA, a place near Alexandria in Egypt.

LAURENTĀLIA, certain feſtivals celebrated at Rome in honor of Laurentia, in the calends of January. They were, in proceſs of time, part of the Saturnalia. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 57.

LAURENTES AGRI, the country in the neighbourhood of Laurentum. Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 41.

LAURENTIA. Vid. Acca.

LAURENTĪNI, the inhabitants of Latium. They received this name from the great number of laurels which grew in the country. King Latinus found one of uncommon largeneſs and beauty, when he was going to build a temple to Apollo, and the tree was conſecrated to the god. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 59.

LAURENTUM now Paterno, the capital of the kingdom of Latium in the reign of Latinus. Vid. Laurentini. Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

LAURENTIUS, belonging to Laurentum or Latium. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 709.

LAURION, a place of Attica, where were gold mines, from which the Athenians drew conſiderable revenues, and with which they built their fleets by the advice of Themiſtocles. Theſe mines failed before the age of Strabo. Thucyd. 2.—Pauſ. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 9.

LAURON, a town of Spain, where Pompey's ſon was conquered by Cæſar's army.

LAUS, now Laino, a town on a river of the ſame name, which forms the ſouthern boundary of Lucania. Strab. 6.

LAUS POMPEIA, a town of Italy, founded by a colony ſent thither by Pompey.

LAUSUS, a ſon of Numitor, and brother of Ilia. He was put to death by his uncle Amulius, who uſurped his father's throne. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 54.——A ſon of Mezentius, king of the Tyrrhenians, killed by Æneas in the war which his father and Turnus made againſt the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 649. l. 10, v. 426, &c.

LAUTIUM, a city of Latium.

LAUTUMIÆ or LATOMIÆ, a priſon at Syracuſe cut out of the ſolid rock by Dionyſius, and now converted into a ſubterraneous garden filled with numerous ſhrubs, floriſhing in luxuriant variety. Cic. Ver. 5, c. 27.—Liv. 26, v. 27. l. 32, c. 26.

LEADES, a ſon of Aſtacus, who killed Eteoclus. Apollod.

LEÆI, a nation of Pæonia, near Macedonia.

LEÆNA, an Athenian harlot. Vid. Læna.

LEANDER, a youth of Abydos, famous for his amours with Hero. [Vid. Hero.]——A Mileſian, who wrote an hiſtorical commentary upon his country.

LEANDRE, a daughter of Amyclas, who married Arcas. Apollod.

LEANDRIAS, a Lacedæmonian refugee at Thebes, who declared, according to an ancient oracle, that Sparta would loſe the ſuperiority over Greece when conquered by the Thebans at Leuctra. Diod. 15.

LEANIRA, a daughter of Amyclas. Vid. Leandre.

LEARCHUS, a ſon of Athamas and Ino, cruſhed to death againſt a wall by his father, in a fit of madneſs. [Vid. Athamas.] Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 490.

LEBĂDĒA, now Lioadias, a town of Bœotia, near mount Helicon. It received this name from the mother of Aſpledon, and became famous for the oracle and cave of Trophonius. No moles could live there, according to Pliny. Strab. 9.—Plin. 16, c. 36.—Pauſ. 9, c. 59.

LEBĔDUS or LEBĔDOS, a town of Ionia, at the north of Colophon, where feſtivals were yearly obſerved in honor of Bacchus, and where Trophonius had a cave and a temple. Lyſimachus deſtroyed it, and carried part of the inhabitants to Epheſus. It had been founded by an Athenian colony, under one of the ſons of Codrus. Strab. 14.—Horat.

Lĕbinthos & Lebynthos, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, near Patmos. Strab. 10, —Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 222.

Lechæum, now Pelago, a port of Corinth, in the bay of Corinth. Stat. Theb. 2, v. 381.—Liv. 32, c. 23.

Lectum, a promontory, now cape Baba, ſeparating Troas from Æolia.—Liv. 37, c. 37.

Lecythus, a town of Eubœa.

Leda, a daughter of king Theſpius and Eurythemis, who married Tyndarus, king of Sparta. She was ſeen bathing in the river Eurotas by Jupiter, when ſhe was ſome few days advanced in her pregnancy, and the god ſtruck with her beauty, reſolved to deceive her. He perſuaded Venus to change herſelf into an eagle, while he aſſumed the form of a ſwan; and, after this metamorphoſis, Jupiter, as if fearful of the tyrannical cruelty of the bird of prey, fled through the air into the arms of Leda, who willingly ſheltered the trembling ſwan from the aſſaults of his ſuperior enemy. The careſſes with which the naked Leda received the ſwan, enabled Jupiter to avail himſelf of his ſituation, and, nine months after this adventure, the wife of Tyndarus brought forth two eggs, of one of which ſprang Pollux and Helena, and of the other Caſtor and Clytemneſtra. The two former were deemed the offspring of Jupiter, and the others claimed Tyndarus for their father. Some mythologiſts attribute this amour to Nemeſis, and not to Leda; and they further mention, that Leda was entruſted with the education of the children which ſprang from the eggs brought forth by Nemeſis. [Vid. Helena.] To reconcile this diverſity of opinions, others maintain that Leda received the name of Nemeſis after death. Homer and Heſiod make no mention of the metamorphoſis of Jupiter into a ſwan, whence ſome have imagined that the fable was unknown to theſe two ancient poets, and probably invented ſince their age. Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 10. —Ovid. Met. 6, v. 109.—Heſiod. 17, v. 55. —Hygin. fab. 77.—Iſocr. in Hel.—Homer. Od. 11.—Eurip. in Hel.——A famous dancer in the age of Juvenal 6, v. 63.

Ledæa, an epithet given to Hermione, &c. as related to Leda. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 328.

Ledus now Lez, a river of Gaul near the modern Montpelier. Mela. 2, c. 5.

Lĕgio, a corps of ſoldiers in the Roman armies, whoſe numbers have been different at different times. The legion under Romulus conſiſted of 3000 foot and 300 horſe, and was ſoon after augmented to 4000, after the admiſſion of the Sabines into the city. When Annibal was in Italy it conſiſted of 5000 ſoldiers, and afterwards it decreaſed to 4000, or 4500. Marius made it conſiſt of 6200, beſides 700 horſe. This was the period of its greatneſs in numbers. Livy ſpeaks of ten, and even eighteen, legions kept at Rome. During the conſular government it was uſual to levy and fit up four legions, which were divided between the two conſuls. This number was however often increaſed, as time and occaſion required. Auguſtus maintained a ſtanding army of twenty-three or twenty-five legions, and this number was ſeldom diminiſhed. In the reign of Tiberius there were 27 legions, and the peace eſtabliſhment of Adrian maintained no leſs than 30 of theſe formidable brigades. They were diſtributed over the Roman empire, and their ſtations were ſettled and permanent. The peace of Britain was protected by three legions; ſixteen were ſtationed on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, viz. two in Lower, and three in Upper, Germany; one in Noricum, one in Rhætia, three in Mœſia, four in Pannonia, and two in Dacia. Eight were ſtationed on the Euphrates, ſix of which remained in Syria, and two in Cappadocia, while the remote provinces of Egypt, Africa, and Spain, were guarded each by a ſingle legion. Beſides theſe, the tranquillity of Rome was preſerved by 20,000 ſoldiers, who, under the titles of city cohorts and of prætorian guards, watched over the ſafety of the monarch and of the capital. The legions were diſtinguiſhed by different appellations, and generally borrowed their name from the order in which they were firſt raiſed, as prima, ſecunda, tertia, quarta, &c. Beſides this diſtinction, another more expreſſive was generally added, as from the name of the emperor who embodied them, as Auguſta, Claudiana, Galbiana, Flavia, Ulpia, Trajana, Antoniana, &c. from the provinces or quarters where they were ſtationed, as Britannica, Cyrenica, Gallica, &c. from the provinces which had been ſubdued by their valor, as Parthica, Scythica, Arabica, Africana, &c. from the names of the deities whom their generals particularly worſhipped, as Minervia, Apollinaris, &c. or from more trifling accidents, as Martia, Fulminatrix, Rapax, Adjutrix, &c. Each legion was divided into ten cohorts, each cohort into three manipuli, and every manipulus into three centuries or ordines. The chief commander of the legion was called legatus, lieutenant. The ſtandards born by the legions were various. In the firſt ages of Rome a wolf was the ſtandard, in honor of Romulus; after that a hog, becauſe that animal was generally ſacrificed at at the concluſion of a treaty, and therefore it indicated that war is undertaken for the obtaining of peace. A minotaur was ſometimes the ſtandard, to intimate the ſecrecy with which the general was to act, in commemoration of the labyrinth. Sometimes a horſe or a boar was uſed, till the age of Marius, who changed all theſe for the eagle, being a repreſentation of that bird in ſilver, holding ſometimes a thunderbolt in its claws. The Roman eagle ever after remained in uſe, though Trajan made uſe of the dragon.

Leitus, one of the five Bœotian generals who came to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2. ——One of the Argonauts, ſon of Alector. Apollod. 2, c. 9.

Lelaps, a dog that never failed to ſeize and conquer whatever animal he was ordered to purſue. It was given to Procris by Diana, and Procris reconciled herſelf to her huſband by preſenting him with that valuable preſent. According to ſome, Procris had received it from Minos, as a reward for the dangerous wounds of which ſhe had cured him. Hygin. fab. 128.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 771.—Pauſ. 9, c. 19.——One of Actæon's dogs.

Lĕlĕges, (αλεγω, to gather) a wandering people, compoſed of different unconnected nations. They were originally inhabitants of Caria, and went to the Trojan war with Altes their king. Achilles plundered their country, and obliged them to retire to the neighbourhood of Halicarnaſſus, where they fixed their habitation. The inhabitants of Laconia and Megara bore this name for ſome time, from Lelex, one of their kings. Strab. 7 & 8.—Homer. Il. 21.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 725.—Pauſ. 3. c. 1.

Lelegeis, a name applied to Miletus becauſe once poſſeſſed by the Leleges. Plin. 5, c. 29.

Lelex, an Egyptian, who came with a colony to Megara, where he reigned about 200 years before the Trojan war. His ſubjects were called from him Leleges, and the place Lelegeia mœnia. Pauſ. 3, c. 1.——A Greek, who was the firſt king of Laconia in Peloponneſus. His ſubjects were alſo called Leleges, and the country where he reigned Lelegia. Id.

Lemanis, a place in Britain, where Cæſar is ſuppoſed to have firſt landed, and therefore placed by ſome at Lime in Kent.

Lemannus, a lake in the country of the Allobroges, through which the Rhone flows. It is now called the lake of Geneva or Lauſanne. Lucan. 1, v. 396.—Mela. 2, c. 5.

Lemnos, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, between Tenedos, Imbros, and Samothrace. It was ſacred to Vulcan, called Lemnius pater, who fell there when kicked down from heaven by Jupiter. [Vid. Vulcanus.] It was celebrated for two horrible maſſacres, that of the Lemnian women murdering their huſbands, [Vid. Hipſipyle.] and that of the Lemnians, or Pelaſgi, in killing all the children they had had by ſome Athenian women, whom they had carried away to become their wives. Theſe two acts of cruelty have given riſe to the proverb of Lemnian actions, which is applied to all barbarous and inhuman deeds. The firſt inhabitants of Lemnos were the Pelaſgi, or rather the Thracians, who were murdered by their wives. After them came the children of the Lemnian widows by the Argonauts, whoſe deſcendants were at laſt expelled by the Pelaſgi, about 1100 years before the Chriſtian era. Lemnos is about 112 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, who ſays, that it is often ſhadowed by mount Athos, though at the diſtance of 87 miles. It has been called Hipſipyle, from queen Hipſipyle. It is famous for a certain kind of earth or chalk, called terra Lemnia, or terra ſigillata, from the ſeal or impreſſion which it can bear. As the inhabitants were blackſmiths, the poets have taken occaſion to fix the forges of Vulcan in that iſland, and to conſecrate the whole country to his divinity. Lemnos is alſo celebrated for a labyrinth, which, according to ſome traditions, ſurpaſſed thoſe of Crete and Egypt. Some remains of it were ſtill viſible in the age of Pliny. The iſland of Lemnos, now called Stalimene, was reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades, and the Carians, who then inhabited it, obliged to emigrate. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 454.—*Homer. Lemovices, a people of Gaul, now Lemouſin & Limoges. Cæſ. G. 7, G. 4

Lemovii, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ.

Lĕmŭres, the manes of the dead. The ancients ſuppoſed that the ſouls, after death, wandered all over the world, and diſturbed the peace of its inhabitants. The good ſpirits were called Lares familiares, and the evil ones were known by the name of Larvæ, or Lemures. They terrified the good, and continually haunted the wicked and impious; and the Romans had the ſuperſtition to celebrate feſtivals in their honor, called Lemuria or Lemuralia, in the month of May. They were firſt inſtituted by Romulus to appeaſe the manes of his brother Remus, from whom they were called Remuria, and, by corruption, Lemuria. Theſe ſolemnities continued three nights, during which the temples of the gods were ſhut, and marriages prohibited. It was uſual for the people people to throw black beans on the graves of the deceaſed, or to burn them, as the ſmell was ſuppoſed to be inſupportable to them. They alſo muttered magical words, and, by beating kettles and drums, they believed that the ghoſts would depart, and no longer come to terrify their relations upon earth. Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 421, &c.

LĔMŪRIA & LĔMŪRĀLIA. Vid. Lemures.

LENÆUS, a ſirname of Bacchus, from ληνος, a wine preſs. There was a feſtival, called Lenæa, celebrated in his honor, in which the ceremonies obſerved at the other feſtivals of the god chiefly prevailed. There were, beſides, poetical contentions, &c. Pauſ.—Virg. G. 2, v. 4. Æn. 4, v. 207. —Ovid. Met. 4, v. 14.——A learned grammarian, ordered by Pompey to tranſlate into Latin ſome of the phyſical manuſcripts of Mithridates, king of Pontus.

LENTŬLUS, a celebrated family at Rome, which produced many great men in the commonwealth. The moſt illuſtrious were L. Corn. Lentulus, a conſul, A. U. C. 428. who diſperſed ſome robbers who infeſted Umbria.——Batiatus Lentulus, a man who trained up ſome gladiators at Capua, which eſcaped from his ſchool.——Corn. Lentulus, ſirnamed Sura. He joined in Catiline's conſpiracy, and aſſiſted in corrupting the Allobroges. He was convicted in full ſenate by Cicero, and put in priſon, and afterwards executed.——A conſul who triumphed over the Samnites.——Cn. Lentulus, ſirnamed Gætulicus, was made conſul, A. D. 26, and was, ſome time after, put to death by Tiberius, who was jealous of his great popularity. He wrote an hiſtory, mentioned by Suetonius, and attempted alſo poetry.——L. Lentulus, a friend of Pompey, put to death in Africa.——P. Corn. Lentulus, a prætor, defeated by the rebellious ſlaves in Sicily.——Lentulus Spinther, a ſenator, kindly uſed by J. Cæſar, &c.——A tribune at the battle of Cannæ.——P. Lentulus, a friend of Brutus, mentioned by Cicero (de Orat. 1, c. 48.) as a great and conſummate ſtateſman.——Beſides theſe, there are a few others, whoſe name is only mentioned in hiſtory, and whoſe life was not marked by any uncommon event. The conſulſhip was in the family of the Lentuli in the years of Rome 428, 477, 515, 516, 551, 553, 594, 596, &c. Tacit. Ann. —Liv.—Flor.—Plin.—Plut.—Eutrop.

LEO, a native of Byzantium, who floriſhed 350 years before the Chriſtian era. His philoſophical and political talents endeared him to his countrymen, and he was always ſent upon every important occaſion as ambaſſador to Athens, or to the court of Philip, king of Macedonia. This monarch, well acquainted with the abilities of Leo, was ſenſible that his views and claims to Byzantium would never ſucceed while it was protected by the vigilance of ſuch a patriotic citizen. To remove him he had recourſe to artifice and perfidy. A letter was forged, in which Leo made ſolemn promiſes of betraying his country to the king of Macedonia for money. This was no ſooner known than the people ran enraged to the houſe of Leo, and the philoſopher, to avoid their fury, and without attempting his juſtification, ſtrangled himſelf. He had written ſome treatiſes upon phyſic and hiſtory, which have been loſt. Plut.——A Corinthian at Syracuſe, &c.——A king of Sparta.——A ſon of Eurycrates. Athen. 12.—Philoſtr.——An emperor of the eaſt, ſirnamed the Thracian. He reigned 17 years, and died A. D. 474, being ſucceeded by Leo the Second for 10 months, and afterwards by Zeno.

LEOCORION, a monument erected by the Athenians to Paſithea, Theope, and Eubule, daughters of Leos, who immolated themſelves when an oracle had ordered that, to ſtop the raging peſtilence, ſome of the blood of the citizens muſt be ſhed. Ælian. 12, c. 28.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 19.

LEOCRĂTES, an Athenian general, who floriſhed B. C. 460, &c. Diod. 11.

LEODĂMAS, a ſon of Eteocles, one of the ſeven Theban chiefs who defended the city againſt the Argives. He killed Ægialeus, and was himſelf killed by Alcmæon.——A ſon of Hector and Andromache. Dictys. Cret.

LEON, a king of Sparta. Herodot. 7, c. 204. ——A town of Sicily, near Syracuſe. Liv. 24, c. 25.

LEONA, a courtezan, called alſo Læna. Vid. Læna.

LEONĂTUS, one of Alexander's generals. His father's name was Eunus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Alexander's conqueſt of Aſia, and once ſaved the king's life in a dangerous battle. After the death of Alexander, at the general diviſion of the provinces, he received for his portion that part of Phrygia which borders on the Helleſpont. He was empowered by Perdiccas to aſſiſt Eumenes in making himſelf maſter of the province of Cappadocia, which had been allotted to him. Like the reſt of the generals of Alexander, he was ambitious of power and dominion. He aſpired to the ſovereignty of Macedonia, and ſecretly communicated to Eumenes the different plans he meant to purſue to execute his deſigns. He paſſed from Aſia into Europe to aſſiſt Antipater againſt the Athenians, and was killed in a battle which was fought soon after his arrival. Historians have mentioned, as an instance of the luxury of Leonatus, that he employed a number of camels to procure some earth from Egypt to wrestle upon, as, in his opinion, it seemed better calculated for that purpose. Plut. in Alex. —Curt.—Diod. 18.—C. Nep. in Eum.—— A Macedonian with Pyrrhus in Italy against the Romans.

Leonĭdas, a celebrated king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Eurysthenicæ, sent by his countrymen to oppose Xerxes, king of Persia, who had invaded Greece with about five millions of souls. He was offered the kingdom of Greece by the enemy, if he would not oppose his views; but Leonidas heard the proposal with indignation, and observed, that he preferred death for his country, to an unjust though extensive dominion over it. Before the engagement Leonidas exhorted his soldiers, and told them all to dine heartily, as they were to sup in the realms of Pluto. The battle was fought at Thermopylæ, and the 300 Spartans, who alone had refused to abandon the scene of action, withstood the enemy with such vigor, that they were obliged to retire, wearied and conquered during three successive days, till Ephialtes, a Trachinian, had the perfidy to conduct a detachment of Persians by a secret path up the mountains, whence they suddenly fell upon the rear of the Spartans, and crushed them to pieces. Only one escaped of the 300; he returned home, where he was treated with insult and reproaches, for flying ingloriously from a battle in which his brave companions, with their royal leader, had perished. This celebrated battle, which happened 480 years before the Christian era, taught the Greeks to despise the numbers of the Persians, and to rely upon their own strength and intrepidity. Temples were raised to the fallen hero, and festivals, called Leonidea, yearly celebrated at Sparta, in which free-born youths contended. Leonidas, as he departed for the battle from Lacedæmon, gave no other injunction to his wife, but, after his death, to marry a man of virtue and honor, to raise from her children deserving of the name and greatness of her first husband. Herodot. 7, c. 120, &c.—C. Nep. in Them.—Justin. 2.—Val. Max. 1. c. 6.—Paus. 3, c. 4.—Plut. in Lyc. & Cleom. ——A king of Sparta after Areus II. 257 years before Christ. He was driven from his kingdom by Cleombrotus, his son-in-law, and afterwards re-established.——A preceptor to Alexander the Great.——A friend of Parmenio, appointed commander, by Alexander, of the soldiers who lamented the death of Parmenio, and who formed a separate cohort. Curt. 7, c. 2 ——A learned man of Rhodes, greatly commended by Strabo, &c.

Leontium & Leontīni, a town of Sicily, about five miles distant from the seashore. It was built by a colony from Chalcis, in Eubœa, and was, according to some accounts, once the habitation of the Læstrygones, for which reason the neighbouring fields are often called Læstrygonii campi. The country was extremely fruitful, whence Cicero calls it the grand magazine of Sicily. The wine which it produced was the best of the island. The people of Leontium implored the assistance of the Athenians against the Syracusans, B. C. 427. Thucyd. 6.—Polyb. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 467.—Ital. 14, v. 126.

Leontium, a celebrated courtezan of Athens, who studied philosophy under Epicurus, and became one of his most renowned pupils. She prostituted herself to the philosopher's scholars, and even to Epicurus himself, if we believe the reports which were raised by some of his enemies. [Vid. Epicurus.] Metrodotus shared her favors in the most unbounded manner, and by him she had a son, to whom Epicurus was so partial that he recommended him to his executors on his dying bed. Leontium not only professed herself a warm admirer and follower of the doctrines of Epicurus, but she even wrote a book in support of them against Theophrastus. This book was valuable, if we believe the testimony and criticism of Cicero, who praised the purity and elegance of its stile, and the truly Attic turn of the expressions. Leontium had also a daughter called Danae, who married Sophron. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 33.

Leonton or Leontopŏlis, a town of Egypt, where lions are worshipped. Ælian. H. An. 12, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 10.

Leontychides. Vid. Leotychides.

Leos, a son of Orpheus, who immolated his three daughters for the good of Athens. Vid. Leocorion.

Leosthĕnes, an Athenian general, who, after Alexander's death, drove Antipater to Thessaly, where he besieged him in the town of Lamia. The success which for a while attended his arms was soon changed by a fatal blow which he received from a stone thrown by the besieged, B. C. 323. The death of Leosthenes was followed by a total defeat of the Athenian forces. The funeral oration over his body was pronounced at Athens by Hyperides, in the absence of Demosthenes, who had been lately banished for taking a bribe from Harpalus. [Vid. Lamiacum.] Diod. 17 & 18.—Strab. 9. ——Another general of Athens, condemned on account of the bad success which attended his arms against Peparethos.

Leotychides, a king of Sparta, son of Menares,

Menares, of the family of the Proclidæ He was ſet over the Grecian fleet, and, by his courage and valor, he put an end to the Perſian war at the famous battle of Mycale. It is ſaid that he cheared the ſpirits of his fellow ſoldiers at Mycale, who were anxious for their countrymen in Greece, by raiſing a report that a battle had been fought at Platæa, in which the barbarians had been defeated. This ſucceeded, and though the information was falſe, yet a battle was fought at Platæa, in which the Greeks obtained the victory the ſame day that the Perſian fleet was deſtroyed at Mycale. Leotychides was accuſed of a capital crime by the Ephori, and, to avoid the puniſhment which his guilt ſeemed to deſerve, he fled to the temple of Minerva at Tegea, where he periſhed, B. C. 469, after a reign of 22 years. He was ſucceeded by his grandſon Archidamus. Pauſ. 3, c. 7 & 8.—Diod. 11.——A ſon of Agis, king of Sparta, by Timæa. The legitimacy of his birth was diſputed by ſome, and it was generally believed that he was the ſon of Alcibiades. He was prevented from aſcending the throne of Sparta by Lyſander, though Agis had declared him upon his death-bed his lawful ſon and heir, and Ageſilaus was appointed in his place. C. Nep. in Ageſ.—Plut.—Pauſ. 3, c. 8.

Lepĭda, a noble woman, accuſed of attempts to poiſon her huſband, from whom ſhe had been ſeparated for 20 years. She was condemned under Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 22.——A woman who married Scipio.——Domitia, a daughter of Druſus and Antonia, great niece to Auguſtus, and aunt to the emperor Nero. She is deſcribed by Tacitus as a common proſtitute, infamous in her manners, violent in her temper, and yet celebrated for her beauty. She was put to death by means of her rival Agrippina, Nero's mother. Tacit.——A wife of Galba the emperor.——A wife of Caſſius, &c.

Lepĭdus M. Æmilius, a Roman, celebrated as being one of the triumvirs with Auguſtus and Antony. He was of an illuſtrious family, and, like the reſt of his contemporaries, he was remarkable for his ambition, to which was added a narrowneſs of mind, and a great deficiency of military abilities. He was ſent againſt Cæſar's murderers, and, ſome time after, he leagued with M. Antony, who had gained the heart of his ſoldiers by artifice, and that of their commander by his addreſs. When his influence and power among the ſoldiers had made him one of the triumvirs, he ſhewed his cruelty, like his colleagues, by his proſcriptions, and even ſuffered his own brother to be ſacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirate. He received Africa as his portion in the diviſion of the empire; but his indolence ſoon rendered him deſpicable in the eyes of his ſoldiers and of his colleagues; and Auguſtus, who was well acquainted with the unpopularity of Lepidus, went to his camp and obliged him to reſign the power to which he was entitled as being a triumvir. After this degrading event, he ſunk into obſcurity, and retired, by order of Auguſtus, to Cerceii, a ſmall town on the coaſt of Latium, where he ended his days in peace, B. C. 13, and where he was forgotten as ſoon as out of power. Appian.—Plut. in Aug.—Flor. 4, c. 6 & 7.——A Roman conſul, ſent to be the guardian of young Ptolemy Epiphanes, whom his father had left to the care of the Roman people. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 67.—Juſtin. 30, c. 3.——A ſon of Julia, the grand-daughter of Auguſtus. He was intended by Caius as his ſucceſſor in the Roman empire. He committed adultery with Agrippina when young. Dion. 59.——An orator mentioned by Cicero in Brut.——A cenſor, A. U. C. 734.

Lepontii, a people at the ſource of the Rhine. Plin. 3, c. 20.

Lepreos, a ſon of Pyrgeus, who built a town in Elis, which he called after his own name. He laid a wager that he would eat as much as Hercules; upon which he killed an ox and eat it up. He afterwards challenged Hercules to a trial of ſtrength, and was killed. Pauſ. 5, c. 5.

Leprium or Lepreos, a town of Elis. Cic. 6. Att. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 5.

Leptĭnes, a general of Demetrius, who ordered Cn. Octavius, one of the Roman ambaſſadors, to be put to death.——A ſon of Hermocrates, of Syracuſe, brother to Dionyſius. He was ſent by his brother againſt the Carthaginians, and experienced ſo much ſucceſs that he ſunk fifty of their ſhips. He was afterwards defeated by Mago, and baniſhed by Dionyſius. He always continued a faithful friend to the intereſts of his brother, though naturally an avowed enemy to tyranny and oppreſſion. He was killed in a battle with the Carthaginians. Diod. 15.——A famous orator at Athens, who endeavoured to unload the people from oppreſſive taxes. He was oppoſed by Demoſthenes.——A tyrant of Apollonia, in Sicily, who ſurrendered to Timoleon. Diod. 16.

Leptis, the name of two cities of Africa, one of which, called Major, now Lebida, was near the Syrtes, and had been built by a Tyrian or Sidonian colony. The other, called Minor, now Lemta, was about eighteen Roman miles from Adrumetum. It paid every day a talent to the republic of Carthage, by way of tribute. Lucan. 2,

The Argives uſed to carry fire to this ſolemnity from a temple upon mount Crathis, dedicated to Diana. Pauſ.

LERO, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Gaul.

LEROS. Vid. Leria.

LESBOS, a large iſland in the Ægean ſea, now known by the name of Metelin, 168 miles in circumference. It has been ſeverally called Pelaſgia, from the Pelaſgi by whom it was firſt peopled, Macaria from Macareus who ſettled in it, and Leſbos from the ſon-in-law and ſucceſſor of Macareus who bore the ſame name. The chief towns of Leſbos were Methymna and Mitylene. Leſbos was originally governed by kings, but they were afterwards ſubjected to the neighbouring powers. The wine which it produced was greatly eſteemed by the antients, and ſtill is in the ſame repute among the moderns. The Leſbians were ſo debauched and diſſipate, that the epithet of Leſbian was often uſed to ſignify debauchery and extravagance. Leſbos has given birth to many illuſtrious perſons, ſuch as Arion, Terpander, &c. The beſt verſes were by way of eminence often called Leſbeum carmen, from Alcæus and Sappho, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves for their poetical compoſitions, and were alſo natives of the place. Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. G. 2, v. 90.—Horat. 1, ep. 11.—Herodot. 1, c. 160.

LESBUS or LESBOS, a ſon of Lapithas, grandſon of Æolus, who married Methymna daughter of Macareus. He ſucceeded his father-in-law, and gave his name to the iſland over which he reigned.

LESCHES, a Greek poet of Leſbos, who floriſhed B. C. 600. Some ſuppoſe him to be the author of the little Iliad, of which only few verſes remain quoted by Pauſ. 10, c. 25.

LESTRĪGŎNES. Vid. Læſtrygones.

LETĀNUM, a town of Propontis, built by the Athenians.

LETHÆUS, a river of Lydia flowing by Magneſia into the Mæander. Strab. 10, &c.——Another of Macedonia.——Of Crete.

LĒTHE, one of the rivers of hell, whoſe waters the ſouls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain ſpace of time in Tartarus. It had the power of making them forget whatever they had done, ſeen, or heard before, as the name implies, λήθη, oblivion.——Lethe is a river of Africa, near the Syrtes, which runs under the ground, and ſome time after riſes again, whence the origin of the fable of the Lethean ſtreams of oblivion.——There is alſo a river of that name in Spain.——Another in Bœotia, whoſe waters were drunk by thoſe who conſulted the oracle of Trophonius. Lucan. 9, v. 355.—Ovid. Triſt. 4, el. 1, v. 47.—Virg. G. 4, v. 545. Æn. 6, v. 714.—Ital. 1, v. 235. l. 10, v. 555.—Pauſ. 9, c. 39.—Horat. 4, od. 7, v. 27.

LETUS, a mountain of Liguria. Liv. 41, c. 18.

LEVĀNA, a goddeſs at Rome, who preſided over the action of the perſon who took up from the ground a newly born child, after it had been placed there by the midwife. This was generally done by the father, and ſo religiouſly obſerved was this ceremony, that the legitimacy of a child could be diſputed without it.

LEUCA, a town of the Salentines near a cape of the ſame name in Italy. Lucan. 5, v. 376.——A town of Ionia——of Crete——of Argolis. Strab. 6, &c.

LEUCAS or LEUCADIA, an iſland of the Ionian ſea now called St. Maura, near the coaſt of Epirus, famous for a promontory called Leucate, Leucas, or Leucates, where deſponding lovers threw themſelves into the ſea. Sappho had recourſe to this leap to free herſelf from the violent paſſion which ſhe entertained for Phaon. The word is derived from λευκος, white, on account of the whiteneſs of its rocks. Apollo had a temple on the promontory, whence he is often called Leucadius. The iſland was formerly joined to the continent by a narrow iſthmus, which the inhabitants dug through after the Peloponneſian war. Ovid. Heroid. 15, v. 171.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ital. 15, v. 302.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 274. l. 8, v. 677.——A town of Phœnicia.

LEUCASPIS,

Leucaspis, a Lycian, one of the companions of Æneas, drowned in the Tyrrhene sea. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 334.

Leucate. Vid. Leucas.

Leuce, a small island in the Euxine sea, of a triangular form, between the mouths of the Danube and the Borysthenes. According to the poets, the souls of the ancient heroes were placed there as in the Elysian fields, where they enjoyed perpetual felicity, and reaped the repose to which their benevolence to mankind, and their exploits during life, seemed to entitle them. From that circumstance it has often been called the island of the blessed, &c. According to some accounts Achilles celebrated there his nuptials with Iphigenia, or rather Helen, and shared the pleasures of the place with the manes of Ajax, &c. Strab. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ammian. 22.—Q. Calab. 3, v 773.——One of the Oceanides whom Pluto carried into his kingdom.

Leuci, a people of Gaul, between the Moselle and the Maese. Their capital is now called Toul. Cæs. B. G 1, c 40.——Mountains on the west of Crete, appearing at a distance like white clouds, whence the name.

Leucippe, one of the Oceanides.

Leucippides, the daughters of Leucippus. Vid. Leucippus.

Leucippus, a celebrated philosopher of Abdera, about 428 years before Christ, disciple to Zeno. He was the first who invented the famous system of atoms and of a vacuum, which was afterwards more fully explained by Democritus and Epicurus. Many of his hypotheses have been adopted by the moderns, with advantage. Diogenes has written his life.——A brother of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who married Philodice daughter of Inachus, by whom he had two daughters, Hilaira and Phœbe, known by the patronymic of Leucippides. They were carried away by their cousins Castor and Pollux, as they were going to celebrate their nuptials with Lynceus and Idas. Ovid. Fast. 5, v 701.—Apollod. 3, c. 10. &c.—Paus. 3, 17 & 26.——A son of Xanthus, descended from Bellerophon. He became deeply enamoured of one of his sisters, and when he was unable to check or restrain his unnatural passion, he resolved to gratify it. He acquainted his mother with it, and threatened to murder himself if she attempted to oppose his views or remove his affection. The mother, rather than lose a son whom she tenderly loved, cherished his passion, and by her consent her daughter yielded herself to the arms of her brother. Some time after the father resolved to give his daughter in marriage to a Lycian prince. The future husband was informed that the daughter of Xanthus secretly entertained a lover, and he communicated the intelligence to the father. Xanthus upon this secretly watched his daughter, and when Leucippus had introduced himself to her bed, the father, in his eagerness to discover the seducer, occasioned a little noise in the room. The daughter was alarmed, and as she attempted to escape she received a mortal wound from her father, who took her to be the lover. Leucippus came to her assistance, and stabbed his father in the dark, without knowing who he was. This accidental parricide obliged Leucippus to fly from his country. He came to Crete, where the inhabitants refused to give him an asylum, when acquainted with the atrociousness of his crime, and he at last came to Ephesus, where he died in the greatest misery and remorse. Hermesianax apud Parthen. c. 5.——A son of Œnomaus, who became enamoured of Daphne, and to obtain her confidence disguised himself in a female dress, and attended his mistress as a companion. He gained the affections of Daphne by his obsequiousness and attention, but his artifice at last proved fatal, for when Daphne and her attendants were bathing in the Ladon, the sex of Leucippus was discovered, and he perished by the darts of the females. Parthen. Erotic. c. 15.—Paus. 8, c. 20.——A son of Hercules by Marse, one of the daughters of Thespius. Apollod. 3, c. 7.

Leucŏla, a part of Cyprus.

Leucon, a tyrant of Bosphorus, who lived in great intimacy with the Athenians. He was a great patron of the useful arts, and greatly encouraged commerce. Strab.—Diod. 14.——A son of Athamas and Themisto. Paus. 6, c. 22.——A king of Pontus killed by his brother, whose bed he had defiled. Ovid. in Ib. 3.——A town of Africa near Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 160.

Leucōne, a daughter of Aphidas, who gave her name to a fountain of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 44.

Leucōnes, a son of Hercules. Apollod.

Leuconoe, a daughter of Lycambes. The Leuconoe to whom Horace addresses his 1 od. 11, seems to be a fictitious name.

Leucopĕtra, a place on the isthmus of Corinth, where the Achæans were defeated by the consul Mummius.——A promontory six miles east from Rhegium in Italy, where the Apeninnes terminate and sink into the sea.

Leucŏphrys, a temple of Diana, with a city of the same name, near the Mæander.—An ancient name of Tenedos. Paus. 10, c. 14.

Leucos, a river of Macedonia near Pydna.——A man, &c. Vid. Idomeneus.

Leucosia, a ſmall iſland in the Tyrrhene ſea. It received its name from one of the companions of Æneas, who was drowned there, or from one of the Sirens, who was thrown there by the ſea. Strab. 5. —Ovid. Met. 15, v. 708.

Leucosyrii, a people of Aſia Minor, called afterwards Cappadocians. Strab. 12. The ſame name is given to the inhabitants of Cilicia where it borders on Cappadocia. C. Nep. 14, c. 1.

Leucothoe or Leucothea, the wife of Athamas, changed into a ſea deity. [Vid. Ino.] She was called Matura by the Romans, who raiſed her a temple, where all the people, particularly women, offered vows for their brother's children. They did not entreat the deity to proteſt their own children, becauſe Ino had been unfortunate in her's. No female ſlaves were permitted to enter the temple, or if their curioſity tempted them to tranſgreſs this rule, they were beaten away with the greateſt ſeverity. To this ſupplicating for other people's children, Ovid alludes in theſe lines; Faſt. 6.

Non tamen hanc proſtirpe ſuâ pia mater adorat, Ipſa parum felix viſa fuiſſe parens.

——A daughter of king Orchamus by Eurynome. Apollo became enamoured of her, and to introduce himſelf to her with greater facility, he aſſumed the ſhape and features of her mother. Their happineſs was complete, when Clytia, who tenderly loved Apollo, and was jealous of his amours with Leucothoe, diſcovered the whole intrigue to her father, who ordered his daughter to be buried alive. The lover, unable to ſave her from death, ſpringled nectar and ambroſia on her tomb, which penetrating as far as the body changed it into a beautiful tree which bears the frankincenſe. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 196.——An iſland of the Tyrrhene ſea, near Capreæ.——A fountain of Samos.——A town of Egypt,—of Arabia. Mela. 2, c. 7.——A part of Aſia which produces frankincenſe.

Leuctra, a village of Bœotia, between Platæa and Theſpia, famous for the victory which Epaminondas the Theban general obtained over the ſuperior force of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, on the 8th of July, B. C. 371. In this famous battle 4000 Spartans were killed, with their king Cleombrotus, and no more than 300 Thebans. From that time the Spartans loſt the empire of Greece, which they had obtained for near 500 years. Plut. in Pelop. & Ageſ.—C. Nep. in Epam. —Juſtin. 6, c. 6.—*Xenophon. Hiſt. Lexovii, a people of Gaul, at the mouth of the Seine, conquered with great ſlaughter by a lieutenant of J. Cæſar. Cæſ. bell. G.

Libanius, a celebrated ſophiſt of Antioch in the age of the emperor Julian. He was educated at Athens, and opened a ſchool at Antioch, which produced ſome of the beſt and moſt of the literary characters of the age. Libanius was naturally vain and arrogant, and he contemptuouſly refuſed the offers of the emperor Julian, who wiſhed to purchaſe his friendſhip and intimacy by raiſing him to offices of the greateſt ſplendor and affluence in the empire. When Julian had impriſoned the ſenators of Antioch for their impertinence, Libanius undertoook the defence of his fellow citizens, and paid a viſit to the emperor, in which he aſtoniſhed him by the boldneſs and independence of his expreſſions, and the firmneſs and reſolution of his mind. Some of his orations, and above 1600 of his letters are extant; they diſcover much affectation and obſcurity of ſtile, and we cannot perhaps much regret the loſs of writings which afforded nothing but a diſplay of pedantry, and quotations from Homer. Julian ſubmitted his writings to the judgment of Libanius with the greateſt confidence, and the ſophiſt freely rejected or approved, and ſhowed that he was more attached to the perſon than the fortune and greatneſs of his prince. The time of his death is unknown.——The beſt edition of Libanius ſeems to be that of Paris, fol. 1606, with a ſecond volume publiſhed by Morell, 1627. His epiſtles have been edited by Wolf. fol. 1738.

Libanus, a high mountain of Syria, famous for its cedars. Strab. 6.

Libentina, a ſirname of Venus, who had a temple at Rome, where the young women uſed to dedicate the toys and childiſh amuſements of their youth, when arrived at nubile years. Varro.

Liber, a ſirname of Bacchus, which ſignifies free. He received this name from his delivering ſome cities of Bœotia from ſlavery, or according to others, becauſe wine, of which he was the patron, delivered mankind mankind from their cares, and made them ſpeak with freedom and unconcern. The word is often uſed for wine itſelf. Senec. de trang. anim.

LIBĔRA, a goddeſs, the ſame as Proſerpine. Cic in Ver. 4, c. 48.——A name given to Ariadne by Bacchus, or Liber, when he had married her. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 513.

LIBĔRĀLIA, feſtivals yearly celebrated in honor of Bacchus the 17th of March. Slaves were then permitted to ſpeak with freedom, and every thing bore the appearance of independence. They are much the ſame as the Dionyſia of the Greeks. Varro.

LIBERTAS, a goddeſs of Rome, who had a temple on mount Aventine, raiſed by T. Gracchus. She was repreſented as a woman in a light dreſs, holding a rod in one hand, and a cap in the other, both ſigns of independence, as the former was uſed by the magiſtrates in the manumiſſion of ſlaves, and the latter was worn by ſlaves, who were ſoon to be ſet at liberty. Sometimes a cat was placed at her feet, as this animal is very fond of liberty, and impatient when confined. Liv. 24, c. 16. l. 25, c. 7.—Ovid. Triſt. 3, el. 1, v. 72.—Plut. in Grac.—Dio. Caſ. 44.

LĪBĒTHRA, a fountain of Magneſia in Theſſaly or of Bœotia according to ſome, ſacred to the Muſes, who from thence are called Libethrides. Virg. Ecl. 7, v. 21.—Plin. 4, c. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Strab. 9 & 10.

LĪBĒTHRĬDES, a name given to the Muſes from the fountain Libethra, or from mount Libethrus in Thrace.

LIBURNUM MARE, the ſea which borders on the coaſts of Liburnia.

LIBURNUS, a mountain of Campania.

LĬBYA, a daughter of Epaphus and Caſſiopea, who became mother of Agenor and Belus by Neptune. Apollod. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 1.—Pauſ. 1, 44.——A name given to Africa one of the three grand diviſions of the ancient globe. Libya, properly ſpeaking, is only a part of Africa, bounded on the eaſt by Ægypt, and on the weſt by that part called by the moderns the kingdom of Tripoli. The ancients, according to ſome traditions, mentioned by Herodotus, and others, ſailed round Africa, by ſteering weſtward from the Red Sea, and entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules, after a perilous navigation of three years. From the word Libya, are derived the epithets of Libys, Libyſſa, Libyſis, Libyſtis, Libycus, Libyſticus, Libyſtinus, Libyſtæus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 106 l. 5, v. 37.—Lucan. 4.—Salluſt. &c.

LIBŸCUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coaſt of Cyrene. Strab. 2.

LIBYCUS & LYBISTIS. (Vid Lybia.)

LIBYS, a ſailor, &c. Ovid. Met. 3.

LIBYSSA, a river of Bithynia, with a town of the ſame name, where was the tomb of Annibal ſtill extant in the age of Pliny.

LICATES, a people of Vindelicia.

LICHA, a city near Lycia.

LICHADES, ſmall iſlands near Cæneum, a promontory of Eubœa, called from Lichas. Vid. Lichas. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 155, 218.—Strab. 9.

LICHAS, a ſervant of Herculeswho brought him the poiſoned tunic from Dejanira. He was thrown by his maſter into the ſea with great violence, and changed into a rock in the Eubœan ſea, by the compaſſion of the gods. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 211.

LICHES, an Arcadian, who found the bones of Oreſtes buried at Tegea, &c. Herodot.

LICĬNIA LEX, was enacted by L. Licinius Craſſus, and Q. Mutius, conſuls, A. U. C. 657. It ordered all the inhabitants of Italy to be enrolled on the liſt of citizens in their reſpective cities.——Another by C. Licinius Craſſus the tribune, A. U. C 608. It transferred the right of chuſing prieſts from the college to the people. It was propoſed but did not paſs.——Another by C. Licinius Stolo the tribune. It forbad any perſon to poſſeſs 500 acres of land, or keep more than 100 head of large cattle, or 500 of ſmall.——Another by P. Licinius Varus, A. U. C. 545, to ſettle the day for the celebration of the Ludi Apollinares, which was before uncertain.——Another by P. Licinius Craſſus Dives, B. C. 110. It was the ſame as the Fannian law, and farther required that no more than 30 aſſes ſhould be ſpent at any table on the calends, nones, or nundinæ, and only three pounds of freſh and one of ſalt meat, on ordinary days. None of the fruits of the earth were forbidden. ——Another de ſodalitiis, by M. Licinius the conſul 690. It impoſed a ſevere penalty on party clubs, or ſocieties aſſembled or frequented for election purpoſes, as coming under the definition of ambitus, and of offering violence in ſome degree to the freedom and independence of the people.—— Another called alſo Æbutia, by Licinius and Æbutius the tribunes. It enacted, that when any law was preferred with reſpect to any office or power, the perſon who propoſed the bill, as well as his colleagues in office, his friends and relations ſhould be declared incapable of being inveſted with the ſaid office or power.

LICĬNIA, the wife of C. Gracchus, who attempted to diſſuade her huſband from his ſeditious meaſures by a pathetic ſpeech. She was deprived of her dowry after the death of Caius.——A veſtal virgin accuſed of incontinence, but acquitted, A U. C 636.——Another veſtal, put to death for her laſciviouſneſs under Trajan.——The wife of Mecænas diſtinguiſhed for conjugal tenderneſs. She was ſiſter to Proculeius, and bore alſo the name of Terentia. Horat. 2, od 12, v. 13.

C. LICĬNIUS, a tribune of the people celebrated for the conſequence of his family, for his intrigues and abilities. He was a plebeian, and was the firſt of that body who was raiſed to the office of a maſter of horſe to the dictator. He was ſirnamed Stolo, or uſeleſs ſprout, on account of the law, which he had enacted during his tribuneſhip. [Vid. Licinia lex by Stolo.] He afterwards made a law which permitted the plebeians to ſhare the conſular dignity with the patricians, A. U. C. 388. He reaped the benefits of this law, and was one of the firſt plebeian conſuls. This law was propoſed and paſſed by Licinius, as it is reported, at the inſtigation of his ambitious wife, who was jealous of her ſiſter who had married a patrician, and who ſeemed to be of a higher dignity in being the wife of a conſul. Liv. 6, c. 34.—Plut.——C. Calvus, a celebrated orator and poet in the age of Cicero. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence in the forum, and his poetry, which ſome of the ancients have compared to Catullus. His orations are greatly commended by Quintilian. Some believe that he wrote annals quoted by Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus. He died in the 30th year of his age. Quintil.—Cic. in Brut. 81.—— Macer, a Roman accuſed by Cicero when prætor. He derided the power of his accuſer, but when he ſaw himſelf condemned he grew ſo deſperate that he killed himſelf. Plut.——P. Craſſus a Roman ſent againſt Perſeus king of Macedonia. He was at firſt defeated, but afterwards repaired his loſſes and obtained a complete victory, &c.—— A conſul ſent againſt Annibal.——Another who defeated the robbers that infeſted the Alps.——A high prieſt.——A conſul, &c. ——Lucullus. Vid. Lucullus.——Craſſus. Vid. Craſſus.——Mucianus, a Roman who wrote about the hiſtory and geography of the eaſtern countries, often quoted by Pliny. He lived in the reign of Veſpaſian.——P. Tegula, a comic poet of Rome about 200 years before Chriſt. He is ranked as the fourth of the beſt comic poets which Rome produced. Few lines of his compoſitions are extant. He wrote an ode which was ſung all over the city of Rome by nine virgins during the Macedonian war. Liv. 31, c. 12.——Varro Muræna, a brother of Proculeius, who conſpired againſt Auguſtus with Fannius Cæpio and ſuffered for his crime. Horace addreſſed his 2 od. 10, to him and recommended equanimity in every ſituation. Dio. 54.——C. Flavius Valerianus a celebrated Roman emperor. His father was a poor peaſant of Dalmatia, and himſelf a common ſoldier in the Roman armies. His valor recommended him to the notice of Galerius Maximianus, who had once ſhared with him the inferior and ſubordinate offices of the army, and had lately been inveſted with the imperial purple by Diocletian. Galerius loved him for his friendly ſervices, particularly during the Perſian war, and he ſhowed his regard for his merit by taking him as a colleague in the empire, and appointing him over the province of Pannonia and Rhætia. Conſtantine, who was alſo one of the emperors, courted the favor of Licinius, and made his intimacy more durable by giving him his ſiſter Conſtantia in marriage, A. D. 313. The continual ſucceſſes of Licinius, particularly againſt Maximinus, encreaſed his pride, and rendered him jealous of the greatneſs of his brother-in-law. The perſecutions of the Chriſtians, whoſe doctrines Conſtantine followed, ſoon cauſed a rupture, and Licinius had the mortification to loſe two battles, one in Pannonia, and the other near Adrianopolis. Treaties of peace were made between the contending powers, but the reſtleſs ambition of Licinius ſoon broke them; after many engagements a deciſive battle was fought near Chalcedonia. Ill-fortune again attended Licinius, he was conquered, and fled to Nicomedia, where ſoon the conqueror obliged him to ſurrender, and to reſign the imperial purple. The tears of Conſtantia obtained forgiveneſs for her huſband, yet Conſtantine knew what turbulent and active enemy had fallen into his hands, therefore he ordered him to be ſtrangled at Theſſalonica A. D. 324. His family was involved in his ruin. The avarice, licentiouſneſs and cruelty of Licinius, are as conſpicuous as his misfortunes. He was an enemy to learning, and this averſion totally proceeded from his ignorance of letters, and the ruſticity of his education. His ſon by Conſtantia bore alſo the ſame name. He was honored with the title of Cæſar, when ſcarce 20 months old. He was involved in his father's ruin, and put to death by order of Conſtantine.

Licīnus, a barber and freedman of Auguſtus, raiſed by his maſter to the rank and dignity of a ſenator, merely becauſe he hated Pompey's family. Horat. Art. P. 301.

Licymnius, a ſon of Electryon and brother of Alcmena. He was ſo infirm in his old age, that when he walked he was always ſupported by a ſlave. Triptolemus, ſon of Hercules, ſeeing the ſlave inattentive to his duty threw a ſtick at him, which unfortunately killed Licymnius. The murderer fled to Rhodes. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Homer. Il. 2.—Pind. Olymp. 7.

Lide, a mountain of Caria. Herodot. 1, c. 175.

Q. Ligarius, a Roman pro-conſul of Africa, after Conſidius. In the civil wars he followed the intereſt of Pompey, and was pardoned when Cæſar had conquered his enemies. Cæſar, however, and his adherents were determined upon the ruin of Ligarius; but Cicero, by an eloquent oration, ſtill extant, defeated his accuſers and he was pardoned. He became afterwards one of Cæſar's murderers. Cic. pro Lig.—Plut. in Cæſar.

Liger, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 576.

Liger or Ligĕris, now La Loire, a large river of Gaul falling into the ocean. Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 18.—Cæſ. G. 7, c. 55 & 75.

Ligŏras, an officer of Antiochus king of Syria, who took the town of Sardis by ſtratagem, &c.

Ligŭres, the inhabitants of Liguria. Vid. Liguria.

Ligŭria, a country at the weſt of Italy, bounded on the eaſt by the river Macra, on the ſouth by part of the Mediterranean called the Liguſtic ſea, on the weſt by the Varus, and on the north by the Po. The commercial town of Genoa was anciently and is now the capital of the country. The origin of the inhabitants is not known. According to ſome they were deſcended from the ancient Gauls or Germans, or, as others ſuppoſe, they were of Greek origin, perhaps the poſterity of the Ligyes mentioned by Herodotus. Liguria was ſubdued by the Romans, and its chief harbour now bears the name of Leghorn. Lucan. 1, v. 442.—Mela. 2, c. 1.—Strab. 4, &c.—Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 15.—Plin. 2, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 5, c. 35. l. 22, c. 33. l. 39, c. 6, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann.—Flor. 2, c. 8.

Ligurīnus, a poet. Martial. 3, ep. 50.——A beautiful youth in the age of Horace, 4, od. 1, v. 33.

Ligus, a woman who inhabited the Alps. She concealed her ſon from the purſuit of Otho's ſoldiers, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 13.

Liguſtĭcæ Alpes, a part of the Alps which borders on Liguria, ſometimes called Maritimi.

Liguſticum Mare, the north part of the Tyrrhene ſea, now the gulf of Genoa. Plin. 2, c. 47.

Ligyes, a people of Aſia who inhabited the country between Caucaſus and the river Phaſis. Some ſuppoſe them to be a colony of the Ligyes of Europe, more commonly called Ligures. Herodot. 7, c. 72.

Ligyrgum, a mountain of Arcadia.

Lilæa, a town of Achaia near the Cephiſus. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 348.

Lĭlўbæum, now Boco, a promontory of Sicily, with a town of the ſame name near the Ægates now Marſalla. The town was ſtrong and very conſiderable, and it maintained long ſieges againſt the Carthaginians, Romans, &c. particularly one of ten years againſt Rome in the firſt Punic war. It had a port large and capacious, which the Romans, in the wars with Carthage, endeavoured in vain to ſtop and fill up with ſtones, on account of its convenience and vicinity to the coaſt of Africa. Nothing now remains of this once powerful city but the ruins of temples and aqueducts. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 706.—Mela.

Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Cic. in Verr. 5.—Cæſ. de bell. Afric.—Diod. 22.

LIMÆA, a river of Luſitania. Strab. 3.

LIMENIA, a town of Cyprus. Id. 14.

LIMNÆ, a fortified place on the borders of Laconia and Meſſenia. Pauſ.——A town of the Thracian Cherſoneſus.

LIMNÆUM, a temple of Diana at Limnæ.

LIMNATIDIA, a feſtival in honor of Diana, ſirnamed Limnatis, from Limnæ, a ſchool of exerciſe at Trœzene, where ſhe was worſhipped, or from λιμναι, ponds, becauſe ſhe preſided over fiſhermen.

LIMNIĂCE, the daughter of the Ganges, mother of Atys. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 48.

LIMNONIA, one of the Nereides. Homer. Il. 18.

LIMON, a place of Campania between Neapolis and Puteoli. Stat. 3. Sylv. 1.

LIMONUM, a town of Gaul, afterwards Pictavi, Poictiers. Cæſ. G. 8, c. 26.

LIMYRA, a town of Lycia at the mouth of the Limyrus. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 645.—Vell. 2, c. 102.

LINCASII, a people of Gaul Narbonenſis.

LINDUM, a colony of Britain, now Lincoln.

LINDUS, a city at the ſouth-eaſt part of Rhode, built by Cercaphus ſon of Sol and Cydippe. The Danaides built there a temple to Minerva, and one of its colonies founded Gela in Sicily. It gave birth to Cleobulus, one of the ſeven wiſe men, and to Chares and Laches, who were employed in making and finiſhing the famous Coloſſus of Rhodes. Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Plin. 34.—Herodot. 7, c. 153.——A grandſon of Apollo. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

LINGŎNES, now Langres, a people of Gallia Belgica, made tributary to Rome by J. Cæſar. They paſſed into Italy, where they made ſome ſettlement near the Alps, at the head of the Adriatic. Tacit. H. 4, c. 55.—Martial. 11, ep. 57, v. 9. l. 14, ep. 159.—Lucan. 1, v. 398.—Cæſ. bell. G. 1, c. 26.

LINTERNA PALUS, a lake of Campania. Ital. 7, v. 278.

LINTERNUM, a town of Campania where Scipio Africanus died and was buried. Liv. 34, c. 45.—Sil. 6, v. 654. l. 7, v. 278.—Cic. 10. Att. 13.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 713.

LINUS. This name is common to different perſons whoſe hiſtory is confuſed, who are often taken one for the other. One was ſon of Urania, and Amphimarus the ſon of Neptune. Another was ſon of Apollo by Pſammathe daughter of Crotopus king of Argos. Martial mentions him in his 78, ep. l. 9. The third, ſon of Iſmenius, and born at Thebes in Bœotia, taught muſic to Hercules, who in a fit of anger, ſtruck him on the head with his lyre and killed him. He was ſon of Mercury and Urania, according to Diogenes, who mentions ſome of his philoſophical compoſitions, in which he aſſerted that the world had been created in an inſtant. He was killed by Apollo, for preſuming to compare himſelf to him. Apollodorus, however, and Pauſanias mention that his ridicule of Hercules on his awkwardneſs in holding the lyre was fatal to him. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diog. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 4,—Pauſ. 2, c. 15. l. 9, c. 20.——A fountain in Arcadia, whoſe waters were ſaid to prevent abortion. Plin. 31, c. 2.

LIODES, one of Penelope's ſuitors, killed by Ulyſſes. Homer. Od. 22, &c.

LIPĂRA, the largeſt of the Æolian iſlands on the coaſt of Sicily, now called the Lipari. It had a city of the ſame name, which according to Diodorus it received from Liparus the ſon of Auſon, king of theſe iſlands, whoſe daughter Cyane was married by his ſucceſſor Æolus, according to Pliny. The inhabitants of this iſland were powerful by ſea, and from the great tributes which they paid to Dionyſius, the tyrant of Syracuſe, they may be called very opulent. The iſland was celebrated for the variety of its fruits, and its raiſins are ſtill in general repute. It had ſome convenient harbours, and a fountain whoſe waters were much frequented on account of their medicinal powers. According to Diodorus, Æolus reigned at Lipara before Liparus. Liv. 5, c. 28.—Plin. 3, c. 9.—Ital. 14, v. 57.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56. l. 8, v. 417.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.——A town of Etruria.

LIPĂRIS, a river of Cilicia, whoſe waters were like oil. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Vitruv. 8, c. 3.

LIPHLUM, a town of the Æqui, taken by the Romans.

LIPODORUS, one of the Greeks ſettled in Aſia by Alexander, &c.

LIQUENTIA, now Livenza, a river of Ciſalpine Gaul, falling into the Adriatic ſea. Plin. 3, c. 18.

LIRCÆUS, a fountain near Nemæa. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 711.

LIRIŎPE, one of the Oceanides, mother of Narciſſus by the Cephiſus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 311.——A fountain of Bœotia on the borders of Theſpis, where Narciſſus was drowned according to ſome accounts.

LIRIS, now Garigliano, a river of Campania, which it ſeparates from Latium. It falls into the Mediterranean ſea. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Horat. 3, od. 17.—Lucan. 2, v. 424.——A warrior killed by Camilla, &c. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 670.

Lʏcinias, a town of Theſſaly. Liv. 32, c. 14.

Lisson, a river of Sicily.

Lissus, now Aleſſo, a town of Macedonia on the confines of Illyricum. Plin. 3, c. 22. Liv. 44, c. 10. Lucan. 5, v. 719.——A river of Thrace, falling into the Ægean ſea, between Thaſos and Samothrace. It was dried up by the army of Xerxes, when he invaded Greece. Strab. 7.—Herodot 7, c. 109.

Lista, a town of the Sabines, whoſe inhabitants are called Liſtini.

Litabrum, now Buitrago, a town of Spain Tarraconenſis. Liv. 32, c. 14. l. 35, c. 22.

Litana, a wood in Gallia Togata. Liv. 23, c. 24.

Litavĭcus, one of the Ædui, who aſſiſted Cæſar with 10,000 men. Cæſ. bell. G. 7, c. 37.

Liternum, a town of Campania.

Lithobŏlia, a feſtival celebrated at Trœzene in honor of Lamia and Auxeſia, who came from Crete, and were ſacrificed by the fury of the ſeditious populace, and ſtoned to death. Hence the name of the ſolemnity, λιθοβολια, lapidation.

Lithrūs, a town of Armenia Minor. Strab.

Litubium, a town of Liguria. Liv. 32, c. 29.

Lityersas, the legitimate ſon of Midas king of Phrygia. He made ſtrangers prepare his harveſt, and afterwards put them to death. Theocrit.

Līvia Lex, de ſociis, propoſed to make all the inhabitants of Italy free citizens of Rome. M Livius Druſus who framed it, was found murdered in his houſe before it paſſed.——Another by M. Livius Druſus the tribune A. U. C. 662, which required that the judicial power ſhould be lodged in the hands of an equal number of knights and ſenators.

Līvia Drusilla, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of L. Druſus Calidianus. She married Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom ſhe had the emperor Tiberius and Druſus Germanicus. The attachment of her huſband to the cauſe of Antony was the beginning of her greatneſs. Auguſtus ſaw her as ſhe fled from the danger which threatened her huſband, and he reſolved to marry her, though ſhe was then pregnant. He divorced his wife Scribonia, and, with the approbation of the augurs, he celebrated his nuptials with Livia. She now took advantage of the paſſion of Auguſtus, in the ſhare that ſhe enjoyed of his power and imperial dignity. Her children by Druſus were adopted by the complying emperor; and, that ſhe might make the ſucceſſion of her ſon Tiberius more eaſy and undiſputed, Livia is accuſed of ſecretly involving in one common ruin, the heirs and neareſt relations of Auguſtus. Her cruelty and ingratitude are ſtill more ſtrongly marked, when ſhe is charged with having murdered her own huſband, to haſten the elevation of Tiberius. If ſhe was anxious for the aggrandizement of her ſon, Tiberius proved ungrateful, and hated a woman to whom he owed his life, his elevation, and his greatneſs. Livia died in the 86th year of her age, A. D. 29. Tiberius ſhewed himſelf as undutiful after her death as before, for he neglected her funeral, and expreſsly commanded that no honors, either private or public, ſhould be paid to her memory. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3. —Suet. in Aug. & Tib.—Dion. Caſſ.——Another [Vid. Druſilla.]——Another called Horeſtilla, &c. She was debauched by Galba, as ſhe was going to marry Piſo. Suet. in Gal. 25.——Another, called alſo Occllina. She was Galba's ſtepmother, and committed adultery with him. Id. ib. 3.

Livineius, a friend of Pompey, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 11, &c.

Livilla, a daughter of Druſus.——A ſiſter of Caligula, &c. Vid. Julia.

Līvius Andronīcus, a dramatic poet who floriſhed at Rome about 240 years before the Chriſtian era. He was the firſt who turned the perſonal ſatyres and ſcfcennine verſes, ſo long the admiration of the Romans, into the form of a proper dialogue and regular play. Though the character of a player, ſo valued and applauded in Greece, was reckoned vile and deſpicable among the Romans, Andronicus acted a part in his dramatical compoſitions and engaged the attention of his audience, by repeating what he had laborioufly formed after the manner of the Greeks. Andronicus was the freedman of M. Livius Salinator, whoſe children he educated. His poetry was grown obſolete in the age of Cicero, whoſe nicety and judgment would not even recommend the reading of it. Some few of his verſes are preſerved in the Corpus Poetarum.——M. Salinator, a Roman conſul ſent againſt the Illyrians. The ſucceſs with which he finiſhed his campaign, and the victory which ſome years after he obtained over Aſdrubal, who was paſſing into Italy with a reinforcement for his brother Annibal, ſhow how deſerving he was to be at the head of the Roman armies. Liv.——Druſus, a tribune who joined the patricians in oppoſing the ambitious views of C. Gracchus. Plut. in Grace.——An uncle of Cato of Utica. Plut.——Titus a native of Padua, celebrated for his writings. He paſſed the greateſt part of his life at Naples and Rome, but more particularly at the court court of Auguſtus, who liberally patronized the learned, and encouraged the progreſs of literature. Few particulars of his life are known, yet his fame was ſo univerſally ſpread even in his life time, that an inhabitant of Gades traverſed Spain, Gaul, and Italy, merely to ſee the man whoſe writings had given him ſuch pleaſure and ſatisfaction in the peruſal. Livy died at Padua, in his 67th year, and according to ſome, on that ſame day Rome was alſo deprived of another of its brighteſt ornaments by the death of the poet Ovid, A. D. 17. It is ſaid that Livia had appointed Livy to be the preceptor to young Claudius the brother of Germanicus, but death prevented the hiſtorian from enjoying an honor to which he was particularly entitled by his learning and his univerſal knowledge. The name of Livy is rendered immortal by his hiſtory of the Roman empire. Beſides this he wrote ſome philoſophical treatiſes and dialogues, with a letter addreſſed to his ſon, on the merit of authors, which ought to be read by young men. This letter is greatly commended by Quintilian, who expatiates with great warmth on the judgment and candor of the author. His Roman hiſtory was comprehended in 140 books, of which only 35 are extant. It began with the foundation of Rome, and was continued till the death of Druſus in Germany. The merit of this hiſtory is well known, and the high rank which Livy holds among hiſtorians will never be diſputed. He is always great, his ſtile is clear and intelligible, labored without affectation, diffuſive without tediouſneſs, and argumentative without pedantry. In his harangues he is bold and animated, and in his narrations and deſcriptions, he claims a decided ſuperiority. He is always elegant, and though many have branded his provincial words with the name of Patavinity, yet the expreſſions, or rather the orthography of words, which in Livy are ſuppoſed to diſtinguiſh a native of a province of Italy from a native of Rome, are not loaded with obſcurity, and the perfect claſſic is as familiarly acquainted with the one as with the other. Livy has been cenſured, and perhaps with juſtice, for being too credulous, and burdening his hiſtory with vulgar notions and ſuperſtitious tales. He may diſguſt when he mentions that milk and blood were rained from heaven, or that an ox ſpoke, or a woman changed her ſex, yet he candidly confeſſes that he recorded only what made an indelible impreſſion upon the minds of a credulous age. His candor has alſo been called in queſtion, and he has ſometimes ſhown himſelf too partial to his countrymen, but every where he is an indefatigable ſupporter of the cauſe of juſtice and virtue. The works of Livy have been divided by ſome of the moderns into 14 decades, each conſiſting of ten books. The firſt decade comprehends the hiſtory of 460 years. The ſecond decade is loſt, and the third comprehends the hiſtory of the ſecond Punic war which includes about 18 years. In the fourth decade, Livy treats of the wars with Macedonia and Antiochus, which contain about 23 years. For the firſt five books of the fifth decade, we are indebted to the reſearches of the moderns. They were found at Worms, A. D. 1431. Theſe are the books that remain of Livy's hiſtory, and the loſs which the celebated work has ſuſtained by the ravages of time, has in ſome meaſure been compentated by the labors of J. Freinſhemius, who with great attention and induſtry has made an epitome of the Roman hiſtory, which is now incorporated with the remaining books of Livy. The third decade ſeems to be ſuperior to the others, yet the author has not ſcrupled to copy from his contemporaries and predeceſſors, and we find many paſſages taken word for word from Polybius, in which the latter has ſhown himſelf more informed in military affairs and ſuperior to his imitator. The beſt editions of Livy will be found to be thoſe of Maittaire, 6 vols. 12vo. London, 1722; of Drakenborch, 7 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1738, and of Ruddiman, 4 vols. 12vo. Edin. 1751.——A governor of Tarentum who delivered his truſt to Annibal, &c.——A high prieſt who devoted Decius to the Dii Manes.——A commander of a Roman fleet ſent againſt Antiochus in the Helleſpont.

Lixus, a river of Mauritania with a city of the ſame name. Antæus had a palace there, and according to ſome accounts it was in the neighbourhood that Hercules conquered him. Ital. 3, v. 258.—Mela. 3, c. 10.—Strab. 2.——A ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod.

Loceus, a man who conſpired againſt Alexander with Dymnus, &c. Curt. 6, c. 7.

Locha, a large city of Africa, taken and plundered by Scipio's ſoldiers.

Lochias, a promontory and citadel of Egypt near Alexandria.

Locri, a town of Magna Græcia in Italy on the Adriatic not far from Rhegium. It was founded by a Grecian colony about 757 years before the Chriſtian era, as ſome ſuppoſe. The inhabitants were called Locri or Locrenſes. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 399.—Strab.—Plin.—Liv. 22, c. 6. l. 23, c. 30.——A town of Locris in Greece.

Locris,

Locris, a country of Greece, whose inhabitants are known by the name of Ozolæ, Epicnemidii, and Opuntii. The country of the Ozolæ, called also Epizephyrii from their westerly situation, was at the north of the bay of Corinth and extended above 12 miles northward. On the west it was separated from Ætolia by the Evenus, and it had Phocis at the east. The chief city was called Naupactus. The Epicnemidii, were at the north of the Ozolæ, and had the bay of Malia at the east, and Œta on the north. They received their name from the situation of their residence near a mountain called Cnemis. They alone of all the Locrians, had the privilege of sending members to the council of the Amphictyons. The Opuntii who received their name from their chief city called Opus, were situated on the borders of the Euripus, and near Phocis and Eubœa. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ptol.—Mela.—Liv. 26, c. 26. l. 28 c. 6.—*Pauf. Locusta, a celebrated woman at Rome in favor with Nero. She poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and at last attempted to destroy Nero himself, for which she was executed. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 66, &c.—Suet in Ner. 33.

Locutius. Vid. Aius.

Lollia Paullina, a beautiful woman who married Caius Cæsar, and afterwards Caligula. She was divorced and put to death by means of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 1, &c.

Lollĭānus Spurius, a general proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in Gaul and soon after murdered, &c.——A consul, &c.

M. Lollius, a companion and tutor of C. Cæsar the son-in-law of Tiberius. He was consul and offended Augustus by his rapacity in the provinces. Horace has addressed two of his epistles to him, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3.

Londĭnum, the capital of Britain founded as some suppose between the age of Julius Cæsar and Nero. It has been severally called Londinium, Lundinum, &c. Ammianus calls it vetustum oppidum. It is represented as a considerable, opulent, and commercial town, in the age of Nero. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 33.—Ammian.

Longārēnus, a man guilty of adultery with Fausta, Sylla's daughter. Horat. 1. Sat. 2, v. 67.

Longimănus, a surname of Artaxerxes from his having one hand longer than the other. The Greeks called him Macrochir. C. Nep. in Reg.

Longīnus, Dionysius Cassius, a celebrated Greek philosopher and critic of Athens. He was preceptor of the Greek language, and afterwards minister, to Zenobia, the famous queen of Palmyra, and his ardent zeal and spirited activity in her cause proved, at last, fatal to him. When the emperor Aurelian entered victorious the gates of Palmyra, Longinus was sacrificed to the fury of the Roman soldiers, A. D. 273. At the moment of death he showed himself great and resolute, and with a philosophical and unparalleled firmness of mind, he even repressed the tears and sighs of the spectators who pitied his miserable end. Longinus rendered his name immortal by his critical remarks on ancient authors. His treatise on the sublime, gives the world reason to lament the loss of his other valuable compositions. The best editions of this author are that of Tollius, 4to. Traj. ad Rhen. 1694, and that of Toup, 8vo. Oxon, 1778.——Cassius, a tribune driven out of the senate for favoring the interest of J. Cæsar. He was made governor of Spain by Cæsar, &c.——A governor of Judæa.——A pro-consul.——A lawyer whom, though blind and respected, Nero ordered to be put to death, because he had in his possession a picture of Cassius, one of Cæsar's murderers. Juv. 10, v. 16.

Q. LUCANIUS, a centurion in Cæſar's army, &c. Cæſar. bell. G. 5.

LŪCĀNUS, M. ANNÆUS, a native of Corduba in Spain. He was early removed to Rome, where his riſing talents and more particularly his laviſhed praiſes and panegyrics, recommended him to the emperor Nero. This intimacy was ſoon productive of honor, and Lucan was raiſed to the dignity of an augur and quæſtor before he had attained the proper age. The poet had the imprudence to enter the liſts againſt his imperial patron; he choſe for his ſubject Orpheus, and Nero took the tragical ſtory of Niobe. Lucan obtained an eaſy victory, but Nero became jealous of his poetical reputation, and reſolved upon revenge. The inſults to which Lucan was daily expoſed, provoked at laſt his reſentment, and he joined Piſo in a conſpiracy againſt the emperor. The whole was diſcovered, and the poet had nothing left but to chuſe the manner of his execution. He had his veins opened in a warm bath, and as he expired he pronounced with great energy the lines which, in his Pharſalia l. 3, v. 639—642, he had put into the mouth of a ſoldier, who died in the ſame manner as himſelf. Some have accuſed him of puſillanimity at the moment of his death, and ſay that, to free himſelf from the puniſhment which threatened him, he accuſed his own mother, and involved her in the crime of which he was guilty. This circumſtance, which throws an indelible blot upon the character of Lucan, is not mentioned by ſome writers, who obſerve that he expired with all the firmneſs of a philoſopher. He died in his 26th year, A. D. 65. Of all his compoſitions none but his Pharſalia remains. This poem, which is an account of the civil wars of Cæſar and Pompey, is unfiniſhed. Opinions are various as to the merit of his poetry. He poſſeſſes neither the fire of Homer, nor the melodious numbers of Virgil. If he had lived to a greater age, his judgment and genius would have matured, and he might have claimed a more exalted rank among the poets of the Auguſtan age. His expreſſions, however, are bold and animated, his poetry entertaining, though his irregularities are numerous, and to uſe the words of Quintilian, he is more an orator than a poet. He wrote a poem upon the burning of Rome, now loſt. It is ſaid that his wife Polla Argentaria, not only aſſiſted him in the compoſition of his poem, but even corrected it after his death. Scaliger ſays, that Lucan rather barks than ſings. The beſt editions of Lucan are thoſe of Oudendorp, 4to. L. Bat. 1728, of Bentley, 4to. printed at Strawbery-hill, 1760, and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1767. Quintil. 10.—Suet.—Tacit. Ann. 15, &c.—Martial. 7, ep. 20.—Ocellus or Ucellus, an antient Pythagorean philoſopher, whoſe age is unknown. He wrote, in the Attic dialect, a book on the nature of the univerſe which he deemed eternal, and from it were drawn the ſyſtems adopted by Ariſtotle, Plato, and Philo Judæus. This work was firſt tranſlated into Latin by Nogarola. Another book of Ocellus on laws, written in the Doric dialect, was greatly eſteemed by Archytas and Plato, a fragment of which has been preſerved by Stobæus, of which, however, Ocellus is diſputed to be the author. There is an edition of Ocellus, with a learned commentary, by C. Emman. Vizzanius, Bononiæ, 1646, in 4to.

LŬCĀRIA or LŬCĔRIA, feſtivals at Rome, celebrated in a large grove between the Via Salaria and the Tiber, where the Romans hid themſelves when beſieged by the Gauls. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 77.

L. LUCCEIUS, a celebrated hiſtorian, aſked by Cicero to write a hiſtory of his conſulſhip. He favored the cauſe of Pompey, but was afterwards pardoned by J. Cæſar. Cic. ad Fam. 5, ep. 12, &c.

LUCCEIUS ALBĪNUS, a governor of Mauritania after Galba's death, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 58.

LUCENTUM, (or ia) a town of Spain now Alicant.

LŬCĔRES, a body of horſe compoſed of Roman knights, firſt eſtabliſhed by Romulus and Tatius. It received its name either from Lucumo, an Etrurian who aſſiſted the Romans againſt the Sabines, or from lucus, a grove where Romulus had erected an aſylum, or a place of refuge for all fugitives, ſlaves, homicides, &c. that he might people his city. The Luceres were ſome of theſe men, and they were incorporated with the legions. Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 31.

LUCĔRIA, a town of Apulia, famous for wool. Liv. 9, c. 2 & 12. l. 10, c. 35.—Horat. 3, od. 15, v. 14.—Lucan. 2, v. 473.

LUCETIUS, a Rutulian, killed by Ilioneus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 570

LUCIĀNUS, a celebrated writer of Samoſata. His father was poor in his circumſtances, and Lucian was early bound to one of his uncles, who was a ſculptor. This employment highly diſpleaſed him, he made no proficiency in the art, and reſolved to ſeek his livelihood by better means. A dream in which Learning ſeemed to draw him to her, and to promiſe fame and immortality, confirmed his reſolutions, and he began to write. The artifices and unfair dealings of a lawyer, a life which he had embraced, diſguſted him, and he began to ſtudy philoſophy and eloquence. He viſited different places, and Antioch, Ionia, Greece, Italy, Gaul, and more particularly Athens, became ſucceſſively acquainted with the depth of his learning and the power of his eloquence. The emperor M. Aurelius was ſenſible of his merit, and appointed him regiſter to the Roman governor of Egypt. He died, A. D. 180, in his 90th year, and ſome of the moderns have aſſerted that he was torn to pieces by dogs for his impiety, particularly for ridiculing the religion of Chriſt. The works of Lucian, which are numerous, and written in the Attic dialect, conſiſt partly of dialogues, in which he introduces different characters, with much dramatic propriety. His ſtile is eaſy, ſimple, elegant, and animated, and he has ſtored his compoſitions with many lively ſentiments, and much of the true Attic wit. His frequent obſcenities, and his manner of expoſing to ridicule not only the religion of his country, but alſo that of every nation, have deſervedly drawn upon him the cenſure of every age, and branded him with the appellation of atheiſt and blaſphemer. He alſo wrote the life of Soſtrates, a philoſopher of Bœotia, as alſo that of the philoſopher Demonax. Some have alſo attributed to him, with great impropriety, the life of Apollonius Thyaneus. The beſt editions of Lucan are that of Grævius, 2 vols. 8vo. Amſt. 1687, and that of Reitzius, 4 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1743.

LŪCĬFER, the name of the planet Venus, or morning ſtar. It is called Lucifer, when appearing in the morning before the ſun; but when it follows it, and appears ſome time after its ſetting, it is called Heſperus. According to ſome mythologiſts, Lucifer was ſon of Jupiter and Aurora.——A chriſtian writer whoſe work was edited by the Coleti, fol. Venet. 1778.

LUCIFĔRI FANUM, a town of Spain.

C. LŪCĬLIUS, a Roman knight born at Aurunca. He lived in the greateſt intimacy with Scipio the firſt Africanus, and even attended him in his war againſt Numantia. He is looked upon as the founder of ſatire, and as the firſt great ſatyrical writer among the Romans. He was ſuperior to his poetical predeceſſors at Rome, and though he wrote with great roughneſs and inelegance, but with much facility, he gained many admirers, whoſe praiſes have been often laviſhed with too liberal a hand. Horace compares him to a river which rolls upon its waters precious ſand, accompanied with mire and dirt. Of the thirty ſatires which he wrote, nothing but a few verſes remain. He died at Naples, in the 46th year of his age, B. C. 103. His fragments have been collected and publiſhed with notes by Fr. Douſa, 4to. L. Bat. 1597, and laſtly by the Vulpii, 8vo. Patav. 1735. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Cic. de Orat. 2.—Horat.——Lucinus, a famous Roman, who fled with Brutus after the battle of Philippi. They were ſoon after overtaken by a party of horſe, and Lucilius ſuffered himſelf to be ſeverely wounded by the dart of the enemy, exclaiming that he was Brutus. He was taken, and carried to the conquerors, whoſe clemency ſpared his life. Plut.——A tribune who attempted in vain to elect Pompey to the dictatorſhip.——A centurion, &c.——A governor of Aſia under Tiberius.——A friend of Tiberius.

LUCILLA, a daughter of M. Aurelius, celebrated for the virtues of her youth, her beauty, debaucheries, and misfortunes. At the age of ſixteen her father ſent her to Syria to marry the emperor Verus, who was then employed in a war with the Parthians and Armenians. The conjugal virtues of Lucilla were great at firſt, but when ſhe ſaw Verus plunge himſelf into debauchery and diſſipation, ſhe followed his example, and proſtituted herſelf. At her return to Rome ſhe ſaw the inceſtuous commerce of her huſband with her mother, &c. and at laſt poiſoned him. She afterwards married an old but virtuous ſenator, by order of her father, and was not aſhamed ſoon to gratify the criminal ſenſualities of her brother Commodus. The coldneſs and indifference with which Commodus treated her afterwards determined her on revenge, and ſhe with many illuſtrious ſenators conſpired againſt his life, A. D 185. The plot was diſcovered, Lucilla was baniſhed, and ſoon after put to death by her brother, in the 38th year of her age.

LŪCĪNA, a goddeſs, daughter of Jupiter and Juno. As her mother brought her into the world without pain, ſhe became the goddeſs whom women in labor invoked, and ſhe preſided over the birth of children. She receives this name either from lucus, or from lux, as Ovid explains it:

Gratia Lucinæ, dedit hæc tibi nomine lucus;
Aut quia principium tu, Dea, lucis habes.

ſome ſuppoſe her to be the ſame as Diana and Juno, becauſe theſe two goddeſſes were alſo ſometimes called Lucina, and preſided over the labors of women. She is called Ilithya by the Greeks. She had a famous temple at Rome, raiſed A. U. C. 396. Varr. de L. L. 4.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27.—Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 449.—Horat. Carm. Sec.

Lucius, a Roman ſoldier killed at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, by ſaving in his arms a man who jumped down from one of the walls. Joſeph.——A brother of M. Antony. [Vid. L. Antonius.]——A Roman general, who defeated the Etrurians, &c.——A relation of J. Cæſar.——A Roman ambaſſador, murdered by the Illyrians.——A conſul, &c.——A writer, called by ſome Saturantius Apuleius. He was born in Africa, on the borders of Numidia. He ſtudied poetry, muſic, geometry, &c at Athens, and warmly embraced the tenets of the Platoniſts. He cultivated magic, and ſome miracles are attributed to his knowledge of enchantments. He wrote in Greek and Latin, with great eaſe and ſimplicity; his ſtile, however, is ſometimes affected, though his eloquence was greatly celebrated in his age. Some fragments of his compoſitions are ſtill extant. He floriſhed in the reign of M. Aurelius.——A brother of Vitellius, &c.——A ſon of Agrippa adopted by Auguſtus.——A man put to death for his incontinence, &c.——The word Lucius is a prænomen common to many Romans, of whom an account is given under their family names Lūcrētia, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of Lucretius, and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. Her accompliſhments proved fatal to her, and the praiſes which a number of young nobles at Ardea, among whom were Collatinus and the ſons of Tarquin, beſtowed upon the domeſtic virtues of their wives at home, was productive of a revolution in the ſtate. While every one was warm with the idea, it was univerſally agreed to leave the camp and to go to Rome, to aſcertain the veracity of their reſpective aſſertions. Collatinus had the pleaſure to ſee his expectations fulfilled in the higheſt degree, and, while the wives of the other Romans were involved in the riot and diſſipation of a feaſt, Lucretia was found at home, employed in the midſt of her female ſervants, and eaſing their labor by ſharing it herſelf. The beauty and innocence of Lucretia inflamed the paſſion of Sextus, the ſon of Tarquin, who was a witneſs of her virtues and induſtry. He cheriſhed his flame, and he ſecretly retired from the camp, and came to the houſe of Lucretia, where he met with a kind reception. He ſhowed himſelf unworthy of ſuch a treatment, and, in the dead of night, he introduced himſelf to Lucretia, who refuſed to his intreaties what her fear of ſhame granted to his threats. She yielded to her raviſher, when he threatened to murder her, and to ſlay one of her ſlaves, and put him in her bed, that this apparent adultery might ſeem to have met with the puniſhment it deſerved. Lucretia, in the morning, ſent for her huſband and her father, and, after ſhe had revealed to them the indignities ſhe had ſuffered from the ſon of Tarquin, and entreated them to avenge her wrongs, ſhe ſtabbed herſelf with a dagger which ſhe had previouſly concealed under her cloaths. This fatal blow was the ſign of rebellion. The body of the virtuous Lucretia was expoſed to the eyes of the ſenate, and the violence and barbarity of Sextus, joined with the unpopularity and oppreſſion of his father, ſo irritated the Roman populace, that that moment they expelled the Tarquins for ever from Rome. Brutus, who was preſent at the tragical death of Lucretia, kindled the flames of rebellion, and the republican or conſular government was eſtabliſhed at Rome A. U. C. 244. Liv. 1, c. 57, &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 741.—Val. Max. 6, c. 1.—Plut.——The wife of Numa. Plut.

T. Lŭcrētius Carus, a celebrated Roman poet and philoſopher, who was early ſent to Athens, where he ſtudied under Zeno and Phædrus. The tenets of Epicurus and Empedocles, which then prevailed at Athens, were warmly embraced by Lucretius, and when united with the infinite of Anaximander, and the atoms of Democritus, they were explained and elucidated in a poem, in ſix books, which is called De rerum naturâ. In this poem the maſterly genius and unaffected elegance of the poet are every where conſpicuous; but the opinions of the philoſopher are juſtly cenſured, who gives no exiſtence of power to a Supreme Being, but is the devoted advocate of atheiſm and impiety. This compoſition, which has little claim to be called a heroic poem, was written and finiſhed while the poet labored under a violent delirium, occaſioned by a philtre, which the jealouſy of his miſtreſs or his wife Lucilia had adminiſtered. It is ſaid that he deſtroyed himſelf in the 44th year of his age, about 54 years before Chriſt. Cicero, after his death, reviſed and corrected his poems, which had been partly written in the lucid intervals intervals of reaſon and of ſenſe. Lucretius, whoſe poem ſhows that he wrote Latin better than any other man ever did, would have proved no mean rival to Virgil, had he lived in the poliſhed age of Auguſtus. The beſt editions of his works are that of Creech, 8vo. Oxon. 1695; that of Havercamp, 2 vols. 4to, Lug. It abounded with excellent oyſters, and was united by Auguſtus to the Avernus, and a communication formed with the ſea, near a harbour called Julius Portus. The Lucrine lake diſappeared on the 30th of September, 1538, in a violent earthquake, which raiſed on the ſpot a mountain 4 miles in circumference, and about 1000 feet high, with a crater in the middle. Cic. 4. Att. 10.—Strab. 5 & 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.——Horat. 2, od. 15.

LUCULLUS, Lucius Licinius, a Roman celebrated for his foundneſs of luxury and for his military talents. He was born about 115 years before the chriſtian era, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his proficiency in the liberal arts, particularly eloquence and philoſophy. His firſt military campaign was in the Marſian war, where his valor and cool intrepidity recommended him to public notice. His mildneſs and conſtancy gained him the admiration and confidence of Sylla, and from this connection he derived honor, and during his quæſtorſhip in Aſia, and pretorſhip in Africa, he rendered himſelf more conſpicuous by his juſtice, moderation, and humanity. He was raiſed to the conſulſhip A. U. C. 678, and entruſted with the care of the Mithridatic war, and firſt diſplayed his military talents in reſcuing his colleague Cotta, whom the enemy had beſieged in Chalcedonia. This was ſoon followed by a celebrated victory over the forces of Mithridates, on the borders of the Granicus, and by the conqueſt of all Bithynia. His victories by ſea were as great as thoſe by land, and Mithridates loſt a powerful fleet near Lemnos. Such conſiderable loſſes weakened the enemy, and Mithridates retired with precipitation towards Armenia, to the court of king Tigranes, his father-in-law. His flight was perceived, and Lucullus croſſed the Euphrates with great expedition, and gave battle to the numerous forces which Tigranes had already aſſembled to ſupport the cauſe of his ſon-in-law. According to the exaggerated account of Plutarch no leſs than 100,000 foot, and near 55,000 horſe, of the Armenians, loſt their lives in that celebrated battle. All this carnage was made by a Roman army amounting to no more than 18,000 men, of whom only five were killed and 100 wounded during the combat. The taking of Tigranocerta, the capital of Armenia, was the conſequence of his immortal victory, and Lucullus there obtained the greateſt part of the royal treaſures. This continual ſucceſs, however, was attended with ſerious conſequences. The ſeverity of Lucullus, and the haughtineſs of his commands, offended his ſoldiers, and diſpleaſed his adherents at Rome. Pompey was ſoon after ſent to ſucceed him, and to continue the Mithridatic war, and the interview which he had with Lucullus began with acts of mutual kindneſs, and ended in the moſt inveterate reproaches, and open enmity. Lucullus was permitted to retire to Rome, and only 1600 of the ſoldiers who had ſhared his fortune and his glories were ſuffered to accompany him. He was received with coldneſs at Rome, and he obtained with difficulty a triumph which was deſervedly claimed by his fame, his ſucceſſes, and his victories. In this ended the days of his glory; he retired to the enjoyment of eaſe and peaceful ſociety, and no longer intereſted himſelf in the commotions which diſturbed the tranquillity of Rome. He dedicated his time to ſtudious purſuits, and to literary converſation. His houſe was enriched with a valuable library, which was opened for the ſervice of the curious, and of the learned. Lucullus fell into a delirium in the laſt part of his life, and died in the 67th or 68th year of his age. The people ſhowed their reſpect for his merit, by their wiſh to give him an honorable burial in the Campus Martius; but their offers were rejected, and he was privately buried, by his brother, in his eſtate at Tuſculum. Lucullus has been admired for his many accompliſhments, but he has been cenſured for his ſeverity and extravagance. The expences of his meals were immoderate, his halls were diſtinguiſhed by the different names of the gods; and, when Cicero and Pompey attempted to ſurpriſe him, they were aſtoniſhed at the coſtlineſs of a ſupper which had been prepared upon the word of Lucullus, who had merely ſaid to his ſervant that he would ſup in the hall of Apollo. In his retirement Lucullus was fond of artificial variety; ſubterraneous caves and paſſages were dug under the hills on the coaſt of Campania, and the ſea water was conveyed round the houſe and pleaſure grounds, where the fiſhes flocked in ſuch abundance that not leſs than 25,000 pounds worth were ſold at his death. In his public character Lucullus was humane and compaſſionate, and he ſhewed his ſenſe of the viciſſitudes of human affairs by ſhedding tears at the ſight of one of the cities of Armenia, which his ſoldiers reduced to aſhes. He was a perfect maſter of the Greek and Latin languages, and he employed himſelf for ſome time to write a conciſe hiſtory of the Marſi in Greek hexameters. Such are the ſtriking characteriſtics of a man who meditated the conqueſt of Parthia, and, for a while, gained the admiration of all the inhabitants of the eaſt, by his juſtice and moderation, and who might have diſputed the empire of the world with a Cæſar or Pompey, had not, at laſt, his fondneſs for retirement withdrawn him from the reach of ambition. Plut. in Vitâ.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Strab.—Appian in Mithr. &c.—Oroſius 6, &c.——A conſul, who went to Spain, &c.——A Roman, put to death by Domitian.——A brother of Lucius Lucullus, lieutenant under Sylla.——A prætor of Macedonia.

LŬCŬMO, the firſt name of Tarquinius Priſcus, afterwards changed into Lucius. The word is Etrurian, and ſignifies prince or chief.

LUCUS, a king of antient Gaul.——A town of Gaul, at the foot of the Alps.

LUGDUNENSIS GALLIA, a part of Gaul, which received its name from Lugdunum, the capital city of the province. It was anciently called Celtica. Vid. Gallia.

LUGDŪNUM, a town of Gallia Celtica, built at the confluence of the Rhone and the Arar, or Saone, by Manutius Plancus, when he was governor of the province. This town, now called Lyons, is the ſecond city of France in point of population. Juv. 1, v. 44.—Strab. 4.——Batavorum, a town on the Rhine, juſt as it falls into the ocean. It is now called Leyden, and is famous for its univerſity.——Convenarum, a town at the foot of the Pyrenees, now St. Bertrand in Gaſcony.

LŪNA, (the moon) was daughter of Hyperion and Terra, and was the ſame, according to ſome mythologiſts, as Diana. She was worſhipped by the ancient inhabitants of the earth with many ſuperſtitious forms and ceremonies. It was ſuppoſed that magicians and enchanters, particularly thoſe of Theſſaly, had an uncontrolable power over the moon, and that they could draw her down from heaven at pleaſure by the mere force of their incantations. Her eclipſes, according to their opinion, proceeded from thence; and, on that account, it was uſual to beat drums and cymbals to eaſe her labors, and to render the power of magic leſs effectual. The Arcadians believed that they were older than the moon. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263, &c.—Tibull. 1, el. 8, v. 21.—Heſiod. Theog.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 69.——A maritime town of Etruria, famous for the white marble which it produced, and called alſo Lunenſis portus. It contained a fine capacious harbour, and abounded in wine, cheeſe, &c. The inhabitants were naturally given to augury, and the obſervation of uncommon phænomena. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 586.—Plin. 14, c. 6.—Liv. 34, c. 8.—Sil. 8, v. 481.

LUPA, (a ſhe wolf) was held in great veneration at Rome, becauſe Romulus and Remus, according to an ancient tradition, were ſuckled and preſerved by one of theſe animals. This fabulous ſtory ariſes from the ſurname of Lupa, proſtitute, which was given to the wife of the ſhepherd Fauſtulus, to whoſe care and humanity theſe children owed their preſervation. Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 415.—Plut. in Romul.

LUPERCAL, a place at the foot of mount Aventine, ſacred to Pan, where feſtivals called Lupercalia were yearly celebrated. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 343.

LUPERCĀLIA, a yearly feſtival obſerved at at Rome the 15th of February, in honor of the god Pan. It was usual first to sacrifice two goats and a dog, and to touch with a bloody knife the foreheads of two illustrious youths, who always were obliged to smile while they were touched. The blood was wiped away with soft wool dipped in milk. After this the skins of the victims were cut into thongs, with which whips were made for the youths. With these whips the youths ran about the streets all naked except the middle, and whipped freely all those they met. Women in particular were fond of receiving the lashes, as they superstitiously believed that they removed barrenness, and eased the pains of child-birth. This excursion in the streets of Rome was performed by naked youths, because Pan is always represented naked, and a goat was sacrificed, because that deity was supposed to have the feet of a goat. A dog was added, as a necessary and useful guardian of the sheepfold. This festival, as Plutarch mentions, was first instituted by the Romans in honor of the she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus. This opinion is controverted by others, and Livy, with Dionysius of Halicarnassus, observes, that they were introduced into Italy by Evander. The name seems to be borrowed from the Greek name of Pan, Lycæus, from λυκος, a wolf; because Pan, as god of shepherds, protected the sheep from the rapacity of the wolves. The priests which officiated at the Lupercalia were called Luperci. Augustus forbad any person above the age of fourteen to appear naked, or to run about the streets during the Lupercalia. Cicero, in his Philippics, reproaches Antony for having disgraced the dignity of the consulship by running naked, and armed with a whip, about the streets. It was during the celebration of these festivals that Antony offered a crown to J. Cæsar, which the indignation of the populace obliged him to refuse.

Luperci, a number of priests at Rome, who assisted at the celebration of the Lupercalia, in honor of the god Pan, to whose service they were dedicated. This order of priests was the most ancient and respectable of all the sacerdotal offices. It was divided into two separate colleges, called Fabiani & Quintiliani, from Fabius and Quintilius, two of their high priests. The former were instituted in honor of Romulus, and the latter of Remus. To these two sacerdotal bodies J. Cæsar added a third, called, from himself, the Julii, and this action contributed not a little to render his cause unpopular, and to betray his ambitious and aspiring views. [Vid. Lupercalia.] Plut. in Rom.—Dio. Cas. 45.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 663.

Lupercus, a grammarian in the reign of the emperor Gallienus. He wrote some grammatical pieces, which some have preferred to Herodian's compositions.

Lupias or Lupia, now Lippe, a town of Germany, with a small river of the same name, falling into the Rhine. Tacit. Ann. 1, &c.

Lupus, a general of the emperor Severus.——A governor of Britain.——A quæstor in the reign of Tiberius, &c.——A comic writer of Sicily, who wrote a poem on the return of Menelaus and Helen to Sparta, after the destruction of Troy. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 16, v. 26.——P. Rut. a Roman, who, contrary to the omens, marched against the Marsi, and was killed with his army. He has been taxed with impiety, and was severely censured in the Augustan age. Horat. 2 Sat. 1, v. 68.

Lusitania, a part of antient Spain, whose extent and situation have not been accurately defined by the antients. According to the better descriptions, it extended from the Tagus to the sea of Cantabria, and comprehended the modern kingdom of Portugal. The inhabitants were warlike, and were conquered by the Roman army under Dolabella, B. C. 99, with great difficulty. They generally lived upon plunder, and were rude and unpolished in their manners. It was usual among them to expose their sick in the high roads, that their diseases might be cured by the directions and advice of travellers. They were very moderate in their meals, and never eat but of one dish. Their cloaths were commonly black, and they generally warmed themselves by means of stones heated in the fire. Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6. l. 3, c. 1.—Liv. 21, c. 43. l. 27, c. 20.

Lusius, a river of Arcadia. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22.—Pauf. Arc. 28.

Lusones, a people of Spain, near the Iberus.

Lustricus Brutianus, a Roman poet. Martial. 4, ep. 23.

Lutatius Catulus, a Roman who shut the temple of Janus after peace had been made with Carthage. Vid. Luctatius.

Luterius, a general of the Gauls, defeated by Cæsar, &c.

Lutetia, a town of Belgic Gaul, on the confluence of the rivers Sequana and Matrona, which received its name, as some suppose, from the quantity of clay, lutum, which is in its neighbourhood. J. Cæsar fortified and embellished it, from which circumstance some authors call it Julii Civitas. Julian the apostate resided there some time. It is now Paris, and is the capital of France. Cæsar. de bell. G. 6 & 7.—Strab. 4.—Ammian. 20.

C. Lutorius Priscus, a Roman knight, put to death by order of Tiberius, becauſe he had written a poem in which he had bewailed the death of Germanicus, who then labored under a ſevere illneſs. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 49, &c.

Lyæus, a ſirname of Bacchus. It is derived from λυειν, ſolvere, becauſe wine, over which Bacchus preſides, gives freedom to the mind, and delivers it from all cares and melancholy. Horat. ep. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 675.

Lybas, one of the companions of Ulyſſes, &c.

Lybya or Lybissa, a ſmall village of Bithynia, where Annibal was buried.

Lycăbas, an Etrurian, one of thoſe who offered violence to Bacchus, and were changed into dolphins. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 624.——One of the Lapithæ, who ran away from the battle which was fought at the nuptials of Pirithous. Id. Met. 12, v. 302.

Lycabētus, a mountain of Attica, near Athens. Stat.

Lycæa, feſtivals in Arcadia, in honor of Pan, the god of ſhepherds. They are the ſame as the Lupercalia of the Romans. ——A feſtival at Argos in honor of Apollo Lycæus, who delivered the Argives from wolves, &c.

Lycæum, a celebrated place near the banks of the Iliſſus, in Attica. It was in this pleaſant and ſalubrious ſpot that Ariſtotle taught philoſophy, and as he generally inſtructed his pupils in walking, they were called Peripatetics, a περιπατεω, ambulo. The philoſopher continued his inſtructions for 12 years, till terrified by the falſe accuſations of Eurymedon, he was obliged to fly to Chalcis.

Lycæus, a mountain of Arcadia, ſacred to Jupiter, where a temple was built in honor of the god Lycæus, by Lycaon, the ſon of Pelaſgus. It was alſo ſacred to Pan, whoſe feſtivals, called Lycæa, were celebrated there. Virg. G. 1, v. 16. Æn. 8, v. 343.—Strab. 8.—Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 2.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 698.

Lycambes, the father of Neobule. He promiſed his daughter in marriage to the poet Archilochus, and afterwards refuſed to fulfil his engagement when ſhe had been courted by a man whoſe opulence had more influence than the fortune of the poet. This irritated Archilochus; he wrote a bitter invective againſt Lycambes and his daughter, and rendered them both ſo deſperate by the ſatire of his compoſition that they hanged themſelves. Horat. ep. 6, v. 13.—Ovid. in Ib. 52.

Lycāon, the firſt king of Arcadia, ſon of Pelaſgus and Meliboea. He built a town called Lycoſura on the top of mount Lycæus, in honor of Jupiter. He had many wives, by whom he had a daughter, called Caliſto, and fifty ſons. He was ſucceeded on the throne by Nyctimus, the eldeſt of his ſons. He lived about 1820 years before the Chriſtian era. Apolled. 3.—Hygin. fab. 176.—Catul. ep. 76.—Pauſ. 8, c. 2, &c.——Another king of Arcadia, celebrated for his cruelties. He was changed into a wolf by Jupiter, becauſe he offered human victims on the altars of the god Pan. Some attribute this metamorphoſis to another cauſe. The ſins of mankind, as they relate, were become ſo enormous, that Jupiter viſited the earth to puniſh wickedneſs and impiety. He came to Arcadia, where he was announced as a god, and the people began to pay proper adoration to his divinity. Lycaon, however, who uſed to ſacrifice all ſtrangers to his wanton cruelty, laughed at the pious prayers of his ſubjects, and to try the divinity of the god, he ſerved up human fleſh on his table. This impiety ſo irritated Jupiter, that he immediately deſtroyed the houſe of Lycaon, and changed him into a wolf. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 198, &c.——Theſe two monarchs are often confounded together, though it appears that they were two different characters, and that not leſs than an age elapſed between their reigns.——A ſon of Priam and Laothe. He was taken by Achilles and carried to Lemnos, whence he eſcaped. He was afterwards killed by Achilles in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 21, &c.——The ſon of Pandarus, killed by Diomedes before Troy.——A Gnoſſian artiſt, who made the ſword which Aſcanius gave to Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 304.

Lycāŏnia, a country of Aſia, between Cappadocia, Piſidia, Pamphylia, and Phrygia, made a Roman province under Auguſtus. Strab. 10.—Mela. 1, c. 2.—Liv. 27, c. 54. l. 38, c. 39.——Arcadia bore alſo that name from Lycaon, one of its kings. Dionyſ. Hal.——An iſland in the Tyber.

Lycas, a prieſt of Apollo, in the intereſt of Turnus. He was killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 315.——Another officer of Turnus. Id. 10, v. 561.

Lycaste, an ancient town of Crete, whoſe inhabitants accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.——A daughter of Priam by a concubine. She married Polydamas, the ſon of Antenor. ——A famous courtezan of Drepanum, called Venus on account of her great beauty. She had a ſon called Eryx by Butes, ſon of Amycus.

Lycastum, a town of Cappadocia.

Lycastus, a ſon of Minos I. He was father of Minos II. by Ida, the daughter of Corybas.——A ſon of Minos and Philonome, nome, daughter of Nyctimus. He ſucceeded his father on the throne of Arcadia. ——A town of Crete.

Lyce, one of the Amazons, &c. Flacc. 6, v. 374.

Lyces, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 33.

Lycēum. Vid. Lycæum.

Lychnīdus, now Achrida, a city with a lake of the ſame name, in Illyricum. Liv. 27, c. 32. l. 44, c. 15.

Lȳcia, a country of Aſia Minor, bounded by the Mediterranean on the ſouth, Caria on the weſt, Pamphylia on the eaſt, and Phrygia on the north. It was anciently called Milyas, and Tremile, from the Milyæ or Solymi, a people of Crete, who came to ſettle there. The country received the name of Lycia from Lycus, the ſon of Pandion, who eſtabliſhed himſelf there. The inhabitants have been greatly commended by all the ancients for their ſobriety and juſtice. They were conquered by Crœſus, king of Lydia, and afterwards by Cyrus. Though they were ſubject to the power of Perſia, yet they were governed by their own kings, and only paid a yearly tribute to the Perſian monarch. They became part of the Macedonian empire when Alexander came into the eaſt, and afterwards were ceded to the houſe of the Seleucidæ. The country was reduced into a Roman province by the emperor Claudius. Apollo had there his celebrated oracle at Patara, and the epithet hyberna is applied to the country, becauſe the god was ſaid to paſs the winter in his temple. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 143, & 446. l. 7, v. 816.—Stat. Theb. 6, v. 686.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 13.—Liv. 37, c. 16. l. 38, c. 39.

Lycĭdas, a centaur, killed by the Lapithæ at the nuptials of Firithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 310.——A ſhepherd's name. Virg. Ecl.——A beautiful youth, the admiration of Rome in the age of Horace. Horat. 1, od. 4, v. 19.

Lycimna, a town of Peloponneſus.

Lycimnia, a ſlave, mother of Helenor by a Lydian prince. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 446.

Lysiscus, an Athenian archon.——A Meſſenian of the family of the Æpytidæ. When his daughters were doomed by lot to be ſacrificed for the good of their country, he fled with them to Sparta, and Ariſtodemus upon this chearfully gave his own children, and ſoon after ſucceeded to the throne. Pauſ. 4, c. 9.——A youth of whom Horace was enamoured.

Lȳcius, a ſon of Hercules and Toxicreta.——A ſon of Lycaon.——An epithet given to Apollo from his temple in Lycia, where he gave oracles, particularly at Patara, where the appellation of Lyciæ ſortes was given to his anſwers, and even to the will of the Fates. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 346.——A ſirname of Danaus.

Lȳcŏmēdes, a king of Scyros, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, ſon of Apollo and Parthenope. He was ſecretly entruſted with the care of young Achilles, whom his mother Thetis had diſguiſed in woman's cloaths, to remove him from the Trojan war, where ſhe knew he muſt unavoidably periſh. Lycomedes has rendered himſelf famous for his treachery to Theſeus, who had implored his protection when driven from the throne of Athens by the uſurper Mneſtheus. Lycomedes, as it is reported, either envious of the fame of his illuſtrious gueſt, or bribed by the emiſſaries of Mneſtheus, led Theſeus to an elevated place, on pretence of ſhowing him the extent of his dominions, and perfidiouſly threw him down a precipice, where he was killed. Plut. in Theſ.—Pauſ. 1, c. 17. l. 7, c. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.——An Arcadian, who, with 500 choſen men, put to flight 1000 Spartans, and 500 Argives, &c. Diod. 15.——A ſeditious perſon at Tegea.——A Mantinean general, &c.——An Athenian, the firſt who took one of the enemy's ſhips at the battle of Salamis. Plut.

Lycon, a philoſopher of Troas, in the age of Ariſtotle. He was greatly eſteemed by Eumenes, Antiochus, &c. He died in the 74th year of his age. Diog. in vit.——A man who wrote the life of Pythagoras.——A poet.——A writer of epigrams.——A player, greatly eſteemed by Alexander.——A Syracuſan who aſſiſted in murdering Dion.——A peripatetic philoſopher.

Lycōne, a city of Thrace.——A mountain of Argolis. Pauſ. 2, c. 24.

Lȳcŏphron, a ſon of Periander, king of Corinth. The murder of his mother Meliſſa by his father had ſuch an effect upon him, that he reſolved never to ſpeak to a man who had been ſo wantonly cruel againſt his relations. This reſolution was ſtrengthened by the advice of Procles, his maternal uncle, and Periander at laſt baniſhed to Corcyra a ſon whoſe diſobedience and obſtinacy had rendered him odious. Cypſelus, the eldeſt ſon of Periander, being incapable of reigning, Lycophron was the only ſurviving child who had any claim to the crown of Corinth. But, when the infirmities of Periander obliged him to look for a ſucceſſor, Lycophron refuſed to come to Corinth while his father was there, and he was induced to leave Corcyra, only on promiſe that Periander would come and dwell there while he remained the maſter of Corinth. This exchange, however, was prevented. The Corcyreans, who were apprehenſive of the tyranny of Periander, murdered Lycophron before he left that iſland. Herodot. 3.—Ariſtot.——A brother of Thebe, the wife of Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ. He aſſiſted his ſiſter in murdering her huſband, and he afterwards ſeized the ſovereignty. He was diſpoſſeſſed by Philip of Macedonia. Plut.—Diod. 16.——A general of Corinth, killed by Nicias. Plut. in Nic.——A native of Cythera, ſon of Maſtor. He went to the Trojan war with Ajax, the ſon of Telamon, after the accidental murder of one of his citizens. He was killed, &c. Homer. Il. 15.——A famous Greek poet and grammarian, born at Chalcis, in Eubœa. He was one of the poets who floriſhed under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and who, from their number, obtained the name of Pleiades. Lycophron died by the wound of an arrow. He wrote tragedies, the titles of twenty of which have been preſerved. The only remaining compoſition of this poet is called Caſſandra or Alexandra. It contains 1474, verſes, whoſe obſcurity has procured the epithet of Tenebroſus to its author. It is a mixture of prophetical effuſions, which, as he ſuppoſes, were given by Caſſandra during the Trojan war. The beſt editions of Lycophron are that of Baſil, 1546, fol. enriched with the Greek commentary of Tzetzes; that of Canter, 8vo. apud Commelin, 1596; and that of Potter, fol. Oxon. 1702. Ovid. in Ib.—Stat. 5. Sylv. 3.

Lycopŏlis, now Siut, a town of Egypt. It received this name on account of the immenſe number of wolves, λυκοι, which repelled an army of Æthiopians, who had invaded Egypt. Diod. 1.—Strab. 17.

Lycōpus, an Ætolian, who aſſiſted the Cyreneans againſt Ptolemy. Polyæn. 8.

Lycorea, a town of Phocis at the top of Parnaſſus, where the people of Delphi took refuge during Deucalion's deluge, directed by the howlings of wolves. Pauſ. Phoc. 6.

Lȳcōrias, a nymph, &c. Virg. G. 4, v. 339.

Lȳcōris, a freedwoman of the ſenator Volumnius alſo called Cytheris, and Volumnia, from her maſter. She is celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. The poet Gallus was greatly enamoured of her, and his friend Virgil comforts him in his 10th eclogue for the loſs of the favors of Cytheris, who followed M. Antony's camp, and was become the Aſpaſia of Rome. The charms of Cleopatra, however, prevailed over thoſe of Cytheris, and the unfortunate courtezan loſt the favors of Antony and of all the world at the ſame time. Lycoris was originally a comedian. Virg. Ecl. 10.

Lycormas, a river of Ætolia, whoſe ſands were of a golden color. It was afterwards called Evenus from king Evenus who threw himſelf into it. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 245.

Lȳcortas, the father of Polybius, who floriſhed B. C. 184. He was choſen general of the Achæan league, and he revenged the death of Philopœmen, &c. Plut.

Lycosūra, a city built by Lycaon on mount Lycæus in Arcadia.

Lyctus, a town of Crete, the country of Idomeneus, whence he is often called Lyctius. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 401.

Lycurgĭdes, annual days of ſolemnity appointed in honor of the lawgiver of Sparta.——The patronymic of a ſon of Lycurgus. Ovid. in Ib. v. 503.

Lycurgus, a king of Nemæa, in Peloponneſus. He was raiſed from the dead by Æſculapius. Stat. Theb. 5, v. 638.——A giant killed by Oſiris in Thrace. Diod. 1.——A king of Thrace, ſon of Dryas. He has been repreſented as cruel and impious, on account of the violence which he offered to Bacchus. He, according to the opinion of the mythologiſts, drove Bacchus out of his kingdom, and aboliſhed his worſhip, for which impiety he was ſeverely puniſhed by the gods. He put his own ſon Dryas to death in a fury, and he cut off his own legs, miſtaking them for vine boughs. He was put to death in the greateſt torments by his ſubjects, who had been informed by the oracle that they ſhould not taſte wine till Lycurgus was no more. This fable is explained by obſerving, that the averſion of Lycurgus for wine, over which Bacchus preſided, aroſe from the filthineſs and diſgrace of intoxication, and therefore the monarch wiſely ordered all the vines of his dominions to be cut down, that himſelf and his ſubjects might be preſerved from the extravagance and debauchery which are produced by too free an uſe of wine. Hygin. fab. 132.—Homer. Il. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 22.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 14.—Horat. 2, od. 19.——A ſon of Hercules and Praxithea, daughter of Theſpius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A ſon of Pheres, the ſon of Cretheus. Id. 1, c. 9.——An orator of Athens, ſirnamed Ibis, in the age of Demoſthenes, famous for his juſtice and impartiality when at the head of the government. He was one of the thirty orators whom the Athenians refuſed to deliver up to Alexander. Some of his orations are extant. He died about 330 years before Chriſt. Diod. 16.——A king of Tegea, ſon of Aleus, by Neæra, the daughter of Pereus. He married Cleophile, called alſo Eurynome, by whom he had Amphidamas, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Homer. Il. 7.——A celebrated lawgiver of Sparta, Sparta, ſon of king Eunomus, and brother to Polydectes. He ſucceeded his brother on the Spartan throne; but when he ſaw that the widow of Polydectes was pregnant, he kept the kingdom not for himſelf, but till Charilaus, his nephew, was arrived to years of maturity. He had previouſly refuſed to marry his brother's widow, who wiſhed to ſtrengthen him on his throne by deſtroying her own ſon Charilaus, and leaving him in the peaceful poſſeſſion of the crown. The integrity with which he acted, when guardian of his nephew Charilaus, united with the diſappointment and the reſentment of the queen, raiſed him many enemies, and he at laſt yielded to their ſatire and malevolence, and retired to Crete. He travelled like a philoſopher, and viſited Aſia and Egypt without ſuffering himſelf to be corrupted by the licentiouſneſs and luxury which prevailed there. The confuſion which followed his departure from Sparta, now had made his preſence totally neceſſary, and he returned home at the earneſt ſolicitations of his countrymen. The diſorder which reigned at Sparta, induced him to reform the government; and the more effectually to execute his undertaking, he had recourſe to the oracle of Delphi. He was received by the prieſteſs of the god with every mark of honor, his intentions were warmly approved by the divinity, and he was called the friend of gods, and himſelf rather god than man. After ſuch a reception from the moſt celebrated oracle of Greece, Lycurgus found no difficulty in reforming the abuſes of the ſtate, and all were equally anxious in promoting a revolution which had received the ſanction of heaven. This happened 884 years before the Chriſtian era. Lycurgus firſt eſtabliſhed a ſenate, which was compoſed of 28 ſenators, whoſe authority preſerved the tranquillity of the ſtate, and maintained a due and juſt equilibrium between the kings and the people, by watching over the intruſions of the former, and checking the ſeditious convulſions of the latter. All diſtinction was deſtroyed, and by making an equal and impartial diviſion of the land among the members of the commonwealth, Lycurgus baniſhed luxury, and encouraged the uſeful arts. The uſe of money, either of gold or ſilver, was totally forbidden, and the introduction of heavy braſs and iron coin brought no temptations to the diſhoneſt, and left every individual in the poſſeſſion of his effects without any fears of robbery or violence. All the citizens dined in common, and no one had greater claims to indulgence or luxury than another. The intercourſe of Sparta with other nations was forbidden, and few were permitted to travel. The youths were entruſted to the public maſter, as ſoon as they had attained their ſeventh year, and their education was left to the wiſdom of the laws. They were taught early to think, to anſwer in a ſhort and laconic manner, and to excel in ſharp repartee. They were inſtructed and encouraged to carry things by ſurpriſe, but if ever the theft was diſcovered they were ſubjected to a ſevere puniſhment. Lycurgus was happy and ſucceſsful in eſtabliſhing and enforcing theſe laws, and by his prudence and adminiſtration the face of Lacedæmon was totally changed, and it gave riſe to a ſet of men diſtinguiſhed for their intrepidity, their fortitude, and their magnanimity. After this, Lycurgus retired from Sparta to Delphi, or according to others to Crete, and before his departure he bound all the citizens of Lacedæmon by a ſolemn oath, that neither they nor their poſterity, would alter, violate, or aboliſh the laws which he had eſtabliſhed, before his return. He ſoon after put himſelf to death, and he ordered his aſhes to be thrown into the ſea, fearful leſt if they were carried to Sparta the citizens ſhould call themſelves freed from the oath which they had taken, and impowered to make a revolution. The wiſdom and the good effect of the laws of Lycurgus have been firmly demonſtrated at Sparta, where for 700 years they remained in full force, but the legiſlator has been cenſured as cruel and impolitic. He has ſhewn himſelf inhumane in ordering mothers to deſtroy ſuch of their children, whoſe feebleneſs or deformity in their youth ſeemed to promiſe incapability of action in maturer years, and to become a burden to the ſtate. His regulations about marriage muſt neceſſarily be cenſured, and no true conjugal felicity can be expected from the union of a man with a perſon whom he perhaps never knew before, and whom he was compelled to chooſe in a dark room, where all the marriageable women in the ſtate aſſembled on ſtated occaſions. The peculiar dreſs which was appointed for the females, might be termed improper; and the law muſt, for ever, be called injudicious, which ordered them to appear naked on certain days of feſtivity, and wreſtle in a public aſſembly promiſcuouſly with boys of equal age with themſelves. Theſe things indeed contributed as much to corrupt the morals of the Lacedæmonians, as the other regulations ſeemed to be calculated to baniſh diſſipation, riot, and debauchery. Lycurgus has been compared to Solon the celebrated legiſlator of Athens, and it has been judiciouſly obſerved that the former gave his citizens morals conformable to the laws which he had eſtabliſhed, and that the latter had given the Athenians laws, which coincided with their cuſtoms and manners. The office of Lycurgus demanded reſolution, and he ſhowed himſelf inexorable and ſevere. In Solon artifice was requiſite, and he ſhowed himſelf mild and even voluptuous. The moderation of Lycurgus is greatly commended, particularly when we recollect that he treated with the greateſt humanity and confidence Alcander, a youth who had put out one of his eyes in a ſeditious tumult. Lycurgus had a ſon called Antiorus, who left no iſſue. The Lacedæmonians ſhewed their reſpect for their great legiſlator by yearly celebrating a feſtival in his honor, called Lycurgidæ or Lycurgides. The introduction of money into Sparta in the reign of Agis the ſon of Archidamus, was one of the principal cauſes which corrupted the innocence of the Lacedæmonians, and rendered them the prey of intrigue and of faction. The laws of Lycurgus were abrogated by Philopœmen B. C. 188, but only for a little time, as they were ſoon after re-eſtabliſhed by the Romans. Plut. in vitâ.—Juſtin. 3, c. 2, &c.—Strab. 8, 10, 15, &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 2.—Pauſ. 3, c. 2.

Lycus, a king of Bœotia, ſucceſſor to his brother Nycteus, who left no male iſſue. He was entruſted with the government only during the minority of Labdacus the ſon of the daughter of Nycteus. He was farther enjoined to make war againſt Epopeus, who had carried away by force Antiope the daughter of Nycteus. He was ſucceſsful in this expedition, Epopeus was killed, and Lycus recovered Antiope and married her though ſhe was his niece. This new connection highly diſpleaſed his firſt wife Dirce, and Antiope was delivered to the unfeeling queen and tortured in the moſt cruel manner. Antiope at laſt eſcaped, and entreated her ſons, Zethus and Amphion, to avenge her wrongs. The children, incenſed on account of the cruelties which their mother had ſuffered, beſieged Thebes, killed Lycus, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull who dragged her till ſhe died. Pauſ. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.——A king of Libya, who ſacrificed whatever ſtrangers came upon his coaſt. Lydia, a celebrated kingdom of Aſia Minor, whoſe boundaries were different at different times. It was firſt bounded by Myſia Major, Caria, Phrygia Major, and Ionia, but in its more floriſhing times it contained the whole country which lies between the Halys and the Ægean ſea. It was anciently called Mæonia, and received the name of Lydia from Lydus one of its kings. It was governed by monarchs who after the fabulous ages reigned for 249 years in the following order: Ardyſus began to reign, 797, B. C. Alyattes, 761; Meles, 747; Candaules, 735; Gyges, 718; Ardyſus 2d, 680; Sadyattes, 631; Alyattes 2d, 619, and Crœſus, 562, who was conquered by Cyrus, B. C. 548, when the kingdom became a province of the Perſian empire. There were three different races that reigned in Lydia, the Atyadæ, Heraclidæ, and Mermnadæ. The hiſtory of the firſt is obſcure and fabulous, the Heraclidæ began to reign about the Trojan war, and the crown remained in their family for about 505 years, and was always tranſmitted from father to ſon. Candaules was the laſt of the Heraclidæ; and Gyges the firſt, and Crœſus the laſt, of the Mermnadæ. The Lydians were great warriors in the reign of the Mermnadæ. They invented the art of coining gold and ſilver, and were the firſt who exhibited public ſports, &c. Herodot. 1, &c. Strab. 2, 5 & 13.—Mela. 1, c. 2.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—*Dionyſ. LYSANDER, a celebrated general of Sparta, in the laſt years of the Peloponneſian war. He drew Epheſus from the intereſt of Athens, and gained the friendſhip of Cyrus the younger. He gave battle to the Athenian fleet conſiſting of 120 ſhips, at Ægoſpotamos, and deſtroyed it all, except three ſhips, with which the enemy's general fled to Evagoras king of Cyprus. In this celebrated battle, which happened 405 years before the Chriſtian era, the Athenians loſt 3000 men, and with them their empire and influence among the neighbouring ſtates. Lyſander well knew how to take advantage of his victory, and the following year Athens, worn out by a long war of 27 years, and diſcouraged by its misfortunes, gave itſelf up to the power of the enemy, and conſented to deſtroy the Piræus, to deliver all its ſhips, except 12, to recall all thoſe that had been baniſhed, and in ſhort to be ſubmiſſive in every degree to the power of Lacedæmon. Beſides theſe humiliating conditions the government of Athens was totally changed, and 30 tyrants were ſet over it by Lyſander. This glorious ſucceſs, and the honor of having put an end to the Peloponneſian war, encreaſed the pride of Lyſander. He had already begun to pave his way to universal power, by establishing aristocracy in the Grecian cities of Asia, and now he attempted to make the crown of Sparta elective. In the pursuit of his ambition, he used prudence and artifice; and as he could not easily abolish a form of government which ages and popularity had confirmed, he had recourse to the assistance of the gods. His attempt, however, to corrupt the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter Ammon, proved ineffectual, and he was even accused of using bribes by the priests of the Libyan temple. The sudden declaration of war against the Thebans, saved him from the accusations of his adversaries, and he was sent, together with Pausanias, against the enemy. The plan of his military operations was discovered, and the Haliartians whose ruin he secretly meditated, attacked him unexpectedly, and he was killed in a bloody battle, which ended in the defeat of his troops, 394 years before Christ. His body was recovered by his colleague Pausanias, and honored with a magnificent funeral. Lysander has been commended for his bravery, but his ambition deserves the severest censure, and his cruelty and his duplicity have greatly stained his character. He was arrogant and vain in his public as well as private conduct, and he received and heard with the greatest avidity the hymns which his courtiers and flatterers sung to his honor. Yet in the midst of all his pomp, his ambition and intrigues, he died extremely poor, and his daughters were rejected by two opulent citizens of Sparta to whom they had been betrothed during the life of their father. This behaviour of the lovers was severely punished by the Lacedæmonians, who protected from injury the children of a man whom they hated for his sacrilege, his contempt of religion, and his perfidy. The father of Lysander, whose name was Aristoclites or Aristocrates, was descended from Hercules, though not reckoned of the race of the Heraclidæ. *Plut. & C. Lysias, a celebrated orator, son of Cephalus, a native of Syracuse. His father left Sicily and went to Athens, where Lysias was born and carefully educated. In his 15th year he accompanied the colony which the Athenians sent to Thurium, and after a long residence there he returned home in his 47th year. He distinguished himself by his eloquence, and by the simplicity, correctness, and purity of his orations, of which he wrote no less than 425 according to Plutarch, though the number may with more probability be reduced to 230. Of these 34 are extant, the best editions of which are that of Taylor, 8vo. Cantab. 1740, and that of Auger, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1783. Lysimachus, a son of Agathocles, who was among the generals of Alexander. After the death of that monarch, he made himself master of part of Thrace, where he built a town which he called Lysimachia. He sided with Cassander and Seleucus against Antigonus and Demetrius, and fought with them at the celebrated battle of Ipsus. He afterwards seized Macedonia, after expelling Pyrrhus from the throne, B. C. 286; but his cruelty rendered him odious, and the murder of his son Agathocles so offended his subjects, that the most opulent and powerful revolted from him and abandoned the kingdom. He pursued them to Asia, and declared war against Seleucus, who had given them a kind reception. He was killed in a bloody battle, 281 years before Christ, in the 80th year of his age, and his body was found in the the heaps of ſlain only by the fidelity of a little dog, which had carefully watched near it. It is ſaid that the love and reſpect of Lyſimachus for his learned maſter Calliſthenes proved nearly fatal to him. He, as Juſtin mentions, was thrown into the den of a hungry lion, by order of Alexander, for having given Calliſthenes poiſon, to ſave his life from ignominy and inſult; and when the furious animal darted upon him, he wrapped his hand in his mantle, and boldly thruſt it into the lion's mouth, and by twiſting his tongue, killed an adverſary ready to devour him. This act of courage in his ſelf-defence, recommended him to Alexander. He was pardoned, and ever after eſteemed by the monarch. Juſtin. 15, c. 3, &c.—Diod. 19, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 10.——An Acarnanian, preceptor to Alexander the Great. LYSIPPUS, a famous ſtatuary of Sicyon. He was originally a white-ſmith, and afterwards applied himſelf to painting, till his talents and inclination taught him that he was born to excel in ſculpture. He floriſhed about 325 years before the Chriſtian era, in the age of Alexander the Great. The monarch was ſo partial to the artiſt, that he forbad any ſculptor but Lyſippus to make his ſtatue. Lyſippus excelled in expreſſing the hair, and he was the firſt who made the head of his ſtatues leſs large, and the body ſmaller than uſual, that they might appear taller. This was obſerved by one of his friends, and the artiſt gave for anſwer, that his predeceſſors had repreſented men in their natural form, but that he repreſented them ſuch as they appeared. Lyſippus made no leſs than 600 ſtatues, the moſt admired of which were thoſe of Alexander; one of Apollo of Tarentum 40 cubits high; one of a man coming out of a bath, with which Agrippa adorned his baths; one of Socrates; and thoſe of the 25 horſemen who were drowned in the Granicus. Theſe were ſo valued, that, in the age of Auguſtus, they were bought for their weight in gold. Plut. in Alex.——Cic. in Brut. ad Her.——Paterc. 1, c. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 240.——A comic poet, ſome of whoſe plays are mentioned by Athenæus. Plin. 7, c. 37.——A general of the Achæan league.

MĂCĔDŎNIA, a celebrated country, situated between Thrace, Epirus, and Greece. Its boundaries have been different at different periods. Philip encreased it by the conquest of Thessaly and of part of Thrace, and according to Pliny it contained no less than 150 different nations. The kingdom of Macedonia, first founded B. C. 814, by Caranus, a descendant of Hercules, and a native of Argos, continued in existence 646 years till the battle of Pydna. The family of Caranus remained in possession of the crown until the death of Alexander the Great, and began to reign in the following order: Caranus, after a reign of 28 years, was succeeded by Cœnus who ascended the throne 786 B. C. Thurimas 774, Perdiccas 729, Argæus 678, Philip 640, Æropas 602, Alcetas or Alectas 576, Amyntas 547, Alexander 497, Perdiccas 454, Archelaus 413, Amyntas 399, Pausanias 398, Amyntas 2d, 397, Argæus the tyrant 390, Amyntas restored 390, Alexander 2d, 371, Ptolemy Alorites 370, Perdiccas 3d, 366, Philip son of Amyntas 360, Alexander the Great 336, Philip Aridæus 323, Cassander 316, Antipater and Alexander 298, Demetrius king of Asia 294, Pyrrhus 287, Lysimachus 286, Ptolemy Ceraunus 280, Meleager two months, Antipater the Etesian 45 days, Antigonus Gonatas 277, Demetrius 243, Antigonus Doson 232, Philip 221, Perseus 179, conquered by the Romans 168 B. C. at Pydna. Macedonia has been severally called Æmonia, Mygdonia, Pæonia, Edonia, Æmathia, &c. The inhabitants of Macedonia were naturally warlike, and though in the infancy of their empire they were little known beyond the borders of their country, yet they signalized themselves greatly in the reign of Philip, and added the kingdom of Asia to their European dominions by the valor of Alexander. The Macedonian phalanx, or body of soldiers, was always held in the highest repute, and it resisted and subdued the repeated attacks of the bravest and most courageous enemies. Liv. 44.—Just. 6, c. 9. l. 7, c. 1, &c.—Strab. 7.—Mela. 1, c. 3, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 10, &c.—Curt. 3 & 4.—Paus. 8, c. 7.

MACEDONĬCUM BELLUM was undertaken by the Romans against Philip king of Macedonia some few months after the second Punic war, B. C. 200. The cause of this war originated in the hostilities which Philip had exercised against the Achæans, the friends and allies of Rome. The consul Flaminius had the care of this war, and he conquered Philip on the confines of Epirus, and afterwards in Thessaly. The Macedonian fleets were also defeated; Eubœa was taken; and Philip, after continual losses, sued for peace, which was granted him in the fourth year of the war. The ambition and cruelty of Perseus, the son and successor of Philip, soon irritated the Romans. Another war was undertaken, in which the Romans suffered two defeats. This, however, did not discourage them; Paulus Æmylius was chosen consul in the 60th year of his age, and entrusted with the care of the war. He came to a general engagement near the city of Pydna. The victory sided with the Romans, and 20,000 of the Macedonian soldiers were left on the field of battle. This decisive blow put an end to the war, which had already continued for three years, 168 years before the Christian era. Perseus and his sons Philip and Alexander were taken prisoners, and carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. About fifteen years after, new seditions were raised in Macedonia, and the false pretensions of Andriscus, who called himself the son of Perseus, obliged the Romans to send an army to quell the commotions. Andriscus at first obtained many considerable advantages over the Roman forces, till at last he was conquered and delivered to the consul Metellus, who carried him to Rome. After these commotions, which are sometimes called the third Macedonian war, Macedonia was finally reduced into a Roman province, and governed by a regular proconsul, about 148 years before the Christian era.

MACEDONĬCUS, a firname given to Metellus, from his conquests in Macedonia. It was also given to such as had obtained any victory in that province.

MACHANĬDAS, a man who made himself absolute at Sparta. He was killed by Philopœmen, after being defeated at Mantinea, B. C. 208. Nabis succeeded him. Plut.

MĂCHĀON, a celebrated physician, son of Æsculapius and brother to Podalirus. He went to the Trojan war with the inhabitants of Trica, Ithome, and Œchalia. According to some he was king of Messenia. As physician to the Greeks, he healed the wounds which they received during the Trojan war, and was one of those concealed in the wooden horse. Some suppose that he was killed before Troy by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus. He received divine honors after death, and had a temple in Messenia. Homer. Il. 2, &c.—Ovid. ex Pont. 3, ep. 4.—Quint. Smyr. 6, v. 409.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 263 & 426.

MACRA, a river flowing from the Apennines, and dividing Liguria from Etruria. Lucan. 2, v. 426.—Liv. 39, c. 32.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

MACRI CAMPI, a plain in Cisalpine Gaul, near the river Gabellus. Liv. 41, c. 18. l. 45, c. 12.——A plain near Mutina bears the same name. Col. 7, c. 2.

MACRIĀNUS, Titus Fulvius Julius, an Egyptian of obscure birth, who, from a private soldier, rose to the highest command in the army, and proclaimed himself emperor when Valerian had been made prisoner by the Persians, A. D. 260. His liberality supported his usurpation; his two sons Macrianus and Quietus were invested with the imperial purple, and the enemies of Rome were severally defeated either by the emperors or their generals. When he had supported his dignity for a year in the eastern parts of the world, Macrianus marched towards Rome, to crush Gallienus, who had been proclaimed emperor. He was defeated in Illyricum by the lieutenant of Gallienus, and put to death with his son, at his own expressive request, A. D. 262.

MACRĪNUS, M. Opilius Severus, a native of Africa, who rose from the most ignominious condition to the rank of præfect of the prætorian guards, and at last of emperor, after the death of Caracalla, whom he inhumanly sacrificed to his ambition, A. D. 217. The beginning of his reign was popular; the abolition of the taxes, and an affable and complaisant behaviour, endeared him to his subjects. These promising appearances did not long continue, and the timidity which Macrinus betrayed in buying the peace of the Persians by a large sum of money, soon rendered him odious; and while he affected to imitate the virtuous Aurelius, without possessing the good qualities of his heart, he became contemptible and insignificant. This affectation irritated the minds of the populace, and when severe punishments had been inflicted on some of the disorderly soldiers, the whole army mutinied; and their tumult was encreased by their consciousness of their power and numbers, which Macrinus had the imprudence to betray, by keeping almost all the military force of Rome encamped together in the plains of Syria. Heliogabalus was proclaimed emperor, and Macrinus attempted to save his life by flight. He was, however, seized in Cappadocia, and his head was cut off and sent to his successor, June 7th A. D. 218. Macrinus reigned about two months and three days. His son, called Diadumenianus, shared his father's fate.——A friend of the poet Persius, to whom his second satire is inscribed.

MACRO, a favorite of the emperor Tiberius, celebrated for his intrigues, perfidy, and cruelty. He destroyed Sejanus, and raised himself upon the ruins of that unfortunate favorite. He was accessary to the murder of Tiberius, and conciliated the good opinion of Caligula, by prostituting to him his own wife called Ennia. He soon after became unpopular, and was obliged by Caligula to kill himself together with his wife, A. D. 38.

MACRŌBII, a people of Æthiopia, celebrated for their justice and the innocence of their manners. They generally lived to their 120th year; and, indeed, from their longevity they have obtained their name (μακρος βιος, long life), to distinguish them more particularly from the other inhabitants of Æthiopia. Herodot. 3, c. 17.—Mela. 3, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 48.—Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

MACROBIUS, a Latin writer who died A. D. 415. Some suppose that he was chamberlain to the emperor Theodosius II. but this appears groundless, when we observe that Macrobius was a follower of paganism, and that none were admitted to the confidence of the emperor, or to the enjoyment of high stations, except such as were of the Christian religion. Macrobius has rendered himself famous for a composition called Saturnalia, a miscellaneous collection of antiquities and criticisms, supposed to have been the result of a conversation of some of the learned Romans during the celebration of the Saturnalia. This was written for the use of his son, and the bad latinity which the author author has often introduced, proves that he was not born in a part of the Roman empire where the Latin tongue was ſpoken, as he himſelf candidly confeſſes. The Saturnalia are uſeful for the learned reflections they contain, and particularly for ſome curious obſervations on the two greateſt epic poets of antiquity. Beſides this, Macrobius wrote a commentary on Cicero's ſomnium Scipionis, which is likewiſe compoſed for the improvement of the author's ſon, and dedicated to him. The beſt editions are that of Gronovius 8vo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Lipſ. 8vo. 1777.

MACRŎCHIR, a Greek name of Artaxerxes, the ſame as Longimanus. This ſirname ariſes from his having one hand longer than the other. C. Nep. in Reg.

MACRŌNES, a nation of Pontus, on the confines of Colchis and Armenia. Flac. 5, v. 152.—Herodot.

MACTORIUM, a town of Sicily.

MĂCŬLŌNUS, a rich and penurious Roman, &c. Juv. 7, v. 40.

MADAURA, a town on the borders of Numidia and Gætulia, of which the inhabitants were called Madaurenſes. It was the native place of Apuleius. Apul. Met. 11.

MADESTES, a town of Thrace.

MADETES, a general of Darius, who bravely defended a place againſt Alexander. The conqueror reſolved to put him to death, though thirty orators pleaded for his life. Siſygambis prevailed over the almoſt inexorable Alexander, and Madetes was pardoned. Curt. 5, c. 3.

MADUATĒNI, a people of Thrace. Liv. 38. c. 40.

MADYES, a Scythian prince who purſued the Cimmerians in Aſia, and conquered Cyaxares, B. C. 623. He held for ſome time the ſupreme power of Aſia Minor. Herodot. 8, c. 103.

MÆANDER, a ſon of Oceanus and Tethys.——A celebrated river of Aſia Minor, riſing near Celænæ, and flowing through Caria and Ionia into the Ægean ſea between Miletus and Priene, after it has been encreaſed by the waters of the Marſyas, Lycus, Eudon, Lethæus, &c. It is celebrated among the poets for its windings, which amount to no leſs than 600, and from which all obliquities have received the name of Mæanders. It forms in its courſe, according to the obſervations of ſome travellers, the Greek letters ι ζ ξ ς & ω, and from its windings Dædalus had the firſt idea of his famous labyrinth. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 145, &c.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 254.—Lucan. 3 & 6.—Homer. Il. 2.—Herodot. 2, c. 29.—Cic. Viſ. 22.—Strab. 12, &c.—Mela. 1, c. 17.

MÆATÆ, a people at the ſouth of Scotland. Dio. 76, c. 12.

MÆCENAS. Vid. Mecænas.

MÆDI, a people of Mædica, a diſtrict of Thrace near Rhodope. Liv. 26, c. 25. l. 40, c. 21.

MÆLIUS, a Roman, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, for aſpiring to tyranny at Rome, in the early ages of the republic.

MÆMACTERIA, ſacrifices offered to Jupiter at Athens in the winter month Mæmacterion. The god ſirnamed Mæmactes was intreated to ſend mild and temperate weather, as he preſided over the ſeaſons, and was the god of the air.

MÆNĂDES, a name of the Bacchantes, or prieſteſſes of Bacchus. The word is derived from μαινομαι, to be furious, becauſe in the celebration of the feſtivals their geſtures and actions were thoſe of mad women. Ovid. Faſt. 4. v. 458.

MÆNALA, a town of Spain.

MÆNĂLUS, (plur. Mænala,) a mountain of Arcadia ſacred to the god Pan, and greatly frequented by ſhepherds. It received its name from Mænalus, a ſon of Lycaon. It was covered with pine trees, whoſe echo and ſhade have been greatly celebrated by all the ancient poets. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 216.—Virg. G. 1, v. 17. Ecl. 8, v. 24.—Pauſ. 8, c. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.——A town of Arcadia.——A ſon of Lycaon.——The father of Atalanta.

MÆNIUS, a Roman conſul.—A dictator accuſed and honorably acquitted, &c.—A ſpendthrift at Rome. Horat. 1, ep. 15, v. 26.

MÆNON, a tyrant of Sicily, B. C. 285.

MÆNUS, a river of Germany now called the Mayne, falling into the Rhine at Mayence.

MÆŎNIA, a country of Aſia Minor, the ſame as Lydia. It is to be obſerved, that only part of Lydia was known by the name of Mæonia, that is, the neighbourhood of mount Tmolus, and the country watered by the Pactolus. The reſt on the ſea coaſt was called Lydia. Strab. 12.—Ovid. Met.—The Etrurians, as being deſcended from a Lydian colony, are often called Mæonidæ, (Virg. Æn. 11, v. 759.) and even the lake Thraſymenus in their country is called Mæonius lacus. Sil. Ital. 15, v. 35.

MÆŎNĬDÆ, a name given to the Muſes, becauſe Homer, their greateſt and worthieſt favorite, was ſuppoſed to be a native of Mæonia.

MÆŎNĬDES, a ſirname of Homer, becauſe, according to the opinion of ſome writers, he was born in Mæonia, or becauſe his father's name was Mæon. Ovid.

MÆŎNIS, an epithet applied to Omphale as queen of Lydia or Mæonia. Ovid. The epithet is alſo applied to Arachne as a native of Lydia. Id. Met. 6.

MÆŌTÆ, a people of Aſiatic Sarmatia.

MÆOTIS PALUS, a large lake, or part of the ſea between Europe and Aſia, at the north of the Euxine, to which it communicates by the Cimmerian Boſphorus, now called the ſea of Azoph or Zaback. It was worſhipped as a deity by the Maſſagetæ. It extends about 390 miles from ſouth-weſt to north-eaſt, and is about 600 miles in circumference. The Amazons are called Mæotides, as living in the neighbourhood. Strab.—Mela. 1, c. 1, &c.—Juſtin. 2, c. 1.—Curt. 5, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, &c.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, el. 12. ep. Sab. 2, v. 9.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 739.

MÆSIA SYLVA, a wood in Etruria, near the mouth of the Tiber. Liv. 1, c. 33.

MÆVIA, an immodeſt woman. Juv. 1, v. 22.

MÆVIUS, a poet of inferior note in the Auguſtan age, who made himſelf known by his illiberal attacks on the character of the firſt writers of his time, as well as by his affected compoſitions. His name would have ſunk in oblivion if Virgil had not ridiculed him in his third eclogue, and Horace in his 10th epode.

MAGAS, a king of Cyrene in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 257. Polyæn. 2.

MAGELLA, a town of Sicily.

MAGETÆ, a people of Africa.

MAGI, a religious ſect among the eaſtern nations of the world, and particularly in Perſia. They had great influence in the political as well as religious affairs of the ſtate, and a monarch ſeldom aſcended the throne without their previous approbation. Zoroaſter was founder of their ſect. They paid particular homage to fire, which they deemed a deity, as pure in itſelf, and the purifier of all things. In their religious tenets they had two principles, one good, the ſource of every thing good; and the other evil, from whence ſprung all manner of ills. Their profeſſional ſkill in the mathematics and philoſophy rendered every thing familiar to them, and from their knowledge of the phænomena of the heavens, the word Magi was applied to all learned men; and in proceſs of time, the Magi, from their experience and profeſſion, were confounded with the magicians who impoſe upon the ſuperſtitious and credulous. Hence the word Magi and magicians became ſynonymous among the vulgar. Smerdis, one of the Magi, uſurped the crown of Perſia after the death of Cambyſes, and the fraud was not diſcovered till the ſeven noble Perſians conſpired againſt the uſurper, and elected Darius king. From this circumſtance there was a certain day on which none of the Magi were permitted to appear in public, as the populace had the privilege of murdering whomſoever of them they met. Strab.—Cic. de Div. 1.—Herodot. 3, c. 62, &c.

MAGIUS, a lieutenant of Piſo, &c.—A man in the intereſt of Pompey, grandfather to the hiſtorian Velleius Paterculus, &c. Paterc. 2, c. 115.

MAGNA GRÆCIA, a part of Italy. Vid. Græcia Magna.

MAGNA MATER, a name given to Cybele.

MAGNENTIUS, an ambitious Roman who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his cruelty and perfidy. He conſpired againſt the life of Conſtans, and murdered him in his bed. This cruelty was highly reſented by Conſtantius; and the aſſaſſin, unable to eſcape from the fury of his antagoniſt, murdered his own mother and the reſt of his relations, and afterwards killed himſelf by falling upon a ſword, which he had thruſt againſt a wall. He was the firſt of the followers of Chriſtianity who ever murdered his lawful ſovereign, A. D. 353.

MAGNES, a young man who found himſelf detained by the iron nails which were under his ſhoes as he walked over a ſtone mine. This was no other than the magnet, which received its name from the perſon who had been firſt ſenſible of its power. ——A ſon of Æolus and Anaretta, who married Nais, by whom he had Pierus, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 7.——A poet and muſician of Smyrna, in the age of Gyges king of Lydia.

MAGNĒSIA, a town of Aſia Minor on the Mæander, about 15 miles from Epheſus, now called Guzelhizar. It is celebrated for the death of Themiſtocles, and for a battle which was fought there 187 years before the Chriſtian era, between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. The forces of Antiochus amounted to 70,000 men, according to Appian, or 70,000 foot and 12,000 horſe according to Livy, which have been exaggerated by Florus to 300,000 men; the Roman army conſiſted of about 28, or 30,000 men, 2000 of which were employed in guarding the camp. The Syrians loſt 50,000 foot and 4000 horſe, and the Romans only 300 killed with 25 horſe. It was founded by a colony from Magneſia in Theſſaly, and was commonly called Magneſia ad Mæandrum, to diſtinguiſh it from another called Magneſia ad Sipylum, in Lydia, at the foot of mount Sipylus. This laſt was deſtroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius.——A country on the eaſtern parts of Theſſaly, at the ſouth of Oſſa. It was ſometimes called Æmonia and Magnes Campus. The capital was alſo called Magneſia.——A promontory of Magneſia in Theſſaly. Liv. 37.——Flor. 2.——Appian.

MAGO, a Carthaginian general ſent againſt Dionyſius tyrant of Sicily. He obtained a victory and granted peace to the conquered. In a battle, which ſoon after followed lowed this treaty of peace, Mago was killed. His ſon of the ſame name ſucceeded to the command of the Carthaginian army, but he diſgraced himſelf by flying at the approach of Timoleon, who had come to aſſiſt the Syracuſans. He was accuſed in the Carthaginian ſenate, and he prevented by ſuicide the execution of the ſentence juſtly pronounced againſt him. His body was hung on a gibbet, and expoſed to public ignominy.—A brother of Annibal the Great. He was preſent at the battle of Cannæ, and was deputed by his brother to carry to Carthage the news of the celebrated victory which had been obtained over the Roman armies. His arrival at Carthage was unexpected; and more powerfully to aſtoniſh his countrymen on account of the victory of Cannæ, he emptied in the ſenate houſe the three buſhels of golden rings which had been taken from the Roman knights ſlain in battle. He was afterwards ſent to Spain, where he defeated the two Scipios, and was himſelf, in another engagement, totally ruined. He retired to the Baleares, which he conquered; and one of the cities there ſtill bears his name, and is called Portus Magonis, Port Mahon. After this he landed in Italy with an army, and took poſſeſſion of part of Inſubria. He was defeated in a battle by Quintilius Varus, and died of a mortal wound 203 years before the Chriſtian era. Liv. 30, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann. 8, gives a very different account of his death, and ſays, he either periſhed in a ſhipwreck or was murdered by his ſervants. Perhaps Annibal had two brothers of that name.——A Carthaginian more known by the excellence of his writings than by his military exploits. He wrote 28 volumes upon huſbandry; theſe were preſerved by Scipio at the taking of Carthage, and preſented to the Roman ſenate. They were tranſlated into Greek by Caſſius Dionyſius of Utica, and into Latin by order of the Roman ſenate, though Cato had already written ſo copiouſly upon the ſubject; and the Romans, as it has been obſerved, conſulted the writings of Mago with greater earneſtneſs than the books of the Sibylline verſes. Columella.——A Carthaginian ſent by his countrymen to aſſiſt the Romans againſt Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, with a fleet of 120 ſail. This offer was politely refuſed by the Roman ſenate. This Mago was father of Aſdrubal and Hamilcar. Val. Max.

MĂGONTIĂCUM or MAGONTEA, a large city of Germany, now called Mentz. Tacit. 4, Hiſt. 15 & 23.

MAGUS, an officer of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 522.

MAHERBAL, a Cathaginian who was at the ſiege of Saguntum, and who commanded the cavalry of Annibal at the battle of Cannæ. He adviſed the conqueror immediately to march to Rome, but Annibal required time to conſider on ſo bold a meaſure; upon which Maherbal obſerved, that Annibal knew how to conquer, but not how to make a proper uſe of victory.

MAĪA, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, mother of Mercury by Jupiter. She was one of the Pleiades, the moſt luminous of the ſeven ſiſters. [Vid. Pleiades.] Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 301.——A ſirname of Cybele.

MAJESTAS, a goddeſs among the Romans, daughter of Honor and Reverence. Ovid. 5, Faſt. 5, v. 25.

MAJORIĀNUS, Jul. Valerius, an emperor of the weſtern Roman empire, raiſed to the imperial throne, A. D. 457. He ſignalized himſelf by his private as well as public virtues. He was maſſacred after a reign of 37 years by one of his generals, who envied in his maſter the character of an active, virtuous, and humane emperor.

MAJORCA, the greateſt of the iſlands called Baleares, on the coaſt of Spain, in the Mediterranean. Strab.

MALA FORTUNA, the goddeſs of evil fortune, was worſhipped among the Romans. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

MALĒA, a promontory of Leſbos.—Another in Peloponneſus, at the ſouth of Laconia. The ſea is ſo rough and boiſterous there, that the dangers which attended a voyage round it gave riſe to the proverb of Cum ad Maleam deflexeris, obliviſcere quæ ſunt domi. Strab. 8 & 9.—Lucan. 6, v. 58.—Plut. in Arat.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 193.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Pauſ. 3, c. 23.

MALEVENTUM, the ancient name of Beneventum. Liv. 9, c. 27.

MALIA, a city of Phthiotis near mount Œta and Thermopylæ. There were in its neighbourhood ſome hot mineral waters which the poet Catullus has mentioned. From Malia a gulf or ſmall bay in the neighbourhood, at the weſtern extremities of the iſland of Eubœa, has received the name of the gulf of Malia, Maliacum Fretum or Maliacus Sinus. Some call it the gulf of Lamia from its vicinity to Lamia. It is often taken for the Sinus Pelaſgicus of the antients. Pauſ. 1, c. 4.—Herodot.

MALHO or MATHO, a general of an army of Carthaginian mercenaries, 258 B. C.

MALII, a people of Meſopotamia.

MALIS, a ſervant maid of Omphale, beloved by Hercules.

MALLEA or MALLIA AQUA. Vid. Malia.

MALLĔOLUS, a man who murderedhis mother, &c. Cic. ad Heren. 1, c. 13.

MALLIUS, a Roman conſul defeated by the Gauls, &c.

MALLOS, a town of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 227.

MALTHĪNUS, a name under which Horace has laſhed ſome of his friends or enemies. 1, Sat. 2, v. 27.

MAMAUS, a river of Peloponneſus.

MAMERCUS, a tyrant of Catana, who ſurrendered to Timoleon. His attempts to ſpeak in a public aſſembly at Syracuſe were received with groans and hiſſes, upon which he daſhed his head againſt a wall, and endeavoured to deſtroy himſelf. The blows were not fatal, and Mamercus was ſoon after put to death as a robber, B. C. 340. Polyæn. 5.—C. Nep. in Tim.—A Dictator at Rome, B. C. 437.

MAMERTHES, a Corinthian who killed his brother's ſon in hopes of reigning, upon which he was torn to pieces by his brother. Ovid. in Ib.

MAMERTĪNA, a town of Campania, famous for its wines.——A name of Meſſana in Sicily. Martial. 13, ep. 117.—Strab. 7.

MAMERTĪNI, a mercenary band of ſoldiers which paſſed from Campania into Sicily, at the requeſt of Agathocles. When they were in the ſervice of Agathocles, they claimed the privilege of voting at the election of magiſtrates at Syracuſe, and had recourſe to arms to ſupport their unlawful demands. The ſedition was appeaſed by the authority of ſome leading men, and the Campanians were ordered to leave Sicily. In their way to the coaſt they were received with great kindneſs by the people of Meſſana, and ſoon returned perfidy for hoſpitality. They conſpired againſt the inhabitants, murdered all the males in the city, and married their wives and daughters, and rendered themſelves maſters of the place. After this violence they aſſumed the name of Mamertini, and called their city Mamertina, from a provincial word, which in their language ſignified martial, or warlike. The Mamertines were afterwards defeated by Hiero, and totally diſabled to repair their ruined affairs. Plut. in Pyrrh. &c.

MAMILIA LEX de limitibus, by the tribune Mamilius. It ordained, that in the boundaries of the lands five or ſix feet of land ſhould be left uncultivated, which no perſon could convert into private property. It alſo appointed commiſſioners to ſee it carried into execution.

MAMILII, a plebeian family at Rome, deſcended from the Aborigines. They firſt lived at Tuſculum, from whence they came to Rome. Liv. 3, c. 29.

MAMILIUS OCTAVIUS, a ſon-in-law of Tarquin, who behaved with uncommon bravery at the battle of Regillæ. He is alſo called Manilius. Vid. Manilius.

MAMMEA, the mother of the emperor Severus, who died A. D. 235.

MAMŬRIUS VETURIUS, a worker in braſs in Numa's reign. He was ordered by the monarch to make a number of ancylia or ſhields, like that one which had fallen from heaven, that it might be difficult to diſtinguiſh the true one from the others. He was very ſucceſsful in his undertaking, and he aſked for no other reward, but that his name might be frequently mentioned in the hymns which were ſung by the Salii in the feaſt of the Ancylia. This requeſt was granted. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 392.

MAMURRA, a Roman knight born at Formiæ. He followed the fortune of J. Cæſar in Gaul, where he greatly enriched himſelf. He built a magnificent palace on mount Cœlius, and was the firſt who incruſted his walls with marble. Catullus has attacked him in his epigrams. Formiæ is ſometimes called Mamurrarum urbs. Plin. 36, c. 6.

MANASTĂBAL, ſon of Maſiniſſa, who was father to the celebrated Jurgurtha. Salluſt. Jug. bell.

C. MANCĪNUS, a Roman general, who, though at the head of an army of 30,000 men, was defeated by 4000 Numantians, B. C. 138. He was dragged from the ſenate, &c. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 40.

MANDĀNE, a daughter of king Aſtyages married by her father to Cambyſes, an ignoble perſon of Perſia. The monarch had dreamed that his daughter's urine had drowned all his city, which had been interpreted in an unfavorable manner by the ſoothſayers, who aſſured him that his daughter's ſon would dethrone him. The marriage of Mandane with Cambyſes would in the monarch's opinion prevent the effects of the dream, and the children of this connection would like their father be poor and unnoticed The expectations of Aſtyages were fruſtrated. He was dethroned by his grandſon. Vid. Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 107.

MANDĀNES, an Indian prince and philoſopher, whom Alexander invited by his ambaſſadors, on pain of death, to come to his banquet, as being the ſon of Jupiter. The philoſopher ridiculed the threats and promiſes of Alexander, &c. Strab. 15.

MANDĒLA, a village in the country of the Sabines, near Horace's country ſeat. Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 105.

MANDŪRIA, a city of Calabria, near Tarentum, whoſe inhabitants were famous for eating dog's fleſh. Plin. 2, c. 103.—Liv. 27, c. 15.

MANES, a ſon of Jupiter and Tellus, who reigned in Mæonia. He was father of Cotys by Callirrhoe, the daughter of Oceanus.

MĀNES, a name generally applied by the antients to the ſouls when ſeparated from the body. They were reckoned among the infernal deities, and generally ſuppoſed to preſide over the burying places, and the monuments of the dead. They were worſhipped with great ſolemnity, particularly by the Romans. The augurs always invoked them when they proceeded to exerciſe their ſacerdotal offices. Virgil introduces his hero as ſacrificing to the infernal deities, and to the Manes, a victim whoſe blood was received in a ditch. The word manes, is ſuppoſed to be derived from Mania, who was by ſome reckoned the mother of thoſe tremendous deities. Others derive it from manare, quod per omnia ætherea terrenaque manabant, becauſe they filled the air, particularly in the night, and were intent to moleſt and diſturb the peace of mankind. Some ſay, that manes comes from manis, an old Latin word which ſignified good or propitious. The word manes is differently uſed by antient authors; ſometimes it is taken for the infernal regions, and ſometimes it is applied to the deities of Pluto's kingdom, whence the epitaphs of the Romans were always ſuperſcribed with D. M. Dis Manibus, to remind the ſacrilegious and profane, not to moleſt the monuments of the dead, which were guarded with ſuch ſanctity. Propert. 1, el. 19.—Virg. 4, G. v. 469. Æn. 3, &c.—Horat. 1. Sat. 8, v. 28.——A river of Locris.

MANĒTHO, a celebrated prieſt of Heliopolis in Egypt, B. C. 261. He wrote in Greek an hiſtory of Egypt, which has been often quoted and commended by the antients, particularly by Joſephus. It was chiefly collected from the writings of Mercury, and from the journals and annals, which were preſerved in the Egyptian temples. This hiſtory has been greatly corrupted by the Greeks. The author ſupported, that all the gods of the Egyptians had been mere mortals, and had all lived upon earth. This hiſtory, which is now loſt, had been epitomized, and ſome fragments of it are ſtill extant. There is extant a Greek poem aſcribed to Manetho, in which the power of the ſtars, which preſide over the birth and fate of mankind, is explained. The Apoteleſmata of this author were edited in 4to. by Gronovius, L. Bat. 1698.

MANIA, a goddeſs, ſuppoſed to be the mother of the Lares and Manes.——A female ſervant of queen Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy.

MĀNĪLIA LEX, by Manilius the tribune, A. U. C. 678. It required that all the forces of Lucullus and his province, together with Bithynia, which was then under the command of Glabrio, ſhould be delivered to Pompey, and that this general ſhould, without any delay, declare war againſt Mithridates, and ſtill retain the command of the Roman fleet, and the empire of the Mediterranean, as before.——Another which permitted all thoſe whoſe fathers had not been inveſted with public offices, to be employed in the management of affairs.——A woman famous for her debaucheries. Juv. 6, v. 242.

MĀNĪLIUS, a Roman who married the daughter of Tarquin. He lived at Tuſculum, and received his father-in-law in his houſe, when baniſhed from Rome, &c. Liv. 2, c. 15.——Caius, a celebrated mathematician and poet of Antioch, who wrote a poetical treatiſe on aſtronomy, of which five books are extant, treating of the fixed ſtars. The ſtile is not elegant. The age in which he lived is not known, though ſome ſuppoſe, that he floriſhed in the Auguſtan age. No author, however, in the age of Auguſtus has made mention of Manilius. The beſt editions of Manilius are thoſe of Bentley, 4to. London, 1739, and Stoeberus, 8vo. Argentor. 1767.——Titus, a learned hiſtorian in the age of Sylla and Marius. He is greatly commended by Cicero, pro Roſcio.——Marcus, another mentioned by Cicero de Orat. 1, c. 48, as ſupporting the character of a great lawyer, and of an eloquent and powerful orator.

MANĪMI, a people in Germany. Tacit. G. 43.

MANLIA LEX, by the tribune P. Manlius, A. U. C. 557. It revived the office of treviri epulones, firſt inſtituted by Numa. The epulones were prieſts, who prepared banquets for Jupiter and the gods at public feſtivals, &c.

MANLIUS TORQUĀTUS, a celebrated Roman, whose youth was distinguished by a lively and chearful disposition. These promising talents were, however, impeded by a difficulty of speaking; and the father unwilling to expose his son's rusticity at Rome, detained him in the country. The behaviour of the father was publicly censured, and Marius Pomponius the tribune cited him to answer for his unfatherly behaviour to his son. Young Manlius was informed of this, and with a dagger in his hand he entered the house of the tribune, and made him solemnly promise that he would drop the accusation. This action of Manlius endeared him to the people, and soon after he was chosen military tribune. In a war against the Gauls, he accepted the challenge of one of the enemy, whose gigantic stature and ponderous arms had rendered him terrible and almost invincible in the eyes of the Romans. The Gaul was conquered, and Manlius stripped him of his arms, and from the collar (torquis) which he took from the enemy's neck, he was ever after surnamed Torquatus. Manlius was the first Roman who was raised to the dictatorship, without having been previously consul. The severity of Torquatus to his son, has been deservedly censured. This father had the courage and heart to put to death his son, because he had engaged one of the enemy, and obtained an honorable victory, without his previous permission. This uncommon rigor displeased many of theRomans; and, though Torquatus was honored with a triumph, and commended by the senate for his services, yet the Roman youth showed their disapprobation of the consul's severity, by refusing him at his return the homage which every other conqueror received. Some time after the censorship was offered to him, but he refused it, observing, that the people could not bear his severity, nor he the vices of the people. From the rigor of Torquatus, all edicts and actions of severity and justice have been called Manliana edicta. Liv. 7, c. 10.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.——Marcus, a celebrated Roman, whose valor was displayed in the field of battle, even at the early age of 16. When Rome was taken by the Gauls, Manlius with a body of his countrymen fled into the capitol, which he defended when it was suddenly surprised in the night by the enemy. This action gained him the surname of Capitolinus, and the geese, which by their clamor had awakened him to arm himself in his own defence, were ever after held sacred among the Romans. A law which Manlius proposed to abolish the taxes on the common people, raised the senators against him. The dictator, Corn. Cossus, seized him as a rebel, but the people put on mourning, and delivered from prison their common father. This did not, in the least, check his ambition; he continued to raise factions, and even secretly to attempt to make himself absolute, till at last the tribunes of the people themselves became his accusers. He was tried in the Campus Martius; but when the distant view of the capitol which Manlius had saved, seemed to influence the people in his favor, the court of justice was removed, and Manlius was condemned. He was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, A. U. C. 371, and to render his ignominy still greater, none of his family were afterwards permitted to bear the surname of Marcus, and the place where his house had stood was deemed unworthy to be inhabited. Liv. 5, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 13 & 26.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.——Imperiosus, father of Manlius Torquatus. He was made dictator. He was accused for detaining his son at home. Vid. Manlius Torquatus.——Volso, a Roman consul who received an army of Scipio in Asia, and made war against the Gallo-grecians, whom he conquered. He was honored with a triumph at his return, though it was at first strongly opposed. Flor. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 38, c. 12, &c.——Another called also Cincinnatus. He made war against the Etrurians and Veientes with great success. He died of a wound he had received in a battle.——Another, who in his prætorship reduced Sardinia. He was afterwards made dictator.——Another, who was defeated by a rebel army of slaves in Sicily.——A prætor in Gaul, who fought against the Boii, with very little success.——Another, called Atilius, who defeated a Carthaginian fleet, &c.——Another, who conspired with Catiline against the Roman republic.——Another, in whose consulship the temple of Janus was shut.——Another, who was banished under Tiberius for his adultery——A Roman appointed judge between his son Silanus and the province of Macedonia. When all the parties had been heard, the father said, "it is evident that my son has suffered himself to be bribed, therefore I deem him unworthy of the republic and of my house, and I order him to depart from my presence." Silanus was so struck at the rigor of his father, that he hanged himself. Val. Max. 5, c. 5.——A learned man in the age of Cicero.

MANNUS, the son of Thiasto, both famous divinities among the Germans. Tacit. de Germ. c. 2.

J. MANSUĒTUS, a friend of Vitellius, who entered the Roman armies, and left his son then very young at home. The ſon was promoted by Galba, and ſoon after met a detachment of the partizans of Vitellius in which his father was. A battle was fought, and Manſuetus was wounded by the hand of his ſon, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 3, c. 25.

MANTINEA, a town of Arcadia in Peloponneſus. It was taken by Aratus and Antigonus, and on account of the latter it was afterwards called Antigonia. The emperor Adrian built there a temple in honor of his favorite Alcinous. It is famous for the battle, which was fought there between Epaminondas at the head of the Thebans, and the combined force of Lacedæmon, Achaia, Elis, Athens, and Arcadia, about 363 years before Chriſt. The Theban general was killed in the engagement, and from that time Thebes loſt its power and conſequence among the Grecian ſtates.

MANTINEUS, the father of Ocalea, who married Abas the ſon of Lynceus and Hypermneſtra. Apollod. 2, c. 9.

MANTINŌRUM OPPIDUM, a town of Corſica, now ſuppoſed to be Baſtia.

MANTIUS, a ſon of Melampus.

MANTO, a daughter of the prophet Tireſias, endowed with the gift of prophecy. She was made priſoner by the Argives when the city of Thebes fell into their hands, and as ſhe was the worthieſt part of the booty, the conquerors ſent her to Apollo, the god of Delphi, as the moſt valuable preſent they could make. Manto, often called Daphne, remained for ſome time at Delphi, where ſhe officiated as prieſteſs, and where ſhe gave oracles. From Delphi ſhe came to Claros in Ionia, where ſhe eſtabliſhed an oracle of Apollo. Here ſhe married Rhadius the ſovereign of the country, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Mopſus. Manto afterwards viſited Italy, where ſhe married Tiberinus the king of Alba, or, as the poets mention, the god of the river Tyber. From this marriage ſprang Ocnus, who built a town in the neighbourhood, which, in honor of his mother, he called Mantua. Manto, according to a certain tradition, was ſo ſtruck at the misfortunes which afflicted Thebes, her native country, that ſhe gave way to her ſorrow, and was turned into a fountain. Some ſuppoſe her to be the ſame who conducted Æneas into hell, and who ſold the Sibylline books to Tarquin the Proud. She received divine honors after death. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 199 l. 10, v. 199.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 157.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.—Strab. 14 & 16.—Pauſ. 9, c. 10.

MANTUA, a town of Italy beyond the Po, founded about 300 years before Rome by Bianor or Ocnus, the ſon of Manto. It was the antient capital of Etruria. When Cremona, which had followed the intereſt of Brutus, was given to the ſoldiers of Octavius, Mantua alſo, which was in the neighbourhood, ſhared the common calamity, though it had favored the party of Auguſtus, and many of the inhabitants were tyrannically deprived of their poſſeſſions. Virgil, who was among them, and a native of the town, and from thence often called Mantuanus, applied for redreſs to Auguſtus, and obtained it by means of his poetical talents. Strab. 5.—Virg. Ecl. 1, &c. G. 3, v. 12. Æn. 10, v. 180.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 15.

MARACANDA, a town of Sogdiana.

MĂRĂTHA, a village of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 28.

MĂRĂTHON, a village of Attica, 10 miles from Athens, celebrated for the victory which the 10,000 Athenians and 1000 Platæans, under the command of Miltiades, gained over the Perſian army, conſiſting of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horſe, or, according to Val. Maximus, of 300,000, or, as Juſtin ſays, of 600,000, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, on the 28th of Sept. 490, B. C. In this battle, according to Herodotus, the Athenians loſt only 192 men, and the Perſians 6,300. Juſtin has raiſed the loſs of the Perſians, in this expedition and in the battle, to 200,000 men. To commemorate this immortal victory of their countrymen the Greeks raiſed ſmall columns, with the names inſcribed on the tombs of the fallen heroes. It was alſo in the plains of Marathon that Theſeus overcame a celebrated bull, which plundered the neighbouring country. Erigone is called Marathonia virgo, as being born at Marathon. Stat. 5 Sylv. 3, v. 74.—C. Nep. in Milt.—Herodot. 6, &c.—Juſtin. 2, c. 9.—*Val. MARĂTHOS, a town of Phœnicia. Mela. 1, c. 12.

MARCELLA, a daughter of Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus by Marcellus. She married Agrippa.

MARCELLĪNUS AMMIĂNUS, a celebrated hiſtorian who carried arms under Conſtantius, Julian, and Valens, and wrote an hiſtory of Rome from the reign of Domitian, where Suetonius ſtops, to the emperor Valens. His ſtile is neither elegant nor labored, but it is greatly valuable for its veracity, and in many of the actions he mentions, the author was nearly concerned. This hiſtory was compoſed at Rome, where Ammianus retired from the noiſe and troubles of the camp, and does not betray that ſeverity againſt the Chriſtians which other writers writers have manifeſted, though the author was warm in favor of Paganiſm, the religion which for a while was ſeated on the throne. It was divided into thirty-one books, of which only the eighteen laſt remain, beginning at the death of Magnentius. Ammianus has been liberal in his encomiums upon Julian, whoſe favors he enjoyed, and who ſo eminently patronized his religion. The negligence with which ſome facts are ſometimes mentioned, has induced many to believe that the hiſtory of Ammianus has ſuffered much from the ravages of time, and that it is deſcended to us mutilated and imperfect. The beſt editions of Ammianus, are thoſe of Gronovius, fol. and 4to. L. Bat. 1693, and of Erneſti, 8vo. Lipſ. 1773. ——An officer under Julian.

MARCELLUS, Marcus Claudius, a famous Roman general, who, after the firſt Punic war, had the management of an expedition againſt the Gauls, where he obtained the Spolia opima, by killing with his own hand Viridomarus the king of the enemy. Such ſucceſs rendered him popular, and ſoon after he was entruſted to oppoſe Annibal in Italy. He was the firſt Roman who obtained ſome advantage over this celebrated Carthaginian, and ſhowed his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible. The troubles which were raiſed in Sicily by the Carthaginians at the death of Hieronymus, alarmed the Romans, and Marcellus, in his third conſulſhip, was ſent with a powerful force againſt Syracuſe. He attacked it by ſea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, and the invention and induſtry of a philoſopher [Vid. Archimedes.] were able to baffle all the efforts, and to deſtroy all the great and ſtupendous machines and military engines of the Romans, during three ſucceſſive years. The perſeverance of Marcellus at laſt obtained the victory. The inattention of the inhabitants during their nocturnal celebration of the feſtivals of Diana, favored his operations; he forcibly entered the town, and made himſelf maſter of it. The conqueror enriched the capital of Italy with the ſpoils of Syracuſe, and when he was accuſed of rapaciouſneſs, for ſtripping the conquered city of all its paintings and ornaments, he confeſſed, that he had done it to adorn the public buildings of Rome, and to introduce a taſte for the fine arts and elegance of the Greeks among his countrymen. After the conqueſt of Syracuſe, Marcellus was called upon by his country to oppoſe a ſecond time Annibal. In this campaign he behaved with greater vigor than before; the greateſt part of the towns of the Samnites, which had revolted, were recovered by force of arms, and 3000 of the ſoldiers of Annibal made priſoners. Some time after an engagement with the Carthaginian general proved unfavorable; Marcellus had the diſadvantage: but on the morrow a more ſucceſsful ſkirmiſh vindicated his military character, and the honor of the Roman ſoldiers. Marcellus, however, was not ſufficiently vigilant againſt the ſnares of his adverſary. He imprudently ſeparated himſelf from his camp, and was killed in an ambuſcade in the 60th year of his age, in his 5th conſulſhip, A. U. C. 544. His body was honored with a magnificent funeral by the conqueror, and his aſhes were conveyed in a ſilver urn to his ſon. Marcellus claims our commendation for his private as well as public virtues; and the humanity of a general will ever be remembered, who, at the ſurrender of Syracuſe, wept at the thought that many were going to be expoſed to the avarice and rapaciouſneſs of an incenſed ſoldiery, which the policy of Rome and the laws of war rendered inevitable. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 855.—Plut. in vitâ, &c.——One of his deſcendants, who bore the ſame name, ſignalized himſelf in the civil wars of Cæſar and Pompey, by his firm attachment to the latter. He was baniſhed by Cæſar, but afterwards recalled at the requeſt of the ſenate. Cicero undertook his defence in an oration which is ſtill extant.——The grandſon of Pompey's friend rendered himſelf popular by his univerſal benevolence and affability. He was ſon of Marcellus by Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus. He married Julia that emperor's daughter, and was publicly intended as his ſucceſſor. The ſuddenneſs of his death, at the early age of 18, was the cauſe of much lamentation at Rome, particularly in the family of Auguſtus, and Virgil procured himſelf great favors by celebrating the virtues of this amiable prince. [Vid. Octavia.] Marcellus was buried at the public expence. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 883.—Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Marcell.—Senec. Conſol. ad Marc.—Paterc. 2, c. 93.——The ſon of the great Marcellus who took Syracuſe, was caught in the ambuſcade which proved fatal to his father, but he forced his way from the enemy and eſcaped. He received the aſhes of his father from the conqueror. Plut. in Marcell.——A man who conſpired againſt Veſpaſian.——The huſband of Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus.——A conqueror of Britain.——An officer under the emperor Julian.——A man put to death by Galba.——A man who gave Cicero information of Catiline's conſpiracy.——A colleague of Cato in the quæſtorſhip.——A native of Pamphylia, who wrote an heroic poem on phyſic, divided into 42 books. He lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius.——A Roman drowned in a ſtorm, &c.

MARCIA LEX, by Marcius Cenſorinus. It forbad any man to be inveſted with the office of cenſor more than once.

MARCIA, the wife of Regulus, when ſhe heard that her huſband had been put to death at Carthage in the moſt excruciating manner, retorted the puniſhment, and ſhut up ſome Carthaginian priſoners in a barrel, which ſhe had previouſly filled with ſharp nails. The ſenate was obliged to ſtop her wantonneſs and cruelty. Diod. 24.——A favorite of the emperor Commodus, whom he poiſoned.——A veſtal virgin, puniſhed for her incontinence.——A daughter of Philip, who married Cato the cenſor. MARCIĀNA, a ſiſter of the emperor Trajan, who, on account of her public and private virtues and her amiable diſpoſition, was declared Auguſta and empreſs by her brother. She died A. D. 113.

MARCIANOPŎLIS, the capital of Lower Mœſia in Greece. It receives its name in honor of the empreſs Marciana.

MARCIĀNUS, a native of Thrace, born of an obſcure family. After he had for ſome time ſerved in the army as a common ſoldier, he was made private ſecretary to one of the officers of Theodoſius. His winning addreſs and uncommon talents raiſed him to higher ſtations; and on the death of Theodoſius the 2d, A. D. 450, he was inveſted with the imperial purple in the eaſt. The ſubjects of the Roman empire had reaſon to be ſatisfied with their choice. Marcianus ſhowed himſelf active and reſolute, and when Attila, the barbarous king of the Huns, aſked of the emperor the annual tribute, which the indolence and cowardice of his predeceſſors had regularly paid, the ſucceſſor of Theodoſius firmly ſaid, that he kept his gold for his friends, but that iron was the metal which he had prepared for his enemies. In the midſt of univerſal popularity Marcianus died, after a reign of ſix years, in the 69th year of his age, as he was making warlike preparations againſt the barbarians that had invaded Africa. His death was lamented, and indeed his merit was great, ſince his reign has been diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the golden age. Marcianus married Pulcheria the ſiſter of his predeceſſor. It is ſaid, that in the years of his obſcurity he found a man who had been murdered, and that he had the humanity to give him a private burial, for which circumſtance he was accuſed of the homicide and impriſoned. He was condemned to loſe his life, and the ſentence would have been executed, had not the real murderer been diſcovered, and convinced the world of the innocence of Marcianus.——Capella a writer. Vid. Capella.

M. MARCIUS SABINUS, was the progenitor of the Marcian family at Rome. He came to Rome with Numa, and it was he who adviſed Numa to accept of the crown, which the Romans offered to him. He attempted to make himſelf king of Rome, in oppoſition to Tullus Hoſtilius, and when his efforts proved unſucceſsful, he killed himſelf. His ſon, who married a daughter of Numa, was made high prieſt by his father-in-law. He was father of Ancus Martius. Plut. in Numa.——A Roman who accuſed Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, of miſdemeanor, in the Roman ſenate.——A Roman conſul, defeated by the Samnites. He was more ſucceſsful againſt the Carthaginians, and obtained a victory, &c.——Another conſul, who obtained a victory over the Etrurians.——Another, who defeated the Hernici.——A Roman who fought againſt Aſdrubal.——A man whom Catiline hired to aſſaſſinate Cicero.

MARCIUS SALTUS, a place in Liguria, &c.

MARCOMANNI, a people of Germany, who originally dwelt on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. They proved powerful enemies to the Roman emperors. Auguſtus granted them peace, but they were afterwards ſubdued by Antoninus and Trajan, &c. Paterc. 2, c. 109.—Tacit. An. 2, c. 46 & 62. G. 42.

MARDI, a people of Perſia, on the confines of Media. They were very poor, and generally lived upon the fleſh of wild beaſts. Their country, in later times, became the reſidence of the famous aſſaſſins deſtroyed by Hulakou the grandſon of Zingis Khan. Herodot. 1 & 3.—Plin. 6, c. 16.

MARDIA, a place of Thrace, famous for a battle between Conſtantine and Licinius, A. D. 315.

MARDONIUS, a general of Xerxes, who, after the defeat of his maſter at Thermopylæ and Salamis, was left in Greece with an army of 300,000 choſen men, to ſubdue the country, and reduce it under the power of Perſia. His operations were rendered uſeleſs by the courage and vigilance of the Greeks; and, in a battle at Platæa, Mardonius was defeated and left among the ſlain, B. C. 479. He had been commander of the armies of Darius Darius in Europe, and it was chiefly by his advice that Xerxes invaded Greece. He was ſon-in-law of Darius. Plut. in Ariſt. —Herodot. 6, 7, & 8.—Diod. 11.—Juſtin. 2, c. 13, &c.

MARDUS, a river of Media, falling into the Caſpian ſea.

MARE MORTUUM, called alſo, from the bitumen it throws up, the lake Aſphaltites, is ſituate in Judæa, and near 100 miles long and 25 broad. Its waters are ſalter than thoſe of the ſea, but the vapors exhaled from them are not ſo peſtilential as has been generally repreſented. It is ſuppoſed that the 13 cities, of which Sodom and Gomorrah as mentioned in the Scriptures, were the capital, were deſtroyed by a volcano, and on the ſite a lake formed. Volcanic appearances now mark the face of the country, and earthquakes are frequent. Plin. 5, c. 6. —Joſeph. J. bell. 4, c. 27.—Strab. 16, p. 764.—Juſtin. 36, c. 3.

MARĪTA LEX. Vid. Julia de Maritandis.

MARIS, a river of Scythia.

MARISUS, a river of Dacia.

C. MARIUS, a celebrated Roman, who, from a peaſant, became one of the moſt powerful and cruel tyrants that Rome ever beheld during her conſular government. He was born at Arpinum, of obſcure and illiterate parents. His father bore the ſame name as himſelf, and his mother was called Fulcinia. He forſook the meaner occupations of the country for the camp, and ſignalized himſelf under Scipio at the ſiege of Numantia. The Roman general ſaw the courage and intrepidity of young Marius, and foretold the era of his future greatneſs. By his ſeditions and intrigues at Rome, while he exerciſed the inferior offices of the ſtate, he rendered himſelf known; and his marriage with Julia, who was of the family of the Cæſars, contributed in ſome meaſure to raiſe him to conſequence. He paſſed into Africa as lieutenant to the conſul Metellus againſt Jugurtha, and, after he had there ingratiated himſelf with the ſoldiers, and raiſed enemies to his friend and benefactor, he returned to Rome, and canvaſſed for the conſulſhip. The extravagant promiſes he made to the people, and his malevolent inſinuations about the conduct of Metellus, proved ſucceſsful. He was elected, and appointed to finiſh the war againſt Jugurtha. He ſhowed himſelf capable in every degree to ſucceed to Metellus. Jugurtha was defeated, and afterwards betrayed into the hands of the Romans by the perfidy of Bocchus. No ſooner was Jugurtha conquered than new honors and freſh trophies awaited Marius. The provinces of Rome were ſuddenly invaded by an army of 300,000 barbarians, and Marius was the only man whoſe activity and boldneſs could reſiſt ſo powerful an enemy. He was elected conſul, and ſent againſt the Teutones. The war was prolonged, and Marius was a third and fourth time inveſted with the conſulſhip. At laſt two engagements were fought, and not leſs than 200,000 of the barbarian forces of the Ambrones and Teutones were ſlain in the field of battle, and 90,000 made priſoners. The following year was alſo marked by a total overthrow of the Cimbri, another horde of barbarians, in which 140,060 were ſlaughtered by the Romans, and 60,000 taken priſoners. After ſuch honorable victories, Marius, with his colleague Catulus, entered Rome in triumph, and, for his eminent ſervices, he deſerved the appellation of the third founder of Rome. He was elected conſul a ſixth time; and, as his intrepidity had delivered his country from its foreign enemies, he ſought employment at home, and his reſtleſs ambition began to raiſe ſeditions, and to oppoſe the power of Sylla. This was the cauſe and the foundation of a civil war. Sylla refuſed to deliver up the command of the forces with which he was empowered to proſecute the Mithridatic war, and he reſolved to oppoſe the authors of a demand which he conſidered as arbitrary and improper. He advanced to Rome, and Marius was obliged to ſave his life by flight. The unfavorable winds prevented him from ſeeking a ſafer retreat in Africa, and he was left on the coaſts of Campania, where the emiſſaries of his enemy ſoon diſcovered him in a marſh, where he had plunged himſelf in the mud, and left only his mouth above the ſurface for reſpiration. He was violently dragged to the neighbouring town of Minturnæ, and the magiſtrates, all devoted to the intereſt of Sylla, paſſed ſentence of immediate death on their magnanimous priſoner. A Gaul was commanded to cut off his head in the dungeon, but the ſtern countenance of Marius diſarmed the courage of the executioner, and, when he heard the exclamation of Tune, homo, audes occidere Caium Marium, the dagger dropped from his hand. Such an uncommon adventure awakened the compaſſion of the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They releaſed Marius from priſon, and favored his eſcape to Africa, where he joined his ſon Marius, who had been arming the princes of the country in his cauſe. Marius landed near the walls of Carthage, and he received no ſmall conſolation at the ſight of the venerable ruins of a once powerful city, which, like himſelf, had been expoſed to calamity, and felt the cruel viciſſitude of fortune. This place of his retreat was ſoon known, and the governor of Africa, to conciliate the favors of Sylla, compelled Marius to fly to a neighbouring iſland. He ſoon after learned that Cinna had embraced his cauſe at Rome, when the Roman ſenate had ſtripped him of his conſular dignity and beſtowed it upon one of his enemies. This intelligence animated Marius; he ſet ſail to aſſiſt his friend, only at the head of a thouſand men. His army, however, gradually encreaſed, and he entered Rome like a conqueror. His enemies were inhumanely ſacrificed to his fury, Rome was filled with blood, and he who had once been called the father of his country, marched through the ſtreets of the city, attended by a number of aſſaſſins, who immediately ſlaughtered all thoſe whoſe ſalutations were not anſwered by their leader. Such were the ſignals for bloodſhed. When Marius and Cinna had ſufficiently gratified their reſentment, they made themſelves conſuls; but Marius, already worn out with old age and infirmities, died ſixteen days after he had been honored with the conſular dignity for the ſeventh time, B. C. 86. His end was probably haſtened by the uncommon quantities of wine which he drank when laboring under a dangerous diſeaſe, to remove, by intoxication, the ſtings of a guilty conſcience. Such was the end of Marius, who rendered himſelf conſpicuous by his victories, and by his cruelty. As he was brought up in the midſt of poverty and among peaſants, it will not appear wonderful that he always betrayed ruſticity in his behaviour, and deſpiſed in others thoſe poliſhed manners and that ſtudied addreſs which education had denied him. He hated the converſation of the learned, only becauſe he was illiterate, and, if he appeared an example of ſobriety and temperance, he owed theſe advantages to the years of obſcurity which he had paſſed at Arpinum. His countenance was ſtern, his voice firm and imperious, and his diſpoſition untractable. He always betrayed the greateſt timidity in the public aſſemblies, as he had not been early taught to make eloquence and oratory his purſuit. He was in the 70th year of his age when he died, and Rome ſeemed to rejoice at the fall of a man whoſe ambition had proved fatal to ſo many of her citizens. His only qualifications were were thoſe of a great general, and with theſe he rendered himſelf the moſt illuſtrious and powerful of the Romans, becauſe he was the only one whoſe ferocity ſeemed capable to oppoſe the barbarians of the north. The manner of his death, according to ſome opinions, remains doubtful, though ſome have charged him with the crime of ſuicide. Among the inſtances which are mentioned of his firmneſs, this may be recorded: a ſwelling in the leg obliged him to apply to a phyſician, who urged the neceſſity of cutting it off. Marius gave it, and ſaw the operation performed without a diſtortion of the face, and without a groan. The phyſician aſked the other, and Marius gave it with equal compoſure. Plut. in vitâ.—Paterc. 2, c. 9.—Flor. 3, c. 3.—Juv. 8, v. 245, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 69.——Caius, the ſon of the great Marius, was as cruel as his father, and ſhared his good and his adverſe fortune. MARS, the god of war amongſt the ancients, cients, was the ſon of Jupiter and Juno, or of Juno alone, according to Ovid. This goddeſs, as the poet mentions, wiſhed to become a mother without the aſſiſtance of the other ſex, like Jupiter, who had produced Minerva all armed from his head, and ſhe was ſhown a flower by Flora in the plains near Olenus, whoſe very touch made women pregnant. [Vid. Juno.] The education of Mars was entruſted by Juno to the god Priapus, who inſtructed him in dancing and every manly exerciſe. His trial before the celebrated court of the Areopagus, according to the authority of ſome authors, for the murder of Hallirhotius, forms an intereſting epoch in hiſtory. [Vid. Areopagitæ.] The amours of Mars and Venus are greatly celebrated. The god of war gained the affections of Venus, and obtained the gratification of his deſires; but Apollo, who was conſcious of their familiarities, informed Vulcan of his wife's debaucheries, and awakened his ſuſpicions. Vulcan ſecretly laid a net around the bed, and the two lovers were expoſed, in each others arms, to the ridicule and ſatire of all the gods, till Neptune prevailed upon the huſband to ſet them at liberty. This unfortunate diſcovery ſo provoked Mars that he changed into a cock his favorite Alectryon, whom he had ſtationed at the door to watch againſt the approach of the ſun, [Vid. Alectryon] and Venus alſo ſhowed her reſentment by perſecuting with the moſt inveterate fury the children of Apollo. In the wars of Jupiter and the Titans, Mars was ſeized by Orus and Ephialtes, and confined for fifteen months, till Mercury procured him his liberty. During the Trojan war Mars intereſted himſelf on the ſide of the Trojans, and defended the favorites of Venus with uncommon activity. The worſhip of Mars was not very univerſal among the antients; his temples were not numerous in Greece, but in Rome he received the moſt unbounded honors, and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they eſteemed as the patron of their city, and the father of the firſt of their monarchs. His moſt celebrated temple at Rome was built by Auguſtus after the battle of Philippi. It was dedicated to Mars ultor, or the avenger. His prieſts among the Romans were called Salii; they were firſt inſtituted by Numa, and their chief office was to guard the ſacred Ancylia, one of which, as was ſuppoſed, had fallen down from heaven. Mars was generally repreſented in the naked figure of an old man, armed with a helmet, a pike, and a ſhield. Sometimes he appeared in a military dreſs, and with a long flowing beard; and ſometimes without. He generally rode in a chariot drawn by furious horſes which the poets called Flight and Terror. His altars were ſtained with the blood of the horſe, on account of his warlike ſpirit, and of the wolf, on account of his ferocity. Magpies and vultures were alſo offered to him, on account of their greedineſs and voracity. The Scythians generally offered him aſſes, and the people of Caria dogs. The weed called dog graſs was ſacred to him, becauſe it grows, as it is commonly reported, in places which are fit for fields of battle, or where the ground has been ſtained with the effuſion of human blood. The ſirnames of Mars are not numerous. He was called Gradivus, Mavors, Quirinus, Saliſubſulus, among the Romans. The Greeks called him Ares, and he was the Enyalus of the Sabines, the Camulus of the Gauls, and the Mamers of Carthage. Mars was father of Cupid, Anteros, and Harmonia, by the goddeſs Venus. He had Aſcalaphus and Ialmenus by Aſtyoche; Alcippe by Agraulos; Molus, Pylus, Evenus, and Theſtius, by Demonice, the daughter of Agenor. Beſides theſe, he was the reputed father of Romulus, Œnomaus, By this, Thrax, Diomedes of Thrace, &c. He preſided over gladiators, and was the god of hunting, and of whatever exerciſes or amuſements have ſomething manly and warlike. Among the Romans it was uſual for the conſul, before he went on an expedition, to viſit the temple of Mars, where he offered his prayers, and in a ſolemn manner ſhook the ſpear which was in the hand of the ſtatue of the god, at the ſame time exclaiming, "Mars vigila! god of war, watch over the welfare and ſafety of this city." *Ovid. MARSI, a nation of Germany, who afterwards came to ſettle near the lake Fucinus in Italy, in a country chequered with foreſts abounding with wild boars, and other ferocious animals. They at firſt proved very inimical to the Romans, but, inproceſs of time, they became their firmeſt ſupporters. They are particularly celebrated for the civil war in which they were engaged, and which from them has received the name of the Marſian war. The large contributions they made to ſupport the intereſt of Rome, and the number of men which they continually ſupplied to the republic, rendered them bold and aſpiring, and they claimed, with the reſt of the Italian ſtates, a ſhare of the honor and privileges which were enjoyed by the citizens of Rome, B. C. 91. This petition, though ſupported by the intereſt, the eloquence, and the integrity of the tribune Druſus, was received with contempt by the Roman ſenate; and the Marſi, with their allies, ſhowed their diſſatisfaction by taking up arms. Their reſentment was increaſed when Druſus, their friend at Rome, had been baſely murdered by the means of the nobles; and they erected themſelves into a republic, and Corfinium was made the capital of their new empire. A regular war was now begun, and the Romans led into the field an army of 100,000 men, and were oppoſed by a ſuperior force. Some battles were fought in which the Roman generals were defeated, and the allies reaped no inconſiderable advantages from their victories. A battle, however, near Aſculum, proved fatal to their cauſe, 4000 of them were left dead on the ſpot, their general Francus, a man of uncommon experience and abilities, was ſlain, and ſuch as eſcaped from the field periſhed by hunger in the Appennines, where they had ſought a ſhelter. After many defeats, and the loſs of Aſculum, one of their principal cities, the allies, grown dejected and tired of hoſtilities which had already continued for three years, ſued for peace one by one, and tranquillity was at laſt re-eſtabliſhed in the republic, and all the ſtates of Italy were made citizens of Rome. The armies of the allies conſiſted of the Marſi, the Peligni, the Veſtini, the Hirpini, Pompeiani, Marcini, Picentes, Venuſini, Ferentanæ, Apuli, Lucani, and Samnites. The Marſi were greatly addicted to magic. Horat. ep. 5, v. 76, ep. 17, v. 29.—Appian.—Val. Max. 8.—Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Sert. Mario, &c.—Cic. pro Balb.—Strab.—*Tacit. MARSYABA, a town of Arabia.

MARSYAS, a celebrated piper of Celænæ, in Phrygia, ſon of Olympus, or of Hyagnis, or Œagrus. He was ſo ſkilful in playing on the flute, that he is generally deemed the inventor of it. According to the opinion of ſome, he found it when Minerva had thrown it aſide on account of the diſtortion of her face when ſhe played upon it. Marſyas was enamoured of Cybele, and he travelled with her as far as Nyſa, where he had the imprudence to challenge Apollo to a trial of his ſkill as a muſician. The god accepted the challenge, and it was mutually agreed that he who was defeated ſhould be ſtead alive by the conqueror. The Muſes, or according to Diodorus, the inhabitants of Nyſa, were appointed umpires. Each exerted his utmoſt ſkill, and the victory, with much difficulty, was adjudged to Apollo. The god, upon this, tied his antagoniſt to a tree, and ſtead him alive. The death of Marſyas was univerſally lamented; the Fauns, Satyrs, and Dryads, wept at his fate, and, from their abundant tears, aroſe a river of Phrygia, well known by the name of Marſyas. The unfortunate Marſyas is often repreſented on monuments as tied, his hands behind his back, to a tree, while Apollo ſtands before him with his lyre in his hands. In independent cities among the ancients the ſtatue of Marſyas was generally erected in the forum, to repreſent the intimacy which ſubſiſted between Bacchus and Marſyas, as the emblems of liberty. It was alſo erected at the entrance of the Roman forum, as a ſpot where uſurers and merchants reſorted to tranſact buſineſs, being principally intended in terrorem litigatorum; a circumſtance to which Horace ſeems to allude, 1 Sat. 6, v. 120. At Celænæ, the ſkin of Marſyas was ſhown to travellers for ſome time; it was ſuſpended in the public place in the form of a bladder or a foot-ball. Hygin. fab. 165.—*Ovid. MARTIĀLES LUDI, games celebrated at Rome in honor of Mars.

MARTIĀLIS, Marcus Valerius, a native of Bilbilis, in Spain, who came to Rome about the 20th year of his age, where he recommended himſelf to notice by his poetical tical genius. As he was the panegyrift of the emperors, he gained the greateft honors, and was rewarded in the moft liberal manner. Domitian gave him the tribuneſhip; but the poet, unmindful of the favors he received, after the death of his benefactor, expoſed to ridicule the vices and cruelties of a monſter, whom, in his life time, he had extolled as the pattern of virtue, goodneſs, and excellence. Trajan treated the poet with coldneſs; and Martial, after he had paſſed 35 years in the capital of the world, in the greateſt ſplendor and affluence, retired to his native country, where he had the mortification to be the object of malevolence, ſatire, and ridicule. He received ſome favors from his friends, and his poverty was alleviated by the liberality of Pliny the younger, whom he had panegyrized in his poems. Martial died about the 104th year of the Chriſtian era, in the 75th year of his age. He is now well known by the fourteen books of epigrams which he wrote, and whoſe merit is now beſt deſcribed by the candid confeſſion of the author in this line, Sunt bona, ſunt quædam mediocria, ſunt mala plura.

But the genius which he diſplays in ſome of his epigrams deſerves commendation, though many critics are liberal in their cenſure upon his ſtile, his thoughts, and particularly upon his puns, which are often low and deſpicable. In many of his epigrams the poet has ſhown himſelf a declared enemy to decency, and the book is to be read with caution which can corrupt the purity of morals, and initiate the votaries of virtue in the myſteries of vice. It has been obſerved of Martial, that his talent was epigrams. Every thing he did was the ſubject of an epigram. He wrote inſcriptions upon monuments in the epigrammatic ſtile, and even a new-year's gift was accompanied with a diſtich, and his poetical pen was employed in begging a favor as well as ſatirizing a fault. The beſt editions of Martial are thoſe of Rader. fol. Mogunt. 1627, of Schiverius, 12mo. L. Bat. 1619; and of Smids, 8vo. Amſt. 1701.——A friend of Otho.——A man who conſpired againſt Caracalla.

Masæsylii, a people of Libya, where Syphax reigned. Vid. Maſſyla.

Masinissa, a king of a ſmall part of Africa, who aſſiſted the Carthaginians in their wars againſt Rome. He proved a moſt indefatigable and courageous ally, but an act of generoſity rendered him amicable to the intereſts of Rome. After the defeat of Aſdrubal, Scipio, the firſt Africanus, who had obtained the victory, found, among the priſoners of war, one of the nephews of Maſiniſſa. He ſent him back to his uncle loaded with preſents, and conducted him with a detachment for the ſafety and protection of his perſon. Maſiniſſa was ſtruck with the generous action of the Roman general, he forgot all former hoſtilities, and joined his troops to thoſe of Scipio. This change of ſentiments was not the effect of a wavering or unſettled mind, but Maſiniſſa ſhewed himſelf the moſt attached and the firmeſt ally the Romans ever had. It was to his exertions they owed many of their victories in Africa, and particularly in that battle which proved fatal to Aſdrubal and Syphax. The Numidian conqueror, charmed with the beauty of Sophoniſba, the captive wife of Syphax, carried her to his camp and married her; but when he perceived that this new connection diſpleaſed Scipio, he ſent poiſon to his wife, and recommended her to deſtroy herſelf, ſince he could not preſerve her life in a manner which became her rank, her dignity, and fortune, without offending his Roman allies. In the battle of Zama, Maſiniſſa greatly contributed to the defeat of the great Annibal, and the Romans, who had been ſo often ſpectators of his courage and valor, rewarded his fidelity with the kingdom of Syphax, and ſome of the Carthaginian territories. At his death Maſſiniſſa ſhewed the confidence he had in the Romans, and the eſteem he entertained for the riſing talents of Scipio Æmilianus, by entruſting him with the care of his kingdom, and impowering him to divide it among his ſons. Maſiniſſa died in the 97th year of his age, after a reign of above ſixty years, years, 149 years before the Christian era. He experienced adversity as well as prosperity, and, in the first years of his reign, he was exposed to the greatest danger, and obliged often to save his life by seeking a retreat among his savage neighbours. But his alliance with the Romans was the beginning of his greatness, and he ever after lived in the greatest affluence. He is remarkable for the health he long enjoyed. In the last years of his life he was seen at the head of his armies, behaving with the most indefatigable activity, and he often remained for many successive days on horseback, without a saddle under him, or a covering upon his head, and without shewing the least marks of fatigue. This strength of mind and body he chiefly owed to the temperance which he observed. He was seen eating brown bread at the door of his tent, like a private soldier, the day after he had obtained an immortal victory over the armies of Carthage. He left fifty-four sons, three of whom were legitimate, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Manastabal. The kingdom was fairly divided among them by Scipio, and the illegitimate children received, as their portion, very valuable presents. The death of Gulussa and Manastabal soon after left Micipsa sole master of the large possessions of Masinissa. Strab. 17.—Polyb.—Appian. Lybic.—Cic. de Senect.—*Val. Massăgĕtæ, a people of Scythia, who had their wives in common, and dwelt in tents. They had no temples, but worshipped the sun, to whom they offered horses, on account of their swiftness. When their parents had come to a certain age, they generally put them to death, and eat their flesh mixed with that of cattle. Authors are divided with respect to the place of their residence. Massilia, a maritime town of Gaul Narbonensis, now called Marseilles, founded B. C. 539, by the people of Phocæa, in Asia, who quitted their country to avoid the tyranny of the Persians. It is celebrated for its laws, its fidelity for the Romans, and for its being long the seat of literature. It acquired great consequence by its commercial pursuits during its infancy, and even waged war against Carthage. By becoming the ally of Rome, its power was established; but in warmly espousing the cause of Pompey against Cæsar, its views were frustrated, and it was so much reduced by the insolence and resentment of the conqueror, that it never after recovered its independence and warlike spirit. Herodot. 1, c. 164.—Plin. 3, c. 4.—Justin. 37, &c.—Strab. 1.—Liv. 5, c. 3.—Horat. ep. 16.—Flor. 4, c. 2.—*Cic. MAURITĀNIA, a country on the weſtern part of Africa, which forms the modern kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. It was bounded on the weſt by the Atlantic, ſouth by Gætulia, and north by the Mediterranean, and is ſometimes called Mauruſia. It became a Roman province in the reign of the emperor Claudius. Vid. Mauri.

MAURUS, a man who floriſhed in the reign of Trajan, or according to others, of the Antonini. He was governor of Syene, in Upper Egypt. He wrote a Latin poem upon the rules of poetry and verſification.

MAURŪSII, the people of Mauruſia, a country near the columns of Hercules. It is alſo called Mauritania. Vid. Mauritania. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 206.

MAUSŌLUS, a king of Caria. His wife Artemiſia was ſo diſconſolate at his death, which happened B. C. 353, that ſhe drank up his aſhes, and reſolved to erect one of the grandeſt and nobleſt monuments of antiquity, to celebrate the memory of a huſband whom ſhe tenderly loved. This famous monument, which paſſed for one of the ſeven wonders of the world, was called Mauſoleum, and from it all other magnificent ſepulchres and tombs have received the ſame name. It was built by four different architects. Scopas erected the ſide which faced the eaſt, Timotheus had the ſouth, Leochares had the weſt, and Bruxis the north. Pithis was alſo employed in raiſing a pyramid over this ſtately monument, and the top was adorned by a chariot drawn by four horſes. The expences of this edifice were immenſe, and this gave an occaſion to the philoſopher Anaxagoras to exclaim, when he ſaw it, How much money changed into ſtones! [*Vid. MAXENTIUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a ſon of the emperor Maximianus Hercules. Some ſuppoſe him to have been a ſuppoſititious child. The voluntary abdication of Diocletian, and of his father, raiſed him in the ſtate, and he declared himſelf independent emperor, or Auguſtus, A. D. 306. He afterwards incited his father to re-aſſume his imperial authority, and in a perfidious manner deſtroyed Severus, who had delivered himſelf into his hands, and relied upon his honor for the ſafety of his life. His victories and ſucceſſes were impeded by Galerius Maximianus, who oppoſed him with a powerful force. The defeat and voluntary death of Galerius ſoon reſtored peace to Italy, and Maxentius paſſed into Africa, where he rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty and oppreſſion. He ſoon after returned to Rome, and was informed that Conſtantine was come to dethrone him. He gave his adverſary battle near Rome, and, after he had loſt the victory, he fled back to the city. The bridge over which he croſſed the Tiber was in a decayed ſituation, and he fell into the river and was drowned, on the 24th of September, A. D. 311. The cowardice and luxuries of Maxentius are as conſpicuous as his cruelties. He oppreſſed his ſubjects with heavy taxes to gratify the cravings of his pleaſures, or the avarice of his favorites. He was debauched in his manners, and neither virtue nor innocence were ſafe whenever he was inclined to voluptuous purſuits. He was naturally deformed, and of an unwieldy body. To viſit a pleaſure ground, or to exerciſe himſelf under a marble portico, or to walk on a ſhady terrace, was to him a Herculean labor, which required the greateſt exertions of ſtrength and reſolution.

CORN. MAXIMILIĀNA, a veſtal virgin buried alive for incontinency, A. D. 92.

MAXIMIĀNUS, Herculius Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a native of Sirmium, in Pannonia, who ſerved as a common ſoldier in the Roman armies. When Diocletian had been raiſed to the imperial throne, he remembered the valor and courage of his fellow ſoldier Maximianus, and rewarded his fidelity by making him his colleague in the empire, and by ceding to him the command of the provinces of Italy, Africa, and Spain, and the reſt of the weſtern territories of Rome. Maximianus ſhowed the juſtneſs of the choice of Diocletian by his victories over the Barbarians. In Britain ſucceſs did not attend his arms; but in Africa he defeated and put to death Aurelius Julianus, who had proclaimed himſelf emperor. Soon after Diocletian abdicated the imperial purple, and obliged Maximianus to follow his example, on the 1ſt of April, A. D. 304. Maximianus reluctantly complied with the command of a man to whom he owed his greatneſs; but, before the firſt year of his reſignation had elapſed, he was rouſed from his indolence and retreat by the ambition of his ſon Maxentius. He re-aſſumed the imperial dignity, and ſhowed his ingratitude to his ſon by wiſhing him to reſign the ſovereignty, and to ſink into a private perſon. This propoſal was not only rejected with the contempt it deſerved, but the troops mutinied againſt Maximianus, and he fled for ſafety to Gaul, to the court of Conſtantine, to whom he gave his daughter Fauſtina in marriage. Here he again acted a perfidious character, and re-aſſumed the imperial power, which his misfortunes had obliged him to relinquiſh. This offended Conſtantine. But, when open violence ſeemed to fruſtrate the ambitious views of Maximianus, he had recourſe to artifice. He prevailed upon his daughter Fauſtina, to leave the doors of her chamber open in the dead of night; and, when ſhe promiſed faithfully to execute his commands, he ſecretly introduced himſelf to her bed, where he ſtabbed to the heart the man who ſlept by the ſide of his daughter. This was not Conſtantine: Fauſtina, faithful to her huſband, had apprized him of her father's machinations, and an eunuch had been placed in his bed. Conſtantine watched the motions of his father-in-law, and, when he heard the fatal blow given to the eunuch, he ruſhed in with a band of ſoldiers, and ſecured the aſſaſſin. Conſtantine reſolved to deſtroy a man who was ſo inimical to his neareſt relations, and nothing was left to Maximianus but to chooſe his own death. He ſtrangled himſelf at Marſeilles, A. D. 310, in the 60th year of his age. His body was found freſh and entire in a leaden coffin about the middle of the eleventh century.——Galerius Valerius, a native of Dacia, who, in the firſt years of his life, was employed in keeping his father's flocks. He entered the army, where his valor and bodily ſtrength recommended him to the notice of his ſuperiors, and particularly to Diocletian, who inveſted him with the imperial purple in the eaſt, and gave him his daughter Valeria in marriage. Galerius deſerved the confidence of his benefactor. He conquered the Goths, and Dalmatians, and checked the inſolence of the Perſians. In a battle, however, with the king of Perſia, Galerius was defeated; and, to complete his ignominy, and render him more ſenſible of his diſgrace, Diocletian obliged him to walk behind his chariot arrayed in his imperial robes. This humiliation ſtung Galerius to the quick; he aſſembled another army, and gave battle to the Perſians. He gained a complete victory, and took the wives and children of his enemy. This ſucceſs elated Galerius to ſuch a degree, that he claimed the moſt dignified appellations, and ordered himſelf to be called the ſon of Mars. Diocletian himſelf dreaded his power, and even, it is ſaid, abdicated the imperial dignity by means of his threats. This reſignation, however, is attributed by ſome to a voluntary act of the mind, and to a deſire of enjoying ſolitude and retirement. As ſoon as Diocletian had abdicated, Galerius was proclaimed Auguſtus, A. D. 304, but his cruelty ſoon rendered him odious, and the Roman people, offended at his oppreſſion, raiſed Maxentius to the imperial dignity the following year, and Galerius was obliged to yield to the torrent of his unpopularity, and to fly before his more fortunate adverſary. He died in the greateſt agonies, A. D. 311. The bodily pains and ſufferings which preceded his death, were, according to the Chriſtian writers, the effects of the vengeance of an offended Providence for the cruelty which he had exerciſed againſt the followers of Chriſt. In his character Galerius was wanton and tyrannical, and he often feaſted his eyes with the ſight of dying wretches, whom his barbarity had delivered to bears and wild beaſts. His averſion to learned men aroſe from his ignorance of letters; and, if he was deprived of the benefits of education, he proved the more cruel and the more inexorable.

Maximīnus, Caius Julius Verus, the ſon of a peaſant at Thrace. He was originally a ſhepherd, and, by heading his countrymen againſt the frequent attacks of the neighbouring barbarians and robbers, he inured himſelf to the labors and to the fatigues of a camp. He entered the Roman armies, where he gradually roſe to the firſt offices; and on the death of Alexander Severus he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, A. D. 235. The popularity which he had gained when general of the armies, was at an end when he aſcended the throne. He was delighted with acts of the greateſt barbarity, and no leſs than 400 perſons loſt their lives on the falſe ſuſpicion of having conſpired againſt the emperor's life. They died in the greateſt torments, and, that the tyrant might the better entertain himſelf with their ſufferings, ſome were expoſed to wild beaſts, others expired by blows, ſome were nailed on croſſes, while others were ſhut up in the bellies of animals juſt killed. The nobleſt of the Roman citizens were the objects of his cruelty; and, as if they were more conſcious than others of his mean origin, he reſolved to ſpare no means to remove from his preſence a number of men whom he looked upon with an eye of envy, and who, as he imagined, hated him for his oppreſſion, and deſpiſed him for the poverty and obſcurity of his early years. Such is the character of the ſuſpicious and tyrannical Maximinus. In his military capacity he acted with the ſame ferocity; and, in an expedition in Germany, he not only cut down the corn, but he totally ruined and ſet fire to the whole country, to the extent of 450 miles. Such a monſter of tyranny at laſt provoked the people of Rome. The Gordians were proclaimed emperors, but their innocence and pacific virtues were unable to reſiſt the fury of Maximinus. After their fall, the Roman ſenate inveſted twenty men of their number with the imperial dignity, and entruſted into their hands the care of the republic. Theſe meaſures ſo highly irritated Maximinus that, at the firſt intelligence, he howled like a wild beaſt, and almoſt deſtroyed himſelf by knocking his head againſt the walls of his palace. When his fury was abated, he marched to Rome, reſolved on ſlaughter. His bloody machinations were ſtopped, and his ſoldiers, aſhamed of accompanying a tyrant whoſe cruelties had procured him the name of Buſiris, Cyclops, and Phalaris, aſſaſſinated him in his tent before the walls of Aquileia, A. D. 236, in the 65th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greateſt rejoicings at Rome, public thankſgivings were offered, and whole hecatombs flamed on the altars. Maximinus has been repreſented by hiſtorians as of a gigantic ſtature, he was eight feet high, and the bracelets of his wife ſerved as rings to adorn the fingers of his hand. His voracity was as remarkable as his corpulence, he generally eat forty pounds of fleſh every day, and drank 18 bottles of wine. His ſtrength was proportionable to his gigantic ſhape; he could alone draw a loaded waggon, and, with a blow of his fiſt, he often broke the teeth in a horſe's mouth; he broke the hardeſt ſtones between his fingers, and cleft trees with his hand. Herodianus.—Jornand. de reb. Get.—Capitol. Maximinus made his ſon, of the ſame name, emperor as ſoon as was inveſted with the purple, and his choice was unanimouſly approved by the ſenate, by the people, and by the army. ——Galerius Valerius, a ſhepherd of Thrace, who was raiſed to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, A. D. 305. He was nephew to Galerius Maximianus, by his mother's ſide, and to him he was indebted for his riſe and conſequence in the Roman armies. As Maximinus was ambitious and fond of power, he looked with an eye of jealouſy upon thoſe who ſhared the dignity of emperor with himſelf. He declared war againſt Licinius, his colleague on the throne, but a defeat, which ſoon after followed, on the 30th of April, A. D. 313, between Heraclea and Adrianopolis, left him without reſources and without friends. His victorious enemy purſued him, and he fled beyond mount Taurus, forſaken and almoſt unknown. He attempted to put an end to his miſerable exiſtence, but his efforts were ineffectual, and, though his death is attributed by ſome to deſpair, it is more univerſally believed that he expired in the greateſt agonies, of a dreadful diſtemper which conſumed him day and night with inexpreſſible pains, and reduced him to a mere ſkeleton. This miſerable end, according to the eccleſiaſtical writers, was the viſible puniſhment of heaven, for the barbarities which Maximinus had exerciſed againſt the followers of Chriſtianity, and for the many blaſphemies which he had uttered. Lactant.—Euſeb.——A miniſter of the emperor Valerian.——One of the ambaſſadors of young Theodoſius to Attila, king of the Huns.

MAXIMUS, MAGNUS, a native of Spain, who proclaimed himſelf emperor, A. D. 383. The unpopularity of Gratian favored his uſurpation, and he was acknowledged by his troops. Gratian marched againſt him, but he was defeated, and ſoon after aſſaſſinated. Maximus refuſed the honors of a burial to the remains of Gratian; and, when he had made himſelf maſter of Britain, Gaul, and Spain, he ſent ambaſſadors into the eaſt, and demanded of the emperor Theodoſius to acknowledge him as his aſſociate on the throne. Theodoſius endeavoured to amuſe and delay him, but Maximus reſolved to ſupport his claim by arms, and croſſed the Alps. Italy was laid deſolate, and Rome opened her gates to the conqueror. Theodoſius now determined to revenge the audacioufneſs of Maximus, and had recourſe to artifice. He began to make a naval armament, and Maximus, not to appear inferior to his adverſary, had already embarked his troops, when Theodoſius, by ſecret and haſtened marches, fell upon him, and beſieged him at Aquileia. Maximus was betrayed by his ſoldiers, and the conqueror, moved with compaſſion at the ſight of his fallen and dejected enemy, granted him life; but the multitude refuſed him mercy, and inſtantly ſtruck off his head, A. D. 388. His ſon Victor, who ſhared the imperial dignity with him, was ſoon after ſacrificed to the fury fury of the ſoldiers.——Petronius, a Roman, deſcended of an illuſtrious family. He cauſed Valentinian III. to be aſſaſſinated, and aſcended the throne; and, to ſtrengthen his uſurpation, he married the empreſs, to whom he had the weakneſs and imprudence to betray that he had ſacrificed her huſband to his love for her perſon. This declaration irritated the empreſs; ſhe had recourſe to the barbarians to avenge the death of Valentinian, and Maximus was ſtoned to death by his ſoldiers, and his body thrown into the Tyber, A. D. 455. He reigned only 77 days.——Pupianus. Vid. Pupianus.——A celebrated cynic philoſopher and magician of Epheſus. He inſtructed the emperor Julian in magic; and, according to the opinion of ſome hiſtorians, it was in the converſation and company of Maximus that the apoſtacy of Julian originated. The emperor not only viſited the philoſopher, but he even ſubmitted his writings to his inſpection and cenſure. Maximus refuſed to live in the court of Julian, and the emperor, not diſſatisfied with the refuſal, appointed him high pontif in the province of Lydia, an office which he diſcharged with the greateſt moderation and juſtice. When Julian went into the eaſt, the philoſopher promiſed him ſucceſs, and even ſaid that his conqueſts would be more numerous and extenſive than thoſe of the ſon of Philip. He perſuaded his imperial pupil that, according to the doctrine of Metempſychoſis, his body was animated by the ſoul which once animated the hero whoſe greatneſs and victories he was going to eclipſe. After the death of Julian, Maximus was almoſt ſacrificed to the fury of the ſoldiers, but the interpoſition of his friends ſaved his life, and he retired to Conſtantinople. He was ſoon after accuſed of magical practices before the emperor Valens, and beheaded at Epheſus, A D. 366. He wrote ſome philoſophical and rhetorical treatiſes, ſome of which were dedicated to Julian. They are all now loſt. Ammian.——Tyrius, a Platonic philoſopher, in the reign of M. Aurelius. This emperor, who was naturally fond of ſtudy, became one of the pupils of Maximus, and paid great deference to his inſtructions. There are extant of Maxmius forty-one diſſertations on moral and philoſophical ſubjects, written in Greek. The beſt editions of which are that of Davis, 8vo. Cantab. 1703; and that of Reiſke, 2 vols, 8vo. Lipſ. 1774.——One of the Greek fathers of the 7th century, whoſe works were edited by Combeſis, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1675. ——Paulus Fabius, a conſul with M. Antony's ſon. Horace ſpeaks of him, 4 od. 1, v. 20, as of a gay handſome youth, fond of pleaſure, yet induſtrious and indefatigable. ——An epithet applied to Jupiter, as being the greateſt and moſt powerful of all the gods.——A native of Sirmium, in Pannonia. He was originally a gardener, but, by enliſting in the Roman army, he became one of the military tribunes, and his marriage with a woman of rank and opulence ſoon rendered him independent. He was father to the emperor Probus.——A general of Trajan, killed in the eaſtern provinces. ——One of the murderers of Domitian, &c. ——A philoſopher, native of Byzantium, in the age of Julian the emperor.

MAZĂCA, a large city of Cappadocia, the capital of the province. It was called Cæſarea by Tiberius, in honor of Auguſtus.

MAZĂCES, a Perſian governor of Memphis. He made a ſally againſt the Grecian ſoldiers of Alexander, and killed great numbers of them. Curt. 4, c. 1.

MAZÆUS, a ſatrap of Cilicia, under Artaxerxes Ochus.——A governor of Babylon, ſon-in-law to Darius. He ſurrendered to Alexander, &c. Curt. 5, c. 1.

MECHANEUS, a ſirname of Jupiter, from his patronizing undertakings.

MECÆNAS or MECŒNAS, C. Cilnius, a celebrated Roman knight, deſcended from the kings of Etruria. He has rendered himſelf immortal by his liberal patronage of learned men and of letters; and to his prudence and advice Auguſtus acknowledged himſelf indebted for the ſecurity he enjoyed. His fondneſs for pleaſure removed him from the reach of ambition, and he preferred to die, as he was born, a Roman knight, to all the honors and dignities which either the friendſhip of Auguſtus or his own popularity, could heap upon him. It was from the reſult of his advice, againſt the opinion of Agrippa, that Auguſtus reſolved to keep the ſupreme power in his hands, and not by a voluntary reſignation to plunge Rome into civil commotions. The emperor received the private admonitions of Mecœnas in the ſame friendly manner as they were given, and he was not diſpleaſed with the liberty of his friend, who threw a paper to him with theſe words, Deſcend from the tribunal thou butcher! while he ſat in the judgment-ſeat, and betrayed revenge and impatience in his countenance. He was ſtruck with the admonition, and left the tribunal without paſſing ſentence of death on the criminals. To the interference of Mecœnas, Virgil owed the reſtitution of his lands, and Horace was proud to boaſt that his learned friend had obtained his forgiveneſs from the emperor, for joining the cauſe of Brutus at the battle of Philippi. Mecœnas was himſelf fond of literature, and, according to the moſt received opinion, he wrote an hiſtory of animals, a journal of the life of Auguſtus, a treatiſe on the different natures and kinds of precious ſtones, beſides the two tragedies of Octavia and Prometheus, and other things, all now loſt. He died eight years before Chriſt; and, on his death-bed, he particularly recommended his poetical friend Horace to the care and confidence of Auguſtus. Seneca, who has liberally commended the genius and abilities of Mecœnas, has not with-held his cenſure from his diſſipation, indolence, and effeminate luxury. From the patronage and encouragement which the princes of heroic and lyric poetry, among the Latins, received from the favorite of Auguſtus, all patrons of literature have ever ſince been called Mecœnates. Virgil dedicated to him his Georgics, and Horace his Odes. Suct. in Aug. 66, &c. —Plut. in Aug.—Herodian. 7.—Senec. ep. 19 & 92.

MĒDĒA, a celebrated magician, daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis. Her mother's name, according to the more received opinion of Heſiod and Hyginus, was Idyia, or according to others, Ephyre, Hecate, Aſterodia, Antiope, and Neæra. She was the niece of Circe. When Jaſon came to Colchis in queſt of the golden fleece, Medea became enamoured of him, and it was to her well-directed labors that the Argonauts owed their preſervation. [Vid. Jaſon & Argonautæ.] Medea had an interview with her lover in the temple of Hecate, where they bound themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths and mutually promiſed eternal fidelity. No ſooner had Jaſon overcome all the difficulties which Æetes had placed in his way, than Medea embarked with the conquerors for Greece. To ſtop the purſuit of her father, ſhe tore to pieces her brother Abſyrtus, and left his mangled limbs in the way, through which Æetes was to paſs. This act of barbarity ſome have attributed to Jaſon, and not to her. When Jaſon reached Iolchos, his native country, the return and victories of the Argonauts were celebrated with univerſal rejoicings; but Æſon, the father of Jaſon, was unable to aſſiſt at the ſolemnity, on account of the infirmities of his age. Medea, at her huſband's requeſt, removed the weakneſs of Æſon, and by drawing away the blood from his veins, and filling them again with the juice of certain herbs, ſhe reſtored him to the vigor and ſprightlineſs of youth. This ſudden change in Æſon aſtoniſhed the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias were alſo deſirous to ſee their father reſtored, by the ſame power, to the vigor of youth. Medea, willing to revenge the injuries which her huſband's family had ſuffered from Pelias, encreaſed their curioſity, and by cutting to pieces an old ram and making it again, in their preſence, a young lamb, ſhe totally determined them to try the ſame experiment upon their father's body. They accordingly killed him of their own accord, and boiled his fleſh in a cauldron, but Medea refuſed to perform the ſame friendly offices to Pelias which ſhe had done to Æſon, and he was conſumed by the heat of the fire, and even deprived of a burial. This action greatly irritated the people of Iolchos, and Medea, with her huſband, fled to Corinth to avoid the reſentment of an offended populace. Here they lived for ten years with much conjugal tenderneſs; but the love of Jaſon for Glauce, the king's daughter, ſoon interrupted their mutual harmony, and Medea was divorced. Medea revenged the infidelity of Jaſon by cauſing the death of Glauce, and the deſtruction of her family. [Vid. Glauce.] This action was followed by another ſtill more atrocious. Medea killed two of her children in their father's preſence, and, when Jaſon attempted to puniſh the barbarity of the mother, ſhe fled through the air upon a chariot drawn by winged dragons. From Corinth Medea came to Athens, where, after ſhe had undergone the neceſſary purification of her murder, ſhe married king Ægeus, or, according to others, lived in an adulterous manner with him. From her connection with Ægeus Medea had a ſon, who was called Medus. Soon after, when Theſeus wiſhed to make himſelf known to his father, [Vid. Ægeus.] Medea, jealous of his fame, and fearful of his power, attempted to poiſon him at a feaſt which had been prepared for his entertainment. Her attempts, however, failed of ſucceſs, and the ſight of the ſword which Theſeus wore by his ſide convinced Ægeus that the ſtranger againſt whoſe life he had ſo baſely conſpired was no leſs than his own ſon. The father and the ſon were reconciled, and Medea, to avoid the puniſhment which her wickedneſs deſerved, deſerved, mounted her fiery chariot, and diſappeared through the air. She came to Colchis, where, according to ſome, ſhe was reconciled to Jaſon, who had ſought her in her native country after her ſudden departure from Corinth. She died at Colchis, as Juſtin mentions, when ſhe had been reſtored to the confidence of her family. After death, ſhe married Achilles in the Elyſian fields, according to the traditions mentioned by Simonides. The murder of Mermerus and Pheres, the youngeſt of Jaſon's children by Medea, is not attributed to their mother, according to Ælian, but the Corinthians themſelves aſſaſſinated them in the temple of Juno Acræa. To avoid the reſentment of the gods, and to deliver themſelves from the peſtilence which viſited their country after ſo horrid a maſſacre, they engaged the poet Euripides, for five talents, to write a tragedy, which cleared them of the murder, and repreſented Medea as the cruel aſſaſſin of her own children. And beſides, that this opinion might be the better credited, feſtivals were appointed, in which the mother was repreſented with all the barbarity of a fury murdering her own ſons. *Vid. MEDIA, a celebrated country of Aſia, bounded on the north by the Caſpian Sea, weſt by Armenia, ſouth by Perſia, and eaſt by Parthia and Hyrcania. It was originally called Aria till the age of Medus, the ſon of Medea, who gave it the name of Media. The province of Media was firſt raiſed into a kingdom by its revolt from the Aſſyrian monarchy, B. C. 820; and, after it had for ſome time enjoyed a kind of republican government, Deioces, by his artifice, procured himſelf to be called king, 700 B. C. After a reign of 53 years he was ſucceeded by Phraortes, B. C. 647; who was ſucceeded by Cyaxares, B. C. 625. His ſucceſſor was Aſtyages, B. C. 585, in whoſe reign Cyrus became maſter of Media, B. C. 551; and ever after the empire was transferred to the Perſians. The Medes were warlike in the primitive ages of their power; they encouraged polygamy, and were remarkable for the homage they paid to their ſovereigns, who were ſtiled kings of kings. This title was afterwards adopted by their conquerors, the Perſians, and it was ſtill in uſe in the age of the Roman emperors. Juſtin. 1, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Polyb. 5 & 10.—Curt. 5, &c.—*Diod. MEDITERRANEUM MARE, a ſea which divides Europe and Aſia Minor from Africa. It receives its name from its ſituation, medio terræ, ſituate in the middle of the land. It has a communication with the Atlantic by the columns of Hercules, and with the Euxine through the Ægean. The word Mediterraneum does not occur in the Claſſics; but it is ſometimes called internum noſtrum or medius liquor, and is frequently denominated in Scripture the Great Sea. The firſt naval power that ever obtained the command of it, as recorded in the fabulous epochs of the writer Caſtor, is Crete, under Minos. Afterwards it paſſed into the hands of the Lydians, B. C. 1179; of the Pelaſgi, 1058; of the Thracians, 1000; of the Rhodians, 916; of the Phrygians, 893; of the Cyprians, 868; of the Phœnicians, 826; of the Egyptians, 787; of the Mileſians, 753; of the Carians, 734; and of the Leſbians, 676, which they retained for 69 years. Horat. 3, od 3, v. 46.—Plin. 2, c. 68.—*Salluſt. MEDUS, now Kur, a river of Media, falling into the Araxes. Some take Medus adjectively as applying to any of the great rivers of Media. Strab. 15.—Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 21.——A ſon of Ægeus and Medea, who gave his name to a country of Aſia. Medus, when arrived to years of maturity, went to ſeek his mother, whom the arrival of Theſeus in Athens had driven away. [Vid. Medea.] He came to Colchis, where he was ſeized by his uncle Perſes, who uſurped the throne of Æetes, his mother's father, becauſe the oracle had declared that Perſes ſhould be murdered by one of the grandſons of Æetes. Medus aſſumed another name, and called himſelf Hippotes, ſon of Creon. Mean while Medea arrived in Colchis diſguiſed in the habit of a prieſteſs of Diana, and when ſhe heard that one of Creon's children was impriſoned, ſhe reſolved to haſten the deſtruction of a perſon whoſe family ſhe deteſted. To effect this with more certainty, ſhe told the uſurper, that Hippotes was really a ſon of Medea, ſent by his mother to murder him. She begged Perſes to give her Hippotes, that ſhe might ſacrifice him to her reſentment. Perſes conſented. Medea diſcovered that it was her own ſon, and ſhe inſtantly armed him with the dagger which ſhe had prepared againſt his life, and ordered him to ſtab the uſurper. He obeyed, and Medea diſcovered who ſhe was, and made her ſon Medus ſit on his grandfather's throne. Heſiod. Theog.—Pauſ. 2.—Apollod. 1.—Juſtin. 42.—Senec. in Med.—Diod.

MEDŪSA, one of the three Gorgons, daughter of Phorcys and Ceto. She was the only one of the Gorgons who was ſubject to mortality. She is celebrated for her perſonal charms and the beauty of her locks. Neptune became enamoured of her, and obtained her favors in the temple of Minerva. This violation of the ſanctity of the temple provoked Minerva, and ſhe changed the beautiful locks of Meduſa, which had inſpired Neptune's love, into ſerpents. According to Apollodorus and others, Meduſa and her ſiſters came into the world with ſnakes on their heads, inſtead of hair, with yellow wings and brazen hands. Their body was alſo covered with impenetrable ſcales, and their very looks had the power of killing or turning to ſtones. Perſeus rendered his name immortal by the conqueſt of Meduſa. He cut off her head, and the blood that dropped from the wound produced the innumerable ſerpents that infeſt Africa. The conqueror placed Meduſa's head on the ægis of Minerva, which he had uſed in his expedition. The head ſtill retained the ſame petrifying power as before, as it was fatally known in the court of Cepheus. [Vid. Andromeda]. He was greatly eſteemed by his ſovereign. Herodot. 3, &c.——A ſon of Zopyrus, ſatrap to Darius. He conquered Egypt, &c. Herodot. 3, c. 160.——A ſatrap of Artaxerxes. He revolted from his king, and defeated two large armies that had been ſent againſt him. The interference of his friends reſtored him to the king's favor, and he ſhewed his attachment to Artaxerxes by killing a lion which threatened his life in hunting. This act of affection in Megabyzus was looked upon with envy by the king. He was diſcarded and afterwards reconciled to the monarch by means of his mother. He died in the 76th year of his age B. C. 447, greatly regretted. Cteſias.

MEGĀRA, a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, given in marriage to Hercules, becauſe he had delivered the Thebans from the tyranny of the Orchomenians. [Vid. Erginus.] When Hercules went to hell by order of Euryſtheus, violence was offered to Megara by Lycus, a Theban exile, and ſhe would have yielded to her raviſher, had not Hercules returned that moment and puniſhed him with death. This murder diſpleaſed Juno, and ſhe rendered Hercules ſo delirious, that he killed Megara and the three children he had by her in a fit of madneſs, thinking them to be wild beaſts. Some ſay that Megara did not periſh by the hand of her huſband, but that he afterwards married her to his friend Iolas. The names of Megara's children by Hercules were Creontiades, Therimachus, and Deicoon. Hygin. fab. 82.—Senec. in Herc.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Diod. 4.

MEGĀRA, (æ, & pl. orum,) a city of Achaia, the capital of a country called Megaris, founded about 1131 B. C. It is ſituate nearly at an equal diſtance from Corinth and Athens, on the Sinus Saronicus. It was built upon two rocks, and is ſtill in being, and preſerves its ancient name. It was called after Megareus the ſon of Neptune, who was buried there, or from Megareus a ſon of Apollo. It was originally governed by twelve kings, but became afterwards a republic, and fell into the hands of the Athenians, from whom it was reſcued by the Heraclidæ. At the battle of Salamis the people of Megara furniſhed 20 ſhips for the defence of Greece, and at Platæa they had 300 men in the army of Pauſanias. There was here a ſect of philoſophers called the Megaric, who held the world to be eternal. *Cic. MELÆNÆ, a village of Attica. Stat. Theb. 12, v. 619.

MELAMPUS, a celebrated ſoothſayer and phyſician of Argos, ſon of Amythaon and Idomenea, or Dorippe. He lived at Pylos in Peloponneſus. His ſervants once killed two large ſerpents who had made their neſts at the bottom of a large oak, and Melampus paid ſo much regard to theſe two reptiles, that he raiſed a burning pile and burned them upon it. He alſo took particular care of their young ones, and fed them with milk. Some time after this the young ſerpents crept to Melampus as he ſlept on the graſs near the oak, and, as if ſenſible of the favors of their benefactor, they wantonly played around him, and ſoftly licked his ears This awoke Melampus, who was aſtoniſhed at the ſudden change which his ſenſes had undergone. He found himſelf acquainted with the chirping of the birds and with all their rude notes, as they flew around him. He took advantage of this ſupernatural gift, and ſoon made himſelf perfect in the knowledge of futurity, and Apollo alſo inſtructed him in the art of medicine. He had ſoon after the happineſs of curing the daughters of Prœtus, by giving them elebore, which from this circumſtance has been called melampodium, and as a reward for his troubles he married the eldeſt of theſe princeſſes. [Vid. Prœtides.] The tyranny of his uncle Neleus, king of Pylos, obliged him to leave his native country, and Prœtus, to ſhew himſelf more ſenſible of his ſervices, gave him part of his kingdom, over which he eſtabliſhed himſelf. About this time the perſonal charms of Pero, the daughter of Neleus, had gained many admirers, but the father promiſed his daughter only to him who brought into his hands the oxen of Iphiclus. This condition diſpleaſed many; but Bias, who was alſo one of her admirers, engaged his brother Melampus to ſteal the oxen, and deliver them to him. Melampus was caught in the attempt, and impriſoned, and nothing but his ſervices as a ſoothſayer and phyſician to Iphiclus would have ſaved him from death. All this pleaded in favor of Melampus, but when he had taught the childleſs Iphiclus how to become a father, he not only obtained his liberty, but alſo the oxen, and with them he compelled Neleus to give Pero in marriage to Bias. A ſevere diſtemper, which had rendered the women of Argos inſane, was totally removed by Melampus, and Anaxagoras, who then ſat on the throne, rewarded his merit by giving him part of his kingdom, where he eſtabliſhed himſelf, and where his poſterity reigned during ſix ſucceſſive generations. He received divine honors after death, and temples were raiſed to his memory. Homer. Od. 11.—Herodot. 2 & 9.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Pauſ. 2, c. 18. l. 4, c. 3.—*Virg. Meldæ, or Meldorum urbs, a city of Gaul, now Meaux in Champagne.

Mĕleāger, a celebrated hero of antiquity, ſon of Œneus, king of Ætolia by Althæa, daughter of Theſtius. The Parcæ were preſent at the moment of his birth, and predicted his future greatneſs. Clotho ſaid, that he would be brave and courageous; Lacheſis foretold his uncommon ſtrength, and Atropos declared that he ſhould live as long as that fire-brand, which was on the fire, remained entire and unconſumed. Althæa, no ſooner heard this, than ſhe ſnatched the ſtick from the fire, and kept it with the moſt jealous care, as the life of her ſon was deſtined to depend upon its preſervation. The fame of Meleager increaſed with his years; he ſignalized himſelf in the Argonautic expedition, and afterwards delivered his country from the neighbouring inhabitants, who made war againſt his father at the inſtigation of Diana, whoſe altars Œneus had neglected. [Vid. Œneus.] No ſooner were they deſtroyed than Diana puniſhed the negligence of Œneus by a greater calamity. She ſent a huge wild boar, which laid waſte all the country, and ſeemed invincible on account of its immenſe ſize. It became ſoon a public concern, all the neighbouring princes aſſembled to deſtroy this terrible animal, and nothing became more famous in mythological hiſtory, than the hunting of the Calydonian boar. The princes and chiefs that aſſembled, and which are mentioned by mythologiſts, are Meleager ſon of Œneus, Idas and Lynceus, ſons of Aphareus, Dryas ſon of Mars, Caſtor and Pollux, ſons of Jupiter and Leda, Pirithous ſon of Ixion, Theſeus ſon of Ægeus, Anceus and Cepheus, ſons of Lycurgus, Admetus ſon of Pheres, Jaſon ſon of Æſon, Peleus and Telamon, ſons of Æacus, Iphicles ſon of Amphitryon, Eurytrion ſon of Actor, Atalanta daughter of Schœneus, Iolas the friend of Hercules, the ſons of Theſtius, Amphiaraus ſon of Oileus, Protheus, Cometes, the brothers of Althæa, Hippothous ſon of Cercyon, Leucippus, Adraſtus, Ceneus, Phileus, Echeon, Lelex, Phœnix ſon of Amyntor, Panopeus, Hyleus, Hippaſus, Neſtor, Menœtius, the father of Patroclus, Amphicides, Laertes the father of Ulyſſes, and the four ſons of Hippocoon. This troop of armed men, attacked the boar, with unuſual fury, and it was at laſt killed by Meleager. The conqueror gave the ſkin and the head to Atalanta, who had firſt wounded the animal. This partiality to a woman, irritated the others, and particularly Toxeus and Plexippus, the brothers of Althæa, and they endeavoured to rob Atalanta of the honorable preſent. Meleager defended a woman, of whom he was enamoured, and killed his uncles in the attempt. Mean time the news of this celebrated conqueſt had already reached Calydon, and Althæa went to the temple of the gods to return thanks for the victory which her ſon had gained. As ſhe went ſhe met the corpſes of her brothers that were brought from the chace, and at this mournful ſpectacle ſhe filled the whole city with her lamentations. She was upon this informed that they had been killed by Meleager, and in the moment of reſentment, to revenge the death of her brothers, ſhe threw into the fire the fatal ſtick, on which her ſon's life depended, and Meleager died as ſoon as it was conſumed. Homer does not mention the fire-brand, whence ſome have imagined that this fable is poſterior to that poet's age. But he ſays that the death of Toxeus and Plexippus ſo irritated Althæa, that ſhe uttered the moſt horrible curſes and imprecations upon the head of her ſon. Meleager married Cleopatra, the daughter of Idas and Marpeſſa, as alſo Atalanta, according to ſome accounts. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Apollon. 1, arg.—Flacc. 1 & 6.—Pauſ. 10, c. 31.—Hygin. 14.—*Ovid. He was but two months inveſted with the regal authority.——A Greek poet in the reign of Seleucus the laſt of the Seleucidæ. He was born at Tyre and died at Cos. It is to his well directed labors, that we are indebted for the anthologia, or collection of Greek epigrams, which he ſelected from 46 of the beſt and moſt eſteemed poets. The original collection of Meleager has been greatly altered by ſucceeding editors. The beſt edition of the anthologia is that of Brunck in three vols. 4to. and 8vo. Angentor. 1772.

MĔLEĀGRĬDES, the ſiſters of Meleager, daughters of Œneus and Althæa. They were ſo diſconſolate at the death of their brother Meleager, that they refuſed all aliments, and were, at the point of death, changed into birds called Meleagrides, whoſe feathers and eggs, as it is ſuppoſed, are of a different color. The youngeſt of the ſiſters Gorge and Dejanira, who had been married, eſcaped this metamorphoſis. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 540.—Plin.

MELESANDER, an Athenian general who died B. C. 414.

MELES (ĒTIS) a river of Aſia Minor, in Ionia near Smyrna. Some of the ancients ſuppoſed that Homer was born on the banks of that river, from which circumſtance they call him Meleſigenes, and his compoſitions Meletææ chartæ. It is even ſupported that he compoſed his poems in a cave near the ſource of that river. Strab. 12.—Stat. 2. Sylv. 7. v. 34.—Tibull. 4, el. 1. v. 201.—Pauſ. 7, c. 5.——A beautiful Athenian youth, greatly beloved by Timagoras, whoſe affections he repaid with the greateſt coldneſs and indifference. He even ordered Timagoras to leap down a precipice, from the top of the citadel of Athens, and Timagoras, not to diſoblige him, obeyed, and was killed in the fall. This token of true friendſhip and affection had ſuch an effect upon Meles, that he threw himſelf down from the place, to atone by his death for the ingratitude which he had ſhewn to Timagoras. Pauſ. 1, c. 30.——A king of Lydia, who ſucceeded his father Alyattes, about 747 years before Chriſt. He was father to Candaules.

MELESIGĔNES or MELESIGĔNA, a name given to Homer. Vid. Meles.

MELIA, a daughter of Oceanus, who married Inachus.——A nymph, &c. Apollod.——A daughter of Oceanus, ſiſter to Caanthus. She became mother of Iſmarus and Tenerus by Apollo. Tenerus was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and the river Ladon in Bœotia, aſſumed the name of Iſmarus. Pauſ. 9. c. 10.——One of the Nereides.——A daughter of Agenor.

MĔLĬBŒA, a daughter of Oceanus, who married Pelaſgus.——A daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Apollod.——A maritime town of Magneſia in Theſſaly, at the foot of mount Oſſa, famous for dying wool. The epithet of Melibœus is applied to Philoctetes becauſe he reigned there. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 401. l. 5, v. 251.—Herodot. 7, c. 188.——Alſo an iſland at the mouth of the Orontes in Syria, whence Melibœa purpura. Mel. 2, c. 3.

MELIBŒUS, a ſhepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues.

MĔLĬCERTA, Melicertes, or Melicertus, a ſon of Athamas and Ino. He was ſaved by his mother, from the fury of his father, who prepared to daſh him againſt a wall as he had done his brother Learchus. The mother was ſo terrified that ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea, with Melicerta in her arms. Neptune had compaſſion on the misfortunes of Ino and her ſon and changed them both into ſea deities. Ino was called Leucothoe or Matuta, and Melicerta was known among the Greeks by the name of Palæmon, and among the Latins by that of Portumnus. Some ſuppoſe that the Iſthmian games, were in honor of Melicerta. Vid. Iſthmia. Apollod.

MELIGŪNIS, one of the Æolian iſlands near Sicily.

MELĪNA, a daughter of Theſpius, mother of Laomedon, by Hercules.

MELĪSA, a town of Magna Græcia.

MELISSA, a daughter of Meliſſus, king of Crete, who with her ſiſter Amalthæa, fed Jupiter with the milk of goats. She firſt found out the means of collecting honey; whence ſome have imagined that ſhe was changed into a bee, as her name is the Greek word for that inſect. Columell.——One of the Oceanides, who married Inachus, by whom ſhe had Phoroneus and Ægialus.——A daughter of Procles, who married Periander, the ſon of Cypſelus, by whom, in her pregnancy, ſhe was killed with a blow of his foot, by the falſe accuſation of his concubines. Diog. Laert.—Pauſ. 1, c. 28.——A woman of Corinth, who refuſed to initiate others in the feſtivals of Ceres, after ſhe had received admiſſion. She was torn to pieces upon this diſobedience, and the goddeſs made a ſwarm of bees riſe from her body.

MELISSUS, a king of Crete, father to Meliſſa and Amalthæa.——An admiral of the Samian fleet B. C. 441. He was defeated by Pericles, &c. Plut. in Per.——A philoſopher of Samos, who maintained that the world was infinite, immoveable, and without a vacuum. According to his doctrines, no one could advance any argument upon the power or attributes of providence, as all human knowledge was weak and imperfect. Themiſtocles was among his pupils. He floriſhed about 440 years before the Chriſtian era. Diog.——A freed man of Mecænas, appointed librarian to Auguſtus. He wrote ſome comedies. Ovid. Pont. 4. ep. 16, v. 30.—Sueton. de Gram.

MELĬTA, an iſland in the Libyan ſea, between Sicily and Africa now called Malta. The ſoil was fertile, and the country famous for its wool. It was firſt peopled by the Phœnicians. St. Paul was ſhipwrecked there, and curſed all venomous creatures, which now are not to be found in the whole iſland. Some, however, ſuppoſe that the iſland on which the apoſtle was ſhipwrecked, was another iſland of the ſame name in the Adriatic on the coaſt of Illyricum. Malta is now remarkable as being the reſidence of the knights of Malta, formerly of St. John of Jeruſalem, ſettled there A. D. 1530, by the conceſſion of Charles Vth, after their expulſion from Rhodes by the Turks. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Cic. in Ver. 4, c. 46.——Another, on the coaſt of Illyricum in the Adriatic, now Melede. Plin. 3, c. 26.——An antient name of Samothrace. Strab. 10.——One of the Nereides. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 825.

MELITENE, a province of Armenia.

MELĬTUS, a poet and orator of Athens, who became one of the principal accuſers of Socrates. After his eloquence had prevailed, and Socrates had been put ignominiouſly to death, the Athenians repented of their ſeverity to the philoſopher, and condemned his accuſers. Melitus periſhed among them. His character was mean and inſidious, and his poems had nothing great or ſublime. Diog.

SP. MELIUS, a Roman knight accuſed of aſpiring to tyranny, on account of his uncommon liberality to the populace. He was ſummoned to appear by the dictator L. Q. Cincinnatus, and when he refuſed to obey, he was put to death by Ahala, the maſter of horſe, A. U. C. 314.—Varro de L. L. 4.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.

MELIXANDRUS, a Mileſian, who wrote an account of the wars of the Lapithæ and Centaurs. Ælian. V. H. 11, c. 2.

MELLA or MELA, a ſmall river of Ciſalpine Gaul, falling into the Allius, and with it into the Po. Catull. 68, v. 33.—Virg. G. 4. v. 278.

MELLA ANNÆUS, the father of Lucan. He was accuſed of being privy to Piſo's conſpiracy againſt Nero, upon which he opened his veins. Tacit. 16. Ann. c. 17.

MELOBŌSIS, one of the Oceanides.

MELON, an aſtrologer, who feigned madneſs and burnt his houſe that he might not go to an expedition, which he knew would be attended with great calamities.——An interpreter of king Darius. Curt. 5, c. 13.

MELOS, now Milo, an iſland between Crete and Peloponneſus, about 24 miles from Scyllæum, about 60 miles in circumference and of an oblong figure. It enjoyed its independence for above 700 years before the time of the Peloponneſian war. This iſland was originally peopled by a Lacedæmonian colony, 1116 years before the Chriſtian era. From this reaſon the inhabitants refuſed to join the reſt of the iſlands and the Athenians againſt the Peloponneſians. This refuſal was ſeverely puniſhed. The Athenians took Melos, and put to the ſword all ſuch as were able to bear arms. The women and children were made ſlaves and the iſland left deſolate. An Athenian colony repeopled it, till Lyſander reconquered it and re-eſtabliſhed the original inhabitants in their poſſeſſions. The iſland produced a kind of earth ſucceſsfully employed in painting and medicine. Strab. 7.—Mela. 2, c 7.—Plin. 4, c 12. l. 35, c. 6.—Thucyd. 2, &c.

MELPES, now Melpa, a river of Lucania, falling into the Tyrrhene ſea. Plin. 3, c. 5.

MELPIA,

Melpia, a village of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 38.

Melpŏmĕne, one of the muſes, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemoſyne. She preſided over tragedy. Horace has addreſſed the fineſt of his odes to her, as to the patroneſs of lyric poetry. She was generally repreſented as a young woman with a ſerious countenance. Her garments were ſplendid; ſhe wore a buſkin, and held a dagger in one hand and in the other a ſceptre and crowns. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Heſiod. Theog.

Memacēni, a powerful nation of Aſia. &c. Curt.

Memmia Sulpitia, a woman who married the emperor Alexander Severus. She died when young.

Memmia Lex, ordained that no one ſhould be entered on the calendar of criminals who was abſent on the public accounts.

Memmius, a Roman citizen, accuſed of ambitus. Cic. ad fratrem. 3.——A Roman knight, who rendered himſelf illuſtrious for his eloquence and poetical talents. He was made tribune, prætor, and afterwards governor of Bithynia. He was accuſed of extortion in his province and baniſhed by J. Cæſar, though Cicero undertook his defence. Lucretius dedicated his poem to him. Cic. in Brut.——Regulus, a Roman of whom Nero obſerved, that he deſerved to be inveſted with the imperial purple. Tacit. ann. 14, c. 47.——A Roman who accuſed Jugurtha before the Roman people.——A lieutenant of Pompey, &c.——The family of the Memmii were plebeians. They were deſcended, according to ſome accounts, from Mneſtheus the friend of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 117.

Memnon, a king of Æthiopia, ſon of Tithonus and Aurora. He came with a body of 10,000 men to aſſiſt his uncle Priam, during the Trojan war, where he behaved with great courage, and killed Antilochus, Neſtor's ſon. The aged father challenged the Æthiopian monarch, but Memnon refuſed it on account of the venerable age of Neſtor, and accepted that of Achilles. He was killed in the combat in the ſight of the Grecian and Trojan armies. Aurora was ſo diſconſolate at the death of her ſon, that ſhe flew to Jupiter all bathed in tears, and begged the god to grant her ſon ſuch honors as might diſtinguiſh him from other mortals. Jupiter conſented, and immediately a numerous flight of birds iſſued from the burning pile on which the body was laid, and, after they had flown three times round the flames, they divided themſelves into two ſeparate bodies, and fought with ſuch acrimony that above half of them fell down into the fire, as victims to appeaſe the manes of Memnon. Theſe birds were called Memnonides; and it has been obſerved by ſome of the ancients, that they never failed to return yearly to the tomb of Memnon, in Troas, and repeat the ſame bloody engagement, in honor of the hero, from whom they received their name. The Æthiopians or Egyptians, over whom Memnon reigned, erected a celebrated ſtatue to the honor of their monarch. This ſtatue had the wonderful property of uttering a melodious ſound every day, at ſun-riſing, like that which is heard at the breaking of the ſtring of a harp when it is wound up. This was effected by the rays of the ſun when they fell upon it. At the ſetting of the ſun, and in the night, the ſound was lugubrious. This is ſupported by the teſtimony of the geographer Strabo, who confeſſes himſelf ignorant whether it proceeded from the baſis of the ſtatue, or the people that were then around it. This celebrated ſtatue was diſmantled by order of Cambyſes, when he conquered Egypt, and its ruins ſtill aſtoniſh modern travellers by their grandeur and beauty. Memnon was the inventor of the alphabet, according to Antichides, a writer mentioned by Pliny, 7, c. 56. Moſch. in Bion.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 578, &c.—Ælian. 5, c. 1.—Paus. 1, c. 42. l. 10, c. 31.—Strab. 13, &c.—Juv. 15, v. 5.—Philoſtr. in Apollod.—Plin. 36, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 9.—Quint. Calab.——A general of the Perſian forces, when Alexander invaded Aſia. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his attachment to the intereſt of Darius, his valor in the field, the ſoundneſs of his counſels, and his great ſagacity. He defended Miletus againſt Alexander, and died in the midſt of his ſucceſsful enterpriſes, B. C. 333. His wife Barſine was taken priſoner with the wife of Darius. Diod. 16.——A governor of Cœloſyria.——A man appointed governor of Thrace by Alexander.——A man who wrote an hiſtory of Heraclea in Pontus, in the age of Auguſtus.

Memphis, a celebrated town of Egypt, on the weſtern banks of the Nile, above the Delta. It once contained many beautiful temples, particularly thoſe of the god Apis, (bos Memphites), whoſe worſhip was obſerved with the greateſt ceremonies. [Vid. Apis.] It was in the neighbourhood of Memphis that thoſe famous pyramids were built, whoſe grandeur and beauty ſtill aſtoniſh the modern traveller. Theſe noble monuments of Egyptian vanity, which paſs for one of the wonders of the world, are about 20 in number, three of which by their ſuperior ſize particularly claim attention. The largeſt of theſe is 481 feet in height meaſured perpendicularly, and the area of its baſis is on 480,249 ſquare feet or ſomething more than 11 Engliſh acres of ground.

It has ſteps all round with maſſy and poliſhed ſtones, ſo large that the breadth and depth of every ſtep is one ſingle ſtone. The ſmalleſt ſtone according to an antient hiſtorian is not leſs than 30 feet. The number of ſteps according to modern obſervation amounts to 208, a number which is not always adhered to by travellers. The place where Memphis formerly ſtood is not now known, the ruins of its fallen grandeur were conveyed to Alexandria to beautify its palaces, or to adorn the neighbouring cities. Tibull. 1. el. 7, v. 28.—*Sil. She gave her name to the celebrated city of Memphis. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——The wife of Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Memphītis, a ſon of Ptolemy Phyſcon king of Egypt. He was put to death by his father.

Mena or Menes, the firſt king of Egypt according to ſome accounts.

Menalcas, a ſhepherd in Virgil's eclogues.

Menalcĭdas, an intriguing Lacedæmonian in the time of the famous Achæan league. He was accuſed before the Romans, and he killed himſelf.

Menalippe, a ſiſter of Antiope, queen of the Amazons, taken by Hercules when that hero made war againſt this celebrated nation. She was ranſomed, and Hercules received in exchange the arms and belt of the queen. Juv. 8, v. 229.——A daughter of the Centaur Chiron, beloved and raviſhed by Æolus, ſon of Hellen. She retired into the woods to hide her diſgrace from the eyes of her father, and when ſhe had brought forth ſhe entreated the gods to remove her totally from the purſuits of Chiron. She was changed into a mare, and called Ocyroe. Some ſuppoſe that ſhe aſſumed the name of Menalippe, and loſt that of Ocyroe. She became a conſtellation after death, called the horſe. Some authors call her Hippe or Evippe. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 18.—Pollux 4.——Menalippe is a name common to other perſons, but it is generally ſpelt Melanippe by the beſt authors. Vid. Melanippe.

Menalippus. Vid. Melanippus.

Menander, a celebrated comic poet, of Athens, educated under Theophraſtus. He was univerſally eſteemed by the Greeks, and received the appellation of Prince of the New Comedy. He did not diſgrace his compoſitions like Ariſtophanes, by mean and indecent reflections and illiberal ſatyr, but his writings were replete with elegance, refined wit, and judicious obſervations. Of 108 comedies which he wrote, nothing remains but a few fragments. It is ſaid, that Terence tranſlated all theſe, and indeed we have cauſe to lament the loſs of ſuch valuable writings when we are told by the antients that the elegant Terence, ſo much admired, was in the opinion of his countrymen reckoned inferior to Menander. It is ſaid that Menander drowned himſelf in the 52d year of his age, B. C. 293, becauſe the compoſitions of his rival Philemon obtained more applauſe than his own. Only eight of his numerous comedies were rewarded with a poetical prize. The name of his father was Diopythus, and that of his mother Hegiſtrata. His fragments, with thoſe of Philemon, were publiſhed by Clericus, 8vo. 1709. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.——A man who wrote an account of embaſſies, &c.—A king of Bactria, whoſe aſhes were divided among his ſubjects, &c.—An hiſtorian of Epheſus.—Another of Pergamus.—An Athenian general defeated at Ægoſpotamos by Lyſander.—An Athenian ſent to Sicily with Nicias.—A man put to death by Alexander for deſerting a fortreſs of which he had the command.—An officer under Mithridates, ſent againſt Lucullus.

Menapis, a Perſian exile made ſatrap of Hyrcania, by Alexander. Curt. 6, c. 4.

Menas, a freedman of Pompey the Great who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the active and perfidious part he took in the civil wars which were kindled between the younger Pompey and Auguſtus. When Pompey invited Auguſtus to his galley, Menas adviſed his maſter to ſeize the perſon of his enemy, and at the ſame time the Roman empire, by cutting the cables of his ſhip. No, replied Pompey, I would have approved of the meaſure if you had done it without conſulting me; but I ſcorn to break my word. Suet. in Oct.—Horace ep. epod. 4, has ridiculed the pride of Menas, and recalled to his mind his former meanneſs and obſcurity.

Menchēres, the 12th king of Memphis.

Mendes, a city of Egypt, near Lycopolis, on one of the mouths of the Nile, called the Mendeſian mouth. Pan under the form of a goat was worſhipped there with the greateſt ſolemnity. It was unlawful to kill one of theſe animals, with which the Egyptians were not aſhamed to have public commerce to the diſgrace of human nature, from the ſuperſtitious notion that ſuch embraces had given birth to the greateſt heroes of antiquity, as Alexander, Scipio, pio, &c. Herodot. 2, c. 42 & 46.—Strab. 17.—Diod. 1.

MENĔCLES, an orator of Alabanda in Caria, who ſettled at Rhodes.

MENECLIDES, a detractor of the character of Epaminondas. C. Nep. in Epam.

MENECRĀTES, a phyſician of Syracuſe, famous for his vanity and arrogance. He was generally accompanied by ſome of his patients whoſe diſorders he had cured. He diſguiſed one in the habit of Apollo, and the other in that of Æſculapius, while he reſerved for himſelf the title and name of Jupiter, whoſe power was extended over theſe inferior deities. He crowned himſelf like the maſter of the gods, and in a letter which he wrote to Philip king of Macedon, he ſtiled himſelf, in theſe words, Menecrates Jupiter to king Philip, greeting. The Macedonian monarch anſwered, Philip to Menecrates, greeting, and better ſenſe. Philip alſo invited him to one of his feaſts, but when the meats were ſerved up, a table was put ſeparate for the phyſician, on which he was ſerved only with perfumes and frankincenſe, like the father of the gods. This entertainment diſpleaſed Menecrates; he remembered that he was a mortal, and hurried away from the company. He lived about 360 years before the Chriſtian æra. The book which he wrote on cures is loſt. Ælian V. H. 10, c. 51.——One of the generals of Seleucus.—A phyſician under Tiberius.—A Greek hiſtorian of Nyſa, diſciple to Ariſtarchus, B. C. 119. Strab. 16.——An Epheſian who wrote on agriculture. Varro de R. R.——An hiſtorian.—A man appointed to ſettle the diſputes of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians in the 8th year of the Peloponneſian war. His father's name was Amphidorus.—An officer in the fleet of Pompey the ſon of Pompey the Great.

MENĒDĒMUS, an officer of Alexander killed by the Dahæ. Curt. 7, c. 6.——A Socratic philoſopher of Eretria, who was originally a tent maker, an employment which he left for the profeſſion of arms. The perſuaſive eloquence and philoſophical lectures of Plato had ſuch an influence over him that he gave up his offices in the ſtate to cultivate literature. It is ſaid that he died through melancholy when Antigonus, one of Alexander's generals, had made himſelf maſter of his country, B. C. 301, in the 74th year of his age. Some attribute his death to a different cauſe, and ſay, that he was falſely accuſed of treaſon, for which he became ſo deſperate that he died after he had paſſed ſeven days without taking any aliments. He was called the Eretrian Bull, on account of his gravity. Strab. 9. —Diog.——A Cynic philoſopher of Lampſacus, who ſaid that he was come from hell to obſerve the ſins and wickedneſs of mankind. His habit was that of the furies, and his behaviour was a proof of his infanity. He was diſciple of Colotes of Lampſacus. Diog.——An officer of Lucullus. ——A philoſopher of Athens. Cic. de Orat. 1. c. 19.

MENEGETAS, a boxer or wreſtler in Philip of Macedon's army, &c. Polyæn.

MENĔLĀI PORTUS, an harbour on the coaſt of Africa, between Cyrene and Egypt. C. Nep. in Ageſ. 8.—Strab. 1.——Mons, a hill near Sparta, with a fortification, called Menelaium: Liv. 34, c. 28.

MĔNĔLĀIA, a feſtival celebrated at Therapnæ in Laconia, in honor of Menelaus. He had there a temple, where he was worſhipped with his wife Helen as one of the ſupreme gods.

MĔNĔLĀUS, a king of Sparta, brother to Agamemnon. His father's name was Atreus, according to Homer, or according to the more probable opinion of Heſiod, Apollodorus, &c. he was the ſon of Pliſthenes and Ærope. [Vid. Pliſthenes.] He was educated with his brother Agamemnon in the houſe of Atreus, but ſoon after the death of this monarch, Thyeſtes his brother uſurped the kingdom and baniſhed the two children of Pliſthenes. Menelaus and Agamemnon came to the court of Œneus king of Calydonia, who treated them with tenderneſs and paternal care. From Calydonia they went to Sparta, where, like the reſt of the Grecian princes, they ſolicited the marriage of Helen the daughter of king Tyndarus. By the artifice and advice of Ulyſſes, Helen was permitted to chooſe a huſband, and ſhe fixed her eyes upon Menelaus and married him, after her numerous ſuitors had ſolemnly bound themſelves by an oath to defend her, and protect her perſon againſt the violence or aſſault of every intruder. [Vid. Helena.] As ſoon as the nuptials were celebrated, Tyndarus reſigned the crown to his ſon-in-law, and their happineſs was complete. This was, however, of ſhort duration; Helen was the faireſt woman of the age, and Venus had promiſed Paris the ſon of Priam to reward him with ſuch a beauty. [Vid. Paris.] The arrival of Paris in Sparta was the cauſe of great revolutions. The abſence of Menelaus in Crete gave opportunities to the Trojan prince to corrupt the fidelity of Helen, and to carry away home what the goddeſs of beauty had promiſed to him as his due. This action was highly reſented by Menelaus; he reminded the Greek princes of their oath and ſolemn engagements when they courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and immediately all Greece took up arms to defend defend his cauſe. The combined forces aſſembled at Aulis in Bœotia, where they choſe Agamemnon for their general, and Calchas for their high prieſt; and after their applications to the court of Priam for the recovery of Helen had proved fruitleſs, they marched to meet their enemies in the field. During the Trojan war Menelaus behaved with great ſpirit and courage, and Paris muſt have fallen by his hand, had not Venus interpoſed and redeemed him from certain death. He alſo expreſſed his wiſh to engage Hector, but Agamemnon hindered him from fighting with ſo powerful an adverſary. In the tenth year of the Trojan war, Helen, as it is reported, obtained the forgiveneſs and the good graces of Menelaus by introducing him with Ulyſſes, the night that Troy was reduced to aſhes, into the chamber of Deiphobus whom ſhe had married after the death of Paris. This perfidious conduct totally reconciled her to her firſt huſband, and ſhe returned with him to Sparta, during a voyage of eight years. He died ſome time after his return. He had had a daughter called Hermione, and Nicoſtratus according to ſome by Helen, and a ſon called Megapenthes by a concubine. Some ſay that Menelaus went to Egypt on his return from the Trojan war to obtain Helen who had been detained there by the king of the country. [Vid. Helena.] The palace which Menelaus once inhabited was ſtill entire in the days of Pauſanias, as well as the temple which had been raiſed to his memory by the people of Sparta. *Homer. MENĒNIUS AGRIPPA, a celebrated Roman who appeaſed the Roman populace in the infancy of the conſular government by repeating the well known fable of the belly and limbs He floriſhed 495, B. C.——A Roman conſul.——An inſane perſon in the age of Horace.

MENĔPHRON, a man who attempted to offer violence to his own mother. He was changed into a wild beaſt.

MĒNES, the firſt king of Egypt. He built the town of Memphis as it is generally ſuppoſed, and deſerved, by his abilities and popularity, to be called a god after death. Herodot. 2, c. 1 & 90.—Diod. 1.

MENESTHĒI PORTUS, a town of Hiſpania Bœtica.

MENESTEUS or MENESTHEUS or MNESTHEUS, a ſon of Pereus, who ſo inſinuated himſelf into the favor of the people of Athens, that, during the long abſence of Theſeus, he was elected king. The lawful monarch at his return home was expelled, and Mneſtheus eſtabliſhed his uſurpation by his popularity and great moderation. As he had been one of Helen's ſuitors, he went to the Trojan war at the head of the people of Athens, and died in his return in the iſland of Melos. He reigned 23 years, 1205, and was ſucceeded by Demophoon the ſon of Theſeus. Plut. in Theſ.——A ſon of Iphicrates who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Athenian armies. C. Nep. in Tim.

MENESTHIUS, a Greek killed by Paris in the Trojan war.

MERCŬRIUS, a celebrated god of antiquity, called Hermes by the Greeks. There were no leſs than five of this name according to Cicero; a ſon of Cœlus and Lux; a ſon of Valens and Coronis; a ſon of the Nile; a ſon of Jupiter and Maia; and another called by the Egyptians Thaut. Some add a ſixth, a ſon of Bacchus and Proſerpine. To the ſon of Jupiter and Maia, the actions of all the others have been probably attributed, as he is the moſt famous, and the beſt known. Mercury was the meſſenger of the gods, and of Jupiter in particular; he was the patron of travellers and of ſhepherds; he conducted the ſouls of the dead into the infernal regions, and not only preſided over orators, merchants, declaimers, but he was alſo the god of thieves, pickpockets, and all diſhoneſt perſons. His name is derived a mercibus, becauſe he was the god of merchandize among the Latins. He was born, according to the more received opinion, in Arcadia, on mount Cyllene, and in his infancy he was entruſted to the care of the Seaſons. The day that he was born, or more probably the following day, he gave an early proof of his craftineſs and diſhoneſty, in ſtealing away the oxen of Admetus which Apollo tended. He gave another proof of his thieviſh propenſity, by taking alſo the quiver and arrows of the divine ſhepherd, and he encreaſed his fame by robbing Neptune of his trident, Venus of her girdle, Mars of his ſword, Jupiter of his ſceptre, and Vulcan of many of his mechanical inſtruments. Theſe ſpecimens of his art recommended him to the notice of the gods, and Jupiter took him as his meſſenger, interpreter, and cup-bearer in the aſſembly of the gods. This laſt office he diſcharged till the promotion of Ganymede. He was preſented by the king of heaven with a winged cap called petaſus, and with wings for his feet called talaria. He had alſo a ſhort ſword called herpe, which he lent to Perſeus. With theſe he was enabled to go into whatever part of the univerſe he pleaſed with the greateſt celerity, and beſides he was permitted to make himſelf inviſible, and to aſſume whatever ſhape he pleaſed. As meſſenger of Jupiter he was entruſted with all his ſecrets. He was the ambaſſador and plenipotentiary of the gods, and he was concerned in all alliances and treaties. He was the confident of Jupiter's amours, and he often was ſet to watch over the jealouſy and intrigues of Juno. The invention of the lyre and its ſeven ſtrings is aſcribed to him. This he gave to Apollo, and received in exchange the celebrated caduceus with which the god of poetry uſed to drive the flocks of king Admetus. [Vid. Caduceus.] In the wars of the giants againſt the gods, Mercury ſhowed himſelf brave, ſpirited, and active, active. He delivered Mars from the long confinement which he ſuffered from the ſuperior power of the Aloides. He purified the Danaides of the murder of their huſbands, he tied Ixion to his wheel in the infernal regions, he deſtroyed the hundred-eyed Argus, he ſold Hercules to Omphale the queen of Lydia, he conducted Priam to the tent of Achilles, to redeem the body of his ſon Hector, and he carried the infant Bacchus to the nymphs of Nyſa. Mercury had many ſirnames and epithets. He was called Cyllenius, Caduceator, Acacetos, from Acacus, an Arcadian; Acaceſius, Tricephalos, Triplex, Chthonius, Camillus, Agoneus, Delius, Arcas, &c. His children are alſo numerous as well as his amours. He was father of Autolycus, by Chione; Myrtillus, by Cleobula; Libys, by Libya; Echion and Eurytus, by Antianira; Cephalus, by Creuſa; Prylis, by Iſſa; and of Priapus, according to ſome. He was alſo father of Hermaphroditus, by Venus; of Eudorus, by Polimela; of Pan, by Dryope, or Penelope. His worſhip was well eſtabliſhed, particularly in Greece, Egypt and Italy. He was worſhipped at Tanagra in Bœotia, under the name of Criophorus, and repreſented as carrying a ram on his ſhoulders, becauſe he delivered the inhabitants from a peſtilence by telling them to carry a ram in that manner round the walls of their city. The Roman merchants yearly celebrated a feſtival on the 15th of May, in honor of Mercury, in a temple near the Circus Maximus. A pregnant ſow was then ſacrificed and ſometimes a calf, and particularly the tongues of animals were offered. After the votaries had ſprinkled themſelves with water with laurel leaves, they offered prayers to the divinity, and intreated him to be favorable to them, and to forgive whatever artful meaſures, falſe oaths, or falſehoods they had uſed or uttered in the purſuit of gain. Sometimes Mercury appears on monuments with a large cloak round his arm or tied under his chin. The chief enſigns of his power and offices are his caduceus, his petaſus, and his talaria. Sometimes he is repreſented ſitting upon a cray fiſh, holding in one hand his caduceus, and in the other the claws of the fiſh. At other times he is like a young man without a beard, holding in one hand a purſe, as being the tutelary God of merchants, with a cock on his wriſts as an emblem of vigilance, and at his feet, a goat, a ſcorpion, and a fly. Some of his ſtatues repreſented him as a youth faſcino erecto. Sometimes he reſts his foot upon a tortoiſe. In Egypt his ſtatues repreſented him with the head of a dog, whence he was often confounded with Anubis, and received the ſacrifice of a ſtork. Offerings of milk and honey were made becauſe he was the God of eloquence, whoſe powers were ſweet and perſuaſive. The Greeks and Romans offered tongues to him by throwing them into the fire, as he was the patron of ſpeaking, of which the tongue is the organ. Sometimes his ſtatues repreſent him as without arms, becauſe, according to ſome, the power of ſpeech can prevail over every thing even without the aſſiſtance of arms. *Homer. MESENE, an iſland in the Tigris, where Apamea was built, now Diſel. Plin. 6. c. 27.

MESOMĒDES, a lyric poet in the age of the emperor Antoninus.

MESOPOTĂMIA, a county of Aſia which receives its name from its ſituation (μεσοποτάμια) between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. It is yearly inundated by the Euphrates, and the water properly conveyed over the country by canals. It is now called Diarbec. Strab. 2.—Mela. 1, c. 11.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 52.

MESSĀLA, a name of Valerius Corvinus, from his having conquered Meſſana in Sicily. This family was very antient; the moſt celebrated was a friend of Brutus, who ſeized the camp of Auguſtus at Philippi. He was afterwards reconciled to Auguſtus, and died A. D. 9, in his 77th year. Plut.—— Another, conſul, &c.——The father of Valeria who married the dictator Sylla. Id.——A great flatterer at the court of Tiberius.——A governor of Syria.——A tribune in one of the Roman legions during the civil war between Veſpaſian and Vitellius, of which he wrote an hiſtorical account mentioned by Tacitus Orat. 14.——A conſul with Domitius, &c.——A painter at Rome, who floriſhed, B. C. 235.——A writer whoſe book de Auguſti progenie was edited 12mo. L. Bat. 1648.

MESSALĪNA VALERIA, a daughter of Meſſala Barbatus. She married the emperor Claudius, and diſgraced herſelf by her cruelties and incontinence. Her huſband's palace was not the only ſeat of her laſciviouſneſs, but ſhe proſtituted herſelf in the public ſtreets, and few men there were at Rome who could not boaſt of having enjoyed the favors of the impure Meſſalina. Her extravagances at laſt irritated her huſband; he commanded her to appear before him to anſwer to all the accuſations which were brought againſt her, upon which ſhe attempted to deſtroy herſelf, and when her courage failed, one of the tribunes, who had been ſent to her, diſpatched her with his ſword, A. D. 48. It is in ſpeaking of her debaucheries and lewdneſs that a celebrated ſatiriſt ſays Et laſſata viris, necdum ſatiata, recеſſit.

Juv.—Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 37.—Suet. in Claud.—Dio.——Another called alſo Statilia. She was deſcended of a conſular family, and married the conſul Atticus Viſtinus whom Nero murdered. She received with great marks marks of tenderneſs her huſband's murderer and married him. She had married four huſbands before ſhe came to the imperial throne; and after the death of Nero ſhe retired to literary purſuits and peaceful occupations. Otho courted her and would have married her had he not deſtroyed himſelf. In his moments he wrote her a very pathetic and conſolatory letter, &c. Tacit. Ann.

MESSĀLĪNUS M. VALER. a Roman officer in the reign of Tiberius. He was appointed governor of Dalmatia, and rendered himſelf known by his oppoſition to Piſo, and by his attempts to perſuade the Romans of the neceſſity of ſuffering women to accompany the camps on their different expeditions. Tacit. Ann. 3.——One of Domitian's informers.——A flatterer of the emperor Tiberius.

MESSĀNA, an ancient and celebrated town of Sicily on the ſtreights which ſeparate Italy from Sicily. It was antiently called Zancle, and was founded 1600 years before the Chriſtian era. The inhabitants, being continually expoſed to the depradations of the people of Cuma, implored the aſſiſtance of the Meſſenians of Peloponneſus, and with them repelled the enemy. After this victorious campaign, the Meſſenians entered Zancle, and lived in ſuch intimacy with the inhabitants that they changed their name, and aſſumed that of the Meſſenians, and called their city Meſſana. Another account ſays, that Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, made war againſt the Zancleans with the aſſiſtance of the Meſſenians of Peloponneſus, and that after he had obtained a deciſive victory, he called the conquered city Meſſana in compliment to his allies, about 494 years before the Chriſtian era. After this revolution at Zancle, the Mamertini took poſſeſſion of it and made it the capital of the neighbouring country. [Vid. Mamertini.] It afterwards fell into the hands of the Romans, and was for ſome time the chief of their poſſeſſions in Sicily. The inhabitants were called Meſſenii, Meſſanienſes, and Mamertini. The ſtreights of Meſſana have always been looked upon as very dangerous, eſpecially by the antients, on account of the rapidity of the currents, and the irregular and violent flowing and ebbing of the ſea. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 4, c. 23.—Diod. 4.—Thucyd. 1, &c.—Herodot. 6, c. 23. l. 7. c. 28.

MESSAPIA, a country of Italy, between Tarentum and Brunduſium. It is the ſame as Calabria. It received its name from Meſſapus, the ſon of Neptune, who left a part of Boeotia called Meſſapia, and came to Italy, where he aſſiſted the Rutulians againſt Æneas. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 513.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 691.

MESSE, a town in the iſland of Cythera. Stat. 1. Theb. 4, v. 226.

MESSEIS, a fountain of Theſſaly. Strab. 9.

MESSĒNE, a daughter of Triopas, king of Argos, who married Polycaon ſon of Lelex, king of Laconia. She encouraged her huſband to levy troops, and to ſeize a part of Peloponneſus, which, after it had been conquered, received her name. She received divine honors after her death. Pauſ. 4, c. 1, &c.

MESSĒNE or MESSĒNA, now Maura-Matra, a city in the Peloponneſus, the capital of the country called Meſſenia. The inhabitants have rendered themſelves famous for the war which they carried on againſt the Spartans, and which received the appellation of the Meſſenian war. The firſt Meſſenian war aroſe from the following circumſtances: The Meſſenians offered violence to ſome Spartan women who had aſſembled to offer ſacrifices in a temple, which was common to both nations, and which ſtood on the borders of their reſpective territories, and beſides they killed Teleclus, the Spartan king, who attempted to defend the innocence of the females. This account, according to the Spartan traditions, is contradicted by the Meſſenians, who obſerve that Teleclus with a choſen body of Spartans aſſembled at the temple, before mentioned, diſguiſed in women's cloaths, and all ſecretly armed with daggers. This hoſtile preparation was to ſurprize ſome of the neighbouring inhabitants; and in a quarrel which ſoon after aroſe Teleclus and his aſſociates were all killed. Theſe quarrels were the cauſe of the firſt Meſſenian war, which began, B. C. 743 years. It was carried with vigor and ſpirit on both ſides, and after many obſtinate and bloody battles had been fought and continued for 19 years, it was at laſt finiſhed by the taking of Ithome by the Spartans, a place which had ſtood a ſiege of ten years, and been defended with all the power of the Meſſenians. The inſults to which the conquered Meſſenians were continually expoſed, at laſt excited their reſentment, and they reſolved to ſhake off the yoke. They ſuddenly revolted, and the ſecond Meſſenian war was begun 685, B. C. and continued 14 years. The Meſſenians at firſt gained ſome advantages, but a fatal battle in the third year of the war ſo totally diſheartened them that they fled to Ira, where they reſolved to maintain an obſtinate ſiege againſt their victorious purſuers. The Spartans were aſſiſted by the Samians in beſieging Ira, and the Meſſenians were at laſt obliged to ſubmit to the ſuperior power of their adverſaries. The taking of Ira, by the Lacedæmonians, after a ſiege of 11 years, put an end to the ſecond Meſſenian war. Peace was re-eſtabliſhed for ſome time in Peloponneſus, but after the expiration of 200 years, the Meſſenians attempted a third time to free themſelves from the power of Lacedæmon, B. C. 465. At that time the Helots had revolted from the Spartans, and the Meſſenians, by joining their forces to theſe wretched ſlaves, looked upon their reſpective calamities as common, and thought themſelves cloſely intereſted in each other's welfare. The Lacedæmonians were aſſiſted by the Athenians, but they ſoon grew jealous of one another's power, and their political connection ended in the moſt inveterate enmity, and at laſt in open war. Ithome was the place in which the Meſſenians had a ſecond time gathered all their forces, and though ten years had already elapſed, both parties ſeemed equally confident of victory. The Spartans were afraid of ſtorming Ithome, as the oracle of Delphi had threatened them with the greateſt calamities, if they offered any violence to a place which was dedicated to the ſervice of Apollo. The Meſſenians, however, were ſoon obliged to ſubmit to their victorious adverſaries, B. C. 453, and they conſented to leave their native country, and totally to depart from the Peloponneſus, ſolemnly promiſing that if they ever returned into Meſſenia, they would ſuffer themſelves to be ſold as ſlaves. The Meſſenians, upon this, miſerably exiled, applied to the Athenians for protection, and were permitted to inhabit Naupactus, whence ſome of them were afterwards removed to take poſſeſſion of their antient territories in Meſſenia, during the Peloponneſian war. The third Meſſenian war was productive of great revolutions in Greece, and though almoſt a private quarrel, it ſoon engaged the attention of all the neighbouring ſtates, and kindled the flames of diſſenſion every where. Every ſtate took up arms as if in its own defence, or to prevent additional power and dominion to be lodged in the hands of its rivals. The deſcendants of the Meſſenians at laſt returned to Peloponneſus, B. C. 370, after a long baniſhment of 300 years. *Pauſ. METELLI, the ſirname of the family of the Cæcilii at Rome, the moſt known of whom were—A general, who defeated the Achæans, took Thebes, and invaded Macedonia, &c.——Q. Cæcilius, who rendered himſelf illuſtrious by his ſucceſſes againſt Jugurtha the Numidian king, from which he was ſurnamed Numidicus. He took, in this expedition, the celebrated Marius, as his lieutenant, and he had ſoon cauſe to repent of the confidence he had placed in him. Marius raiſed himſelf to power by defaming the character of his benefactor, and Metellus was recalled to Rome and accuſed of extortion and ill management. Marius was appointed ſucceſſor to finiſh the Numidian war, and Metellus was acquitted quitted of the crimes laid to his charge before the tribunal of the Roman knights, who obſerved that the probity of his whole life and the greatneſs of his exploits were greater proofs of his innocence, than the moſt powerful arguments. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Salluſt. de bell. Jug.——L. Cæcilius, another, who ſaved from the flames the palladium, when Veſta's temple was on fire. He was then high prieſt. He loſt his ſight and one of his arms in doing it, and the ſenate, to reward his zeal and piety, permitted him always to be drawn to the ſenate houſe in a chariot, an honor which no one had ever before enjoyed. He alſo gained a great victory over the Carthaginians in the firſt Punic war, and took from them elephants, &c. He was honored with the dictatorſhip, and the office of maſter of horſe, &c.——Q. Cæcilius Celer, another who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſpirited exertions againſt Catiline. He married Clodia the ſiſter of Clodius, who diſgraced him by her incontinence and laſciviouſneſs. He died 57 years before Chriſt. He was greatly lamented by Cicero, who ſhed tears at the loſs of one of his moſt faithful and valuable friends. Cic. de Cæl. ——L. Cæcilius, a tribune in the civil wars of J. Cæſar and Pompey. He favored the cauſe of Pompey, and oppoſed Cæſar when he entered Rome with a victorious army. He refuſed to open the gates of Saturn's temple, in which were depoſited great treaſures, upon which they were broke open by Cæſar, and Metellus retired, when threatened with death. —— Q. Cæcilius, the grandſon of the high prieſt who ſaved the palladium from the flames, was a warlike general, who, from his conqueſt of Crete and Macedonia, was ſurnamed Macedonicus. He had ſix ſons, of which four are particularly mentioned by Plutarch.—Q. Cæcilius, ſirnamed Balearicus, from his conqueſt of the Baleares.—L. Cæcilius, ſirnamed Diadema, but ſuppoſed the ſame as that called Lucius with the ſirname of Dalmaticus, from a victory obtained over the Dalmatians, during his conſulſhip with Mutius Scævola. —Caius Cæcilius, ſirnamed Caprarius, who was conſul with Carbo, A. U. C. 639.—The fourth was Marcus, and of theſe four brothers it is remarkable, that two of them triumphed in one day, but over what nations is not mentioned by Eutrop. 4.—— Nepos, a conſul, &c.——Another, who accuſed C. Curio, his father's detractor, and who alſo vented his reſentment againſt Cicero when going to baniſhment.—— Another, who, as tribune, oppoſed the ambition of Julius Cæſar.——A general of the Roman armies againſt the Sicilians and Carthaginians. Before he marched he offered ſacrifices to all the gods, except Veſta, for which neglect the goddeſs was ſo incenſed that ſhe demanded the blood of his daughter Metella. When Metella was going to be immolated, the goddeſs placed a heifer in her place, and carried her to a temple at Lanuvium, of which ſhe became the prieſteſs.——Lucius Cæcilius or Quintus ſirnamed Creticus, from his conqueſt in Crete, B. C. 66, is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſon of Metellus Macedonicus. ——Cimber, one of the conſpirators againſt J. Cæſar. It was he who gave the ſignal to attack and murder the dictator in the ſenate houſe.——Pius, a general in Spain, againſt Sertorius, on whoſe head he ſet a price of 100 talents and 20,000 acres of land. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf alſo in the Marſian war, and was high prieſt. He obtained the name of Pius from the ſorrow he ſhowed during the baniſhment of his father Metellus Numidicus, whom he cauſed to be recalled.——A conſul who commanded in Africa, &c. Val. Max.—Plin.—Plut.—Liv.—Paterc. 2.—Flor. 3. c. 8.—Pauſ. 7, c. 8 & 13.—Cic. in Tuſc. &c.—Juv. 3, v. 138.—Appian. Civ.—Cæſar. bell. Civ.—Salluſt. in Jug.

Metilius, a man who accuſed Fabius Maximus, before the ſenate, &c.

Mĕtiŏchus, a ſon of Miltiades, who was taken by the Phœnicians, and given to Darius king of Perſia. He was tenderly treated by the monarch, though his father had conquered the Perſian armies in the plains of Marathon. Plut.—Herodot. 6, c 41.——An Athenian entruſted with the care of the roads, &c. Plut.

Metion, a ſon of Erechtheus, king of Athens and Praxithea. He married Alcippe, daughter of Mars and Agraulos. His ſons drove Pandion from the throne of Athens, and were afterwards expelled by Pandion's children. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 2, c. 6.

Metis, one of the Oceanides. She was Jupiter's firſt wife, celebrated for her great prudence and ſagacity above the reſt of the gods. Jupiter, who was afraid leſt ſhe ſhould bring forth into the world a child more cunning and greater than himſelf, devoured her in the firſt month of her pregnancy. Sometime after this adventure the god had his head opened, from which iſſued Minerva armed from head to foot. According to Apollodorus, 1, c. 2. Metis gave a potion to Saturn, and obliged him to throw up the children he had devoured. Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Hygin.

Metiscus, a charioteer to Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 469.

Metius Curtius, one of the Sabines, who fought againſt the Romans on account of the ſtolen virgins.——Suffetius, a dictator of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hoſtilius. He fought againſt the Romans, and at laſt, finally to ſettle their diſputes, he propoſed a ſingle combat between the Horatii and Curatii. The Albans were conquered, and Metius promiſed to aſſiſt the Romans againſt their enemies. In a battle againſt the Veientes and Fidenates, Metius ſhowed his infidelity by forſaking the Romans at the firſt onſet, and retired to a neighbouring eminence, to wait for the event of the battle, and to fall upon whatever ſide proved victorious. The Romans obtained the victory, and Tullus ordered Metius to be tied between two chariots, which were drawn by four horſes two different ways, and his limbs were torn away from his body, about 669 years before the Chriſtian era. Liv. 1, c. 23, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 3.—Virg Æn. 8. v. 642.——A critic. Vid. Tarpa.——Carus, a celebrated informer under Domitian who enriched himſelf with the plunder of thoſe who were ſacrificed to the emperor's ſuſpicion.

Metœcia, feſtivals inſtituted by Theſeus in commemoration of the people of Attica having removed to Athens.

Meton, an aſtrologer and mathematician of Athens. His father's name was Pauſanias. He refuſed to go to Sicily with his countrymen, and pretended to be inſane, becauſe he foreſaw the calamities that attended that expedition. In a book called Enneadecaterides, or the cycle of 19 years, he endeavoured to adjuſt the courſe of the ſun and of the moon, and ſupported that the ſolar and lunar years could regularly begin from the ſame point in the heavens. This is called by the moderns the golden numbers. He floriſhed, B. C. 432. Vitruv. 1.—Plut. in Nicia.——A native of Tarentum, who pretended to be intoxicated that he might draw the attention of his countrymen, when he wiſhed to diſſuade them from making an alliance with king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrr.

Mĕtŏpe, the wife of the river Sangarius. She was mother of Hecuba.—The daughter of Ladon, who married the Aſopus.——A river of Arcadia.

Metra, a daughter of Ereſichthon, a Theſſalian prince, beloved by Neptune. When her father had ſpent all his fortune to gratify the canine hunger under which he labored, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to her neighbours, and received for reward oxen, goats, and ſheep, which ſhe preſented to Eriſichthon. Some ſay that ſhe had received from Neptune the power of changing herſelf into whatever animal ſhe pleaſed, and that her father ſold her continually to gratify his hunger, and that ſhe inſtantly aſſumed a different ſhape, and became again his property. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 21.

Mĕtrŏcles, a pupil of Theophraſtus, who had the care of the education of Cleombrotus and Cleomenes. He ſuffocated himſelf when old and infirm. Diog.

Mĕtrodōrus, a phyſician of Chios, B. C. 444. He was diſciple of Democritus, and had Hippocrates among his pupils. His compoſitions on medicine, &c. are loſt. He ſupported that the world was eternal and infinite, and denied the exiſtence of motion. Diog.——A painter and philoſopher of Stratonice, B. C. 171. He was ſent to Paulus Æmylius, who, after the conqueſt of Perſeus, demanded of the Athenians nians a philoſopher and a painter, the former to inſtruct his children, and the latter to make a painting of his triumphs. Metrodorus was ſent, as in him alone were united the philoſopher and the painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.—Cic. 5, de Finib. 1. de Orat. 4. Acad.—Diog. in Epic.——A friend of Mithridates, ſent as ambaſſador to Tigranes, king of Armenia. He was remarkable for his learning, moderation, humanity, and juſtice. He was put to death by his royal maſter for his infidelity B. C. 72. Strab.—Plut.——Another, of a very retentive memory.

MIDAS, a king of Phrygia, ſon of Gordius or Gorgias. In the early part of his life, according to ſome traditions, he found a large treaſure, to which he owed his greatneſs and opulence. The hoſpitality he ſhewed to Silenus, the preceptor of Bacchus, who had been brought to him by ſome peaſants, was liberally rewarded; and Midas, when he conducted back the old man to the god, was permitted to chuſe whatever recompence he pleaſed. He had the imprudence and the avarice to demand of the god that whatever he touched might be turned into gold. His prayer was granted, but he was ſoon convinced of his injudicious choice; and when the very meats which he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he begged Bacchus to take away a preſent which muſt prove ſo fatal to the receiver. He was ordered to waſh himſelf in the river Pactolus, whoſe ſands were turned into gold by the touch of Midas. Some time after this adventure Midas had the imprudence to ſupport that Pan was ſuperior to Apollo in ſinging and in playing upon the flute, for which raſh opinion the offended god changed his ears into thoſe of an aſs, to ſhew his ignorance and ſtupidity. This Midas attempted to conceal from the knowledge of his ſubjects, but one of his ſervants ſaw the length of his ears, and being unable to keep the ſecret, and afraid to reveal it, apprehenſive of the king's reſentment, he opened a hole in the earth, and after he had whiſpered there that Midas had the ears of an aſs, he covered the place as before, as if he had buried his words in the ground. On that place, as the poets mention, grew a number of reeds, which, when agitated by the wind, uttered the ſame ſound that had been buried beneath, and publiſhed to the world that Midas had the ears of an aſs. Some explain the fable of the ears of Midas, by the ſuppoſition that he kept a number of informers and ſpies, who were continually employed in gathering every ſeditious word that might drop from the mouths of his ſubjects. Midas, according to Strabo, died of drinking bull's hot blood. This he did, as Plutarch mentions, to free himſelf from the numerous ill-dreams which continually tormented him. Midas, according to ſome, was ſon of Cybele. He built a town, which he called Ancyræ. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 5.—Plut. de Superſt.—Strab. 1.—Hygin. fab. 191.—*Max. MILĒTIUM, a town of Calabria, built by the people of Miletus of Aſia.——A town of Crete.

MĪLĒTUS, a ſon of Apollo, who fled from Crete to avoid the wrath of Minos, whom he meditated to dethrone. He came to Caria, where he built a city which he called by his own name. Some ſuppoſe that he only conquered a city there, which aſſumed his name. They farther ſay, that he put the inhabitants to the ſword, and divided the women among his ſoldiers. A woman called Cyanea fell to his ſhare. Strab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 446.—Pauſ. 7, c. 2.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.——A celebrated town of Aſia Minor, the capital of all Ionia, ſituate about ten ſtadia ſouth of the mouth of the river Mæander near the ſea coaſt on the confines of Ionia and Caria. It was founded by a Cretan colony under Miletus, or, according to others, by Neleus, the ſon of Codrus, or by Sarpedon, Jupiter's ſon. It has ſucceſſively been called Lelegeis, Pithyuſa, and Anactoria. The inhabitants, called Mileſii, were very powerful, and long maintained an obſtinate war againſt the kings of Lydia. They early applied themſelves to navigation, and planted no leſs than 80 colonies, or, according to Seneca, 380, in different parts of the world. Miletus gave birth to Thales, Anaximenes, Anaximander, Hecatæus, Timotheus the muſician, Pittacus one of the ſeven wiſe men, &c. Miletus was alſo famous for a temple and an oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and for its excellent wool, with which were made ſtuffs and garments, held in the higheſt reputation, both for ſoftneſs, elegance, and beauty. The words Mileſiæ fabulæ, or Mileſiaca, were uſed to expreſs wanton and ludicrous plays. Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 413.—Capitolin. in Alb. 11.—*Virg. MILICHUS, a freedman who diſcovered Piſo's conſpiracy againſt Nero. Tacit. Ann. c. 54.

MILINUS, a Cretan king, &c.

MILIONIA, a town of the Samnites taken by the Romans.

MĪLO, a celebrated athlete of Crotona in Italy. His father's name was Diotimus. He early accuſtomed himſelf to carry the greateſt burdens, and by degrees became a monſter in ſtrength. It is ſaid that he carried on his ſhoulders a young bullock 4 years old, for above 40 yards, and afterwards killed it with one blow of his fiſt, and eat it up in one day. He was ſeven times crowned at the Pythian games, and ſix at Olympia. He preſented himſelf a ſeventh time, but no one had the courage or boldneſs to enter the liſts againſt him. He was one of the diſciples of Pythagoras, and to his uncommon ſtrength the learned preceptor and his pupils owed their life. The pillar which ſupported the roof of the ſchool ſuddenly gave way, but Milo ſupported the whole weight of the building, and gave the philoſopher and his auditors time to eſcape. In his old age Milo attempted to pull up a tree by the roots and break it. He partly effected it, but his ſtrength being gradually exhauſted, the tree when half cleft reunited, and his hands remained pinched in the body of the tree. He was then alone, and being unable to diſentangle himſelf, he was eaten up by the wild beaſts of the place, about 500 years before the Chriſtian era. Ovid. Met. 15.—Cic. de Senect.—Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—Strab. 16.—Pauſ. 6. c. 11.——T. Annius, a native of Lanuvium, who attempted to obtain the conſulſhip at Rome by intrigue and ſeditious tumults. Clodius the tribune oppoſed his views, yet Milo would have ſucceeded, had not an unfortunate event totally fruſtrated his hopes. As he was going into the country, attended by his wife and a numerous retinue of gladiators and ſervants, he met on the Appian road his enemy Clodius, who was returning to Rome with three of his friends and ſome domeſtics completely armed. A quarrel aroſe between the ſervants. Milo ſupported his attendants, and the diſpute became general. Clodius received many ſevere wounds, and was obliged to retire to a neighbouring cottage. Milo purſued his enemy in his retreat, and ordered his ſervants to diſpatch him. Eleven of the ſervants of Clodius ſhared his fate, as alſo the owner of the houſe who had given them reception. The body of the murdered tribune was carried to Rome, and expoſed to public view. The enemies of Milo inveighed bitterly againſt the violence and barbarity with which the ſacred perſon of a tribune had been treated. Cicero undertook the defence of Milo, but the continual clamors of the friends of Clodius, and the ſight of an armed ſoldiery, which ſurrounded the ſeat of judgment, ſo terrified terrified the orator, that he forgot the greateſt part of his arguments, and the defence he made was weak and injudicious. Milo was condemned, and baniſhed to Maſſilia. Cicero ſoon after ſent his exiled friend a copy of the oration which he had delivered in his defence, in the form in which we have it now; and Milo, after he had read it, exclaimed, O Cicero, hadſt thou ſpoken before my accuſers in theſe terms, Milo would not be now eating figs at Marſeilles. The friendſhip and cordiality of Cicero and Milo were the fruits of long intimacy and familiar intercourſe. It was by the ſucceſsful labors of Milo that the orator was recalled from baniſhment and reſtored to his friends. Cic. pro Milon.—Paterc. 2, c. 47 & 68.—Dio. 40.——A general of the forces of Pyrrhus. He was made governor of Tarentum, and that he might be reminded of his duty to his ſovereign, Pyrrhus ſent him as a preſent a chain, which was covered with the ſkin of Nicias the phyſician, who had perfidiouſly offered the Romans to poiſon his royal maſter for a ſum of money. Polyæn. 8, &c.——A tyrant of Piſa in Elis, thrown into the river Alpheus by his ſubjects for his oppreſſion. Ovid. in Ib. v. 325.

MILŌNIUS, a drunken buffoon at Rome, accuſtomed to dance when intoxicated. Horat. 2, Sat. 1, v. 24.

MILTAS, a ſoothſayer, who aſſiſted Dion in explaining prodigies, &c.

MILTIĂDES, an Athenian, ſon of Cypſelus, who obtained a victory in a chariot race at the Olympic games, and led a colony of his countrymen to the Cherſoneſus. The cauſes of this appointment are ſtriking and ſingular. The Thracian Dolonci, haraſſed by a long war with the Abſynthians, were directed by the oracle of Delphi to take for their king the firſt man they met in their return home, who invited them to come under his roof and partake of his entertainments. This was Miltiades, whom the appearance of the Dolonci, their ſtrange arms and garments, had ſtruck. He invited them to his houſe, and was made acquainted with the commands of the oracle. He obeyed, and when the oracle of Delphi had approved a ſecond time the choice of the Dolonci, he departed for the Cherſoneſus, and was inveſted by the inhabitants with ſovereign power. The firſt meaſure he took was to ſtop the further incurſions of the Abſynthians, by building a ſtrong wall acroſs the Iſthmus. When he had eſtabliſhed himſelf at home, and fortified his dominions againſt foreign invaſion, he turned his arms againſt Lampſacus. His expedition was unſucceſsful; he was taken in an ambuſcade and made priſoner. His friend Crœſus, king of Lydia, was informed of his captivity, and he procured his releaſe by threatening the people of Lampſacus with his ſevereſt diſpleaſure. He lived a few years after he had recovered his liberty. As he had no iſſue, he left his kingdom and poſſeſſions to Steſagoras the ſon of Cimon, who was his brother by the ſame mother. The memory of Miltiades was greatly honored by the Dolonci, and they regularly celebrated feſtivals and exhibited ſhews in commemoration of a man to whom they owed their greatneſs and preſervation. Some time after Steſagoras died without iſſue, and Miltiades the ſon of Cimon, and the brother of the deceaſed, was ſent by the Athenians with one ſhip to take poſſeſſion of the Cherſoneſus. At his arrival Miltiades appeared mournful, as if lamenting the recent death of his brother. The principal inhabitants of the country viſited the new governor to condole with him; but their confidence in his ſincerity proved fatal to them. Miltiades ſeized their perſons, and made himſelf abſolute in Cherſoneſus; and to ſtrengthen himſelf he married Hegeſipyla, the daughter of Olorus the king of the Thracians. His proſperity however was of ſhort duration. In the third year of his government his dominions were threatened by an invaſion of the Scythian Nomades, whom Darius had ſome time before irritated by entering their country. He fled before them, but as their hoſtilities were but momentary, he was ſoon reſtored to his kingdom. Three years after he left Cherſoneſus and ſet ſail for Athens, where he was received with great applauſe. He was preſent at the celebrated battle of Marathon, in which all the chief officers ceded their power to him, and left the event of the battle to depend upon his ſuperior abilities. He obtained an important victory [Vid. Marathon] over the more numerous forces of his adverſaries; and when he had demanded of his fellow-citizens an olive crown as the reward of his valor in the field of battle, he was not only refuſed, but ſeverely reprimanded for preſumption. The only reward, therefore, that he received for a victory which proved ſo beneficial to the intereſts of univerſal Greece, was in itſelf ſimple and inconſiderable, though truly great in the opinion of that age. He was repreſented in the front of a picture among the reſt of the commanders who fought at the battle of Marathon, and he ſeemed to exhort and animate his ſoldiers to fight with courage and intrepidity. Some time after Miltiades was entruſted with a fleet of 70 ſhips, and ordered to puniſh thoſe iſlands which had revolted to the Perſians. He was ſucceſsful at firſt, but a ſudden report that the Perſian fleet was coming to attack him, changed his operations as he was beſieging Paros. He raiſed the ſiege and returned to Athens, where he was accuſed of treaſon, and particularly of holding correſpondence with the enemy. The falſity of theſe accuſations might have appeared, if Miltiades had been able to come into the aſſembly. A wound which he had received before Paros detained him at home, and his enemies, taking advantage of his abſence, became more eager in their accuſations and louder in their clamors. He was condemned to death, but the rigor of the ſentence was retracted on the recollection of his great ſervices to the Athenians, and he was put into priſon till he had paid a fine of 50 talents to the ſtate. His inability to diſcharge ſo great a ſum detained him in confinement, and ſoon after his wounds became incurable, and he died about 489 years before the Chriſtian era. His body was ranſomed by his ſon Cimon, who was obliged to borrow and pay the 50 talents, to give his father a decent burial. The crimes of Miltiades were probably aggravated in the eyes of his countrymen, when they remembered how he made himſelf abſolute in Cherſoneſus; and in condemning the barbarity of the Athenians towards a general, who was the ſource of their military proſperity, we muſt remember the jealouſy which ever reigns among a free and independent people, and how watchful they are in defence of the natural rights which they ſee wreſted from others by violence and oppreſſion. Cornelius Nepos has written the life of Miltiades the ſon of Cimon, but his hiſtory is incongruous and not authentic; and the author, by confounding the actions of the ſon of Cimon with thoſe of the ſon of Cypſelus, has made the whole dark and unintelligible. Greater reliance in reading the actions of both the Miltiades is to be placed on the narration of Herodotus, whoſe veracity is confirmed, and who was undiſputedly more informed and more capable of giving an account of the life and exploits of men who floriſhed in his age, and of which he could ſee the living monuments. Herodotus was born about ſix years after the famous battle of Marathon, and C. Nepos, as a writer of the Auguſtan age, floriſhed about 450 years after the age of the father of hiſtory. *C. Mimnermus, a Greek poet and muſician of Colophon in the age of Solon. He chiefly excelled in elegiac poetry, whence ſome have attributed the invention of it to him, and, indeed, he was the poet who made elegy an amorous poem, inſtead of a mournful and melancholy tale. In the expreſſion of love, Propertius prefers him to Homer, as this verſe ſhews:

Plus in amore valet Mimnermi verſus Homero.

In his old age Mimnermus became enamoured of a young girl called Nanno. Some few fragments of his poetry remain, collected by Stobæus. He is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the inventor of the pentameter verſe, which others however attribute to Callinus, or Archilochus. The ſirname of Liguſtiades, λιγυς, (ſhrill voiced), has been applied to him, though ſome imagine the word to be the name of his father. Strab. 1 & 14.—Pauſ. 9, c. 29.—Diog. 1.

Minēides, the daughters of Minyas or Mineus, king of Orchomenos, in Bœotia. They were three in number, Leuconoe, Leucippe, and Alcithoe. Ovid calls the two firſt Clymene and Iris. They derided the the orgies of Bacchus, for which impiety the god inſpired them with an unconquerable deſire of eating human fleſh. They drew lots which of them ſhould give up her ſon as food to the reſt. The lot fell upon Leucippe, and ſhe gave up her ſon Hippaſus, who was inſtantly devoured by the three ſiſters. They were changed into bats. In commemoration of this bloody crime, it was uſual among the Orchomenians for the high prieſt, as ſoon as the ſacrifice was finiſhed, to purſue, with a drawn ſword, all the women who had entered the temple, and even to kill the firſt he came up to. Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 12.—Plut. Queſt. Gr.

MINERVA, the goddeſs of wiſdom, war, and all the liberal arts, was produced from Jupiter's brain without a mother. The god, as it is reported, married Metis, whoſe ſuperior prudence and ſagacity above the reſt of the gods, made him apprehend that the children of ſuch an union would be of a more exalted nature, and more intelligent than their father. To prevent this, Jupiter devoured Metis in her pregnancy, and, ſome time after, to relieve the pains which he ſuffered in his head, he ordered Vulcan to cleave it open. Minerva came all armed and grown up from her father's brain, and immediately was admitted into the aſſembly of the gods, and made one of the moſt faithful counſellors of her father. The power of Minerva was great in heaven; ſhe could hurl the thunders of Jupiter, prolong the life of men, beſtow the gift of prophecy, and, indeed, ſhe was the only one of all the divinities whoſe authority and conſequence were equal to thoſe of Jupiter. The actions of Minerva are numerous, as well as the kindneſſes by which ſhe endeared herſelf to mankind. Her quarrel with Neptune concerning the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, deſerves attention. The aſſembly of the gods ſettled the diſpute by promiſing the preference to whichever of the two gave the moſt uſeful and neceſſary preſent to the inhabitants of the earth. Neptune, upon this, ſtruck the ground with his trident, and immediately a horſe iſſued from the earth. Minerva produced the olive, and obtained the victory by the unanimous voice of the gods, who obſerved, that the olive, as the emblem of peace, is far preferable to the horſe, the ſymbol of war and bloodſhed. The victorious deity called the capital Athenæ, and became the tutelar goddeſs of the place. Minerva was always very jealous of her power, and the manner in which ſhe puniſhed the preſumption of Arachne is well known. [Vid. Arachne.] The attempts of Vulcan to offer her violence, are ſtrong marks of her virtue. Jupiter had ſworn by the Styx to give to Vulcan, who made him a complete ſuit of armour, whatever he deſired. Vulcan demanded Minerva, and the father of the gods, who had permitted Minerva to live in perpetual celibacy, conſented, but privately adviſed his daughter to make all the reſiſtance ſhe could to fruſtrate the attempts of her lover. The prayers and the force of Vulcan proved ineffectual, and her chaſtity was not violated, though the god left on her body the marks of his paſſion, and, from the impurity which proceeded from this ſcuffle, and which Minerva threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool, was born Erichthon, an uncommon monſter. [Vid. Erichthonius.] Minerva was the firſt who built a ſhip, and it was her zeal for navigation and her care for the Argonauts, which placed the prophetic tree of Dodona behind the ſhip Argo, when going to Colchis. She was known among the ancients by many names. She was called Athena, Pallas, [Vid. Pallas.] Parthenos, from her remaining in perpetual celibacy; Tritonia, becauſe worſhipped near the lake Tritonis; Glaucopis, from the blueneſs of her eyes; Agorea, from her preſiding over markets; Hippia, becauſe ſhe firſt taught mankind how to manage the horſe; Stratea and Area, from her martial character; Coryphagenes, becauſe born from Jupiter's brain; Sais, becauſe worſhipped at Sais, &c. Some attributed to her the invention of the flute, whence ſhe was ſirnamed Andon, Luſcinia, Muſica, Salpiga, &c. She, as it is reported, once amuſed herſelf in playing upon her favorite flute before Juno and Venus, but the goddeſſes ridiculed the diſtortion of her face in blowing the inſtrument. Minerva, convinced of the juſtneſs of their remarks by looking at herſelf in a fountain near mount Ida, threw away the muſical inſtrument, and denounced a melancholy death to him who found it. Marſyas was the miſerable proof of the veracity of her expreſſions. The worſhip of Minerva was univerſally eſtabliſhed; ſhe had magnificent temples in Egypt, Phœnicia, all parts of Greece, Italy, Gaul, and Sicily. Sais, Rhodes, and Athens, particularly claimed her attention, and it is even ſaid, that Jupiter rained a ſhower of gold upon the iſland of Rhodes, which had paid ſo much veneration and ſuch an early reverence to the divinity of his daughter. The feſtivals celebrated in her honor were ſolemn and magnificent. [Vid. Panathenæa.] She was invoked by every artiſt, and particularly ſuch as worked in wool, embroidery, painting, and ſculpture. It was the duty of almoſt every member of ſociety to implore the aſſiſtance and and patronage of a deity who preſided over ſenſe, taſte, and reaſon. Hence the poets have had occaſion to ſay,

Tu nihil invitâ dices, faciesve Minervâ,

Qui bene placârit Pallada, doctus erit.

Minerva was repreſented in different ways, according to the different characters in which ſhe appeared. She generally appeared with a countenance full more of maſculine firmneſs and compoſure, than of ſoftneſs and grace. Moſt uſually ſhe was repreſented with a helmet on her head, with a large plume nodding in the air. In one hand ſhe held a ſpear, and in the other a ſhield, with the dying head of Meduſa upon it. Sometimes this Gorgon's head was on her breaſtplate, with living ſerpents writhing round it, as well as round her ſhield and helmet. In moſt of her ſtatues ſhe is repreſented as ſitting, and ſometimes ſhe holds, in one hand, a diſtaff, inſtead of a ſpear. When ſhe appeared as the goddeſs of the liberal arts, ſhe was arrayed in a variegated veil, which the ancients called peplum. Sometimes Minerva's helmet was covered at the top with the figure of a cock, a bird which, on account of his great courage, is properly conſecrated to the goddeſs of war. Some of her ſtatues repreſented her helmet with a ſphinx in the middle, ſupported on either ſide by griffins. In ſome medals, a chariot drawn by four horſes, or ſometimes a dragon or a ſerpent, with winding ſpires, appear at the top of her helmet. She was partial to the olive-tree; the owl and the cock were her favorite birds, and the dragon among reptiles was ſacred to her. The functions, offices, and actions, of Minerva, ſeem ſo numerous that they undoubtedly originate in more than one perſon. Cicero ſpeaks of five perſons of this name; a Minerva, mother of Apollo; a daughter of the Nile, who was worſhipped at Sais, in Egypt; a third, born from Jupiter's brain; a fourth, daughter of Jupiter and Coryphe; and a fifth, daughter of Pallas, generally repreſented with winged ſhoes. This laſt put her father to death becauſe he attempted her virtue. Pauſ. 1, 2, 3, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 16. l. 3, od. 4.—Virg. Æn. 2, &c.—Strab. 6, 9 & 13.—Philoſt. Icon. 2.—*Ovid. Minos, a king of Crete, ſon of Jupiter and Europa, who gave laws to his ſubjects, B. C. 1406, which ſtill remained in full force in the age of the philoſopher Plato. His juſtice and moderation procured him the appellation of the favorite of the gods, the confident of Jupiter, the wiſe legiſlator, in every city of Greece; and, according to the poets, he was rewarded for his equity, after death, with the office of ſupreme and abſolute judge in the infernal regions. In this capacity he is repreſented ſitting in the middle of the ſhades, and holding a ſceptre in his hand. The dead plead their different cauſes before him, and the impartial judge ſhakes the fatal urn, which is filled with the deſtinies of mankind. He married Ithona, by whom he had Lycaſtes, who was the father of Minos 2d. Homer. Od. 19.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 432.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 28.——The 2d. was a ſon of Lycaſtes, the ſon of Minos I. and king of Crete. He married Paſiphae, the daughter of Sol and Perſeis, and by her he had many children. He increaſed his paternal dominions by the conqueſt of the neighbouring iſlands, but he ſhowed himſelf cruel in the war which he carried on againſt the Athenians, who had put to death his ſon Androgeus. [Vid. Androgeus.] He took Megara by the the treachery of Scylla. [Vid. Scylla.] and, not ſatisfied with a victory, he obliged the vanquiſhed to bring him yearly to Crete ſeven choſen boys, and the ſame number of virgins, to be devoured by the minotaur. [Vid. Minotaurus.] This bloody tribute was at laſt aboliſhed when Theſeus had deſtroyed the monſter. [Vid. Theſeus.] When Dædalus, whoſe induſtry and invention had fabricated the labyrinth, and whoſe imprudence, in aſſiſting Paſiphae in the gratification of her unnatural deſires, had offended Minos, fled from the place of his confinement with wings, [Vid. Dædalus.] and arrived ſafe in Sicily, the incenſed monarch purſued the offender, reſolved to puniſh his infidelity. Cocalus, king of Sicily, who had hoſpitably received Dædalus, entertained his royal gueſt with diſſembled friendſhip; and, that he might not deliver to him a man whoſe ingenuity and abilities he ſo well knew, he put Minos to death. Some ſay that it was the daughters of Cocalus who put the king of Crete to death, by detaining him ſo long in a bath till he fainted, after which they ſuffocated him. Minos died about 35 years before the Trojan war. He was father of Androgeus, Glaucus, and Deucalion, and two daughters, Phædra and Ariadne. Many authors have confounded the two monarchs of this name, the grandfather and the grandſon, but Homer, Plutarch, and Diodorus prove plainly that they were two different perſons. Pauſ. in Ach. 4.—Plut. in Theſ.—Hygin. fab. 41.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 141.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Plut. in Min.—Athen.—Flacc. 14.

Minōtaurus, a celebrated monſter, half a man and half a bull, according to this verſe of Ovid, Semibovemque virum, ſemivirumque bovem.

It was the fruit of Paſiphae's amour with a bull. Minos refuſed to ſacrifice a white bull to Neptune, an animal which he had received from the god for that purpoſe. This offended Neptune, and he made Paſiphae, the wife of Minos, enamoured of this fine bull, which had been refuſed to his altars. Dædalus proſtituted his talents in being ſubſervient to the queen's unnatural deſires, and, by his means, Paſiphae's horrible paſſions were gratified, and the Minotaur came into the world. Minos confined in the labyrinth a monſter which convinced the world of his wife's laſciviouſneſs and indecency, and reflected diſgrace upon his family. The Minotaur uſually devoured the choſen young men and maidens, which the tyranny of Minos yearly exacted from the Athenians. Theſeus delivered his country from this ſhameful tribute, when it had fallen to his lot to be ſacrificed to the voracity of the Minotaur, and, by means of Ariadne, the king's daughter, he deſtroyed the monſter, and made his eſcape from the windings of the labyrinth. The fabulous tradition of the Minotaur, and of the infamous commerce of Paſiphae with a favorite bull, has been often explained. Some ſuppoſe that Paſiphae was enamoured of one of her huſband's courtiers, called Taurus, and that Dædalus favored the paſſions of the queen by ſuffering his houſe to become the retreat of the two lovers. Paſiphae, ſome time after, brought twins into the world, one of whom greatly reſembled Minos, and the other Taurus. In the natural reſemblance of their countenances with that of their ſuppoſed fathers originated their name, and conſequently the fable of the Minotaur. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 2.—Hygin. fab. 40.—Plut. in Theſ.—Palæphat.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 26.

Minthe, a daughter of Cocytus, loved by Pluto. Proſerpine diſcovered her huſband's amour, and changed his miſtreſs into an herb, called by the ſame name, mint. Ovid. Met 10, v. 729.

Minturnæ, a town of Campania, between Sinueſſa and Formiæ. It was in the marſhes, in its neighbourhood, that Marius concealed himſelf in the mud, to avoid the partizans of Sylla. The people condemned him to death, but, when his voice alone had terrified the executioner, they ſhowed themſelves compaſſionate, and favored his eſcape. Marica was worſhipped there, hence maricæ regna applied to the place. Strab. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Liv. 8, &c.—Patere. 2, c. 14.—Lucan. 2, v. 424.

D. He has written an elegant dialogue in defence of the Chriſtian religion, called Octavius, from the principal ſpeaker in it. This book was long attributed to Arnobius, and even printed as an 8th book [Octavus] till Balduinus diſcovered the impoſition in his edition of Felix, 1560. The two laſt editions are that of Davies, 8vo. Cantab. 1712; and of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1709.

Minyæ, a name given to the inhabitants of Orchomenos, in Bœotia, from Minyas, king of the country. Orchomenos, the ſon of Minyas, gave his name to the capital of the country, and the inhabitants ſtill retained their original appellation in contradiſtinction to the Orchomenians of Arcadia. A colony of Orchomenians paſſed into Theſſaly and ſettled in Iolchos; from which circumſtance the people of the place, and particularly the Argonauts, were called Minyæ. This name they received, according to the opinion of ſome, not becauſe a number of Orchomenians had ſettled among them, but becauſe the chief and nobleſt of them were deſcended from the daughters of Minyas. Part of the Orchomenians accompanied the ſons of Codrus when they migrated to Ionia. The deſcendants of the Argonauts, as well as the Argonauts themſelves, received the name of Minyæ. They firſt inhabited Lemnos, where they had been born from the Lemnian women who had murdered their huſbands. They were driven from Lemnos by the Pelaſgi about 1160 years before the Chriſtian era, and came to ſettle in Laconia, from whence they paſſed into Calliſte with a colony of Lacedæmonians. Hygin. fab. 14.—Pauſ. 9. c. 6.—Apollon. 1, arg.—Herodot. 4, c. 145.

Minyas, a king of Bœotia, ſon of Neptune and Tritogenia, the daughter of Æolus. Some make him the ſon of Neptune and Calliſthoe, or of Chryſes, Neptune's ſon, and Chryſogenia, the daughter of Halmus. He married Clytodora, by whom he had Preſbon, Periclymenus, and Eteoclymenus. He was father of Orchomenos, Diochithondes, and Athamas, by a ſecond marriage with Phanaſora, the daughter of Paon. According to Plutarch and Ovid, he had three daughters, called Leuconoe, Alcithoe, and Leucippe. They were changed into bats. [Vid. Mineides.] Pauſ. 9, c. 36.—Plut. Quæſt. Græc.—*Ovid. Misenum or Misenus. Vid. Miſenus.

Misenus, a ſon of Æolus, who was piper to Hector. After Hector's death he followed Æneas to Italy, and was drowned on the coaſt of Campania, becauſe he had challenged one of the Tritons. Æneas afterwards found his body on the ſea-ſhore, and buried it on a promontory which bears his name, now Miſeno. There was alſo a town of the ſame name on the promontory, at the weſt of the bay of Naples, and it had alſo a capacious harbour, where Auguſtus and ſome of the Roman emperors generally kept ſtationed one of their fleets. *Virg. Misitheus, a Roman, celebrated for his virtues and his misfortunes. He was father-in-law to the emperor Gordian, whoſe counſels and actions he guided by his prudence and moderation. He was ſacrificed to the ambition of Philip, a wicked ſenator, who ſucceeded him as prefect of the prætorian guards. He died A. D. 243, and left all his poſſeſſions to be appropriated for the good of the public.

Mithras, a god of Perſia, ſuppoſed to be the ſun. His worſhip was introduced at Rome, and the Romans raiſed him altars, on which was this inſcription, Deo Soli Mithræ, or Soli Deo invicto Mithræ. He is generally repreſented as a young man, whoſe head is covered with a turban, after the manner of the Perſians. He ſupports his knee upon a bull that lies on the ground, and one of whoſe horns he holds in one hand, while with the other he plunges a dagger dagger into his neck. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 720 —Curt. 4, c. 13.—Claudian. de laud. Stil. 1.

MITHRĒNES, a Perſian who betrayed Sardes, &c. Curt. 3.

MITHRIDĀTES Ist, was the third king of Pontus. He was tributary to the crown of Perſia, and his attempts to make himſelf independent proved fruitleſs He was conquered in a battle, and obtained peace with difficulty. Xenophon calls him merely a governor of Cappadocia. He was ſucceeded by Ariobarzanes, B. C. 363. Diod.—Xenoph. ——The ſecond of that name, king of Pontus, was grandſon to Mithridates I. He made himſelf maſter of Pontus, which had been conquered by Alexander, and had been ceded to Antigonus at the general diviſion of the Macedonian empire among the conqueror's generals. He reigned about 26 years, and died at the advanced age of 84 years, B. C. 302. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Mithridates III. Some ſay that Antigonus put him to death, becauſe he favored the cauſe of Caſſander. Appian. Mith.—Diod.——The III. was ſon of the preceding monarch. He enlarged his paternal poſſeſſions by the conqueſt of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, and died after a reign of 36 years. Diod.——The IV. ſucceeded his father Ariobarzanes, who was the ſon of Mithridates III.——The V. ſucceeded his father Mithridates IV. and ſtrengthened himſelf on his throne by an alliance with Antiochus the Great, whoſe daughter Laodice he married. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Pharnaces.—— The VI. ſucceeded his father Pharnaces. He was the firſt of the kings of Pontus who made alliance with the Romans. He furniſhed them with a fleet in the third Punic war, and aſſiſted them againſt Ariſtonicus, who had laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. This fidelity was rewarded; he was called Evergetes, and received from the Roman people the province of Phrygia Major, and was called the friend and ally of Rome. He was murdered, B. C. 123. Appian. Mithr. —Juſtin. 37, &c.——The VII. ſirnamed Eupator, and The Great, ſucceeded his father Mithridates VI. though only at the age of 11 years. The beginning of his reign was marked by ambition, cruelty, and artifice. He murdered his own mother, who had been left by his father coheireſs of the kingdom, and he fortified his conſtitution by drinking antidotes againſt the poiſon with which his enemies at court attempted to deſtroy him. He early inured his body to hardſhip, and employed himſelf in many manly exerciſes, often remaining whole months in the country, and making the frozen ſnow and the earth the place of his repoſe. Naturally ambitious and cruel, he ſpared no pains to acquire himſelf power and dominion. He murdered the two ſons whom his ſiſter Laodice had had by Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and placed one of his own children, only eight years old, on the vacant throne. Theſe violent proceedings alarmed Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who had married Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes. He ſuborned a youth to be king of Cappadocia, as the third ſon of Ariarathes, and Laodice was ſent to Rome to impoſe upon the ſenate, and aſſure them that her third ſon was now alive, and that his pretenſions to the kingdom of Cappadocia were juſt and well grounded. Mithridates uſed the ſame arms of diſſimulation. He alſo ſent to Rome Gordius, the governor of his ſon, who ſolemnly declared before the Roman people, that the youth who ſat on the throne of Cappadocia was the third ſon and lawful heir of Ariarathes, and that he was ſupported as ſuch by Mithridates. This intricate affair diſpleaſed the Roman ſenate, and, finally to ſettle the diſpute between the two monarchs, the powerful arbiters took away the kingdom of Cappadocia from Mithridates, and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes. Theſe two kingdoms being thus ſeparated from their original poſſeſſors, were preſented with their freedom and independence; but the Cappadocians refuſed it, and received Ariobarzanes for king. Such were the firſt ſeeds of enmity between Rome and the king of Pontus. [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] Mithridates never loſt an opportunity by which he might leſſen the influence of his adverſaries; and, the more effectually to deſtroy their power in Aſia, he ordered all the Romans that were in his dominions to be maſſacred. This was done in one night, and no leſs than 150,000, according to Plutarch, or 80,000 Romans, as Appian mentions, were made, at one blow, the victims of his cruelty. This univerſal maſſacre called aloud for revenge. Aquilius, and ſoon after Sylla, marched againſt Mithridates with a large army. The former was made priſoner, but Sylla obtained a victory over the king's generals, and another deciſive engagement rendered him maſter of all Greece, Macedonia, Ionia, and Aſia Minor, which had ſubmitted to the victorious arms of the monarch of Pontus. This ill fortune was aggravated by the loſs of about 200,000 men, who were killed in the ſeveral engagements that had been fought; and Mithridates, weakened by repeated ill ſucceſs by ſea and land, ſued for peace from the conqueror, queror, which he obtained on condition of defraying the expences which the Romans had incurred by the war, and of remaining ſatisfied with the poſſeſſions which he had received from his anceſtors. While theſe negociations of peace were carried on, Mithridates was not unmindful of his real intereſt. His poverty, and not his inclinations, obliged him to wiſh for peace. He immediately took the field with an army of 140,000 infantry, and 16,000 horſe, which conſiſted of his own forces and thoſe of his ſon-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. With ſuch a numerous army, he ſoon made himſelf maſter of the Roman provinces in Aſia; none dared to oppoſe his conqueſts, and the Romans, relying on his fidelity, had withdrawn the greateſt part of their armies from the country. The news of his warlike preparations was no ſooner heard, than Lucullus, the conſul, marched into Aſia, and, without delay, he blocked up the camp of Mithridates, who was then beſieging Cyzicus. The Aſiatic monarch eſcaped from him, and fled into the heart of his kingdom. Lucullus purſued him with the utmoſt celerity, and would have taken him priſoner after a battle, had not the avidity of his ſoldiers preferred the plundering of a mule loaded with gold, to the taking of a monarch who had exerciſed ſuch cruelties againſt their countrymen, and ſhown himſelf ſo faithleſs to the moſt ſolemn engagements. After this eſcape, Mithridates was more careful about the ſafety of his perſon, and he even ordered his wives and ſiſters to deſtroy themſelves, fearful of their falling into the enemy's hands. The appointment of Glabrio to the command of the Roman forces, inſtead of Lucullus, was favorable to Mithridates, and he recovered the greateſt part of his dominions. The ſudden arrival of Pompey, however, ſoon put an end to his victories. A battle, in the night, was fought near the Euphrates, in which the troops of Pontus labored under every diſadvantage. The engagement was by moon-light, and, as the moon then ſhone in the face of the enemy, the lengthened ſhadows of the arms of the Romans having induced Mithridates to believe that the two armies were cloſe together, the arrows of his ſoldiers were darted from a great diſtance, and their efforts rendered ineffectual. An univerſal overthrow enſued, and Mithridates, bold in his misfortunes, ruſhed through the thick ranks of the enemy, at the head of 800 horſemen, 500 of which periſhed in the attempt to follow him. He fled to Tigranes, but that monarch refuſed an aſylum to his father-in-law, whom he had before ſupported with all the collected forces of his kingdom. Mithridates found a ſafe retreat among the Scythians, and, though deſtitute of power, friends, and reſources, yet he meditated the deſtruction of the Roman empire, by penetrating into the heart of Italy by land. Theſe wild projects were rejected by his followers, and he ſued for peace. It was denied to his ambaſſadors, and the victorious Pompey declared, that, to obtain it, Mithridates muſt aſk it in perſon. He ſcorned to truſt himſelf into the hands of his enemy, and reſolved to conquer or to die. His ſubjects refuſed to follow him any longer, and they revolted from him, and made his ſon Pharnaces king. The ſon ſhowed himſelf ungrateful to his father, and even, according to ſome writers, he ordered him to be put to death. This unnatural treatment broke the heart of Mithridates; he obliged his wife to poiſon herſelf, and attempted to do the ſame himſelf. It was in vain; the frequent antidotes he had taken in the early part of his life, ſtrengthened his conſtitution againſt the poiſon, and, when this was unavailing, he attempted to ſtab himſelf. The blow was not mortal; and a Gaul, who was then preſent, at his own requeſt, gave him the fatal ſtroke, about 63 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 72d year of his age. Such were the misfortunes, abilities, and miſerable end of a man, who ſupported himſelf ſo long againſt the power of Rome, and who, according to the declaration of the Roman authors, proved a more powerful and indefatigable adverſary to the capital of Italy, than the great Annibal, and Pyrrhus, Perſeus, or Antiochus. Mithridates has been commended for his eminent virtues, and cenſured for his vices. As a commander he deſerves the moſt unbounded applauſe, and it may create admiration to ſee him waging war with ſuch ſucceſs during ſo many years, againſt the moſt powerful people on earth, led to the field by a Sylla, a Lucullus, and a Pompey. He was the greateſt monarch that ever ſat on a throne, according to the opinion of Cicero; and, indeed, no better proof of his military character can be brought, than the mention of the great rejoicings which happened in the Roman armies and in the capital at the news of his death. No leſs than twelve days were appointed for public thankſgivings to the immortal gods, and Pompey, who had ſent the firſt intelligence of his death to Rome, and who had partly haſtened his fall, was rewarded with the moſt uncommon honors. [Vid. Ampia lex.] It is ſaid, that Mithridates conquered 24 nations, whoſe different languages he knew, and ſpoke with the ſame eaſe and fluency as his own. As a man of letters he alſo deſerves attention. He was acquainted with the Greek language, and even wrote in that dialect a treatiſe on botany. His ſkill in phyſic is well known, and even now there is a celebrated antidote which bears his name, and is called Mithridate. Superſtition, as well as nature, had united to render him great; and, if we rely upon the authority of Juſtin, his birth was accompanied by the appearance of two large comets, which were ſeen for ſeventy days ſucceſſively, and whoſe ſplendor eclipſed the mid-day ſun, and covered the fourth part of the heavens. Juſtin. 37, c. 1, &c. —Strab.—Diod. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 5, &c.—*Plut. in Syll. MITHRIDĀTĬCUM BELLUM, begun 89 years B.C. was one of the longeſt and moſt celebrated wars ever carried on by the Romans againſt a foreign power. The ambition of Mithridates, from whom it receives its name, may be called the cauſe and origin of it. His views upon the kingdom of Cappadocia, of which he was ſtripped by the Romans, firſt engaged him to take up arms againſt the republic. Three Roman officers, L. Caſſius, the pro-conſul, M. Aquilius, and Q. Oppius, oppoſed Mithridates with the troops of Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallo-græcia. The army of theſe provinces, together with the Roman ſoldiers in Aſia, amounted to 70,000 men, and 6000 horſe. The forces of the king of Pontus were greatly ſuperior to theſe; he led 250,000 foot, 40,000 horſe, and 130 armed chariots, into the field of battle, under the command of Neoptolemus and Archelaus. His fleet conſiſted of 400 ſhips of war, well manned and proviſioned. In an engagement, the king of Pontus obtained the victory, and diſperſed the Roman forces in Aſia. He became maſter of the greateſt part of Aſia, and the Helleſpont ſubmitted to his power. Two of the Roman generals were taken, and M. Aquilius, who was the principal cauſe of the war, was carried about in Aſia, and expoſed to the ridicule and inſults of the populace, and at laſt put to death by Mithridates, who ordered melted gold to be poured down his throat, as a ſtur upon the avidity of the Romans. The conqueror took every poſſible advantage; he ſubdued all the iſlands of the Ægean Sea, and, though Rhodes refuſed to ſubmit to his power, yet all Greece was ſoon over-run by his general Archelaus, and made tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. Mean while the Romans, incenſed againſt Mithridates on account of his perfidy, and of his cruelty in maſſacring 80,000 of their countrymen in one day all over Aſia, appointed Sylla to march into the eaſt. Sylla landed in Greece, where the inhabitants readily acknowledged his power; but Athens ſhut her gates againſt the Roman commander, and Archelaus, who defended it, defeated, with the greateſt courage, all the efforts and operations of the enemy. This ſpirited defence was of ſhort duration. Archelaus retreated into Bœotia, where Sylla ſoon followed him. The two hoſtile armies drew up in a line of battle near Chæronea, and the Romans obtained the victory, and, of the almoſt innumerable forces of the Aſiatics, no more than 10,000 eſcaped. Another battle in Theſſaly, near Orchomenos, proved equally fatal to the king of Pontus. Dorylaus, one of his generals, was defeated, and he ſoon after ſued for peace. Sylla liſtened to the terms of accommodation, as his preſence at Rome was now become neceſſary to quell the commotions and cabals which his enemies had raiſed againſt him. He pledged himſelf to the king of Pontus to confirm him in the poſſeſſion of his dominions, and to procure him the title of friend and ally of Rome; and Mithridates conſented to relinquiſh Aſia and Paphlagonia, to deliver Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and Bithynia to Nicomedes, and to pay to the Romans 2000 talents to defray the expences of the war, and to deliver into their hands 70 gallies with all their rigging. Though Mithridates ſeemed to have re-eſtabliſhed peace in his dominions, yet Fimbria, whoſe ſentiments were contrary to thoſe of Sylla, and who made himſelf maſter of an army by intrigue and oppreſſion, kept him under continual alarms, and rendered the exiſtence of his power precarious. Sylla, who had returned from Greece to ratify the treaty which had been made with Mithridates, rid the world of the tyrannical Fimbria; and the king of Pontus, awed by the reſolution and determined firmneſs of his adverſary, agreed to the conditions, though with reluctance. The hoſtile preparations of Mithridates, which continued in the time of peace, became ſuſpected by the Romans, and Muræna, who was left as governor of Aſia in Sylla's abſence, and who wiſhed to make himſelf known by ſome conſpicuous action, began hoſtilities by taking Comana and plundering the temple of Bellona. Mithridates did not oppoſe him, but he complained of the breach of peace before the Roman ſenate. Muræna was publicly reprimanded; but, as he did not ceaſe from hoſtilities, it was eaſily underſtood that he acted by the private directions of the Roman people. The king upon this marched againſt him, and a battle was fought, in which both the adverſaries claimed the victory. This was the laſt blow which the king of Pontus received in this war, which is called the ſecond Mithridatic war, and which continued for about three years. Sylla, at that time, was made perpetual dictator at Rome, and he commanded Muræna to retire from the kingdom of Mithridates. The death of Sylla changed the face of affairs; the treaty of peace between the king of Pontus and the Romans, which had never been committed to writing, demanded frequent explanations, and Mithridates at laſt threw off the maſk of friendſhip, and declared war. Nicomedes, at his death, left his kingdom to the Romans, but Mithridates diſputed their right to the poſſeſſions of the deceaſed monarch, and entered the field with 120,000 men, beſides a fleet of 400 ſhips in his ports, 16,000 horſemen to follow him, and 100 chariots armed with ſcythes. Lucullus was appointed over Aſia, and entruſted with the care of the Mithridatic war. His valor and prudence ſhowed his merit; and Mithridates, in his vain attempts to take Cyzicum, loſt no leſs than 300,000 men. Succeſs continually attended the Roman arms. The king of Pontus was defeated in ſeveral bloody engagements, and with difficulty ſaved his life, and retired to his ſon-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus purſued him, and, when his applications for the perſon of the fugitive monarch had been deſpiſed by Tigranes, he marched to the capital of Armenia, and terrified, by his ſudden approach, the numerous forces of the enemy. A battle enſued. The Romans obtained an eaſy victory, and no leſs than 100,000 foot of the Armenians periſhed, and only five men of the Romans were killed. Tigranocerta, the rich capital of the country, fell into the conqueror's hands. After ſuch ſignal victories, Lucullus had the mortification to ſee his own troops mutiny, and to be diſpoſſeſſed of the command by the arrival of Pompey. The new general ſhewed himſelf worthy to ſucceed Lucullus. He defeated Mithridates, and rendered his affairs ſo deſperate, that the monarch fled for ſafety into the country of the Scythians, where, for a while, he meditated the ruin of the Roman empire, and, with more wildneſs than prudence, ſecretly reſolved to invade Italy by land, and march an army acroſs the northern wilds of Aſia and Europe to the Apennines. Not only the kingdom of Mithridates had fallen into the enemy's hands, but alſo all the neighbouring kings and princes were ſubdued, and Pompey ſaw proſtrate at his feet Tigranes himſelf, that king of kings, who had lately treated the Romans with ſuch contempt. Mean time, the wild projects of Mithridates terrified his ſubjects; and they, fearful to accompany him in a march of above 2000 miles acroſs a barren and uncultivated country, revolted and made his ſon king. The monarch, forſaken in his old age, even by his own children, put an end to his life, [Vid. Mithridates VII.] and gave the Romans cauſe to rejoice, as the third Mithridatic war was ended in his fall, B. C. 63. Such were the unſucceſsful ſtruggles of Mithridates againſt the power of Rome. He was always full of reſources, and the Romans had never a greater or more dangerous war to ſuſtain. The duration of the Mithridatic war is not preciſely known. According to Juſtin, Oroſius, Florus, and Eutropius, it laſted for forty years; but the opinion of others, who fix its duration to 30 years, is far more credible; and, indeed, by proper calculation, there elapſed no more than 26 years from the time that Mithridates firſt entered the field againſt the Romans till the time of his death. Appian. in Mithrid.—Juſtin. 37, &c.—Flor. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. in Luc. &c.—Oroſius.—Paterc.—Dion.

Pittacus, Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, Theophanes, Hellenicus, &c. were all natives of Mitylene. It was long a ſeat of learning, and, with Rhodes and Athens, it had the honor of having educated many of the great men of Rome and Greece. In the Peloponneſian war the Mityleneans ſuffered greatly for their revolt from the power of Athens; and, in the Mithridatic wars, they had the boldneſs to reſiſt the Romans, and diſdain the treaties which had been made between Mithridates and Sylla. Cic. de Leg. ag.—Strab. 13.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 3 & 12.—Paterc. 1, c. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 7, &c.—Thucyd. 3, &c.—Plut. in Pomp. &c.

Momus, the god of pleaſantry among the ancients, ſon of Nox, according to Heſiod. He was continually employed in ſatirizing the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned to ridicule. He blamed Vulcan, becauſe in the human form which he had made of clay, he had not placed a window in his breaſt, by which whatever was done or thought there, might be eaſily brought to light. He cenſured the houſe which Minerva had made, becauſe the goddeſs had not made it moveable, by which means a bad neighbourhood might be avoided. In the bull which Neptune had produced, he obſerved that his blows might have been ſurer if his eyes had been placed nearer the horns. Venus herſelf was expoſed to his ſatire; and when the ſneering god had found no fault in the body of the naked goddeſs, he obſerved as ſhe retired, that the noiſe of her feet was too loud and greatly improper in the goddeſs of beauty. Theſe illiberal reflections upon the gods were the cauſe that Momus was driven from heaven. He is generally repreſented raiſing a maſk from his face, and holding a ſmall figure in his hand. Heſiod. in Theog.—Lucian. in Herm.

Monēta, a ſirname of Juno among the Romans. She received it becauſe ſhe adviſed them to ſacrifice a pregnant ſow to Cybele, to avert an earthquake. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 15.—Livy ſays, (7, c. 28.) that a temple was vowed to Juno, under this name, by the dictator Furius, when the Romans waged war againſt the Aurunci, and that the temple was raiſed to the goddeſs by the ſenate, on the ſpot where the houſe of Manlius Capitolinus had formerly ſtood.—Suidas however, ſays, that Juno was ſirnamed Moneta, from aſſuring the Romans, when in the war againſt Pyrrhus they complained of want of pecuniary reſources, that money could never fail to thoſe who cultivated juſtice.

Monĭma, a beautiful woman of Miletus, whom Mithridates the Great married. When his affairs grew deſperate, Mithridates ordered his wives to deſtroy themſelves; Monima attempted to ſtrangle herſelf, but when her efforts were unavailing, ſhe ordered one of her attendants to ſtab her. Plut. in Luc.

Monĭmus a philoſopher of Syracuſe.

Monŏdus, a ſon of Pruſias. He had one continued bone inſtead of a row of teeth, whence his name (μονος οδους). Plin. 7, c. 16.

Monœcus, a town and port of Liguria, where Hercules had a temple, whence he is called Monœcius. Strab. 4.

Monoleus, a lake of Æthiopia.

Monophĭlus, an eunuch of Mithridates. The king entruſted him with the care of one of his daughters; and the eunuch, when he ſaw the affairs of his maſter in a deſperate ſituation, ſtabbed her leſt ſhe ſhould fall into the enemy's hands, &c.

Mons sacer, a mountain near Rome, where the Roman populace retired in a tumult, which was the cauſe of the election of the tribunes.

Mons sevērus, a mountain near Rome, &c.

Montānus, a poet who wrote in hexameter and elegiac verſes. Ovid. ex Pont. 4. —An orator under Veſpaſian.——A favorite of Meſſalina.——One of the ſenators whom Domitian conſulted about boiling a turbot. Juv. 4.

Monophăge, ſacrifices in Ægina.

Monŷchus, a powerful giant, who could root up trees and hurl them like a javelin. He receives his name from his having the feet of a horſe, as the word implies. Juv. 1, v. 11.

Monŷma. Vid. Monima.

Monŷmus, a ſervant of Corinth, who, not being permitted by his maſter to follow Diogenes the cynic, pretended madneſs, and obtained his liberty. He became a great admirer of the philoſopher, and alſo of Crates, and even wrote ſomething in the form of facetious ſtories. Diog. Laert.

Mophis, an Indian prince conquered by Alexander.

Mopsium, a hill and town of Theſſaly, between Tempe and Lariſſa. Liv. 42.

Mopsopia, an antient name of Athens, from Mopſus one of its kings, and from thence the epithet of Mopſopius is often applied to an Athenian.

Mopsuhestia, or Mopsos, a town of Cilicia near the ſea. Cic. Fam. 3, c. 8.

Mopsus, a celebrated prophet, ſon of Manto and Apollo, during the Trojan war. He was conſulted by Amphimachus, king of Colophon, who wiſhed to know what ſucceſs would attend his arms in a war which he was going to undertake. He predicted the greateſt calamities; but Calchas, who had been a ſoothſayer of the Greeks during the Trojan war, promiſed the greateſt ſucceſſes. Amphimachus followed the opinion of Calchas, but the prediction of Mopſus was fully verified. This had ſuch an effect upon Calchas that he died ſoon after. His death is attributed by ſome to another mortification of the ſame nature. The two ſoothſayers, jealous of each other's fame, came to a trial of their ſkill in divination. Calchas firſt aſked his antagoniſt how many figs a neighbouring tree bore; ten thouſand except one, replied Mopſus, and one ſingle veſſel can contain them all. The figs were gathered, and his conjectures were true. Mopſus, now, to try his adverſary, aſked him how many young ones a certain pregnant ſow would bring forth. Calchas confeſſed his ignorance, and Mopſus immediately ſaid, that the ſow would bring forth on the morrow ten young ones, of which only one ſhould be a male, all black, and that the females ſhould all be known by their white ſtreaks. The morrow proved the veracity of his prediction, and Calchas died by exceſs of the grief which his defeat produced. Mopſus after death was ranked among the gods; and had an oracle at Malia, celebrated for the true and deciſive anſwers which it gave. Strab. 9. —Pauſ. 7, c. 3.—Ammian. 14, c. 8.—Plut. de orac. defect.——A ſon of Ampyx and Chloris, born at Titareſſa in Theſſaly. He was the prophet and ſoothſayer of the Argonauts, and died at his return from Colchis by the bite of a ſerpent in Libya. Jaſon erected him a monument on the ſea ſhore, where afterwards the Africans built him a temple where he gave oracles. He has often been confounded with the ſon of Manto, as their profeſſions and their names were alike. Hygin. fab. 14, 128, 173.—Strab. 9.——A ſhepherd of that name in Virg. Ecl.

MARGANTIUM (or IA), a town of Sicily, near the mouth of the Symethus. Cic. in Ver. 3, c. 18.

MORĬNI, a people of Belgic Gaul, on the ſhores of the Britiſh ocean. The ſhorteſt paſſage in Britain was from their territories. They were called extremi hominum by the Romans, becauſe ſituate on the extremities of Gaul. Their city, called Morinorum caſtellum, is now Mount Caſſel, in Artois; and Morinorum civitas, is Terouenne, on the Lis. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 726.—Cæſ. 4, Bell. G. 21.

MORIUS, a river of Bœotia. Plut.

MORPHEUS, a miniſter of the god Somnus, who naturally imitated the grimaces, geſtures, words, and manners, of mankind. He is ſometimes called the god of ſleep. He is generally repreſented as a ſleeping child of a great corpulence, and with wings. He holds a vaſe in one hand, and in the other are ſome poppies. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 10.

MORS, one of the infernal deities born of Night, without a father. She was worſhipped by the antients with great ſolemnity, and repreſented not as an actually exiſting power, but as an imaginary being. Euripides introduces her in one of his tragedies on the ſtage. The moderns repreſent her as a ſkeleton armed with a ſcythe and a ſcymetar.

MORTUUM MARE. Vid. Mare Mortuum.

MORYS, a Trojan killed by Meriones during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 13, &c.

MOSA, a river of Belgic Gaul falling into the German ocean, and now called the Maeſe or Meuſe. The bridge over it, Moſæ pons, is now ſuppoſed to be Maeſtricht. Tacit. H. 4, c. 66.

MOSCHA, now Maſcat, a port of Arabia on the Red ſea.

MOSCHI, a people of Aſia, at the weſt of the Caſpian ſea. Sicla. 1, c. 2. l. 3, c. 5.—Lucan. 3, v. 270.

MOSCHION, a name common to four different writers whoſe compoſitions, character, and native place are unknown. Some fragments of their writings remain, ſome few verſes and a treatiſe de morbis mulierum, edited by Gesner, 4to. Baſil. 1566.

MOSCHUS, a Phœnician who wrote the hiſtory of his country in his own mother tongue.—— A philoſopher of Sidon. He is ſuppoſed to be the founder of anatomical philoſophy. Strab.——A Greek Bucolic poet in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The ſweetneſs and elegance of his eclogues, which are ſtill extant, make the world regret the loſs of poetical pieces no ways inferior to the productions of Theocritus. The beſt edition of Moſchus with Bion is that of Heſkin, 8vo. Oxon. 1748.——A Greek rhetorician of Pergamus in the age of Horace, defended by Torquatus in an accuſation of having poiſoned ſome of his friends. Horat. 1, ep. 5, v. 9.

MOSELLA, a river of Belgic Gaul falling into the Rhine, at Coblentz, and now called the Moſelle.—Flor. 3, c. 10.—Tacit. An. 13, c. 53.

MOSES, a celebrated legiſlator and general among the Jews, well known in ſacred hiſtory. He was born in Egypt, 1571 B. C. and after he had performed his miracles before Pharaoh, conducted the Iſraelites through the Red ſea, and given them laws and ordinances, during their peregrination of 40 years in the wilderneſs of Arabia; he died at the age of 120. His writings have been quoted and commended by ſeveral of the heathen authors, who have diveſted themſelves of their prejudices againſt an Hebrew, and extolled his learning and the effects of his wiſdom. Longinus.—Diod. 1.

MOSYNÆCI, a nation on the Euxine ſea, in whoſe territories the 10,000 Greeks ſtaid on their return from Cunaxa. Xenoph.

MOTHŌNE, a town of Magneſia, where Philip loſt one of his eyes. Juſtin. 7, c. 6. The word is oftener ſpelt Methone.

MOTYA, a town of Sicily, beſieged and taken by Dionyſius, tyrant of Syracuſe.

MUCIUS. Vid. Mutius.

MUCRÆ, a village of Samnium. Ital. 8, v. 565.

MULCĬBER, a ſirname of Vulcan, (a mulcendo ferrum,) from his occupation. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 5. Vid. Vulcanus.

MULŬCHA, a river of Africa, dividing Numidia from Mauritania. Plin. 5, c. 2.

MULVIUS PONS, a bridge on the Flaminian way, about one mile diſtant from Rome. Mart. 3, ep. 14.

L. MUMMIUS, a Roman conſul, ſent againſt the Achæans, whom he conquered, B. C. 147. He deſtroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, by order of the ſenate, and obtained the ſirname of Achaicus from his victories. He did not enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of the enemy, but returned home without any encreaſe of fortune. He was ſo unacquainted with the value of the paintings and works of the moſt celebrated artiſts of of Greece, which were found in the plunder of Corinth, that he ſaid to thoſe who conveyed them to Rome, that if they loſt them or injured them, they ſhould make others in their ſtead. Paterc. 1, c. 13.—Strab. 8.—Plin. 34, c. 7. l. 37, c. 1.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Pauſ. 5, c. 24.——Publius, a man commended by C. Publicius for the verſatility of his mind, and the propriety of his manners. Cic. de orat. 2.——A Latin poet. Macrobius. 1. Satur. 10.——M. a prætor. Cic. in Verr.——Spurius, a brother of Achaicus before mentioned, diſtinguiſhed as an orator, and for his fondneſs for the ſtoic philoſophy. Cic. ad Brut. 25. ad att. 13, ep. 6.——A lieutenant of Craſſus defeated, &c. Plut. in Craſſ.——

MUNATIUS, PLANCUS, a conſul ſent to the rebellious army of Germanicus. He was almoſt killed by the incenſed ſoldiery, who ſuſpected that it was through him that they had not all been pardoned and indemnified by a decree of the ſenate. Calpurnius reſcued him from their fury.——An orator and diſciple of Cicero. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather bore the ſame name. He was with Cæſar in Gaul, and was made conſul with Brutus. He promiſed to favor the republican cauſe for ſome time, but he deſerted again to Cæſar. He was long Antony's favorite, but he left him at the battle of Actium to conciliate the favors of Octavius. His ſervices were great in the ſenate; for, through his influence and perſuaſion, that venerable body flattered the conqueror of Antony with the appellation of Auguſtus. He was rewarded with the office of cenſor. Plut. in Ant.——Gratus, a Roman knight who conſpired with Piſo againſt Nero. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 50.—Suet. in Aug. 29.——A friend of Horace. 1. ep. 3, v. 31.

MUNDA, a ſmall town of Hiſpania Bætica, celebrated for a battle which was fought there on the 17th of March B. C. 45. between Cæſar and the republican forces of Rome, under Labienus and the ſons of Pompey. Cæſar obtained the victory after an obſtinate and bloody battle, and by this blow put an end to the Roman republic. Pompey loſt 30,000 men, and Cæſar only 1,000, and 500 wounded. Sil. Ital. 3, v. 400.—Hirt. bell. Hiſp. 27.—Lucan. 1.

MUNĪTUS, a ſon of Laodice the daughter of Priam by Acamas. He was entruſted to the care of Æthra as ſoon as born. Parthen. 16.

MUNŸCHIA (and Æ,) a port of Attica, between the Piræus and the promontory of Sunium, called after king Munychus, who built there a temple to Diana, and in whoſe honor he inſtituted feſtivals called Munychia. The temple was held ſo ſacred that whatever criminals fled there for refuge were pardoned. During the feſtivals they offered ſmall cakes which they called amphiphontes, απο του αμφιφαειν, from ſhining all round, becauſe there were lighted torches hung round when they were carried to the temple, or becauſe they were offered at the full moon, at which time the ſolemnity was obſerved. It was particularly in honor of Diana who is the ſame as the moon, becauſe it was full moon when Themiſtocles conquered the Perſian fleet at Salamis. The port of Munychia was well fortified, and of great conſequence; therefore the Lacedæmonians, when ſovereigns of Greece, always kept a regular garriſon there. Plut.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 709.—Strab. 9.—Pauſ. 1, c. 1.

MURÆNA, a celebrated Roman left at the head of the armies of the republic in Aſia by Sylla. He invaded the dominions of Mithridates with ſucceſs, but ſoon after met with a defeat. He was honored with a triumph at his return to Rome. He commanded one of the wings of Sylla's army at the battle againſt Archelaus near Chæronea. He was ably defended in an oration by Cicero, when his character was attacked and cenſured. Cic. pro Mur.—Appian. de Mithrid.——A man put to death for conſpiring againſt Auguſtus, B. C. 22.

MURCUS, an enemy of the triumvirate of J. Cæſar.——Statius, a man who murdered Piſo in Veſta's temple in Nero's reign. Tacit. H. 1, c. 43.

MURGANTIA, a town of Samnium. Liv. 25, c. 27.

MURRHĒNUS, a friend of Turnus killed by Æneas, &c. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 529.

MURSA, now Eſſek, a town of Hungary, where the Drave falls into the Danube.

MURTIA, or MYRTIA, (a μυρτος), a ſirname of Venus, becauſe ſhe preſided over the myrtle. This goddeſs was the patron of idleneſs and cowardice. Varro de L. L. 4, c. 32.

MUS, a Roman conſul. Vid. Decius.

MUSA ANTONIUS, a freedman and phyſician of Auguſtus. He cured his imperial maſter of a dangerous diſeaſe under which he labored, by recommending to him the uſe of the cold bath. He was greatly rewarded for this celebrated cure. He was honored with a brazen ſtatue by the Roman ſenate, which was placed near that of Æſculapius, and Auguſtus permitted him to wear a golden ring, and to be exempted from all taxes. He was not ſo ſucceſsful in recommending the uſe of the cold bath to Marcellus, as he had been to Auguſtus, and his illuſtrious patient died under his care. The cold bath was for a long time discontinued, till Charmis of Marseilles introduced it again, and convinced the world of its great benefits. Musa was brother to Euphorbus the physician of king Juba. Two small treatises, de herbâ Botanicâ, and de tuendâ Valetudine, are supposed to be the productions of his pen.——A daughter of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. She attempted to recover her father's kingdom from the Romans, but to no purpose, though Cæsar espoused her cause. Patere. 2.—Suet in Cæs.

Musæ, certain goddesses who presided over poetry, music, dancing, and all the liberal arts. They were daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, and were nine in number; Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Calliope, and Urania. Some suppose that there were only three muses, Melete, Mneme, and Aœde; others four, Telxiope, Aœde, Arche, Melete. They were, according to others, daughters of Pierus and Antiope, from which circumstance they are called Pierides. The name of Pierides might probably be derived from mount Pierus where they were born. They have been severally called Castalides, Aganippedes, Lebethrides, Aonides, Heliconiades, &c. from the places where they were worshipped, or over which they presided. Apollo, who was the patron and the conductor of the muses, has received the name of Musagetes, or leader of the muses. The same surname was also given to Hercules. The palm tree, the laurel, and all the fountains of Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus, &c. were sacred to the muses. They were generally represented as young, beautiful, and modest virgins. They were fond of solitude, and commonly appeared in different attire according to the arts and sciences over which they presided. [Vid. Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, &c.] Sometimes they were represented as dancing in a chorus, to intimate the near and indissoluble connexion which exists between the liberal arts and sciences. The muses sometimes appear with wings, because by the assistance of wings they freed themselves from the violence of Pyrenæus. Their contest with the daughters of Pierus is well known. [Vid. Pierides.] The worship of the muses was universally established, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece, Thessaly, and Italy. No sacrifices were ever offered to them, though no poet ever began a poem without a solemn invocation to the goddesses who presided over verse. There were festivals instituted in their honor in several parts of Greece, especially among the Thespians, every fifth year. The Macedonians observed also a festival in honor of Jupiter and the muses. It had been instituted by king Archelaus, and it was celebrated with stage plays, games, and different exhibitions, which continued nine days according to the number of the muses. Plut. Erot.—Pollux.—Æschin. in Tim.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 21.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 310.—Homer. Hymn. Mus.—Juv. 7.—Diod. 1.—Martial. 4, ep. 14.

Musæus, an ancient Greek poet, supposed to have been son or disciple of Linus or Orpheus, and to have lived about 1410 years before the Christian era. Virgil has paid great honor to his memory by placing him in the Elysian fields attended by a great multitude, and taller by the head than his followers. None of the poet's compositions are extant. The elegant poem of the loves of Leander and Hero was written by a Musæus who flourished in the fourth century, according to the more received opinions. Among the good editions of Musæus two may be selected as the best, that of Rover 8vo. L. Bat. 1727; and that of Schroder, 8vo. Leovard, 1743. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 677.—Diog.——A Latin poet whose compositions were very obscene. Martial. 12, ep. 96.——A poet of Thebes who lived during the Trojan war.

Musonius Rufus, a stoic philosopher of Etruria in the reign of Vespasian. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 81.

Muthullus, a river of Numidia. Sallust. Jug. 48.

Mutia, a daughter of Q. Mutius Scævola and sister of Metelius Celer. She was Pompey's third wife. Her incontinent behaviour so disgusted her husband that at his return from the Mithridatic war, he divorced her, though she had borne him three children. She afterwards married M. Scaurus. Augustus greatly esteemed her. Plut. in Pomp.——A wife of Julius Cæsar beloved by Clodius the tribune. Suet. in Cæs. 50.——The mother of Augustus.

Mutia Lex, the same as that which was enacted by Licinius Crassus, and Q. Mutius, A. U. C. 657. Vid. Licinia Lex.

Mutiça, or Mutyce, a town of Sicily west of the cape Pachynus. Cic. in Ver. 3, c. 43.

Mutilia, a woman intimate with Livia Augusta. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 12.

Mutĭna, a Roman colony of Cisalpine Gaul, where M. Antony besieged D. Brutus whom the consuls Pansa and Hirtius delivered. Two battles on the fifteenth of April B. C. 43, were fought, in which Antony was defeated, and at last obliged to retire. Mutina is now called Modena. Lucan. 1, v. 41. l. 7, v. 872.—Sil. 8, v. 592.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 822.—Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 14 Brut. ep. 5.

Mutīnes, one of Annibal's generals who was honored with the freedom of Rome, on delivering up Agrigentum. Liv. 25, c. 41. l. 27, c. 5.

Mutinus. Vid. Mutunus.

Mutius, the father-in-law of C. Marius. ——A Roman who ſaved the life of young Marius, by conveying him away from the purſuits of his enemies in a load of ſtraw. ——A friend of Tiberius Gracchus by whoſe means he was raiſed to the office of a tribune. ——C. Scævola, ſirnamed Cordus, became famous for his courage and intrepidity. When Porſenna, king of Etruria, had beſieged Rome to reinſtate Tarquin in all his rights and privileges, Mutius determined to deliver his country from ſo dangerous an enemy. He diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a Tuſcan, and as he could fluently ſpeak the language, he gained an eaſy introduction into the camp, and ſoon into the royal tent. Porſenna ſat alone with his ſecretary, when Mutius entered. The Roman immediately ruſhed upon the ſecretary, and ſtabbed him to the heart, miſtaking him for his royal maſter. This occaſioned a noiſe; and Mutius, unable to eſcape, was ſeized and brought before the king. He gave no anſwer to the enquiries of the courtiers, and only told them that he was a Roman, and to give them a proof of his fortitude, he laid his right hand on an altar of burning coals and ſternly looking at the king, and without uttering a groan, he boldly told him, that 300 young Romans like himſelf had conſpired againſt his life, and entered his camp in diſguiſe, determined either to deſtroy him, or periſh in the attempt. This extraordinary confeſſion aſtoniſhed Porſenna, he made peace with the Romans and retired from their city. Mutius obtained the ſirname of Scævola, becauſe he had loſt the uſe of his right hand by burning it in the preſence of the Etrurian king. Plut. in Par. —Flor. 1, c. 10.—Liv. 2, c. 12.——Q. Scævola, a Roman conſul. He obtained a victory over the Dalmatians, and ſignalized himſelf greatly in the Marſian war. He is highly commended by Cicero, whom he inſtructed in the ſtudy of civil law. Cic.—Plut.——Another appointed proconſul of Aſia, which he governed with ſo much popularity, that he was generally propoſed to others as a pattern of equity and moderation. Cicero ſpeaks of him as eloquent, learned, and ingenious, equally eminent as an orator and as a lawyer. He was murdered in the temple of Veſta, during the civil war of Marius and Sylla, 82 years before Chriſt. Plut.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Paterc. 2, c. 22.

Mutūnus, or Mutīnus, a deity among the Romans, much the ſame as the Priapus of the Greeks. The Roman matrons, and particularly new married women, diſgraced themſelves by the obſcene ceremonies which cuſtom obliged them to obſerve before the ſtatue of this impure deity. Auguſt. de Civ. D. 4, c. 9. l. 6, c. 9.—Lactant. 1, c. 20.

Mutuscæ, a town of Umbria. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 711.

Muzeris, a town of India, now Vizindruk. Plin. 6, c. 23.

Myagrus or Myodes, a divinity among the Egyptians. He was entreated by the inhabitants to protect them from flies and ſerpents. Pauſ. 8, c. 26.

Mȳcălē, a celebrated magician, who boaſted that he could draw down the moon from her orb. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263.—— A city and promontory of Aſia Minor oppoſite Samos, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the Greeks and Perſians on the 22d of September 479 B. C. the ſame day that Mardonius was defeated at Platæa. The Perſians were about 100,000 men, that had juſt returned from the unſucceſsful expedition of Xerxes in Greece. They had drawn their ſhips to the ſhore and fortified themſelves, as if determined to ſupport a ſiege. They ſuffered the Greeks to diſembark from their fleet without the leaſt moleſtation, and were ſoon obliged to give way before the cool and reſolute intrepidity of an inferior number of men. The Greeks obtained a complete victory, ſlaughtered ſome thouſands of the enemy, burned their camp, and ſailed back to Samos with an immenſe booty, in which were ſeventy cheſts of money among other very valuable things. Herodot.—Juſtin. 2. c. 14.—Diod. ——A woman's name. Juv. 4, v. 141.

Mycalessus, an inland town of Bœotia, where Ceres had a temple. Pauſ. 9, c. 19.

Mȳcēnæ, a town of Argolis, in Peloponneſus, built by Perſeus, ſon of Danae. It was ſituate on a ſmall river at the eaſt of the Inachus, about 50 ſtadia from Argos, and received its name from Mycene, a nymph of Laconia. It was once the capital of a kingdom, whoſe monarchs reigned in the following order; Acriſius 1344 B. C. Perſeus, Electryon, Mæſtor and Sthenelus; and Sthenelus alone for eight years; Atreus and Thyeſtes, Agamemnon, Ægyſthus, Oreſtes, Æpytus, who was diſpoſſeſſed 1104 B.C. on the return of the Heraclidæ. The town of Mycenæ was taken and laid in ruins by the Argives B. C. 568; and it was almoſt unknown where it ſtood in the age of the geographer Strabo. Pauſ. 2, c. 16.—Strab. 8. —Virg. Æn. 6, v. 839.—Mela. 2, c. 3. The word Mycenæus is uſed for Agamemnon as he was one of the kings of Mycenæ.

diſcontinued, till Charmis of Marſeilles introduced it again, and convinced the world of its great benefits. Muſa was brother to Euphorbus the phyſician of king Juba. Two ſmall treatiſes, de herbâ Botanicâ, and de tuendâ Valetudine, are ſuppoſed to be the productions of his pen.——A daughter of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. She attempted to recover her father's kingdom from the Romans, but to no purpoſe, though Cæſar eſpouſed her cauſe. Patere. 2.—Suet in Cæſ.

Musæ, certain goddeſſes who preſided over poetry, muſic, dancing, and all the liberal arts. They were daughters of Jupiter and Mnemoſyne, and were nine in number; Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpſichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Calliope, and Urania. Some ſuppoſe that there were only three muſes, Melete, Mneme, and Aœde; others four, Telxiope, Aœde, Arche, Melete. They were fond of ſolitude, and commonly appeared in different attire according to the arts and ſciences over which they preſided. [Vid. Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, &c.] Sometimes they were repreſented as dancing in a chorus, to intimate the near and indiſſoluble connexion which exiſts between the liberal arts and ſciences. The muſes ſometimes appear with wings, becauſe by the aſſiſtance of wings they freed themſelves from the violence of Pyrenæus. Their conteſt with the daughters of Pierus is well known. [Vid. Pierides.] The worſhip of the muſes was univerſally eſtabliſhed, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece, Theſſaly, and Italy. No ſacrifices were ever offered to them, though no poet ever began a poem without a ſolemn invocation to the goddeſſes who preſided over verſe. There were feſtivals inſtituted in their honor in ſeveral parts of Greece, eſpecially among the Theſpians, every fifth year. The Macedonians obſerved alſo a feſtival in honor of Jupiter and the muſes. It had been inſtituted by king Archelaus, and it was celebrated with ſtage plays, games, and different exhibitions, which continued nine days according to the number of the muſes. *Plut. Musæus, an ancient Greek poet, ſuppoſed to have been ſon or diſciple of Linus or Orpheus, and to have lived about 1410 years before the Chriſtian era. Virgil has paid great honor to his memory by placing him in the Elyſian fields attended by a great multitude, and taller by the head than his followers. None of the poet's compoſitions are extant. The elegant poem of the loves of Leander and Hero was written by a Muſæus who floriſhed in the fourth century, according to the more received opinions. Among the good editions of Muſæus two may be ſelected as the beſt, that of Rover 8vo. L. Bat. 1727; and that of Schroder, 8vo. Leovard, 1743. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 677.—Diog.——A Latin poet whoſe compoſitions were very obſcene. Martial. 12, ep. 96.——A poet of Thebes who lived during the Trojan war.

MUTINUS. Vid. Mutunus.

MUTIUS, the father-in-law of C. Marius. ——A Roman who ſaved the life of young Marius, by conveying him away from the purſuits of his enemies in a load of ſtraw. ——A friend of Tiberius Gracchus by whoſe means he was raiſed to the office of a tribune. ——C. Scævola, ſirnamed Cordus, became famous for his courage and intrepidity. When Porſenna, king of Etruria, had beſieged Rome to reinſtate Tarquin in all his rights and privileges, Mutius determined to deliver his country from ſo dangerous an enemy. He diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a Tuſcan, and as he could fluently ſpeak the language, he gained an eaſy introduction into the camp, and ſoon into the royal tent. Porſenna ſat alone with his ſecretary, when Mutius entered. The Roman immediately ruſhed upon the ſecretary, and ſtabbed him to the heart, miſtaking him for his royal maſter. This occaſioned a noiſe; and Mutius, unable to eſcape, was ſeized and brought before the king. He gave no anſwer to the enquiries of the courtiers, and only told them that he was a Roman, and to give them a proof of his fortitude, he laid his right hand on an altar of burning coals and ſternly looking at the king, and without uttering a groan, he boldly told him, that 300 young Romans like himſelf had conſpired againſt his life, and entered his camp in diſguiſe, determined either to deſtroy him, or periſh in the attempt. This extraordinary confeſſion aſtoniſhed Porſenna, he made peace with the Romans and retired from their city. Mutius obtained the ſirname of Scævola, becauſe he had loſt the uſe of his right hand by burning it in the preſence of the Etrurian king. Plut. in Par. —Flor. 1, c. 10.—Liv. 2, c. 12.——Q. Scævola, a Roman conſul. He obtained a victory over the Dalmatians, and ſignalized himſelf greatly in the Marſian war. He is highly commended by Cicero, whom he inſtructed in the ſtudy of civil law. Cic.—Plut.——Another appointed proconſul of Aſia, which he governed with ſo much popularity, that he was generally propoſed to others as a pattern of equity and moderation. Cicero ſpeaks of him as eloquent, learned, and ingenious, equally eminent as an orator and as a lawyer. He was murdered in the temple of Veſta, during the civil war of Marius and Sylla, 82 years before Chriſt. Plut.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Paterc. 2, c. 22.

MUTŪNUS, or MUTĪNUS, a deity among the Romans, much the ſame as the Priapus of the Greeks. The Roman matrons, and particularly new married women, diſgraced themſelves by the obſcene ceremonies which cuſtom obliged them to obſerve before the ſtatue of this impure deity. *Auguſt. de Civ. MŸCĂLE, a celebrated magician, who boaſted that he could draw down the moon from her orb. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263.—— A city and promontory of Aſia Minor oppoſite Samos, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the Greeks and Perſians on the 22d of September 479 B. C. the ſame day that Mardonius was defeated at Platæa. The Perſians were about 100,000 men, that had juſt returned from the unſucceſsful expedition of Xerxes in Greece. They had drawn their ſhips to the ſhore and fortified themſelves, as if determined to ſupport a ſiege. They ſuffered the Greeks to diſembark from their fleet without the leaſt moleſtation, and were ſoon obliged to give way before the cool and reſolute intrepidity of an inferior number of men. The Greeks obtained a complete victory, ſlaughtered ſome thouſands of the enemy, burned their camp, and ſailed back to Samos with an immenſe booty, in which were ſeventy cheſts of money among other very valuable things. Herodot.—Juſtin. 2. c. 14.—Diod. ——A woman's name. Juv. 4, v. 141.

MYCALESSUS, an inland town of Bœotia, where Ceres had a temple. Pauſ. 9, c. 19.

MŸCĒNÆ, a town of Argolis, in Peloponneſus, built by Perſeus, ſon of Danae. It was ſituate on a ſmall river at the eaſt of the Inachus, about 50 ſtadia from Argos, and received its name from Mycene, a nymph of Laconia. It was once the capital of a kingdom, whoſe monarchs reigned in the following order; Acriſius 1344 B. C. Perſeus, Electryon, Mæſtor and Sthenelus; and Sthenelus alone for eight years; Atreus and Thyeſtes, Agamemnon, Ægyſthus, Oreſtes, Ægyſtus, who was diſpoſſeſſed 1104 B.C. on the return of the Heraclidæ. The town of Mycenæ was taken and laid in ruins by the Argives B. C. 568; and it was almoſt unknown where it ſtood in the age of the geographer Strabo. Pauſ. 2, c. 16.—Strab. 8. —Virg. Æn. 6, v. 839.—Mela. 2, c. 3. The word Mycenæus is uſed for Agamemnon as he was one of the kings of Mycenæ.

Myciberna, a town of the Hellespont. Diod. 12.

Mycithus, a servant of Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium. He was entrusted with the care of the kingdom, and of the children of the deceased prince, and he exercised his power with such fidelity and moderation that he acquired the esteem of all the citizens, and at last restored the kingdom to his master's children when come to years of maturity, and retired to peace and solitude with a small portion. He is called by some Micalus. Justin. 4, c. 2.

Mycon, a celebrated painter who with others assisted in making and perfecting the Poecile of Athens. Plin. 33 & 35.——A youth of Athens changed into a poppy by Ceres.

Mycŏnos, (or e,) one of the Cyclades between Delos and Icaria, which received its name from Myconus, an unknown person. It is about three miles at the east of Delos, and is thirty-six miles in circumference. It remained long uninhabited on account of the frequent earthquakes to which it was subject. Some suppose that the giants whom Hercules killed were buried under that island, whence arose the proverb of every thing is under Mycone, applied to those who treat of different subjects under one and the same title, as if none of the defeated giants had been buried under no other island or mountain about Mycone. Strabo observes, and his testimony is supported by that of modern travellers, that the inhabitants of Mycone became bald very early, even at the age of 20 or 25, from which circumstance they were called by way of contempt, the bald heads of Mycone. Pliny says, that the children of the place were always born without hair. The island was poor, and the inhabitants very avaricious; whence Archilochus reproached a certain Pericles, that he came to a feast like a Myconian, that is, without previous invitation. Strab. 10.—Plin. 11, c. 37. l. 12, c. 7. l. 14, c. 1.—Athen. 1.—Thucyd. 3, c. 29.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—*Ovid. Myrmĭdŏnes, a people on the southern borders of Thessaly, who accompanied Achilles to the Trojan war. They received their name from Myrmidon, a son of Jupiter and Eurymedusa, who married one of the daughters of Æolus, son of Helen. His son Actor married Ægina, the daughter of the Asopus. He gave his name to his subjects, who dwelt near the river Peneus in Thessaly. According to some, the Myrmidons received their name from their having been originally ants, μυρμηκες. [Vid. Æacus.] According to Strabo, they received it from their industry, because they imitated the diligence of the ants, and like them were indefatigable, and were continually employed in cultivating the earth. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 654.—Strab.—Hygin. fab 52.

Myron, a tyrant of Sicyon.——A man of Priene, who wrote an history of Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 6.——A celebrated statuary of Greece, peculiarly happy in imitating nature. He made a cow so much resembling life, that even bulls were deceived and approached her as if alive, as is frequently mentioned by many epigrams in the Anthologia. He flourished about 442 years before Christ. Ovid. Art. Am. 3, v. 319.—Paus.—Juv. 8. —Propert. 2, el. 41.

Myronides, an Athenian general, who conquered the Thebans. Polyæn.

Myrrha, a daughter of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. She became enamoured of her father, and introduced herself into his bed unknown. She had a son by him, called Adonis. When Cinyras was apprized of the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, and Myrrha fled into Arabia, where she was changed into a tree called myrrh. Hygin. fab. 58 & 275.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 298.—Plut. in Par.

Myrsĭlus, a son of Myrsus, the last of the Heraclidæ, who reigned in Lydia. He is also called Candaules. Vid. Candaules.

Myrsus, the father of Candaules. Herodot. 1, c. 7.——A Greek historian in the age of Solon.

Myrtale, a courtezan of Rome, mistress to the poet Horace. 1. od. 33.

Myrtea, a surname of Venus. Vid. Murtia.

Myrtĭlus, a son of Mercury and Phaetusa or Cleobule, arm bearer to Œnomaus, king of Pisa. He was so experienced in riding and in the management of horses, that he rendered those of Œnomaus the swiftest in all Greece. His infidelity proved at last fatal to him. Œnomaus had been informed by an oracle, that his daughter Hippodamia's husband should cause his death, and on that account he resolved to marry her only to him who should overcome him in a chariot race. This seemed totally impossible, and to render it more terrible, Œnomaus declared that death would be the consequence of a defeat in the suitors. The charms of Hippodamia were so great that many sacrificed their life in the fruitless endeavour to obtain her hand. Pelops, at last presented himself, undaunted at the fate of those who had gone before him, but before he entered the course he bribed Myrtilus, and assured him that he should share Hippodamia's favors if he returned victorious from the race. Myrtilus, who was enamoured of Hippodamia, gave an old chariot to Œnomaus, which broke in the course and caused his death. Pelops gained the victory, and married Hippodamia; and when Myrtilus had the audacity to claim the reward promised to his perfidy, Pelops threw him headlong into the sea, where he perished. The body of Myrtilus, according to some, was carried by the waves to the sea shore, where he received an honorable burial, and as he was the son of Mercury, he was made a constellation. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 84 & 224.—Paus. 8, c. 14.—Apollon. 1.

Myrtis, a Greek woman who distinguished herself by her poetical talents. She flourished about 500 years B. C. and instructed the celebrated Corinna in the several rules of versification. Pindar himself, as some report, was also one of her pupils.

Myrtōum Mare, a part of the Ægean sea, which lies between Eubœa, Attica, and Peloponnesus, as far as cape Malea. It receives this name from Myrto, a woman, or from Myrtos, a small island opposite to Carystos in Eubœa; or from Myrtilus, the son of Mercury, who was drowned there, &c. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Hygin. fab. 84.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

Myrtuntium, a name given to that part of the sea which lies on the coast of Epirus between the bay of Ambracia and Leucas.

Myrtūsa, a mountain of Libya. Callim. in Apoll.

Mys, (myos), an artist famous in working ing and poliſhing ſilver. He beautifully repreſented the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, on a ſhield in the hands of Minerva's ſtatue made by Phidias. Pauſ. 1, c. 28.—Martial. 8, ep. 34 & 51. l. 14, ep. 93.—Propert. 3, el. 9, v. 14.

Myscellus, or Miscellus, a native of Achaia, who founded Crotona in Italy, according to an oracle, which told him to build a city where he found rain with fine weather. The meaning of the oracle long perplexed him till he found a beautiful woman all in tears in Italy, which circumſtance he interpreted in his favor. According to ſome Myſcellus, who was the ſon of Hercules, went out of Argos, without the permiſſion of the magiſtrates, for which he was condemned to death. The judges had put each a black ball as a ſign of condemnation, but Hercules changed them all and made them white, and had his ſon acquitted, upon which Myſcellus left Greece and came to Italy, where he built Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 19.—Strab. 6 & 8.

Mysia, a country of Aſia minor, generally divided into major and minor. Myſia minor was bounded on the north and weſt by the Propontis and Bithynia, and Phrygia on the ſouthern and eaſtern borders. Myſia major had Æolia on the ſouth, the Ægean on the weſt, and Phrygia on the north and eaſt. Its chief cities were Cyzicum, Lampſacus, &c. The inhabitants were once very warlike, but they greatly degenerated; and the words Myſorum ultimus were emphatically uſed to ſignify a perſon of no merit. The antients generally hired them to attend their funétions as mourners, becauſe they were naturally melancholy and inclined to ſhed tears. They were once governed by monarchs. They are ſuppoſed to be deſcended from the Myſians of Europe, a nation which inhabited that part of Thrace which was ſituate between mount Hæmus and the Danube. Strab.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Cic. in Verr. Flacc. 27.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Appian. in Mithrid.——A feſtival in honor of Ceres, ſirnamed Myſia from Myſias, an Argive, who raiſed her a temple near Pallene in Achaia. Some derive the word απο του μυσιαν, to cloy or ſatisfy, becauſe Ceres was the firſt who ſatisfied the wants of men by giving them corn. The feſtival continued during ſeven days, &c.

Mystes, a ſon of the poet Valgius, whoſe early death was ſo lamented by the father that Horace wrote an ode to allay the grief of his friend. Horat. 2, od. 9.

Myson, a native of Sparta, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. When Anacharſis conſulted the oracle of Apollo, to know which was the wiſeſt man in Greece, he received for anſwer, he who is now ploughing his fields. This was Myſon. Diog. in Vit.

Mythecus, a ſophiſt of Syracuſe. He ſtudied cookery, and when he thought himſelf ſufficiently ſkilled in dreſſing meat, he went to Sparta, where he gained much practice, eſpecially among the younger citizens. He was ſoon after expelled the city by the magiſtrates, who obſerved that the aid of Mythecus was unneceſſary, as hunger was the beſt ſeaſoning.

Mytilene. Vid. Mitylene.

Myus, (Myuntis), a town of Ionia on the confines of Caria, founded by a Grecian colony. It is one of the 12 capital cities of Ionia, ſituate at the diſtance of about 30 ſtadia from the mouth of the Mæander. Artaxerxes, king of Perſia, gave it to Themiſtocles to maintain him in meat. Magneſia was to ſupport him in bread, and Lampſacus in wine. C. Nep. in Themiſ.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 1, c. 142. Diod. 11.

Nabazanes, an officer of Darius 3d. at the battle of Iſſus. He conſpired with Beſſus to murder his royal maſter, either to obtain the favor of Alexander, or to ſeize the kingdom. He was pardoned by Alexander. Curt. 3, &c.—Diod. 17.

Năbăthæa, a country of Arabia, of which the capital was called Petra. The word is often applied to any of the eaſtern countries of the world by the poets, and ſeems to be derived from Nabath the ſon of Iſmael. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 61. l. 5, v. 163.—Strab. 16.—Lucan. 4, v. 63.—Juv. 11, v. 126.

Năbis, a celebrated tyrant of Lacedæmon, who in all acts of cruelty and oppreſſion ſurpaſſed a Phalaris or a Dionyſius. His houſe was filled with flatterers and with ſpies, who were continually employed in watching the words and the actions of his ſubjects. When he had exerciſed every art in plundering the citizens of Sparta, he made a ſtatue, which in reſemblance was like his wife, and was cloathed in the moſt magnificent apparel, and whenever any one refuſed to deliver up his riches, the tyrant led him to the ſtatue, which immediately, by means of ſecret ſprings, ſeized him in its its arms, and tormented him in the moſt exciciating manner with bearded points and prickles, hid under the cloaths. To render his tyranny more popular, Nabis made an alliance with Flaminius, the Roman general, and purſued with the moſt inveterate enmity the war which he had undertaken againſt the Achæans. He beſieged Gythium, and defeated Philopœmen in a naval battle. His triumph was ſhort, the general of the Achæans ſoon repaired his loſſes, and Nabis was defeated in an engagement, and treacherouſly murdered as he attempted to ſave his life by flight, B. C. 192, after an uſurpation of 14 years. Polyb. 13.—Juſtin. 30 & 31.—Plut. in Phil.—Pauſ. 7, c. 8.—Flor. 2, c. 7.——A prieſt of Jupiter Ammon, killed in the ſecond Punic war, as he fought againſt the Romans. Sil. 15, v. 672.

NABONASSAR, a king of Babylon, after the diviſion of the Aſſyrian monarchy. From him the Nabonaſſarean epoch received its name, agreeing with the year of the world 3237, or 746, B. C.

NACRI CAMPI, a place of Gallia Togata near Mutina. Liv. 41, c. 18.

NADAGARA. Vid. Nargara.

NÆNIA, the goddeſs of funerals at Rome, whoſe temple was without the gates of the city. The ſongs which were ſung at funerals were alſo called nænia. They were generally filled with the praiſes of the deceaſed, but ſometimes they were ſo unmeaning and improper, that the word became proverbial to ſignify nonſenſe. Varro.—Plaut. Aſin. 41, c. 1, v. 63.

CN. NÆVIUS, a Latin poet in the firſt Punic war. He was originally in the Roman armies, but afterwards he applied himſelf to ſtudy, and wrote comedies, beſides a poetical account of the firſt Punic war in which he had ſerved. His ſatirical diſpoſition diſpleaſed the conſul Metellus, who drove him from Rome. He paſſed the reſt of his life in Utica, where he died, about 203 years before the Chriſtian era. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 1. de Senect.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 53.——A tribune of the people at Rome, who accuſed Scipio Africanus of extortion.——An augur in the reign of Tarquin. To convince the king and the Romans of his power, as an augur, he cut a flint with a razor, and turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration. Tarquin rewarded his merit by erecting him a ſtatue in the comitium which was ſtill in being in the age of Auguſtus. The razor and flint were buried near it under an altar, and it was uſual among the Romans to make witneſſes in civil cauſes ſwear near it. This miraculous event of cutting a flint with a razor, though believed by ſome writers, is treated as fabulous and improbable by Cicero, who, himſelf, had been an augur. Dionyſ. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 36.—Cic. de divin. 1.

NÆVŎLUS, an infamous pimp in Domitian's reign. Juv. 9, v. 1.

NAHARVALI, a people of Germany. Tacit. Germ. 43.

NĀĬĂDES or NAIDES, certain inferior deities who preſided over rivers, ſprings, wells, and fountains. The Naiades generally inhabited the country, and reſorted to the woods or meadows near the ſtream over which they preſided, whence the name (ναειν to flow.) They are repreſented as young and beautiful virgins, often leaning upon an urn, from which flows a ſtream of water. Ægle was the faireſt of the Naiades, according to Virgil. They were held in great veneration among the ancients, and often ſacrifices of goats and lambs, were offered to them with libations of wine, honey, and oil. Sometimes they received only offerings of milk, fruit, and flowers. Vid. Nymphæ. Virg. Ecl. 6.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 328.—Homer. Od. 13.

Narcæus, a ſon of Bacchus and Phyſcoa. Pauſ. 5, c. 15.

Narcissus, a beautiful youth, ſon of Cephiſus and the nymph Liriope, born at Theſpis in Bœotia. He ſaw his image reflected in a fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place. His fruitleſs attempts to approach this beautiful object ſo provoked him that he grew deſperate and killed himſelf. His blood was changed into a flower, which ſtill bears his name. The nymphs raiſed a funeral pile to burn his body, according to Ovid, but they found nothing but a beautiful flower. Pauſanias ſays, that Narciſſus had a ſiſter as beautiful as himſelf, of whom he became deeply enamoured. He often hunted in the woods in her company, but his pleaſure was ſoon interrupted by her death, and ſtill to keep afreſh her memory, he frequented the groves, where he had often attended her, or repoſed himſelf on the brim of a fountain, where the ſight of his own reflected image ſtill awakened tender ſentiments. Pauſ. 9, c. 21.—Hygin. fab. 271.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 346, &c.—Philoſtrat. 1.——A freedman and ſecretary of Claudius, who abuſed his truſt and the infirmities of his imperial maſter, and plundered the citizens of Rome to enrich himſelf. Meſſalina, the emperor's wife, endeavoured to remove him, but Narciſſus ſacrificed her to his avarice and reſentment. Agrippina, who ſucceeded in the place of Meſſalina, was more ſucceſsful. Narciſſus was baniſhed by her intrigues, and compelled to kill himſelf, A. D. 54. Nero greatly regretted his loſs, as he had found him ſubſervient to his moſt criminal and extravagant pleaſures. Tacit.—Sueton. ——A favorite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba.——A wretch who ſtrangled the emperor Commodus.

NAUPLIĂDES, a patronymic of Palamedes ſon of Nauplius. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 39.

NAUPLIUS, a ſon of Neptune and Amymone, king of Eubœa. He was father to the celebrated Palamedes, who was ſo unjuſtly ſacrificed to the artifice and reſentment of Ulyſſes by the Greeks during the Trojan war. The death of Palamedes highly irritated Nauplius, and to revenge the injuſtice of the Grecian princes, he attempted to debauch their wives and ruin their character. When the Greeks returned from the Trojan war, Nauplius ſaw them with pleaſure diſtreſſed in a ſtorm on the coaſts of Eubœa, and to make their diſaſter ſtill more univerſal, he lighted fires on ſuch places as were ſurrounded with the moſt dangerous rocks, that the fleet might be ſhipwrecked upon the coaſt. This ſucceeded, but Nauplius was ſo diſappointed when he ſaw Ulyſſes and Diomedes eſcape from the general calamity, that he threw himſelf into the ſea. According to ſome mythologiſts there were two perſons of this name, a native of Argos, who went to Colchis with Jaſon. He was ſon of Neptune and Amymone. The other was king of Eubœa, and lived during the Trojan war. He was, according to ſome, ſon of Clytonas, one of the deſcendants of Nauplius the Argonaut. The Argonaut was remarkable for his knowledge of ſea affairs, and of aſtronomy. He built the town of Nauplia and ſold Auge, daughter of Aleus, to king Teuthras, to withdraw her from her father's reſentment. *Orph. NELO, one of the Danaides. Apollod. 2.

NEMÆA, a town of Argolis between Cleonæ and Phlius with a wood, where Hercules, in the 16th year of his age, killed the celebrated Nemæan lion. This animal, born of the hundred-headed Typhon, infeſted the neighbourhood of Nemæa, and kept the inhabitants under continual alarms. It was the firſt labor of Hercules to deſtroy it; and the hero, when he found that his arrows and his club were uſeleſs againſt an animal whoſe ſkin was hard and impenetrable, ſeized him in his arms and ſqueezed him to death. The conqueror cloathed himſelf in the ſkin, and games were inſtituted to commemorate ſo great an event. The Nemæan games were originally inſtituted by the Argives in honor of Archemorus, who died by the bite of a ſerpent, [Vid. Archemorus.] and Hercules ſometime after renewed them. They were one of the four great and ſolemn games, which were obſerved in Greece. The Argives, Corinthians, and the inhabitants of Cleonæ, generally preſided by turns at the celebration, in which were exhibited foot and horſe races, chariot races, boxing, wreſtling, and conteſts of every kind, both gymnical and equeſtrian. The conqueror was rewarded with a crown of olive, afterwards of green parſley, in memory of the adventure of Archemorus, whom his nurſe laid down on a ſprig of that plant. They were celebrated every third, or, according to others, every fifth year, or more properly on the 1ſt and 3d year of every Olympiad, on the 12th day of the Corinthian month Panemos, which correſponds to our Auguſt. They ſerved as an era to the Argives, and to the inhabitants of the neighbouring country. It was always uſual for an orator to pronounce a funeral oration in memory of the death of Archemorus, and thoſe who diſtributed the prizes were always dreſſed in mourning. Liv. 27, c. 30 & 31. l. 34. c. 41.—*Ovid. NĔMĔSIS, one of the infernal deities, daughter of Nox. She was the goddeſs of vengeance always prepared to puniſh impiety, and at the ſame time liberally to reward the good and virtuous. She is made one of the Parcæ by ſome mythologiſts, and is repreſented with a helm and a wheel. The people of Smyrna were the firſt who made her ſtatues with wings, to ſhow with what celerity ſhe is prepared to puniſh puniſh the crimes of the wicked both by ſea and land, as the helm and the wheel in her hands intimate. Her power did not only exiſt in this life, but ſhe was alſo employed after death to find out the moſt effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemeſis was particularly worſhipped at Rhamnus in Attica, where ſhe had a celebrated ſtatue 10 cubits long, made of Parian marble by Phidias, or according to others, by one of his pupils. The Romans were alſo particularly attentive to the adoration of a deity whom they ſolemnly invoked, and to whom they offered ſacrifices before they declared war againſt their enemies, to ſhow the world that their wars were undertaken upon the moſt juſt grounds. Her ſtatue at Rome was in the capitol. Some ſuppoſe that Nemeſis was the perſon whom Jupiter deceived in the form of a ſwan, and that Leda was entruſted with the care of the children which ſprang from the two eggs. Others obſerve that Leda obtained the name of Nemeſis after death. According to Pauſanias, there were more than one Nemeſis. The goddeſs Nemeſis was ſirnamed Rhamnuſia, becauſe worſhipped at Rhamnus, and Adraſtia from the temple which Adraſtus king of Argos erected to her when he went againſt Thebes to revenge the indignities which his ſon-in-law Polynices had ſuffered in being unjuſtly driven from his kingdom by Eteocles. The Greeks celebrated a feſtival called Nemeſia, in memory of deceaſed perſons, as the goddeſs Nemeſis was ſuppoſed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all inſult. *Hygin. P. NEŌPTŎLĔMUS, a king of Epirus, ſon of Achilles and Deidamia, called Pyrrhus, from the yellow color of his hair. He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother, and gave early proofs of his valor. After the death of Achilles, Calchas declared in the aſſembly of the Greeks that Troy could not be taken without the aſſiſtance of the ſon of the deceaſed hero. Immediately upon this Ulyſſes and Phœnix were commiſſioned to bring Pyrrhus to the war. He returned with them with pleaſure, and received the name of Neoptolemus, (new ſoldier,) becauſe he had come late to the field. On his arrival before Troy he paid a viſit to the tomb of his father, and wept over his aſhes. He afterwards, according to ſome authors, accompanied Ulyſſes to Lemnos, to engage Philoctetes to come to the Trojan war. He greatly ſignalized himſelf during the remaining time of the ſiege, and he was the firſt who entered the wooden horſe. He was inferior to none of the Grecian warriors in valor, and Ulyſſes and Neſtor alone could claim a ſuperiority over him in eloquence, wiſdom, and addreſs. His cruelty however was as great as that of his father. Not ſatisfied with breaking down the gates of Priam's palace, he exerciſed the greateſt barbarity upon the remains of his family, and without any regard to the ſanctity of the place where Priam had taken refuge, he ſlaughtered him without mercy; or, according to others, dragged him by the hair, to the tomb of his father, where he ſacrificed him, and where he cut off his head, and carried it in exultation through the ſtreets of Troy, fixed on the point of a ſpear. He alſo ſacrificed Aſtyanax to his fury, and immolated Polyxena on the tomb of Achilles according to thoſe who deny that that ſacrifice was voluntary. When Troy was taken, taken, the captives were divided among the conquerors, and Pyrrhus had for his ſhare Andromache the widow of Hector, and Helenus the ſon of Priam. With theſe he departed for Greece, and he probably eſcaped from deſtruction by giving credit to the words of Helenus, who foretold him that if he ſailed with the reſt of the Greeks, his voyage would be attended with fatal conſequences, and perhaps with death. This obliged him to take a different courſe from the reſt of the Greeks, and he travelled over the greateſt part of Thrace, where he had a ſevere encounter with queen Harpalyce. [Vid. Harpalyce.] The place of his retirement after the Trojan war is not known. Some maintain that he went to Theſſaly, where his grandfather ſtill reigned; but this is confuted by others, who obſerve, perhaps with more reaſon, that he went to Epirus, where he laid the foundations of a new kingdom, becauſe his grandfather Peleus had been deprived of his ſceptre by Acaſtus the ſon of Pelias. Neoptolemus lived with Andromache after his arrival in Greece, but it is unknown whether he treated her as a lawful wife, or a concubine. He had a ſon by this unfortunate princeſs called Moloſſus, and two others, if we rely on the authority of Pauſanias. Beſides Andromache he married Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, as alſo Lanaſſa the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the deſcendants of Hercules. The cauſe of his death is variouſly related. Menelaus, before the Trojan war, had promiſed his daughter Hermione to Oreſtes, but the ſervices he experienced from the valor and the courage of Neoptolemus during the ſiege of Troy, induced him to reward his merit by making him his ſon-in-law. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but Hermione became jealous of Andromache, and becauſe ſhe had no children, ſhe reſolved to deſtroy her Trojan rival who ſeemed to ſteal away the affections of their common huſband. In the abſence of Neoptolemus at Delphi, Hermione attempted to murder Andromache, but ſhe was prevented by the interference of Peleus, or according to others, of the populace. When ſhe ſaw her ſchemes defeated, ſhe determined to lay violent hands upon herſelf to avoid the reſentment of Neoptolemus. The ſudden arrival of Oreſtes changed her reſolutions, and ſhe conſented to elope with her lover to Sparta. Oreſtes at the ſame time, to revenge and to puniſh his rival, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated in the temple of Delphi, and he was murdered at the foot of the altar by Machareus the prieſt, or by the hand of Oreſtes himſelf, according to Virgil, Paterculus, and Hyginus. Some ſay that he was murdered by the Delphians, who had been bribed by the preſents of Oreſtes. It is unknown why Neoptolemus went to Delphi. Some ſupport that he wiſhed to conſult the oracle to know how he might have children by the barren Hermione; others ſay, that he went thither to offer the ſpoils which he had obtained during the Trojan war, to appeaſe the reſentment of Apollo whom he had provoked by calling him the cauſe of the death of Achilles. The plunder of the rich temple of Delphi, if we believe others, was the object of the journey of Neoptolemus, and it cannot but be obſerved, that he ſuffered the ſame death and the ſame barbarities which he had inflicted in the temple of Minerva upon the aged Priam and his wretched family. From this circumſtance the ancients have made uſe of the proverb of Neoptolemic revenge when a perſon had ſuffered the ſame ſavage treatment which others had received from his hand. The Delphians celebrated a feſtival with great pomp and ſolemnity in memory of Neoptolemus, who had been ſlain in his attempt to plunder their temple, becauſe, as they ſaid, Apollo, the patron of the place, had been in ſome manner acceſſary to the death of Achilles. Patere. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. Nĕphĕle, the firſt wife of Athamas king of Thebes, and mother of Phryxus and Helle. She was repudiated on pretence of being ſubject to fits of inſanity, and Athamas married Ino the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had ſeveral children. Ino became jealous of Nephele, becauſe her children would ſucceed to their father's throne before her's, by right of ſeniority, and ſhe reſolved to deſtroy them. Nephele was apprized of her wicked intentions, and ſhe removed her children from the reach of Ino, by giving them a celebrated ram ſprung from the union of Neptune and Theophane, on whoſe back they eſcaped to Colchis. [Vid. Phryxus.] Nephele was afterwards changed into a cloud, whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds. Some call her Nebula, which word is the latin tranſlation of Nephele. Corn. Nepos, a celebrated hiſtorian in the reign of Auguſtus. He was born at Hoſtīlia, and like the reſt of his learned contemporaries, he ſhared the favors and enjoyed the patronage of the emperor. He was the intimate friend of Cicero and of Atticus, and recommended himſelf to the notice of the great and opulent by delicacy of ſentiment and a lively diſpoſition. According to ſome writers he compoſed three books of chronicles, as alſo a biographical account of all the moſt celebrated kings, generals, and authors of antiquity. Of all his valuable compoſitions, nothing remains but his lives of the illuſtrious Greek and Roman generals, which have often been attributed to Æmylius Probus, who publiſhed them in his own name in the age of Theodoſius, to conciliate the favor and the friendſhip of that emperor. The language of Cornelius has always been admired, and, as a writer of the Auguſtan age, he is intitled to many commendations for the delicacy of his expreſſions, the elegance of his ſtile, and the clearneſs and preciſion of his narrations. Some ſupport that he tranſlated Dares Phrygius from the Greek original; but the inelegance of the diction, and its many incorrect expreſſions, plainly prove that it is the production, not of a writer of the Auguſtan age, but the ſpurious compoſition of a more modern pen. Cornelius ſpeaks of his account of the Greek hiſtorians in Dion. c. 3. Among the many good editions of Cornelius Nepos, two may be ſelected as the beſt, that of Verheyk, 8vo. L. Nepotiānus Flavius Popilius, a ſon of Eutropia, the ſiſter of the emperor Conſtantine. He was murdered by Anicetus, after one month's reign, and his family were involved in his ruin.

Neptūnius, an epithet applied to Sext. Pompey, becauſe he believed himſelf to be god of the ſea, or deſcended from him, on account of his ſuperiority in ſhips, &c. Horat. Epod. 9.—Dion. 48.

Neptūnus, a god, ſon of Saturn and Ops, and brother to Jupiter, Pluto and Juno. He was devoured by his father the day of his birth, and again reſtored to life by means of Metis, who gave Saturn a certain potion. Pauſanias ſays, that his mother concealed him in a ſheepfold in Arcadia, and that ſhe impoſed upon her huſband, telling telling him that ſhe had brought a colt into the world, which was inſtantly devoured by Saturn. Neptune ſhared with his brothers the empire of Saturn, and received as his portion the kingdom of the ſea. This, however, did not ſeem equivalent to the empire of heaven and earth, which Jupiter had claimed, therefore he conſpired to dethrone him with the reſt of the gods. The conſpiracy was diſcovered, and Jupiter condemned Neptune to build the walls of Troy. [Vid. Laomedon.] A reconciliation was ſoon after made, and Neptune was re-inſtituted to all his rights and privileges. Neptune diſputed with Minerva the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, but he was defeated, and the olive which the goddeſs ſuddenly raiſed from the earth was deemed more ſerviceable for the good of mankind than the horſe which Neptune had produced by ſtriking the ground with his trident, as that animal is the emblem of war and ſlaughter. This deciſion did not pleaſe Neptune, he renewed the combat by diſputing for Trœzene, but Jupiter ſettled their diſputes by permitting them to be conjointly worſhipped there, and by giving the name of Polias, or the protectreſs of the city, to Minerva, and that of king of Trœzene to the god of the ſea. He alſo diſputed his right for the iſthmus of Corinth with Apollo; and Briareus the Cyclops, who was mutually choſen umpire, gave the iſthmus to Neptune, and the promontory to Apollo. Neptune, as being god of the ſea, was entitled to more power than any of the other gods, except Jupiter. Not only the ocean, rivers, and fountains, were ſubjected to him, but he alſo could cauſe earthquakes at his pleaſure, and raiſe iſlands from the bottom of the ſea with a blow of his trident. The worſhip of Neptune was eſtabliſhed in almoſt every part of the earth, and the Libyans in particular venerated him above all other nations, and looked upon him as the firſt and greateſt of the gods. The Greeks and the Romans were alſo attached to his worſhip, and they celebrated their Iſthmian games and Conſualia with the greateſt ſolemnity. He was generally repreſented ſitting in a chariot made of a ſhell, and drawn by ſea horſes or dolphins. Sometimes he is drawn by winged horſes, and holds his trident in his hand, and ſtands up as his chariot flies over the ſurface of the ſea. Homer repreſents him as iſſuing from the ſea, and in three ſteps croſſing the whole horizon. The mountains and the foreſts, ſays the poet, trembled as he walked; the whales, and all the fiſhes of the ſea, appear round him, and even the ſea herſelf ſeems to feel the preſence of her god. The antients generally ſacrificed a bull and a horſe on his altars, and the Roman ſoothſayers always offered to him the gall of the victims, which in taſte reſembles the bitterneſs of the ſea water. The amours of Neptune are numerous. He obtained, by means of a dolphin, the favors of Amphitrite, who had made a vow of perpetual celibacy, and he placed among the conſtellations the fiſh which had perſuaded the goddeſs to become his wife. He alſo married Venilia and Salacia, which are only the names of Amphitrite, according to ſome authors, who obſerve that the former word is derived from venire, alluding to the continual motion of the ſea. Salacia is derived from ſalum, which ſignifies the ſea, and is applicable to Amphitrite. Neptune became a horſe to enjoy the company of Ceres. [Vid. Arion.] To deceive Theophane, he changed himſelf into a ram. [Vid. Theophane.] He aſſumed the form of the river Enipeus, to gain the confidence of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, by whom he had Pelias and Neleus. He was alſo father of Phorcus and Polyphemus by Thoeſſa; of Lycus, Nycteus, and Euphemus, by Celeno; of Chryſes by Chryſogenia; of Anæus by Aſtypalea; of Bœotus and Hellen by Antiope; of Leuconoe by Themiſto; of Agenor and Bellerophon by Eurynome the daughter of Nyſus; of Antas by Alcyone the daughter of Atlas; of Abas by Arethuſa; of Actor and Dictys by Agemede the daughter of Augias; of Megareus by Œnope daughter of Epopeus; of Cycnus by Harpalyce; of Taras, Otus, Ephialtes, Dorus, Aleſus, &c. The word Neptunus is often uſed metaphorically by the poets, to ſignify ſea water. In the Conſualia of the Romans, horſes were led through the ſtreets finely equipped and crowned with garlands, as the god, in whoſe honor the feſtivals were inſtituted, had produced the horſe, an animal ſo beneficial for the uſe of mankind. Pauſ. 1, 2, &c.—*Homer. NĔRĔĪDES, nymphs of the ſea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. They were fifty, according to the greater number of the mythologiſts, whoſe names are as follows: Sao, Amphitrite, Proto, Galatæa, Thoe, Eucrate, Eudora, Galena, Glauce, Thetis, Spio, Cymothoe, Melita, Thalia, Agave, Eulimene, Erato, Paſithea, Doto, Eunice, Neſea, Dynamene, Pheruſa, Protomelia, Actea, Panope, Doris, Cymatolege, Hippothoe, Cymo, Lione, Hippenoe, Cymodoce, Neſo, Eupompe, Pronoe, Themiſto, Glauconome, Halimede, Pontoporia, Evagora, Liagora, Polynome, Laomadia, Lyſianaſſa, Autonoe, Menippe, Evarne, Pſamathe, Nemertes. In thoſe which Homer mentions, to the number of 30, we find the following names different from thoſe ſpoken of by Heſiod; Halia, Limmoria, Iera, Amphitroe, Dexamene, Amphinome, Callianira, Apſeudes, Callanaſſa, Clymene, Janira, Naſſa, Mera, Orithya, Amathea. Apollodorus, who mentions 45, mentions the following names different from the others: Glaucothoe, Protomeduſa, Pione, Pleſaura, Calypſo, Cranto, Neomeris, Dejanira, Polynoe, Melia, Dione, Iſea, Dero, Eumolpe, Ione, Ceto. Hyginus, and others, differ from the preceding authors in the following names: Drymo, Xantho, Ligea, Phyllodoce, Cydippe, Lycorias, Cleio, Beroe, Ephira, Opis, Aſia, Deopea, Arethuſa, Crenis, Eurydice, and Leucothoe. The Nereides were implored as the reſt of the deities, they had altars chiefly on the coaſts of the ſea, where the piety of mankind made offerings of milk, oil, and honey, and often of the fleſh of goats. When they were on the ſea ſhore they generally reſided in grottos and caves, which were adorned with ſhells, and ſhaded by the branches of vines. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the ſea, and to be ſubſervient to the will of Neptune. They were particularly fond of alcyons, and as they had the power of ruffling or calming the waters, they were always addreſſed by ſailors, who implored their protection, that they might grant them a favorable voyage and a proſperous return. They are repreſented as young and handſome virgins, ſitting on dolphins and holding Neptune's trident in their hand, or ſometimes garlands of flowers, &c. Orpheus Hymn. 23.—*Catull. de Rapt. NEREIUS, a name given to Achilles, as ſon of Thetis, who was one of the Nereides. Horat. ep. 17, v. 8.

NEREUS, a deity of the ſea, ſon of Oceanus and Terra. He married Doris, by whom he had 50 daughters, called the Nereides. [Vid. Nereides.] Nereus was generally repreſented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and hair of an azure color. The chief place of his reſidence was in the Ægean ſea, where he was ſurrounded by his daughters, who often danced in choruſſes round him. He had the gift of prophecy, and informed thoſe that conſulted him with the different fates that attended them. He acquainted Paris with the conſequences of his elopement with Helen; and it was by his directions that Hercules obtained the golden apples of the Heſperides, but the ſea-god often evaded the importunities of inquirers by aſſuming different ſhapes, and totally eſcaping from their graſp. The word Nereus is often taken for the ſea itſelf. Nereus is ſometimes called the moſt antient of all the gods. Heſiod. Theog.—Hygin.—Homer. Il. 18.—Apollod.—*Orpheus. The word Neritos is often applied to the whole iſland of Ithaca, and Ulyſſes, the king of it, is called Neritius dux, and his ſhip Neritia navis. NERIUS, a ſilverſmith in the age of Horace, 2 Sat. 3, v. 69.—— An uſurer in Nero's age, who was ſo eager to get money, that he married as often as he could, and as ſoon deſtroyed his wives by poiſon, to poſſeſs himſelf of their eſtates. Perſ. 2, v. 14.

NERO, Claudius Domitius Cæſar, a celebrated Roman emperor, ſon of Caius Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A. D. 50, and four years after he ſucceeded to him on the throne. The beginning of his reign was marked by acts of the greateſt kindneſs and condeſcenſion, by affability, complaiſance, and popularity. The object of his adminiſtration ſeemed to be the good of his people; and when he was deſired to ſign his name to a liſt of malefactors that were to be executed, he exclaimed, I wiſh to heaven I could not write. He was an enemy to flattery, and when the ſenate had liberally commended the wiſdom of his government, Nero deſired them to keep their praiſes till he deſerved them. Theſe promiſing virtues were ſoon diſcovered to be artificial, and Nero diſplayed the propenſities of his nature. He delivered himſelf from the ſway of his mother, and at laſt ordered her to be aſſaſſinated. This unnatural act of barbarity might aſtoniſh ſome of the Romans, but Nero had his devoted adherents, and when he declared that he had taken away his mother's life to ſave himſelf from ruin, the ſenate applauded his meaſures, and the people ſignified their approbation. Many of his courtiers ſhared the unhappy fate of Agrippina, and Nero ſacrificed to his fury or caprice all ſuch as obſtructed his pleaſure, or diverted his inclination. In the night he generally ſallied out from his palace, to viſit the meaneſt taverns, and all the ſcenes of debauchery which Rome contained. In this nocturnal riot he was fond of inſulting the people in the ſtreets, and his attempts to offer violence to the wife of a Roman ſenator, nearly coſt him his life. He alſo turned actor, and publicly appeared on the Roman ſtage in the meaneſt characters. In his attempts to excel in muſic, and to conquer the diſadvantages of a hoarſe rough voice, he moderated his meals, and often paſſed the day without eating. The celebrity of the Olympian games attracted his notice. He paſſed into Greece, and preſented himſelf as a candidate for the public honor. He was defeated in wreſtling, but the flattery of the ſpectators adjudged him the victory, and Nero returned to Rome with all the pomp and ſplendor of an eaſtern conqueror drawn in the chariot of Auguſtus, and attended by a band of muſicians, actors, and ſtage dancers from every part of the empire. Theſe private and public amuſements of the emperor were indeed innocent, his character was injured but not the lives of the people. But his conduct ſoon became more abominable; he diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a woman, and was publicly married to one of his eunuchs. This violence to nature and decency was ſoon exchanged for another; Nero reſumed his ſex, and celebrated his nuptials with one of his meaneſt catamites, and it was on this occaſion that one of the Romans obſerved that the world would have been happy, if Nero's father had had ſuch a wife. But now his cruelty was diſplayed in a more ſuperlative degree, and he ſacrificed to his wantonneſs his wife Octavia Poppæa, and the celebrated writers, Seneca, Lucan, Petronius, &c. The Chriſtians alſo did not eſcape his barbarity. He had heard of the burning of Troy, and as he wiſhed to renew that diſmal ſcene, he cauſed Rome to be ſet on fire in different places. The conflagration became ſoon univerſal, and during nine ſucceſſive days the fire was unextinguiſhed. All was deſolation, nothing was heard but the lamentations of mothers whoſe children had periſhed in the flames, the groans of the dying, and the continual fall of palaces and buildings. Nero was the only one who enjoyed the general conſternation. He placed himſelf on the top of a high tower, and he ſang on his lyre the deſtruction of Troy, a dreadful ſcene which his barbarity had realized before his eyes. He attempted to avert the public odium from his head, by a feigned commiſeration of the miſeries of his ſubjects. He began to repair the ſtreets and the public buildings at his own expence. He built himſelf a celebrated palace, which he called his golden houſe. It was profuſely adorned with gold, with precious ſtones, and with whatever was rare and exquiſite. It contained ſpacious fields, artificial lakes, woods, gardens, orchards, and whatever could exhibit beauty and grandeur. The entrance of this edifice could admit a large coloſſus of the emperor 120 feet high, the galleries were each a mile long, and the whole was covered with gold. The roofs of the dining halls repreſented the firmament, in motion as well as in figure, and continually turned round night and day, ſhowering down all ſorts of perfumes and ſweet waters. When this grand edifice, which, according to Pliny, extended all round the city, was finiſhed, Nero ſaid, that now he could lodge like a man. His profuſion was not leſs remarkable in all his other actions. When he went a fiſhing, his nets were made with gold and ſilk. He never appeared twice in the ſame garment, and when he undertook a voyage, there were thouſands of ſervants to take care of his wardrobe. This continuation of debauchery and extravagance, at laſt, rouſed the reſentment of the people. Many conſpiracies were formed againſt the emperor, but they were generally diſcovered, and ſuch as were acceſſary ſuffered the greateſt puniſhments. The moſt dangerous conſpiracy againſt Nero's life was that of Piſo, from which he was delivered by the confeſſion of a ſlave. The conſpiracy of Galba, proved more ſucceſsful, and the conſpirator, when he was informed that his plot was known to Nero, declared himſelf emperor. The unpopularity of Nero favored his cauſe, he was acknowledged by all the Roman empire, and the ſenate condemned the tyrant that ſat on the throne to be dragged naked through the ſtreets of Rome, and whipped to death, and afterwards to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock like the meaneſt malefactor. This, however, was not done, and Nero, by a voluntary death, prevented the execution of the ſentence. He killed himſelf, A. D. 68, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 13 years and eight months. Rome was filled with acclamation at the intelligence, and the citizens, more ſtrongly to indicate their joy, wore caps, ſuch as were generally uſed by ſlaves, who had received their freedom. Their vengeance was not only exerciſed againſt the ſtatues of the deceaſed tyrant, but his friends were the object of the public reſentment, and many were cruſhed to pieces in ſuch a violent manner, that one of the ſenators, amid the univerſal joy, ſaid that he was afraid they ſhould ſoon have cauſe to wiſh for Nero. The tyrant, as he expired, begged that his head might not be cut off from his body, and expoſed to the inſolence of an enraged populace, but that the whole might be burned on the funeral pile. His requeſt was granted by one of Galba's freedmen, and his obſequies were performed with the uſual ceremonies. Though his death ſeemed to be the ſource of univerſal gladneſs, yet many of his favorites lamented his fall, and were grieved to ſee that their pleaſures and amuſements were ſtopped by the death of the patron of debauchery and extravagance. Even the king of Parthia ſent ambaſſadors to Rome to condole with the Romans, and to beg that they would honor and revere the memory of Nero. His ſtatues were alſo crowned with garlands of flowers, and many believed that he was not dead, but that he would ſoon make his appearance, and take a due vengeance upon his enemies. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, in finiſhing the character of this tyrannical emperor, that the name of Nero is even now uſed emphatically to expreſs a barbarous and unfeeling oppreſſor. Pliny calls him the common enemy and the fury of mankind, and in this he has been followed by all writers who exhibit Nero as a pattern of the moſt execrable barbarity and unpardonable wantonneſs. Plut. in Galb.—Suet. in vitâ.—Plin. 7, c. 8. &c.—Dio. 64.—*Aurel. He was afterwards made conſul, and intercepted Aſdrubal, who was paſſing from Spain into Italy with a large reinforcement for his brother Annibal. An engagement was fought near the river Metaurus, in which 56,000 of the Carthaginians were left in the field of battle, and great numbers taken priſoners, 207 B.C. Aſdrubal, the Carthaginian general, was alſo killed, and his head cut off and thrown into his brother's camp by the conquerors. Appian. in Han.—Oroſ. 4.—Liv. 27, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—*Val. NERVA COCCEIUS, a Roman emperor after the death of Domitian, A.D. 96. He rendered himſelf popular by his mildneſs, his generoſity, and the active part he took in the management of affairs. He ſuffered no ſtatues to be raiſed to his honor, and he applied to the uſe of the government all the gold and ſilver ſtatues which flattery had erected to his predeceſſor. In his civil character he was the patron of good manners, of ſobriety, and temperance. He forbad the mutilation of male children, and gave no countenance to the law which permitted the marriage of an uncle with his niece. He made a ſolemn declaration that no ſenator ſhould ſuffer death during his reign; and this he obſerved with ſuch ſanctity that, when two members of the ſenate had conſpired againſt his life, he was ſatisfied to tell them that he was informed of their wicked machinations. He alſo conducted them to the public ſpectacles, and ſeated himſelf between them, and, when a ſword was offered to him, according to the uſual cuſtoms, he deſired the conſpirators to try it upon his body. Such goodneſs of heart, ſuch confidence in the ſelf-conviction of the human mind, and ſuch reliance upon the conſequence of his lenity and indulgence, conciliated the affection of all his ſubjects. Yet, as envy and danger are the conſtant companions of greatneſs, the prætorian guards at laſt mutinied, and Nerva nearly yielded to their fury. He uncovered his aged neck in the preſence of the incenſed ſoldiery, and bade them wreak their vengeance upon him, provided they ſpared the life of thoſe to whom he was indebted for the empire, and whom his honor commanded him to defend. His ſeeming ſubmiſſion was unavailing, and he was at laſt obliged to ſurrender, to the fury of his ſoldiers, ſome of his friends and ſupporters. The infirmities of his age, and his natural timidity, at laſt obliged him to provide himſelf againſt any future mutiny or tumult, by chuſing a worthy ſucceſſor. He had many friends and relations, but he did not conſider the aggrandizement of his family, and he choſe for his ſon and ſucceſſor, Trajan, a man of whoſe virtues and greatneſs of mind he was fully convinced. This voluntary choice was approved by the acclamations of the people, and the wiſdom and prudence which marked the reign of Trajan ſhowed how diſcerning was the judgment, and how affectionate were the intentions, of Nerva, for the good of Rome. He died on the 27th of July, A. D. 98, in his 72d year, and his ſucceſſor ſhowed his reſpect for his merit and for his character by raiſing him altars and temples in Rome, and in the provinces, and by ranking him in the number of the gods. Nerva was the firſt Roman emperor who was of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete. Plin. paneg. —Dion. 69.——M. Cocceius, a conſul in the reign of Tiberius. Nessus, a celebrated centaur, ſon of Ixion and the Cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had entruſted to his care, with orders to carry her acroſs the river Evenus. [Vid. Dejanira.] Hercules ſaw the diſtreſs of his wife from the oppoſite ſhore of the river, and immediately he let fly one of his poiſoned arrows, which ſtruck the centaur to the heart. Neſſus, as he expired, gave the tunic he then wore to Dejanira, aſſuring her that, from the poiſoned blood which had flowed from his wounds, it had received the power of calling a huſband away from unlawful loves. Dejanira received it with pleaſure, and this mournful preſent cauſed the death of Hercules. [Vid. Hercules.] Apollod. 2, c. 7.—*Ovid. Nestŏcles, a famous ſtatuary of Greece, rival to Phidias. Plin. 34, c. 8.

Nestor, a ſon of Neleus and Chloris, nephew to Pelias, and grandſon to Neptune. He had eleven brothers, who were all killed, with his father, by Hercules. His tender age detained him at home, and was the cauſe of his preſervation. The conqueror ſpared his life, and placed him on the throne of Pylos. He married Eurydice, the daughter of Clymenes, or, according to others, Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus. He early diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field of battle, and was preſent at the nuptials of Pirithous, when a bloody battle was fought between the Lapithæ and Centaurs. As king of Pylos and Meſſenia he led his ſubjects to the Trojan war, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the reſt of the Grecian chiefs, by eloquence, addreſs, wiſdom, juſtice, and an uncommon prudence of mind. Homer diſplays his character as the moſt perfect of all his heroes; and Agamemnon exclaims, that, if he had ten generals like Neſtor, he ſhould ſoon ſee the walls of Troy reduced to aſhes. After the Trojan war, Neſtor retired to Greece, where he enjoyed, in the boſom of his family, the peace and tranquillity which were due to his wiſdom and to his old age. The manner and the time of his death are unknown; the ancients are all agreed that he lived three generations of men, which length of time ſome ſuppoſe to be 300 years, though, more probably, only 90, allowing 30 years for each generation. From that circumſtance, therefore, it was uſual among the Greeks and the Latins, when they wiſhed a long and happy life to their friends, to wiſh them to ſee the years of Neſtor. He had two daughters, Piſidice and Polycaſte; and ſeven ſons, Perſeus, Straticus, Aretus, Echephron, Piſiſtratus, Antilochus, and Traſimedes. NICETERIA, a feſtival at Athens, in memory of the victory which Minerva obtained over Neptune, in their diſpute about giving a name to the capital of the country.

NICIA, a city. [Vid. Nicæa.]——A river falling into the Po at Brixellum. It is now called Lenza, and ſeparates the duchy of Modena from Parma.

NICIAS, an Athenian general, celebrated for his valor and for his misfortunes. He early conciliated the good will of the people by his liberality, and he eſtabliſhed his military character by taking the iſland of Cythera from the power of Lacedæmon. When Athens determined to make war againſt Sicily, Nicias was appointed, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to conduct the expedition, which he reprobated as impolitic, and as the future cauſe of calamities to the Athenian power. In Sicily he behaved with great firmneſs, but he often blamed the quick and inconſiderate meaſures of his colleagues. The ſucceſs of the Athenians remained long doubtful. Alcibiades was recalled by his enemies to take his trial, and Nicias was left at the head of affairs. Syracuſe was ſurrounded by by a wall, and, though the operations were carried on ſlowly, yet the city would have ſurrendered, had not the ſudden appearance of Gylippus, the Corinthian ally of the Sicilians, cheered up the courage of the beſieged at the critical moment. Gylippus propoſed terms of accommodation to the Athenians, which were refuſed; ſome battles were fought in which the Sicilians obtained the advantage, and Nicias at laſt, tired of his ill ſucceſs, and grown deſponding, demanded of the Athenians a reinforcement or a ſucceſſor. Demoſthenes, upon this, was ſent with a powerful fleet, but the advice of Nicias was deſpiſed, and the admiral, by his cagerneſs to come to a deciſive engagement, ruined his fleet and the intereſt of Athens. The fear of his enemies at home prevented Nicias from leaving Sicily; and when, at laſt, a continued ſeries of ill ſucceſs obliged him to comply, he found himſelf ſurrounded on every ſide by the enemy, without hope of eſcaping. He gave himſelf up to the conquerors with all his army, but the aſſurances of ſafety which he had received ſoon proved vain and falſe, and he was no ſooner in the hands of the enemy than he was ſhamefully put to death with Demoſthenes. His troops were ſent to quarries, where the plague and hard labor diminiſhed their numbers and aggravated their misfortunes. Some ſuppoſe that the death of Nicias was not violent. He periſhed about 413 years before Chriſt, and the Athenians lamented in him a great and valiant but unfortunate general. *Plut. in vitâ.—C. friends, who discovered the conspiracy of Dymus. Curt. 6.——An excellent painter.——A Pythagorean philosopher.——A Lacedæmonian general, conquered by Timotheus.——A writer in the fifth century, &c.

NICOMĒDES 1st. a king of Bithynia, about 278 years before the Christian era. It was by his exertions that this part of Asia became a monarchy. He behaved with great cruelty to his brothers, and built a town which he called by his own name, Nicomedia. Justin.—Pausan. &c.——The 2d, was ironically surnamed Philopater, because he drove his father Prusias from the kingdom of Bithynia, and caused him to be assassinated, B. C. 149. He reigned 59 years. Mithridates laid claim to his kingdom, but all their disputes were decided by the Romans, who deprived Nicomedes of the province of Paphlagonia, and his ambitious rival of Cappadocia. He gained the affections of his subjects by a courteous behaviour, and by a mild and peaceful government. Justin.——The 3d, son and successor of the preceding, was dethroned by his brother Socrates, and afterwards by the ambitious Mithridates. The Romans re-established him on his throne, and encouraged him to make reprisals upon the king of Pontus. He followed their advice, and he was, at last, expelled another time from his dominions, till Sylla came into Asia, who restored him to his former power and affluence. Strab.—Appian.——The 4th of that name, was son and successor of Nicomedes 3d. He passed his life in an easy and tranquil manner, and enjoyed the peace which his alliance with the Romans had procured him. He died B. C. 75, without issue, and left his kingdom, with all his possessions, to the Roman people. Strab. 12.—Appian. Mithrid.—Justin. 38, c. 2, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 5.——A celebrated geometrician in the age of the philosopher Eratosthenes. He conspired against the king's life, with Hermolaus. Curt. 8.——A painter who expressed great admiration at the sight of Helen's picture by Zeuxis. Ælian. 14, c. 47.——A dramatic actor of Ionia.——A comic poet of Argos.——An orator of Macedonia, in the reign of the emperor M. Antoninus.——A son of Menelaus and Helen.——A general of the Achæans, who defeated the Macedonians.

NICOTELEA, a celebrated woman of Messenia, who said that she became pregnant of Aristomenes by a serpent. Paus. 4, c. 14.

NICOTĔLES, a Corinthian drunkard, &c. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

NIGER, a friend of M. Antony, sent to him by Octavia.——A surname of Clitus, whom Alexander killed in a fit of drunkenness.——C. Pescennius Justus, a celebrated governor in Syria, well known by his valor in the Roman armies, while yet a private man. At the death of Pertinax, he was declared emperor of Rome, and his claims to that elevated situation were supported by a sound understanding, prudence of mind, moderation, courage, and virtue. He proposed to imitate the actions of the venerable Antoninus, of Trajan, of Titus, and M. Aurelius. He was remarkable for his fondness for ancient discipline, and never suffered his soldiers to drink wine, but obliged them to quench their thirst with water and vinegar. He forbad the use of silver or gold utensils in his camp, and the bakers and cooks were driven away and and the ſoldiers ordered to live, during the expedition they undertook, merely upon biſcuits. In his puniſhments, Niger was inexorable: he condemned ten of his ſoldiers to be beheaded in the preſence of the army, becauſe they had ſtolen and eaten a fowl. The ſentence was heard with groans: the army interfered: and, when Niger conſented to diminiſh the puniſhment for fear of kindling rebellion, he yet ordered the criminals to make each a reſtoration of ten fowls to the perſon whoſe property they had ſtolen; they were, beſides, ordered not to light a fire the reſt of the campaign, but to live upon cold aliments, and to drink nothing but water. Such great qualifications in a general ſeemed to promiſe the reſtoration of ancient diſcipline in the Roman armies, but the death of Niger fruſtrated every hope of reform. Severus, who had alſo been inveſted with the imperial purple, marched againſt him; ſome battles were fought, and Niger was, at laſt, defeated, A. D. 194. His head was cut off, and fixed to a long ſpear, and carried in triumph through the ſtreets of Rome. He reigned about one year. Herodian. 3.—Eutrop.

NIGER, or NIGRIS, (itis), a river of Africa, which riſes in Æthiopia, and falls by three mouths into the Atlantic, little known to the antients, and not yet ſatisfactorily explored by the moderns. Plin. 5, c. 1 & 8.

P. NIGIDIUS FIGŬLUS, a celebrated philoſopher and aſtrologer at Rome, one of the moſt learned men of his age. He was intimate with Cicero, and gave him his moſt unbiaſſed opinions concerning the conſpirators who had leagued to deſtroy Rome with Catiline. He was made prætor, and honored with a ſeat in the ſenate. In the civil wars he followed the intereſt of Pompey, for which he was baniſhed by the conqueror. He died in the place of his baniſhment, 47 years before Chriſt. Cic. ad fam. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 639.

NIGRITÆ, a people of Africa, who dwell on the banks of the Niger. Mela. 1, c. 4.—Plin. 5, c. 1.

NILEUS, a ſon of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Aſia, where he built Epheſus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenæ, &c. Pauſ. 7, c. 2, &c.——A philoſopher who had in his poſſeſſion all the writings of Ariſtotle. Athen. 1.

NILUS, a king of Thebes, who gave his name to the river which flows through the middle of Egypt and falls into the Mediterranean ſea. The Nile, anciently called Ægyptus, is one of the moſt celebrated rivers in the world. Its ſources were unknown to the antients, and the moderns are equally ignorant of their ſituation, whence an impoſſibility is generally meant by the proverb of Nili caput quærere. It flows through the middle of Egypt in a northern direction, and when it comes to the town of Cercaſorum, it then divides itſelf into ſeveral ſtreams, and falls into the Mediterranean by ſeven mouths. The moſt eaſtern canal is called the Peluſian, and the moſt weſtern is called the Canopic mouth. The other canals are the Sebennytican, that of Sais, the Mendeſian, Bolbitinic, and Bucolic. They have all been formed by nature, except the two laſt, which have been dug by the labors of men. The iſland which the Nile forms by its diviſion into ſeveral ſtreams is called Delta, from its reſemblance to the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. The Nile yearly overflows the country, and it is to thoſe regular inundations that the Egyptians are indebted for the fertile produce of their lands. It begins to riſe in the month of May for 100 ſucceſſive days, and then decreaſes gradually the ſame number of days. If it does not riſe as high as 16 cubits, a famine is generally expected, but if it exceeds this by many cubits, it is of the moſt dangerous conſequences; houſes are overturned, the cattle are drowned, and a great number of inſects are produced from the mud, which deſtroy the fruits of the earth. The river, therefore, proves a bleſſing or a calamity to Egypt, and the proſperity of the nation depends ſo much upon it, that the tributes of the inhabitants were in ancient times, and are ſtill under the preſent government, proportioned to the riſe of the waters. The cauſes of the overflowings of the Nile, which remained unknown to the ancients, though ſearched with the greateſt application, are owing to the heavy rains which regularly fall in Æthiopia, in the months of April and May, and which ruſh down like torrents upon the country, and lay it all under water. Theſe cauſes, as ſome people ſuppoſe, were well known to Homer, as he ſeems to ſhew it, by ſaying, that the Nile flowed down from heaven. The inhabitants of Egypt, near the banks of the river, were called Niliaci, Niligenæ, &c. and large canals were alſo from this river denominated Nili or *Euripi. Cic. NINNIUS, a tribune who oppoſed Clodius the enemy of Cicero.

NINIAS. Vid. Ninyas.

NINUS, a ſon of Belus who built a city to which he gave his own name, and founded the Aſſyrian monarchy of which he was the firſt ſovereign, B. C. 2059. He was very warlike, and extended his conqueſts from Egypt to the extremities of India and Bactriana. He became enamoured of Semiramis the wife of one of his officers, and he married her after her huſband had deſtroyed himſelf through fear of his powerful rival. Ninus reigned 52 years, and at his death he left his kingdom to the care of his wife Semiramis, by whom he had a ſon. The hiſtory of Ninus is very obſcure and even fabulous according to the opinion of ſome. Cteſias is the principal hiſtorian from whom it is derived, but little reliance is to be placed upon him, when Ariſtotle deems him unworthy to be believed. Ninus after death received divine honors, and became the Jupiter of the Aſſyrians and the Hercules of the Chaldeans. Cteſias.—Diod. 2.—Juſtin. 1, c. 1.—Herodot. 2.——A celebrated city, now Nino, the capital of Aſſyria, built on the banks of the Tigris by Ninus, and called Nineveh in Scripture. It was, according to the relation of Diodorus Siculus, fifteen miles long, nine broad, and forty-eight in circumſtance. It was ſurrounded by large walls 100 feet high, on the top of which three chariots could paſs together abreaſt, and was defended by 1500 towers each 200 feet high. Ninus was taken by the united armies of Cyaxares and Nabopolaſſar king of Babylon, B. C. 606. Strab. 1.—Diod. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 185, &c.—Pauſ. 8, c. 33.—Lucian.

NINYAS, a ſon of Ninus and Semiramis king of Aſſyria, who ſucceeded his mother who had voluntarily abdicated the crown. Some ſuppoſe that Semiramis was put to death by her own ſon, becauſe ſhe had encouraged him to commit inceſt. The reign of Ninyas is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. The prince left the care of the government to his favorites and miniſters, and gave himſelf up to pleaſure, riot, and debauchery, and never appeared in public. His ſucceſſors imitated the example of his voluptuouſneſs, and therefore their name or hiſtory are little known till the age of Sardanapalus. Juſtin. 1, c. 2.—Diod. 1, &c.

NIOBE, a daughter of Tantalus king of Lydia by Euryanaſſa or Dione. She married Amphion the ſon of Jaſus, by whom ſhe had ten ſons and ten daughters according to Heſiod, or two ſons and three daughters according to Herodotus. Homer and Propertius ſay, that ſhe had ſix daughters and as many ſons; and Ovid, Apollodorus, &c. according to the more received opinion, ſupport that ſhe had ſeven ſons and ſeven daughters. The ſons were Sipylus, Minytus, Tantalus, Agenor, Phædimus, Damaſichthon, and Ilmenus; and thoſe of the daughters, Cleodoxa, Ethodæa or Thera, Aſtyoche, Phthia, Pelopia or Chloris, Aſticratea, and Ogygia. The number of her children encreaſed her pride, and ſhe had the imprudence not only to prefer herſelf to Latona who had only two children, but ſhe even inſulted her, and ridiculed the worſhip which was paid to her, obſerving, that ſhe had a better claim to altars and ſacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana. This inſolence provoked Latona. She entreated her children to puniſh the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the ſons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters, except Chloris, were equally deſtroyed by Diana; and Niobe, ſtruck at the ſuddenneſs of her misfortunes, was changed into a ſtone. The carcaſes of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were left unburied in the plains for nine ſucceſſive days, becauſe Jupiter changed into ſtones all ſuch as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day they were honored with a funeral by the gods. Homer. Il. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—*Ovid. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Argus, who gave his name to Argia or Argolis, a country of Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 2, c. 22.—Apollod. 2. c. 1. l. 3, c. 8.

NIPHÆUS, a man killed by horſes, &c. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 570.

NIPHATES, a mountain of Aſia, which divides Armenia from Aſſyria, and from which the Tigris takes its riſe. Virg. G. 3, v. 30.—Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 15.——A river of Armenia, falling into the Tigris. Horat. 2, od. 9.—Lucan. 3, v. 245.

NIPHE, one of Diana's companions. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 245.

NIREUS, a king of Naxos, ſon of Charops and Aglaia, celebrated for his beauty. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.—Horat. 2, od. 20.

NISA, a town of Greece. Homer. Il. 2.——A country woman. Virg. Ecl. 8.——A place. Vid. Nyſa.——A celebrated plain of Media, near the Caſpian ſea, famous for its horſes.

NISÆA, a naval ſtation on the coaſts of Megaris. Strab. 9.——A town of Parthia, called alſo Niſa.

NISEIA. Vid. Niſus.

NISÆE, a ſea nymph. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 826.

NISĬBIS, a town of Meſopotamia built by a colony of Macedonians on the Tigris, and celebrated as being a barrier between the provinces of Rome and the Perſian empire during the reign of the Roman emperors. It was ſometimes called Antiochia Mygdonica. Joſeph. 20, c. 2.—Strab. 11.—Ammian. 25, &c.—Plin. 6, c. 13.

NISUS, a ſon of Hyrtacus, born on mount Ida near Troy. He came to Italy with Æneas, and ſignalized himſelf by his valor againſt the Rutulians. He was united in the cloſeſt friendſhip with Euryalus, a young Trojan, and with him he entered, in the dead of night, the enemy's camp. As they were returning victorious, after much bloodſhed, they were perceived by the Rutulians; who attacked Euryalus. Niſus in endeavouring to reſcue his friend from the enemy's darts, periſhed himſelf with him, and their heads were cut off and fixed on a ſpear, and carried in triumph to the camp. Their death was greatly lamented by all the Trojans, and their great friendſhip, like that of a Pylades and an Oreſtes, or of a Theſeus and Pirithous, is become proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 176, &c.——A king of Dulichium, remarkable for his probity and virtue. Homer. Od. 18.——A king of Megara, ſon of Mars, or more probably of Pandion. He inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, and received as his portion the country of Megaris. The peace of the brothers was interrupted by the hoſtilities of Minos, who wiſhed to avenge the death of his ſon Androgeus, who had been murdered by the Athenians. Megara was beſieged, and Attica laid waſte. The fate of Niſus depended totally upon a yellow lock, which, as long as it continued on his head, according to the words of an oracle, promiſed him life and ſucceſs to his affairs. His daughter Scylla (often called Niſeia Virgo) ſaw from the walls of Megara the royal beſieger, and ſhe became deſperately enamoured of him. To obtain a more immediate interview with this object of her paſſion, ſhe ſtole away the fatal hair from her father's head as he was aſleep; the town was immediately taken, but Minos diſregarded the ſervices of Scylla, and ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea. The gods changed her into a lark, and Niſus aſſumed the nature of the hawk, at the very moment that he gave himſelf death, not to fall into the enemy's hands. Theſe two birds have continually been at variance with each other, and Scylla, by her apprehenſions at the ſight of her father, ſeems to ſuffer the puniſhment which her perfidy deſerved. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 6, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 404, &c.

NISYROS, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, at the weſt of Rhodes with a town of the ſame name. It was originally joined to the iſland of Cos, according to Pliny, and it bore the name of Porphyris. Neptune, who was ſuppoſed to have ſeparated them with a blow of his trident, and to have then overwhelmed the giant Polybotes, was worſhipped there, and called Niſyreus. Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Strab. 10.

NITĒTIS, a daughter of Apries, king of Egypt, married by his ſucceſſor Amaſis to Cyrus. Polyæn. 8.

NITIOBRIGES, a people of Gaul, ſuppoſed to be Agenois, in Guienne. Cæſ. B. G. 7, c. 7.

NITŌCRIS, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge acroſs the Euphrates, in the middle of that city, and dug a number of reſervoirs for the ſuperfluous waters of that river. She ordered herſelf to be buried over one of the gates of the city, and placed an inſcription on her tomb, which ſignified that her ſucceſſors would find great treaſures within, if ever they were in need of money, but that their labors would be but ill repaid if ever they ventured to open it without neceſſity. Cyrus opened it through curioſity, and was ſtruck to find within theſe words, If thy avarice had not been inſatiable thou never wouldſt have violated the monuments of the dead. Herodot. 1, c. 185.——A queen of Egypt who built a third pyramid.

NITRIA, a country of Egypt with two towns of the ſame name, above Memphis.

NIVARIA, an iſland at the weſt of Africa, ſuppoſed to be Teneriff, one of the Canaries. Plin. 6, c. 32.

NOAS, a river of Thrace falling into the Iſter. Herodot. 4, c. 49.

NOCMON, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

NOCTILŪCA, a ſirname of Diana. She had a temple at Rome, on mount Palatine. Varro de L. L. 4.—Horat. 4, od. 6.

NOLA, an ancient town of Campania, which became a Roman colony before the firſt Punic war. It was founded by a Tuſcan, or according to others by an Eubœan colony. It is ſaid that Virgil had introduced the name of Nola in his Georgics, but that, when he was refuſed a glaſs of water by the inhabitants as he paſſed through the city, he totally blotted it out of his poem, and ſubſtituted the word ora, in the 225th line line of the 2d book of his Georgics. Nola was beſieged by Annibal, and bravely defended by Marcellus. Auguſtus died there on his return from Neapolis to Rome. Bells were firſt invented there in the beginning of the fifth century, from which reaſon they have been called Nolæ or Campanæ, in Latin. The inventor was St. Paulinus the biſhop of the place, who died A. D. 431, though many imagine that bells were known long before, and only introduced into churches by that prelate. Before his time, congregations were called to the church by the noiſe of wooden rattles (ſaxa ligna). Paterc. 1, c. 7.—Suet. in Aug. —Sil. 12, v. 161.—A. Gellius, 7, c. 20. —Liv. 23, c. 14 & 39. l. 24, c. 13.

Nomădes, a name given to all thoſe uncivilized people who had no fixed habitation, and who continually changed the place of their reſidence, to go in queſt of freſh paſture, for the numerous cattle which they tended. There were Nomades in Scythia, India, Arabia, and Africa. Thoſe of Africa were afterwards called Numidians, by a ſmall change of the letters which compoſed their name. Ital. 1, v. 215.—Plin. 5, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, c. 15. l. 4, c. 187.—Strab. 7.—Mela. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 4.—*Virg. Nomæ, a town of Sicily. Diod. 11.—Sil. 14, v. 266.

Nomentānus, an epithet applied to L. Caſſius as a native of Nomentum. He is mentioned by Horace as a mixture of luxury and diſſipation. Horat. 1. Sat. 1. v. 102, & alibi.

Nomentum, a town of the Sabines in Italy, now called Lamentana. The dictator Q. Servilius Priſcus, gave the Veientes and Fidenates battle there A. U. C. 312, and totally defeated them. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 905.—Liv. 1, c. 38. l. 4, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.

Nomius, a ſirname given to Apollo, becauſe he fed (νεμω, paſco) the flocks of king Admetus in Theſſaly. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

Nōnācris, a town of Arcadia, which received its name from a wife of Lycaon. There was a mountain of the ſame name in the neighbourhood. Evander is ſometimes called Nonacrius heros, as being an Arcadian by birth, and Atalanta Nonacria, as being a native of the place. Curt. 10, c. 10.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 97. Met. 8, fab. 10.—Pauſ. 8, c. 17, &c.

Nonius, a Roman ſoldier impriſoned for paying reſpect to Galba's ſtatues, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 56.——A Roman who exhorted his countrymen after the fatal battle of Pharſalia, and the flight of Pompey, by obſerving that eight ſtandards (aquilæ) ſtill remained in the camp, to which Cicero anſwered, recte, ſi nobis cum graculis bellum eſſet.

Nonnius Marcellus, a grammarian whoſe treatiſe de variâ ſignificatione verborum was edited by Mercer, 8vo. Paris 1614.

Nonnus, a Greek writer of the 5th century, who wrote an account of the embaſſy he had undertaken to Æthiopia, among the Saracens, and other eaſtern nations. He is alſo known by his Dionyſiaca, a wonderful collection of heathen mythology and erudition, edited 4to. Antwerp, 1569. His paraphraſe on John was edited by Heinſius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1627.

Nopia or Cnopia, a town of Bœotia, where Amphiaraus had a temple.

Nora, now Nour, a place of Phrygia, where Eumenes retired for ſome time, &c. C. Nepos.——A town. Vid. Norax.

Norba, a town of the Volſci. Liv. 2, c. 34.——Cæſaria, a town of Spain on the Tagus.

C. Norbānus, a young and ambitious Roman who oppoſed Sylla, and joined his intereſt to that of young Marius. In his conſulſhip he marched againſt Sylla, by whom he was defeated, &c. Plut.——A friend and general of Auguſtus employed in Macedonia againſt the republicans. He was defeated by Brutus, &c.

Norĭcum, a country of ancient Illyricum, which now forms a part of modern Bavaria and Auſtria. It extended between the Danube, and part of the Alps and Vindelicia. Its ſavage inhabitants, who were once governed by kings, made many incurſions upon the Romans, and were at laſt conquered under Tiberius, and the country became a dependent province. In the reign of Dioclefian Noricum was divided into two parts, Ripenſe and Mediterranean. The iron that was drawn from Noricum was eſteemed excellent, and thence Noricus enſis was uſed to expreſs the goodneſs of a ſword. *Dionyſ. NOX, one of the moſt antient deities among the heathens, daughter of Chaos. From her union with her brother Erebus, ſhe gave birth to the Day and the Light. She was alſo the mother of the Parcæ, Heſperides, Dreams, of Diſcord, Death, Momus, Fraud, &c. She is called by ſome of the poets the mother of all things, of gods as well as of men, and therefore ſhe was worſhipped with great ſolemnity by the ancients. She had a famous ſtatue in Diana's temple at Epheſus. It was uſual to offer her a black ſheep, as ſhe was the mother of the furies. The cock was alſo offered to her, as that bird proclaims the approach of day, during the darkneſs of the night. She is repreſented as mounted on a chariot and covered with a veil beſpangled with ſtars. The conſtellations generally went before her as her conſtant meſſengers. Sometimes ſhe is ſeen holding two children under her arms, one of which is black, repreſenting death or rather night, and the other white repreſenting ſleep, or day. Some of the moderns have deſcribed her as a woman veiled in mourning, and crowned with poppies, and carried on a chariot drawn by owls and bats. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 950.—*Ovid. NUCERIA, a town of Campania taken by Annibal. It became a Roman colony under Auguſtus, and was called Nuceria Conſtantia, or Alfaterna. It now bears the name of Nocera, and contains about 30,000 inhabitants. Lucan. 2, v. 472.—Liv. 9, c. 41, l. 27, c. 3.——A town of Umbria, at the foot of the Apennines. Strab.—Plin.

NUITHONES, a people of Germany poſſeſſing the country now called Mecklenburg and Pomerania. Tacit. G. 40.

NUMA MARCIUS, a man made governor of Rome by Tullus Hoſtilius. He was ſon-in-law of Numa Pompilius, and father to Ancus Martius. Tacit. A. 6, c. 11.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

NUMA POMPILIUS, a celebrated philoſopher, born at Cures, a village of the Sabines, on the day that Romulus laid the foundation of Rome. He married Tatia the daughter of Tatius the king of the Sabines, and at her death he retired into the country to devote himſelf more freely to literary purſuits. At the death of Romulus, the Romans fixed upon him to be their new king, and two ſenators were ſent to acquaint him with the deciſions of the ſenate and of the people. Numa refuſed their offers, and it was not but at the repeated ſolicitations and prayers of his friends, that he was prevailed upon to accept the royalty. The beginning of his reign was popular, and he diſmiſſed the 300 body guards which his predeceſſor had kept around his perſon, obſerving that he did not diſtruſt a people who had compelled him to reign over them. He was not, like Romulus, fond of war, and military expeditions, but he applied himſelf to tame the ferocity of his ſubjects, to inculcate in their minds a reverence for the deity, and to quell their diſſenſions by dividing all the citizens into different claſſes. He eſtabliſhed different orders of prieſts, and taught the Romans not to worſhip the deity by images; and from his example no graven or painted ſtatues appeared in the temples or ſanctuaries of Rome for upwards of 160 years. He encouraged the report which was ſpread of his paying regular viſits to the the nymph Egeria, and made uſe of her name to give ſanction to the laws and inſtitutions which he had introduced. He eſtabliſhed the college of the veſtals, and told the Romans that the ſafety of the empire depended upon the preſervation of the ſacred ancyle or ſhield which, as was generally believed, had dropped down from heaven. He dedicated a temple to Janus, which, during his whole reign, remained ſhut, as a mark of peace and tranquillity at Rome. Numa died after a reign of 43 years, in which he had given every poſſible encouragement to the uſeful arts, and in which he had cultivated peace, B. C. 672. Not only the Romans, but alſo the neighbouring nations, were eager to pay their laſt offices to a monarch whom they revered for his abilities, moderation, and humanity. He forbad his body to be burnt according to the cuſtom of the Romans, but he ordered it to be buried near mount Janiculum, with many of the books which he had written. Theſe books were accidentally found by one of the Romans about 400 years after his death, and as they contained nothing new or intereſting, but merely the reaſons why he had made innovations in the form of worſhip and in the religion of the Romans, they were burnt by order of the ſenate. He left behind one daughter called Pompilia, who married Numa Marcius, and became the mother of Ancus Martius the fourth king of Rome. Some ſay that he had alſo four ſons, but this opinion is ill founded. Plut. in vitâ. —Varro.—Liv. 1.—Plin 13 & 14, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6 & 9.—*Cic. de Nat. NUMĀNA, a town of Picenum in Italy, of which the people were called Numanates. Mela. 2, c. 4.

NUMANTIA, a town of Spain near the ſources of the river Durius, celebrated for the long war which it maintained againſt the Romans. The inhabitants obtained ſome advantages over the Roman forces till Scipio Africanus was empowered to finiſh the war, and to ſee the deſtruction of Numantia. He began the ſiege with an army of 60,000 men, and was bravely oppoſed by the beſieged who were no more than 4000 men able to bear arms. Both armies behaved with uncommon valor, and the courage of the Numantines was ſoon changed into deſpair and fury. Their proviſions began to fail, and they fed upon the fleſh of their horſes, and afterwards of that of their dead companions, and at laſt were neceſſitated to draw lots to kill and devour one another. The melancholy ſituation of their affairs obliged ſome to ſurrender to the Roman general. Scipio demanded them to deliver themſelves up on the morrow; they refuſed, and when a longer time had been granted to their petitions, they retired and ſet fire to their houſes, and all deſtroyed themſelves, B. C. 133, ſo that not even one remained to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. Some hiſtorians however deny that, and ſupport that a number of Numantines delivered themſelves into Scipio's hands, and that 50 of them were drawn in triumph at Rome, and the reſt ſold as ſlaves. The fall of Numantia was more glorious than that of Carthage or Corinth, though inferior to them. The conqueror obtained the ſirname of Numantinus. Flor. 2, c. 18.—*Appian. NUMANTĪNA, a woman accuſed under Tiberius of making her huſband inſane by enchantments, &c. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 22.

NUMĀNUS REMŬLUS, a Rutulian who accuſed the Trojans of effeminacy. He had married the younger ſiſter of Turnus, and was killed by Aſcanius during the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 592, &c.

NUMĒNES, a follower of the doctrines of Plato and Pythagoras, born at Apamea in Syria. He floriſhed in the reign of M. Antoninus.

NUMENIA, or NEOMENIA, a feſtival obſerved by the Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month, in honor of all the gods, but eſpecially of Apollo, or the ſun, who is juſtly deemed the author of light, and of whatever diſtinction is made in the months, ſeaſons, days, and nights. It was obſerved with games and public entertainments which were provided at the expence of rich citizens, and which were always frequented by the poor. Solemn prayers were offered at Athens during the ſolemnity for the proſperity of the republic. The demigods as well as the heroes of the antients were honored and invoked in the feſtival.

NUMENIUS, a philoſopher who ſuppoſed that Chaos from which the world was created was animated by an evil and maleficent ſoul. He lived in the ſecond century.

NUMENTĀNA VIA, a road at Rome which led to mount Sacer through the gate Viminalis. Liv. 3, c. 52.

NUMERIĀNUS, M. Aurelius, a ſon of the emperor Carus. He accompanied his father into the eaſt with the title of Cæſar, and at his death he ſucceeded him with his brother Carinus, B. C. 282. His reign was ſhort. Eight months after his father's death, he was murdered in his litter by his father-in-law Arri-

Anius Aper, who accompanied him in an expedition. The murderer, who hoped to aſcend the vacant throne, continued to follow the litter as if the emperor was alive, till he found a proper opportunity to declare his ſentiments. The ſtench of the body however ſoon diſcovered his perfidy, and he was ſacrificed to the fury of the ſoldiers. Numerianus has been admired for his learning as well as his moderation. He was naturally an eloquent ſpeaker, and in poetry he was inferior to no writer of his age.——A friend of the emperor Severus.

NUMERIUS, a man who favored the eſcape of Marius to Africa, &c.——A friend of Pompey taken by J. Cæſar's adherents. &c. Plin.

NUMICIA VIA, one of the great Roman roads which led from the capital to the town of Brunduſium.

NŬMĪCUS, a ſmall river of Latium near Lavinium, where the dead body of Æneas was found, and where Anna, Dido's ſiſter, drowned herſelf. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 150, &c.—Sil. 1, v. 359.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 358, &c. Faſt. 3, v. 643.——A friend of Horace, to whom he addreſſed 1 ep. 6.

NUMĬDA, a ſirname given by Horace 1 od. 36, to one of the generals of Auguſtus, from his conqueſts in Numidia. Some ſuppoſe that it is Pomponius, others, Plotius.

NŬMĬDIA, an inland country of Africa, which now forms the kingdom of Algiers and Bildulgerid. It was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean ſea, ſouth by Gætulia, weſt by Mauritania, and eaſt by a part of Libya, which was called Africa Propria. The inhabitants were called Nomades, and afterwards Numidæ. It was the kingdom of Maſiniſſa, who was the occaſion of the third Punic war, on account of the offence he had received from the Carthaginians. Jugurtha reigned there, as alſo Juba the father and ſon. It was conquered, and became a Roman province, of which Salluſt was the firſt governor. The Numidians were excellent warriors, and in their expeditions they always endeavoured to engage with the enemy in the night time. They rode without ſaddles or bridles, whence they have been called infræni. They had their wives in common as the reſt of the barbarian nations of antiquity. Sallaſt. in Jug.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Strab. 2 & 17.—Mela. 1, c. 4, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 754.

NUMIDIUS QUADRATUS, a governor of Syria under Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 12.

NUMISTRO, a town of the Brutii in Italy. Liv. 45, c. 17.

NŬMĬTOR, a ſon of Procas, king of Alba, who inherited his father's kingdom with his brother Amulius, and began to reign conjointly with him. Amulius was too avaricious to bear a Colleague on the throne; he expelled his brother, and that he might more ſafely ſecure himſelf, he put to death his ſon Lauſus, and conſecrated his daughter Ilia to the ſervice of the goddeſs Veſta, which demanded perpetual celibacy. Theſe great precautions were rendered abortive. Ilia became pregnant, and though the two children whom ſhe brought forth were expoſed in the river by order of the tyrant, their life was preſerved, and Numitor was reſtored to his throne by his grandſons, and the tyrannical uſurper was put to death. Dionyſ. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 3.—Plut. in Romul.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 55, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.——A ſon of Phorcus who fought with Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 342.——A rich and diſſolute Roman in the age of Juvenal 7, v. 74.

NUMITŌRIUS, a Roman who defended Virginia, to whom Appius wiſhed to offer violence. He was made military tribune. ——Q. Pullus, a general of Fregellæ, &c. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 34.

NUMONIUS. Vid. Vala.

NUNCOREUS, a ſon of Seſoſtris king of Egypt, who made an obeliſk, ſome ages after brought to Rome, and placed in the Vatican. Plin. 36, c. 11.——He is called Pheron by Herodotus.

NUNDĪNA, a goddeſs whom the Romans invoked when they named their children. This happened the ninth day after their birth, whence the name of the goddeſs, Nona dies. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 16.

NUNDĪNÆ. Vid. Feriæ.

NURSÆ, a town of Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 744.

NURSCIA, a goddeſs who patronized the Etrurians. Juv. 10, v. 74.

NURSIA, now Norza, a town of Picenum whoſe inhabitants are called Nurſini. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.—Martial. 13, ep. 20.—Liv. 28, c. 45.

NUTRIA, a town of Illyricum. Polyb. 2.

NYCTEIS, a daughter of Nyctеus, who was mother of Labdacus.——A patronymic of Antiope the daughter of Nyctеus, mother of Amphion and Zethus by Jupiter, who had aſſumed the ſhape of a ſatyr to enjoy her company. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 110.

NYCTELIUS, a ſirname of Bacchus, becauſe his orgies were celebrated in the night. (νυξ nox τελεω perficio.) The words latex Nyctelius thence ſignify wine. Seneca in Œdip.—Pauſ. 1, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.

NYCTEUS, a ſon of Hyrieus and Clonia. ——A ſon of Chthonius.——A ſon of Neptune by Celene, daughter of Atlas, king of Leſbos, or of Thebes according to the more received opinion. He married a nymph of Crete called Polyxo or Amalthæa, by whom he had two daughters, Nyctimene and Antiope. The firſt of theſe diſgraced herſelf by her criminal amours, with her father, into whoſe bed ſhe introduced herſelf by means of her nurſe. When the father knew the inceſt he had committed, he attempted to ſtab his daughter, who was immediately changed by Minerva into an owl. Nycteus made war againſt Epopeus, who had carried away Antiope, and died of a wound which he had received in an engagement, leaving his kingdom to his brother Lycus, whom he intreated to continue the war, and puniſh Antiope for her immodeſt conduct. [Vid. Antiope.] Pauſ. 2, c. 6.—Hygin. fab. 157 & 204.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 590, &c. l. 6, v. 110, &c.

NYCTIMĔNE, a daughter of Nycteus. Vid. Nycteus.

NYCTĬMUS, a ſon of Lycaon, king of Arcadia. He died without iſſue, and left his kingdom to his nephew Arcas, the ſon of Calliſto. Pauſ. 8, c. 4.

NYMBÆUM, a lake of Peloponneſus in Laconia. Id. 3, v. 23.

NYMPHÆ, certain female deities among the ancients. They were generally divided into two claſſes, nymphs of the land and nymphs of the ſea. Of the nymphs of the earth, ſome preſided over woods, and were called Dryades and Hamadryades, others preſided over mountains, and were called Oreades, ſome preſided over hills and dales, and were called Napææ, &c. Of the ſea nymphs, ſome were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, &c. Theſe preſided not only over the ſea, but alſo rivers, fountains, ſtreams, and lakes. The nymphs fixed their reſidence not only in the ſea, but alſo on mountains, rocks, in woods or caverns, and their grottoes were beautified by evergreens and delightful and romantic ſcenes. The nymphs were immortal according to the opinion of ſome mythologiſts; others ſuppoſed that, like men, they were ſubject to mortality, though their life was of long duration. They lived for ſeveral thouſand years according to Heſiod, or as Plutarch ſeems obſcurely to intimate, they lived about 9720 years. The number of the nymphs is not preciſely known. There were above 3000, according to Heſiod, whoſe power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind. They were worſhipped by the ancients, though not with ſo much ſolemnity as the ſuperior deities. They had no temples raiſed to their honor, and the only offerings they received were milk, honey, oil, and ſometimes the ſacrifice of a goat. They were generally repreſented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle, and ſometimes they held a vaſe, from which they ſeemed to pour water. Sometimes they had graſs, leaves, and ſhells inſtead of vaſes. It was deemed unfortunate to ſee them naked, and ſuch ſight was generally attended by a delirium, to which Propertius ſeems to allude in this verſe, wherein he ſpeaks of the innocence and ſimplicity of the primitive ages of the world, Nec fuerat nudas pœna videre Deas.

The nymphs were generally diſtinguiſhed by an epithet which denoted the place of their reſidence; thus the nymphs of Sicily were called Sicelides; thoſe of Corycus, Corycides, &c. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320. l. 5, v. 412. l. 9, 651, &c. Faſt. 3, v. 769.—Pauſ. 10, c. 3.—Plut. de Orac. def.—Orpheus. Arg.—Heſiod. Theogn.—Propert. 3, el. 12.—Homer. Od. 14.

NYMPHÆUM, a port of Macedonia. Cæſ. bell. civ.——A promontory of Epirus on the Ionian ſea.——A place near the walls of Apollonia, ſacred to the nymphs, where Apollo had alſo an oracle. The place was alſo celebrated for the continual flames of fire which ſeemed to riſe at a diſtance from the plains. It was there that a ſleeping ſatyr was once caught and brought to Sylla as he returned from the Mithridatic war. This monſter had the ſame features as the poets aſcribe to the ſatyr. He was interrogated by Sylla, and by his interpreters, but his articulations were unintelligible, and the Roman ſpurned from him a creature which ſeemed to partake of the nature of a beaſt more than that of a man. Plut. in Sylla.—Dio. 41.—Plin. 5.—Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 36 & 49.——A city of Taurica Cherſoneſus.——The building at Rome where the nymphs were worſhipped bore alſo this name, being adorned with their ſtatues and with fountains and water-falls which afforded an agreeable and refreſhing coolneſs.

NYMPHÆUS, a man who went into Caria at the head of a colony of Melians, &c. Polyæn. 8.

NYMPHIDIUS, a favorite of Nero, who ſaid that he was deſcended from Caligula. He was raiſed to the conſular dignity, and ſoon after diſputed the empire with Galba. He was ſlain by the ſoldiers, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15.

NYMPHIS, a native of Heraclea, who wrote an hiſtory of Alexander's life and actions, divided into 24 books. Ælian. 7, de Anim.

NYMPHODŌRUS, a writer of Amphipolis.——A Syracuſan who wrote an hiſtory of Sicily.

NYMPHOLEPTES, or Nymphomanes, poſſeſſed by the nymphs. This name was given to the inhabitants of mount Cithæron, who believed that they were inſpired by the nymphs. Plut. in Ariſt.

NYMPHON, a native of Colophon, &c. Cic. ad fra. 1.

NYPSIUS, a general of Dionyſius the tyrant who took Syracuſe, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword. Diod. 16.

NYSA or NYSSA, a town of Æthiopia, at the ſouth of Egypt, or according to others, of Arabia. This city, with another of the ſame name in India, was ſacred to the god Bacchus, who was educated there by the nymphs of the place, and who received the name of Dionyſius, which ſeems to be compounded of Διος & Νυσα, the name of his father, and that of the place of his education. The god made this place the ſeat of his empire and the capital of the conquered nations of the eaſt. Diog. 3 & 4.—Mela. 3, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 13, &c.—Ital. 7, v. 198.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 805.—According to ſome geographers there were no leſs than ten places of the name of Nyſa. One of theſe was on the coaſt of Eubœa, famous for its vines, which grew in ſuch an uncommon manner that if a twig was planted in the ground in the morning, it immediately produced grapes, which were full ripe in the evening.——A city of Thrace.——Another ſeated on the top of mount Parnaſſus, and ſacred to Bacchus. Juv. 7, v. 63.

NYSÆUS, a ſirname of Bacchus, becauſe he was worſhipped at Nyſa.——A ſon of Dionyſius of Syracuſe. C. Nep. in Diod.

NYSAS, a river of Africa, riſing in Æthiopia.

NYSIÆ PORTÆ, a ſmall iſland of Africa.

NYSIĂDES, a name given to the nymphs of Nyſa, to whoſe care Jupiter intruſted the education of his ſon Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 314, &c.

NYSĪROS, an iſland. Vid. Niſyros.

OARUS, a river of Sarmatia, falling into the Palus Mœotis. Herodot. 4.

OARSES, the original name of Artaxerxes Memnon.

OĂSIS, a town about the middle of Libya, at the diſtance of ſeven days journey from Thebes in Egypt, where the Perſian army ſent by Cambyſes to plunder Jupiter Ammon's temple was loſt in the ſands. There were two other cities of that name very little known. Oaſis became a place of baniſhment under the lower empire. Strab. 17.—Zoſim. 5, c. 97.—Herodot. 3, c. 26.

OAXES, a river of Crete which received its name from Oaxus the ſon of Apollo. Virg. Ecl. 1, v. 66.

OAXUS, a town of Crete, where Etearchus reigned, who founded Cyrene.——A ſon of Apollo and the nymph Anchiale.

OBRINGA, now Ahr, a river of Germany falling into the Rhine above Rimmagen.

OBULTRONIUS, a quæſtor put to death by Galba's orders, &c. Tacit.

OCALEA or OCALIA, a town of Bœotia, Homer. Il. 2.——A daughter of Mantineus, who married Abas, ſon of Lynceus and Hypermneſtra, by whom ſhe had Acriſius and Prœtus. Apollod. 2, c. 2.

OCEIA, a woman who preſided over the ſacred rites of Veſta for 57 years with the greateſt ſanctity. She died in the reign of Tiberius, and the daughter of Domitius ſucceeded her. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 86.

OCEĂNĬDES & OCEANĪTĬDES, ſea nymphs, daughters of Oceanus, from whom they received their name, and of the goddeſs Tethys. They were 3000 according to Apollodorus, who mentions the names of ſeven of them; Aſia, Styx, Electra, Doris, Eurynome, Amphitrite, and Metis. Heſiod ſpeaks of the eldeſt of them and reckons 41, Pitho, Admete, Prynno, Ianthe, Rhodia, Hippo, Callirhoe, Urania, Clymene, Idyia, Paſithoe, Clythia, Zeuxo, Galuxaure, Plexaure, Perſeis, Pluto, Thoe, Polydora, Melobosis, Dione, Cerceis, Xanthe, Acaſta, Ianira, Teleſtho, Europa, Meneſtho, Petrea, Eudora, Calypſo, Tyche, Ocyroe, Criſia, Amphiro, with thoſe mentioned by Apollodorus, except Amphitrite. Hyginus mentions 16 whoſe names are almoſt all different from thoſe of Apollodorus and Heſiod, which difference proceeds from the mutilation of the original text. The Oceanides, as the reſt of the inferior deities, were honored with libations and ſacrifices. Prayers were offered to them, and they were entreated to protect ſailors from ſtorms and dangerous tempeſts. The Argonauts, before they proceeded to their expedition, made an offering of flour, honey, and oil, on the ſea ſhore, to all the deities of the ſea, and ſacrificed bulls to them, and entreated their protection. When the ſacrifice was made on the ſea ſhore the blood of the victim was received in a veſſel, but when it was in open ſea, the blood was permitted to run down into the waters. When the ſea was calm the ſailors generally offered a lamb or a young pig, but if it was agitated by the winds and rough, a black bull was deemed the moſt acceptable victim. Homer. Od. 3.—Horat. —Apollon. Arg.—Virg. G. 4, v. 341.—Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1.

Oceănus, a powerful deity of the ſea, ſon of Cœlus and Terra. He married Tethys, by whom he had the moſt principal rivers ſuch as the Alpheus, Peneus, Strymon, &c. with a number of daughters who are called from him Oceanides. [Vid. Oceanides.] According to Homer, Oceanus was the father of all the gods, and on that account he received frequent viſits from the reſt of the deities. He is generally repreſented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and ſitting upon the waves of the ſea. He often holds a pike in his hand, while ſhips under ſail appear at a diſtance, or a ſea monſter ſtands near him. Oceanus preſided over every part of the ſea, and even the rivers were ſubjected to his power. The ancients were ſuperſtitious in their worſhip to Oceanus, and revered with great ſolemnity a deity to whoſe care they entruſted themſelves when going on any voyage. Heſiod. Theog.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 81, &c. —Apollod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.—Homer. Il.

Ocellus, an ancient philoſopher of Lucania. Vid. Lucanus.

Ocēlum, a town of Gaul. Cæſ. bell. G. 1, c. 10.

Ocha, a mountain of Eubœa, and the name of Eubœa itſelf.——A ſiſter of Ochus buried alive by his orders.

Ochesius, a general of Ætolia in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5.

Ochus, a ſirname given to Artaxerxes the 3d king of Perſia. Vid. Artaxerxes. ——A man of Cyzicus, who was killed by the Argonauts. Flac. 3.——A prince of Perſia, who refuſed to viſit his native country for fear of giving all the women each a piece of gold. Plut.——A river of India, or of Bactriana. Plin. 6 & 31.——A king of Perſia. He exchanged this name for that of Darius. Vid. Darius Nothus.

Ocnus, a ſon of the Tiber and of Manto, who aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. He built a town which he called Mantua after his mother's name. Some ſuppoſe that he is the ſame as Bianor. Virg. Ecl. 9. Æn. 10, v. 198.——A man remarkable for his induſtry. He had a wife as remarkable for her profuſion, ſhe always conſumed and laviſhed away whatever the labors of her huſband had earned. He is repreſented as twiſting a cord, which an aſs ſtanding by eats up as ſoon as he makes it, whence the proverb of the cord of Ocnus often applied to labor which meets no return, and which is totally loſt. Propert. 4, el. 3, v. 21.—Plin. 35, c. 11.—Pauſ. 10, c. 29.

Ocricŭlum, now Otricoli, a town of Umbria near Rome. Cic. pro Mil.—Liv. 19, c. 41.

Ocridion, a king of Rhodes who was reckoned in the number of the gods after death. Plut. in Græc. quæſt.

Ocrīsia, the wife of Corniculus, was one of the attendants of Tanaquil the wife of Tarquinius Priſcus. As ſhe was throwing into the flames, as offerings, ſome of the meats that was ſerved on the table of Tarquin, ſhe ſuddenly ſaw in the fire what Ovid calls obſcœni forma virilis. She informed the queen of it, and when by her orders ſhe had approached near it, ſhe conceived a ſon who was called Servius Tullius, and who being educated in the king's family, afterwards ſucceeded to the vacant throne. Some ſuppoſe that Vulcan had aſſumed that form which was preſented to the eyes of Ocriſia, and that the god was the father of the ſixth king of Rome. Plut. de fort. Rom.—Plin. 36, c. 27.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 627.

Octacillius, a ſlave who was manumitted, and who afterwards taught rhetoric at Rome. He had Pompey the Great in the number of his pupils. Sueton. in Rhet. —Martial. 10, ep. 79.

Octāvia, a Roman lady ſiſter to the emperor Auguſtus and celebrated for her beauty and virtues. She married Claudius Marcellus, and after his death M. Antony. Her marriage with Antony was a political ſtep to reconcile her brother and her huſband. Antony proved for ſome time attentive to her, but he ſoon after deſpiſed her for Cleopatra, and when ſhe attempted to withdraw him from this unlawful amour by going to meet him at Athens, ſhe was ſecretly rebuked and totally baniſhed from his preſence. This affront was highly reſented by Auguſtus, and though Octavia endeavoured to pacify him by palliating her huſband's behaviour, he reſolved to revenge her cauſe by arms. After the battle of Actium and the death of Antony, Octavia, forgetful of the injuries ſhe had received, took into her houſe all the children of her huſband and treated them with maternal tenderneſs. Marcellus her ſon by her firſt huſband was married to a niece of Auguſtus, and publicly intended as a ſucceſſor to his uncle. His ſudden death plunged all his family into the greateſt grief. Virgil, whom Auguſtus patronized, undertook upon himſelf to pay a melancholy tribute to the memory of a young man whom Rome regarded as her future father father and patron. He was desired to repeat his composition in the presence of Augustus and of his sister. Octavia burst into tears as soon as the poet began; but when he mentioned Tu Marcellus eris, she swooned away. This tender and pathetic encomium upon the merit and the virtues of young Marcellus was liberally rewarded by Octavia, and Virgil received 10,000 sesterces for every one of the verses. Octavia had two daughters by Antony, Antonia Major and Antonia Minor. The elder married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had Cn. Domitius the father of the emperor Nero by Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. Antonia Minor, who was as virtuous and as beautiful as her mother, married Drusus the son of Tiberius, by whom she had Germanicus, and Claudius who reigned before Nero. The death of Marcellus continually preyed upon the mind of Octavia, who died of melancholy about 10 years before the Christian era. Her brother paid great regard to her memory by pronouncing himself, her funeral oration. The Roman people also showed their respect for her virtues by their wish to pay her divine honors. Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Anton. &c.——A daughter of the emperor Claudius by Messalina. She was betrothed to Silanus, but by the intrigues of Agrippina, she was married to the emperor Nero in the 16th year of her age. She was soon after divorced on pretence of barrenness, and the emperor married Poppæa, who exercised her enmity upon Octavia by causing her to be banished into Campania. She was afterwards recalled at the instance of the people, and Poppæa, who was resolved on her ruin, caused her again to be banished to an island, where she was ordered to kill herself by opening her veins. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa. Suet. in Claud. 27. in Ner. 7 & 35.—Tacit. Ann. 12.

Octāviānus, or Octāvius Cæsar, the nephew of Cæsar the dictator. After the battle of Actium and the final destruction of the Roman republic the servile senate bestowed upon him the title and surname of Augustus, as expressive of his greatness and dignity. Vid. Augustus.

Octāvius, a Roman officer who brought Perseus, king of Macedonia, a prisoner to the consul. He was sent by his countrymen to be guardian to Ptolemy Eupator, the young king of Egypt, where he behaved with the greatest arrogance. He was assassinated by Lysias, who was before regent of Egypt. The murderer was sent to Rome.——A man who opposed Metellus in the reduction of Crete, by means of Pompey. He was obliged to retire from the island.——A man who banished Cinna from Rome and became remarkable for his probity and fondness of discipline. He was seized and put to death by order of his successful rivals Marius and Cinna.——A Roman who boasted of being in the number of Cæsar's murderers. His assertions were false, yet he was punished as if he had been accessary to the conspiracy.——A lieutenant of Crassus in Parthia. He accompanied his general to the tent of the Parthian conqueror, and was killed by the enemy as he attempted to hinder them from carrying away Crassus.——A governor of Cilicia. He died in his province, and Lucullus made applications to succeed him, &c.——A tribune of the people at Rome, whom Tib. Gracchus his colleague deposed.——A commander of the forces of Antony against Augustus.——An officer who killed himself, &c.——A tribune of the people, who debauched a woman of Pontus from her husband. She proved unfaithful to him, upon which he murdered her. He was condemned under Nero. Tacit. Ann. & Hist.—Plut. in vitis.—Flor.—Liv. &c.——A poet in the Augustan age intimate with Horace. He also distinguished himself as an historian. Horat. 1. Sat. 10, v. 82.

Octodurus, a village in the modern country of Switzerland, now called Martigny. Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 1.

Octolophum, a place of Greece. Liv. 31.

Ocypĕte, one of the Harpies, who infected whatever she touched. The name signifies swift flying. Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.——A daughter of Thaumas.——A daughter of Danaus.

Ocўroe, a daughter of Chiron, who had the gift of prophecy. She was changed into a mare. Vid. Melanippe. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 638, &c.——A woman carried away by Apollo, as she was going to a festival at Miletus.

Odenātus, a celebrated prince of Palmyra. He early inured himself to bear fatigues, and by hunting leopards and wild beasts, he accustomed himself to the labors of a military life. He was faithful to the Romans, and when Aurelian had been taken prisoner by Sapor, king of Persia, Odenatus warmly interested himself in his cause, and solicited his release by writing a letter to the conqueror and sending him presents. The king of Persia was offended at the liberty of Odenatus, he tore the letter, and ordered the presents which were offered to be thrown into a river. To punish Odenatus, who had the impudence, as he obſerved, to pay homage to ſo great a monarch as himſelf, he ordered him to appear before him, on pain of being devoted to inſtant deſtruction, with all his family, if he dared to refuſe. Odenatus diſdained the ſummons of Sapor, and oppoſed force to force. He obtained ſome advantages over the troops of the Perſian monarch, and took his wife priſoner with a great and rich booty. Theſe ſervices were ſeen with gratitude by the Romans; and Gallienus, the then reigning emperor, named Odenatus as his colleague on the throne, and gave the title of Auguſtus to his children, and to his wife the celebrated Zenobia. Odenatus, inveſted with new power, reſolved to ſignalize himſelf more conſpicuouſly by conquering the northern barbarians, but his exultation was ſhort, and he periſhed by the dagger of one of his relations, whom he had ſlightly offended in a domeſtic entertainment. He died at Emeſſa, about the 267th year of the Chriſtian era. Zenobia ſucceeded to all his titles and honors.

Odessus, a ſea port town at the weſt of the Euxine ſea in Lower Mœſia, below the mouths of the Danube. Ovid. 1. Triſt. 9, v. 37.

Odeum, a muſical theatre at Athens. Vitruv. 5, c. 9.

Odīnus, a celebrated hero of antiquity, who floriſhed about 70 years before the Chriſtian era, in the northern parts of antient Germany, or the modern kingdom of Denmark. He was at once a prieſt, a ſoldier, a poet, a monarch, and a conqueror. He impoſed upon the credulity of his ſuperſtitious countrymen, and made them believe that he could raiſe the dead to life, and that he was acquainted with futurity. When he had extended his power, and encreaſed his fame by conqueſt, and by perſuaſion, he reſolved to die in a different manner from other men. He aſſembled his friends, and with the ſharp point of a lance he made on his body nine different wounds in the form of a circle, and as he expired he declared he was going into Scythia, where he ſhould become one of the immortal gods. He further added, that he would prepare bliſs and felicity for ſuch of his countrymen as lived a virtuous life, who fought with intrepidity, and who died like heroes in the field of battle. Theſe injunctions had the deſired effect, his countrymen ſuperſtitiouſly believed him, and always recommended themſelves to his protection whenever they engaged in a battle, and they entreated him to receive the ſouls of ſuch as had fallen in war.

Odītes, a ſon of Ixion, killed by Mopſus, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 457.——A prince killed at the nuptials of Andromeda. Id. ib. 5, v. 97.

ŒDIPŎDIA, a fountain of Thebes in Bœotia.

ŒDĬPUS, a ſon of Laius, king of Thebes and Jocaſta. As being deſcended from Venus by his father's ſide, Œdipus was born to be expoſed to all the dangers and the calamities which Juno could inflict upon the poſterity of the goddeſs of beauty. Laius the father of Œdipus, was informed by the oracle, as ſoon as he married Jocaſta, that he muſt periſh by the hands of his ſon. Such dreadful intelligence awakened his fears, and to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle, he reſolved never to approach Jocaſta; but his ſolemn reſolutions were violated in a fit of intoxication. The queen became pregnant, and Laius ſtill intent to ſtop the evil, ordered his wife to deſtroy her child as ſoon as it came into the world. The mother had not the courage to obey, yet, ſhe gave the child as ſoon as born to one of her domeſtics, with orders to expoſe him on the mountains. The ſervant was moved with pity, but to obey the command of Jocaſta, he bored the feet of the child, and ſuſpended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on mount Cithæron, where he was ſoon found by one of the ſhepherds of Polybus, king of Corinth. The ſhepherd carried him home, and Peribœa, the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child, with maternal tenderneſs. The accompliſhments of the infant, who was named Œdipus, on account of the ſwelling of his feet (οἰδάω tumeo, πόδες pedes,) ſoon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his ſtrength and his addreſs, and one of them, to mortify his riſing ambition, told him he was an illegitimate child. This raiſed his doubts; he aſked Peribœa, who, out of tenderneſs, told him that his ſuſpicions were ill-founded. Not ſatisfied with this, he went to conſult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for if he did, he muſt neceſſarily be the murderer of his father, and the huſband of his mother. This anſwer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the houſe of Polybus, therefore he reſolved not to return to Corinth, where ſuch calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey, met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his arm-bearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refuſed, and a conteſt enſued, in which Laius and his arm-bearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality, and of the rank of the men whom he had juſt killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphynx. This terrible monſter, whom Juno had ſent to lay waſte the country, (Vid. Sphynx,) reſorted in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all thoſe who attempted to explain without ſucceſs the enigmas which he propoſed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern, and as the ſucceſsful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the ſphynx, Creon, who, at the death of Laius, had aſcended the throne of Thebes, promiſed his crown and Jocaſta to him, who ſucceeded in the attempt. The enigma propoſed was this: What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain; he came to the monſter and ſaid, that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he ſupports his old age with the aſſiſtance of a ſtaff. The monſter, mortified at the true explanation, daſhed his head againſt a rock and periſhed. Œdipus aſcended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocaſta, by whom he had two ſons Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Iſmena and Antigone. Some years after, the Theban territories were viſited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it ſhould ceaſe, only when the murderer of king Laius was baniſhed from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumſtances that attended it never known, this anſwer of the oracle was of the greateſt concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, reſolved to overcome every difficulty by the moſt exact enquiries. His reſearches were ſucceſsful, and he was ſoon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy diſcovery was rendered the more alarming, when Œdipus conſidered, that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed inceſt with his mother. In the exceſs of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to ſee the light, and baniſhed himſelf from Thebes, or, as ſome ſay, was baniſhed by his own ſons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonos, where there was a grove ſacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in ſuch a place, and to become the ſource of proſperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A meſſenger upon this was ſent to Theſeus, king of the country, to inform him of the reſolution of Œdipus. When Theſeus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he ſtood; and to ſhow the truth of this he walked, himſelf, without the aſſiſtance of a guide, to the ſpot where he muſt expire. Immediately the earth opened and Œdipus diſappeared. Some ſuppoſe that Œdipus had not children by Jocaſta, and that the mother murdered herſelf as ſoon as ſhe knew the inceſt which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus, in the age of Pauſanias. Some of the antient poets repreſent him in hell, as ſuffering the puniſhment which crimes like his ſeemed to deſerve. According to ſome, the four children which he had were by Euriganea, the daughter of Periphas, whom he married after the death of Jocaſta. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Eurip. in Phœniſſ. &c.—*Sophocl. ŒME, a daughter of Danaus, by Crino. Apollod.

ŒNANTHES, a favorite of young Ptolemy king of Egypt.

ŒNE, a ſmall town of Argolis. The people are called Œneadæ.

ŒNEA, a river of Aſſyria. Ammian.

ŒNEUS, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, ſon of Parthaon or Portheus, and Euryte. He married Althæa the daughter of Theſtius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira. After Althæa's death, he married Peribœa the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus. In a general ſacrifice, which Œneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana, and the goddeſs to revenge this unpardonable neglect, incited his neighbours to take up arms againſt him, and beſides ſhe ſent a wild boar to lay waſte the country of Calydonia. The animal was at laſt killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chace, known by the name of the chace of the Calydonian boar. Sometime after, Meleager died, and Œneus was driven from his kingdom by the ſons of his brother Agrius. Diomedes, however, his grandſon, ſoon reſtored him to his throne; but the continual misfortunes to which he was expoſed, rendered him melancholy. He exiled himſelf from Calydon, and left his crown to his ſon-in-law Andremon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the care of Diomedes, in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of Œneæ. It is reported that Œneus received a viſit from Bacchus, and that he ſuffered the god to enjoy the favors of Althæa, and to become the father of Dejanira, for which Bacchus permitted that the wine of which he was the patron, ſhould be called among the Greeks by the name of Œneus (οἶνος). Hygin. fab. 129.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—*Homer. ŒNŎMAUS, a ſon of Mars by Sterope the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Piſa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia by Evarete, daughter of Acriſius, or Eurythoa, the daughter of Danaus. He was informed by the oracle that he ſhould periſh by the hands of his ſon-in-law, therefore as he could ſkilfully drive a chariot, he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could out-run him, on condition that all who entered the liſt ſhould agree to lay down their life if conquered. Many had already periſhed, when Pelops ſon of Tantalus, propoſed himſelf. He previouſly bribed Myrtilus the charioteer of Œnomaus, by promiſing him the enjoyment of the favors of Hippodamia, if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his maſter an old chariot, whoſe axle-tree broke on the courſe, which was from Piſa to the Corinthian iſthmus, and Œnomaus was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Piſa. As he expired, Œnomaus entreated Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Thoſe that had been defeated when Pelops entered the liſts, were Marmax, Alcathous, Euryalus, Eurymachus, Capetus, Laſius, Acrias, Chalcodon, Lycurgus, Tricolonus, Prias, Ariſtomachus, Æolius, Eurythrus, and Chronius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 4.—Pauſ. 5, c. 17. l. 6, c. 11, &c.—*Appollon. ŒNŌNA, an antient name of the iſland Ægina. It is alſo called Œnopia. Herodot. 8, c. 46.——Two villages of Attica are alſo called Œnona, or rather Œnoe.—A town of Troas, the birth place of the nymph Œnone. Strab. 13.

ŒNŌNE, a nymph of mount Ida, daughter of the river Cebrenus in Phrygia. As ſhe had received the gift of prophecy, ſhe foretold to Paris, whom ſhe married before he was diſcovered to be the ſon of Priam, that his voyage into Greece would be attended with the moſt ſerious conſequences, and the total ruin of his country, and that he ſhould have recourſe to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All theſe predictions were fulfilled; and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to Œnone, in hopes of being cured by her aſſiſtance. He expired as he came into her preſence, and Œnone was ſo ſtruck at the ſight of his dead body, that ſhe bathed it with her tears, and ſtabbed herſelf to the heart. She was mother of Corythus by Paris, and this ſon periſhed by the hand of his father, when he attempted, at the inſtigation of Œnone, to perſuade him to withdraw his affection from Helen. Dictyſ. Cret.—Ovid. de Rem. Amor. v. 457. Heroid. 5.—Lucan. 9.

ŒNOPĬDES, a mathematician of Chios. Diod. 1.

ŒNŎPION, a ſon of Ariadne by Theſeus, or, according to others, by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to ſuch a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refuſal, evaded his applications, and at laſt put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Some ſuppoſe that this violence was offered to Orion after he had diſhonored Merope. Œnopion received the iſland of Chios from Rhadamanthus, who had conquered moſt of the iſlands of the Ægean ſea, and his tomb was ſtill ſeen there in the age of Pauſanias. Some ſuppoſe, and with more probability, that he reigned not at Chios, but at Ægina, which from him was called Œnopia. Plut. in Theſ.—Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Diod. Pauſ. 7, c. 4.—Apollod. Rhod. 3.

ŒNŌTRI, the inhabitants of Œnotria.

ŒNŌTRIA, a part of Italy which was afterwards called Lucania. It received this name from Œnotrus the ſon of Lycaon, who ſettled there with a colony of Arcadians. The Œnotrians afterwards ſpread themſelves into Umbria and as far as Latium, and the country of the Sabines, according to ſome writers. The name of Œnotria is ſometimes applied to Italy. That part of Italy where Œnotrus ſettled, was before inhabited by the Auſones. Dionyſ. Hal. 1, c. 11.—Pauſ. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 536, l. 7, v. 85.—Ital. 8, v. 220.

ŒNOTRĬDES, two ſmall iſlands on the coaſt of Lucania, where ſome of the Romans were baniſhed by the emperors. They were called Iſcia and Pontia.

ŒNŌTRUS, a ſon of Lycaon of Arcadia. He paſſed into Magna Græcia with a colony, and gave the name of Œnotria to that part of the country where he ſettled. Dionyſ. Hal. 1, c. 11.—Pauſ. 1, c. 3.

ŒNŪSÆ, ſmall iſlands near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31.—Thucyd. 8.——Others on the coaſt of the Peloponneſus, near Meſſenia. Mela. 2, c. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

ŒONUS, a ſon of Licymnius, killed at Sparta, where he accompanied Hercules.——A ſmall river of Laconia. Liv. 34, c. 28.

ŒROE, an iſland of Bœotia, formed by the Aſopus. Herodot. 9, c. 50.

ŒTA, now Banina, a celebrated mountain between Theſſaly and Macedonia, upon which Hercules burnt himſelf. Its height has given occaſion to the poets to feign that the ſun, moon, and ſtars roſe behind it. Mount Œta, properly ſpeaking, is a long chain of mountains which runs from the ſtreights of Thermopylæ and the gulph of Malia, in a weſtern direction, to mount Pindus, and from thence to the bay of Ambracia. The ſtreights or paſſes of mount Œta are called the ſtreights of Thermopylæ from the hot baths and mineral waters which are in the neighbourhood. Theſe paſſes are not more than 25 feet in breadth. Mela. 2, c. 3.—Catull. 66, v. 54.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 10, c. 20, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 2, v. 216. l. 9, v. 204, &c.—*Virg. Ogulnia lex, by Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 453. It encreaſed the number of pontifices and augurs from four to nine. The addition was made to both orders from plebeian families.——A Roman lady as poor as ſhe was laſcivious. Juv. 6, v. 351.

Ogȳges, a celebrated monarch, the moſt antient of thoſe that reigned in Greece. He was ſon of Terra, or, as ſome ſuppoſe, of Neptune, and married Thebe the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Bœotia, which, from him, is ſometimes called Ogygia, and his power was alſo extended over Attica. It is ſuppoſed that he was of Egyptian or Phœnician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived, and the duration of his reign, are ſo obſcure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygian is often applied to every thing of dark antiquity. In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge, which ſo inundated the territories of Attica, that they remained waſte for near 200 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is ſuppoſed to have happened about 1764 years before the chriſtian era, previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to ſome writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was alſo marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens, and as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her color, diameter, figure, and her courſe. *Varro de R. Olpæ, a fortified place of Epirus, now Forte Castri.

Olympeum, a place in Delos.——Another in Syracuse.

Olympia, (orum,) celebrated games which received their name either from Olympia where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom they were dedicated. They were, according to some, instituted by Jupiter after his victory over the Titans, and first observed by the Idæi Dactyli, B. C. 1453. Some attribute the institution to Pelops, after he had obtained a victory over Œnomaus and married Hippodamia; but the more probable, and indeed the more received opinion is, that they were first established by Hercules in honor of Jupiter Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augias, B. C. 1222. Strabo objects to this opinion, by observing, that if they had been established in the age of Homer, the poet would have undoubtedly spoken of them, as he is in every particular careful to mention the amusements and diversions of the antient Greeks. But they were neglected after their first institution by Hercules, and no notice was taken of them according to many writers, till Iphitus, in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta, renewed them, and instituted the celebration with greater solemnity. This re-institution, which happened B. C. 884, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiads. [Vid. Olympias.] They, however, were neglected for some time after the age of Iphitus, till Corœbus, who obtained a victory B. C. 776, re-instituted them to be regularly and constantly celebrated. The care and superintendance of the games were intrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans B. C. 364, after the destruction of Pisa. These obtained great privileges from this appointment; they were in danger neither of violence nor war, but they were permitted to enjoy their possessions without molestation, as the games were celebrated within their territories. Only one person superintended till the 50th olympiad, when two were appointed. In the 103d olympiad, the number was encreased to twelve, according to the number of the tribes of Elis. But in the following olympiad, they were reduced to eight, and afterwards encreased to ten, which number continued till the reign of Adrian. The presidents were obliged solemnly to swear that they would act impartially, and not take any bribes, or discover why they rejected some of the combatants. They generally sat naked, and held before them the crown which was prepared for the conqueror. There were also certain officers to keep good order and regularity, called αλυται, much the same as the Roman lictors; of whom the chief was called αλυταρχης. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games, and whoever dared to trespass this law, was immediately thrown down from a rock. This however was sometimes neglected, for we find not only women present at the celebration, but also some among the combatants, and some rewarded with the crown. The preparations for these festivals were great. No person was permitted to enter the lists if he had not regularly exercised himself ten months before the celebration at the public gymnasium of Elis. No unfair dealings were allowed, and whoever attempted to bribe his adversary, was subjected to a severe fine. No criminals, nor such as were connected with impious and guilty persons, were suffered to present themselves as combatants; and even the father and relations were obliged to swear that they would have recourse to no artifice which might decide the victory in favor of their friends. The wrestlers were appointed by lot. Some little balls superscribed with a letter, were thrown into a silver urn, and such as drew the same letter were obliged to contend one with the other. He who had an odd letter remained the laſt, and he often had the advantage, as he was to encounter the laſt who had obtained the ſuperiority over his adverſary. He was called ἐφέδρος. In theſe games were exhibited running, leaping, wreſtling, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit, which was called altogether πένταθλον, or quinquertium. Beſides theſe, there were horſe and chariot races, and alſo contentions in poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts. The only reward that the conqueror obtained, was a crown of olive; which, as ſome ſuppoſe, was in memory of the labors of Hercules, which were accompliſhed for the univerſal good of mankind, and for which the hero claimed no other reward but the conſciouſneſs of having been the friend of humanity. So ſmall and trifling a reward ſtimulated courage and virtue, and was more the ſource of great honors than the moſt unbounded treaſures. The ſtatues of the conquerors, called Olympionicæ, were erected at Olympia, in the ſacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was that of a warlike conqueror; they were drawn in a chariot by four horſes, and every where received with the greateſt acclamations. Their entrance into their native city was not through the gates, but, to make it more grand and more ſolemn, a breach was made in the walls. Painters and poets were employed in celebrating their names; and indeed the victories ſeverally obtained at Olympia are the ſubjects of the moſt beautiful odes of Pindar. The combatants were naked; a ſcarf was originally tied round their waiſt, but when it had entangled one of the adverſaries, and been the cauſe that he loſt the victory, it was laid aſide, and no regard was paid to decency. The olympic games were obſerved every fifth year, or to ſpeak with greater exactneſs, after a revolution of four years, and in the firſt month of the fifth year, and they continued for five ſucceſſive days. As they were the moſt antient and the moſt ſolemn of all the feſtivals of the Greeks, it will not appear wonderful that they drew ſo many people together, not only inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring iſlands and countries. *Pind. OLYMPIAS, a certain ſpace of time which elapſed between the celebration of the olympic games. The olympic games were celebrated after the expiration of four complete years, whence ſome have ſaid that they were obſerved every fifth year. This period of time was called Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who computed their time by it. The cuſtom of reckoning time by the celebration of the olympic games was not introduced at the firſt inſtitution of theſe feſtivals, but to ſpeak accurately, only the year in which Coræbus obtained the prize. This olympiad, which has always been reckoned the firſt, fell, according to the accurate and learned computations of ſome of the moderns, exactly 776 years before the chriſtian era, in the year of the Julian period 3938, and 23 years before the building of Rome. The games were exhibited at the time of the full moon, next after the ſummer ſolſtice; therefore the olympiads were of unequal lengths, becauſe the time of the full moon differs 11 days every year, and for that reaſon they ſometimes began the next day after the ſolſtice, and at other times four weeks after. The computations by olympiads ceaſed, as ſome ſuppoſe, after the 364th, in the year 440 of the Chriſtian era. It was univerſally adopted, not only by the Greeks, but by many of the neighbouring countries, though ſtill the Pythian games ſerved as an epoch to the people of Delphi and to the Bœotians, the Nemæan games to the Argives and Arcadians, and the Iſthmian to the Corinthians, and the inhabitants of the Peloponneſian iſthmus. To the olympiads hiſtory is much indebted. They have ſerved to fix the time of many momentous events, and indeed before this method of computing time was obſerved, every page of hiſtory is moſtly fabulous, and filled with obſcurity and contradiction, and no true chronological account can be properly eſtabliſhed and maintained with certainty. The mode of computation, which was uſed after the ſuppreſſion of the olympiads and of the conſular faſti of Rome, was more uſeful as it was more univerſal; but while the era of the creation of the world prevailed in the eaſt, the weſtern nations in the 6th century began to adopt with more propriety the chriſtian epoch, which was propagated in the 8th century, and at laſt, in the 10th became legal and popular.——A celebrated woman who was daughter of a king of Epirus, and who married Philip king of Macedonia, by whom ſhe had Alexander the Great. Her haughtineſs, and, more probably, her infidelity, obliged Philip to repudiate her, and to marry Cleopatra, the niece of king Attalus. Olympias was ſo ſible of this injury, and Alexander ſhowed his diſapprobation of his father's meaſures by retiring from the court to his mother. The murder of Philip, which ſoon followed this diſgrace, and which ſome have attributed to the intrigues of Olympias, was productive of the greateſt extravagancies. The queen paid the higheſt honor to her huſband's murderer. She gathered his mangled limbs, placed a crown of gold on his head, and laid his aſhes near thoſe of Philip. The adminiſtration of Alexander, who had ſucceeded his father, was, in ſome inſtance, offenſive to Olympias; but, when the ambition of her ſon was concerned, ſhe did not ſcruple to declare publicly, that Alexander was not the ſon of Philip, but that he was the offſpring of an enormous ſerpent which had ſupernaturally introduced itſelf into her bed. When Alexander was dead, Olympias ſeized the government of Macedonia, and, to eſtabliſh her uſurpation, ſhe cruelly put to death Aridæus, with his wife Eurydice, as alſo Nicanor, the brother of Caſſander, with 100 leading men of Macedon, who were inimical to her intereſt. Such barbarities did not long remain unpuniſhed; Caſſander beſieged her in Pydna, where ſhe had retired with the remains of her family, and ſhe was obliged to ſurrender after an obſtinate ſiege. The conqueror ordered her to be accuſed, and to be put to death. A body of 200 ſoldiers were directed to put the bloody commands into execution, but the ſplendor and majeſty of the queen diſarmed their courage, and ſhe was at laſt maſſacred by thoſe whom ſhe had cruelly deprived of their children, about 316 years before the Chriſtian era. Juſtin. 7, c. 6. l. 9, c. 7.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Pauſ.——A fountain of Arcadia, which flowed for one year and the next was dry. Pauſ. 8, c. 29.

He wrote alſo an account of an embaſſy to ſome of the barbarian nations of the north, &c. His ſtile is cenſured by ſome as low, and unworthy of an hiſtorian. Omphăle, a queen of Lydia, daughter of Jardanus, She married Tmolus, who, at his death, left her miſtreſs of his kingdom. Omphale had been informed of the great exploits of Hercules, and wiſhed to ſee ſo illuſtrious a hero. Her wiſh was ſoon gratified. After the murder of Eurytus, Hercules fell ſick, and was ordered to be ſold as a ſlave, that he might recover his health and the right uſe of his ſenſes. Mercury was commiſſioned to ſell him, and Omphale bought him, and reſtored him to liberty. The hero became enamoured of his miſtreſs, and the queen favored his paſſion, and had a ſon by him, whom ſome call Agelaus, and others Lamon. From this ſon were deſcended Gyges and Cræſus; but this opinion is different from the account which makes theſe Lydian monarchs ſpring from Alcæus, a ſon of Hercules, by one of the female ſervants of Omphale. Hercules is repreſented by the poets as ſo deſperately enamoured of the queen that, to conciliate her eſteem, he ſpins by her ſide among her women, while ſhe covers herſelf with the lion's ſkin, and arms herſelf with the club of the hero, and often ſtrikes him with her ſandals for the uncouth manner with which he holds the diſtaff, &c. Their fondneſs was mutual. As they once travelled together, they came to a grotto on mount Tmolus, where the queen dreſſed herſelf in the habit of her lover, and obliged him to appear in a female garment. After they had ſupped, they both retired to reſt in different rooms, as a ſacrifice on the morrow to Bacchus required. In the night, Faunus, or, rather, Pan, who was enamoured of Omphale, introduced himſelf into the cave. He went to the bed of the queen, but the lion's ſkin perſuaded him that it was the dreſs of Hercules, and therefore he repaired to the bed of Hercules, in hopes to find there the object of his affection. The female dreſs of Hercules deceived him, and he laid himſelf down by his ſide. The hero was awaked, and kicked the intruder into the middle of the cave. The noiſe awoke Omphale, and Faunus was diſcovered lying on the ground, greatly diſappointed and aſhamed. *Ovid. OPPIA, a veſtal virgin, buried alive for her incontinence.

OPPIA LEX, by C. Oppius, the tribune, A. U. C. 540. It required that no woman ſhould wear above half an ounce of gold, have party-colored garments, or be carried in any city or town, or to any place within a mile's diſtance, unleſs it was to celebrate ſome ſacred feſtivals or ſolemnities. This famous law, which was made while Annibal was in Italy, and while Rome was in diſtreſſed circumſtances, created diſcontent, and, 18 years after, the Roman ladies petitioned the aſſembly of the people that it might be repealed. Cato oppoſed it ſtrongly, and made many ſatirical reflections upon the women for their appearing in public to ſolicit votes. The tribune Valerius, who had preſented their petition to the aſſembly, anſwered the objections of Cato, and his eloquence had ſuch an influence on the minds of the people, that the law was inſtantly abrogated with the unanimous conſent of all the comitia, Cato alone excepted. Liv. 33 & 34.—Cic. de Orat. 3.

OPPIĀNUS, a Greek poet of Cilicia in the ſecond century. His father's name was Ageſilaus, and his mother's Zenodota. He wrote ſome poems, celebrated for their elegance and ſublimity. Two of his poems are now extant, five books on fiſhing, called alieuticon, and four on hunting, called cynegeticon. The emperor Caracalla was ſo pleaſed with his poetry that he gave him a piece of gold for every verſe of his cynegeticon;

Icon; from which circumſtance the poem received the name of the golden verſes of Oppian. The poet died of the plague in the 30th year of his age. His countrymen raiſed ſtatues to his honor, and engraved on his tomb, that the gods had haſtened to call back Oppian in the flower of youth, only becauſe he had already excelled all mankind. The beſt edition of his works is that of Schneider, 8vo. Argent. 1776.

Oppidius, a rich old man introduced by Horace, 2 Sat. 3, v. 168, as wiſely dividing his poſſeſſions among his two ſons, and warning them againſt thoſe follies, and that extravagance which he believed he ſaw riſing in them.

C. Oppius, a friend of Julius Cæſar, celebrated for his life of Scipio Africanus, and of Pompey the Great. In the latter, he paid not much regard to hiſtorical facts, and took every opportunity to defame Pompey, to extol the character of his patron Cæſar. In the age of Suetonius, he was deemed the true author of the Alexandrian, African, and Spaniſh wars, which ſome attribute to Cæſar, and others to A. Hirtius. *Tacit. He met with ill ſucceſs, and was ſent in chains to the king, &c.——A Roman, who ſaved his aged father from the dagger of the triumvirate.

Ops, (opis,) a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, the ſame as the Rhea of the Greeks, who married Saturn, and became mother of Jupiter. She was known among the ancients by the different names of Cybele, Bona Dea, Magna Mater, Thya, Tellus, Proſerpina, and even of Juno and Minerva; and the worſhip which was paid to theſe apparently ſeveral deities was offered merely to one and the ſame perſon, mother of the gods. The word Ops ſeems to be derived from Opus; becauſe the goddeſs, who is the ſame as the earth, gives nothing without labor. Tatius built her a temple at Rome. She was generally repreſented as a matron, with her right hand opened, as if offering aſſiſtance to the helpleſs, and holding a loaf in her left hand. Her feſtivals were called Opalia, &c. Varr. de L. L. 4.—Dionyſ. Hal. 2, &c.—Tibull. el. 4, v. 68.

Oracŭlum, an anſwer of the gods to the queſtions of men, or the place where thoſe anſwers were given. Nothing is more famous than the ancient oracles of Egypt, Greece, Rome, &c. They were ſuppoſed to be the will of the gods themſelves, and they were conſulted, not only upon every important matter, but even in the affairs of private life. To make peace or war, to introduce a change of government, to plant a colony, to enact laws, to raiſe an edifice, to marry, were ſufficient reaſons to conſult the will of the gods. Mankind, in conſulting them, ſhewed that they wiſhed to pay implicit obedience to the command of the divinity, and, when they had been favored with an anſwer, they acted with more ſpirit and with more vigor, conſcious that the undertaking had met with the ſanction and approbation of heaven. In this, therefore, it will not appear wonderful, that ſo many places were ſacred to oracular purpoſes. The ſmall province of Bœotia could once boaſt of her 25 oracles, and Peloponneſus of the ſame number. Not only the chief of the gods gave oracles, but, in proceſs of time, heroes were admitted to enjoy the ſame privileges; and the oracles of a Trophonius and an Antinous were ſoon able to rival the fame of Apollo and of Jupiter. The moſt celebrated oracles of antiquity were thoſe of Dodona, Delphi, Jupiter Ammon, &c. [Vid. Dodona, Delphi, Ammon.] The temple of Delphi ſeemed to claim a ſuperiority over the other temples; its fame was once more extended, and its riches were ſo great, that not only private perſons, but even kings and numerous armies, made it an object of plunder and of rapine. The manner of delivering oracles was different. A prieſteſs at Delphi [Vid. Pythia] was permitted to pronounce the oracles of the god, and her delivery of the anſwers was always attended with acts of apparent madneſs and deſperate fury. Not only women, but even doves, were the miniſters of the temple of Dodona, and the ſuppliant votary was often ſtartled to hear his queſtions readily anſwered by the decayed trunk, or the ſpreading branches of a neighbouring oak. Ammon conveyed his anſwer in a plain and open manner, but Amphiaraus required many ablutions and preparatory ceremonies, and he generally communicated his oracles to his ſuppliants in dreams and viſions. Sometimes the firſt words that were heard, after iſſuing from the temple, were deemed the anſwers of the oracles, and ſometimes the nodding or ſhaking of the head of the ſtatue, the motions of fiſhes in a neighbouring lake, or their reluctance in accepting the food which which was offered to them, were as ſtrong and valid as the moſt expreſs and the minuteſt explanations. The anſwers were alſo ſometimes given in verſe, or written on tablets, but their meaning was always obſcure, and often the cauſe of diſaſter to ſuch as conſulted them. Crœſus, when he conſulted the oracle of Delphi, was told that, if he croſſed the Halys, he ſhould deſtroy a great empire: he ſuppoſed that that empire was the empire of his enemy, but unfortunately it was his own. The words of Credo te, Æacida, Romanos vincere poſſe, which Pyrrhus received when he wiſhed to aſſiſt the Tarentines againſt the Romans, by a favorable interpretation for himſelf, proved his ruin. Nero was ordered, by the oracle of Delphi, to beware of 73 years, but the pleaſing idea that he ſhould live to that age rendered him careleſs, and he was ſoon convinced of his miſtake, when Galba, in his 73d year, had the preſumption to dethrone him. It is a queſtion among the learned, whether the oracles were given by the inſpiration of evil ſpirits, or whether they proceeded from the impoſture of the prieſts. Impoſture, however, and forgery, cannot long floriſh, and falſehood becomes its own deſtroyer; and, on the contrary, it is well known how much confidence an enlightened age, therefore, much more the credulous and the ſuperſtitious, places upon dreams and romantic ſtories. Some have ſtrongly believed, that all the oracles of the earth ceaſed at the birth of Chriſt, but the ſuppoſition is falſe. It was, indeed, the beginning of their decline, but they remained in repute, and were conſulted, though, perhaps, not ſo frequently, till the fourth century, when chriſtianity began to triumph over paganiſm. The oracles often ſuffered themſelves to be bribed. Alexander did it, but it is well known that Lyſander failed in the attempt. Herodotus, who firſt mentioned the corruption which often prevailed in the oracular temples of Greece and Egypt, has been ſeverely treated for his remarks by the hiſtorian Plutarch. Demoſthenes is alſo a witneſs of the corruption, and he obſerved, that the oracles of Greece were ſervilely ſubſervient to the will and pleaſure of Philip, king of Macedonia, as he beautifully expreſſes it by the word φιλιππιζειν. If ſome of the Greeks, and other European and Aſiatic countries, paid ſo much attention to oracles, and were ſo fully perſuaded of their veracity, and even divinity, many of their leading men and of their philoſophers were apprized of the deceit, and paid no regard to the command of prieſts whom money could corrupt, and interpoſition ſilence. The Egyptians ſhowed themſelves the moſt ſuperſtitious of mankind, by their blind acquieſcence to the impoſition of the prieſts, who perſuaded them that the ſafety and happineſs of their life depended upon the mere motions of an ox, or the tameneſs of a crocodile. *Homer. Orestes, a ſon of Agamemnon and Clytemneſtra. When his father was cruelly murdered by Clytemneſtra and Ægiſthus, young Oreſtes was ſaved from his mother's dagger by means of his ſiſter Electra, called Laodicea by Homer, and he was privately conveyed to the houſe of Strophius, who was king of Phocis, and who had married a ſiſter of Agamemnon. He was tenderly treated by Strophius, who educated him with his ſon Pylades. The two young princes ſoon became acquainted, and, from their familiarity, aroſe the moſt inviolable attachment and friendſhip. When Oreſtes was arrived to years of manhood, he viſited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by aſſaſſinating his mother Clytemneſtra and her adulterer Ægiſthus. The manner in which he committed this murder is variouſly reported. According to Æſchylus, he was commiſſioned by Apollo to avenge his father, and, therefore, he introduced himſelf, with his friend Pylades, at the court of Mycenæ, pretending to bring the news of the death of Oreſtes from king Strophius. He was at firſt received with coldneſs, and, when he came into the preſence of Ægiſthus, who wiſhed to inform himſelf of the particulars, he murdered him, and ſoon Clytemneſtra ſhared the adulterer's fate. Euripides and Sophocles mention the ſame circumſtances. Ægiſthus was aſſaſſinated after Clytemneſtra, according to Sophocles; and, in Euripides, Oreſtes is repreſented as murdering the adulterer, while he offers a ſacrifice to the nymphs. This murder, as the poet mentions, irritates the guards, who were preſent, but Oreſtes appeaſes their fury by telling them who he is, and immediately he is acknowledged king of the country. Afterwards, he ſtabs his mother, at the inſtigation of his ſiſter Electra, after he has upbraided her for her infidelity and cruelty to her huſband. Such meditated murders receive the puniſhment which, among the ancients, was always ſuppoſed to attend parricide. Oreſtes is tormented by the Furies, and exiles himſelf to Argos, where he is ſtill purſued by the avengeful goddeſſes. Apollo, himſelf, purifies him, and he is acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Areopagites, whom Minerva, herſelf, inſtituted on this occaſion, according to the narration of the poet Æſchylus, who flatters the Athenians in his tragical ſtory, by repreſenting them as paſſing judgment, even upon the gods themſelves. According to Pauſanias, Oreſtes was purified of the murder, not at Delphi, but at Trœzene, where ſtill was ſeen a large ſtone, at the entrance of Diana's temple, upon which the ceremonies of purification had been performed by nine of the principal citizens of the place. There was alſo, at Megalopolis in Arcadia, a temple dedicated to the Furies, near which Oreſtes cut off one of his fingers with his teeth in a fit of inſanity. Theſe different traditions are confuted by Euripides, who ſays, that Oreſtes, after the murder of his mother, conſulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the perſecutions of the Furies, if he did not bring into Greece Diana's ſtatue, which was in the Taurica Cherſoneſus, and which, as it is reported by ſome, had fallen down from heaven. This was an arduous enterprize. The king of the Cherſoneſus always ſacrificed on the altars of the goddeſs all ſuch as entered the borders of his country. Oreſtes and his friend were both carried before Thoas, the king of the place, and they were doomed to be ſacrificed. Iphigenia was then prieſteſs of Diana's temple, and it was her office to immolate theſe ſtrangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn ſomething about a country which had given her birth. [Vid. Iphigenia.] She even intereſted herſelf in their misfortunes, and offered to ſpare the life of one of them, provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendſhip more truly diſplayed, according to the words of Ovid, ex Pont. 3, el. 2.

Hic negat; inque vicem pugnat uterque mori.

At laſt Pylades gave way to the preſſing entreaties of his friend, and conſented to carry the letters of Iphigenia to Greece. Theſe were addreſſed to Oreſtes himſelf, and, therefore, theſe circumſtances ſoon led to a total diſcovery of the connections of the prieſteſs with the man whom ſhe was going to immolate. Iphigenia was convinced that he was her brother Oreſtes, and, when the cauſes of their journey had been explained, ſhe reſolved, with the two friends, to fly from Cherſoneſus, and to carry away the ſtatue of Diana. Their flight was diſcovered, and Thoas prepared to purſue them, but Minerva interfered, and told him, that all had been done by the will and approbation of the gods. Some ſuppoſe, that Oreſtes came to Cappadocia from Cherſoneſus, and that there he left the ſtatue of Diana at Comana. Others contradict this tradition, and, according to Pauſanias, the ſtatue of Diana Orthia was the ſame as that which had been carried away from the Cherſoneſus. Some alſo ſuppoſe, that Oreſtes brought it to Aricia, in Italy, where Diana's worſhip was eſtabliſhed. After theſe celebrated adventures, Oreſtes aſcended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect ſecurity, and married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and gave his ſiſter to his friend Pylades. The marriage of Oreſtes with Hermione is a matter of diſpute among the ancients. All are agreed that ſhe had been promiſed to the ſon of Agamemnon, but Menelaus had married her to Neoptelemus, the ſon of Achilles, who had ſhown himſelf ſo truly intereſted in his cauſe during the Trojan war. The marriage of Hermione with Neoptolemus diſpleaſed Oreſtes; he remembered that ſhe had been early promiſed to him, and therefore he reſolved to recover her by force or artifice. This he effected by cauſing Neoptolemus to be aſſaſſinated, or aſſaſſinating him himſelf. According to Ovid's epiſtle of Hermione to Oreſtes, Hermione had always been faithful to her firſt lover, and even it was by her perſuaſions that Oreſtes removed her from the houſe of Neoptolemus. Hermione was diſſatisfied with the partiality of Neoptolemus for Andromache, and her attachment for Oreſtes was encreaſed. Euripides, however, and others, ſpeak differently of Hermione's attachment to Neoptolemus: ſhe loved him ſo tenderly that ſhe reſolved to murder Andromache, who ſeemed to ſhare, in a ſmall degree, the affections of her huſband. She was ready to perpetrate the horrid deed when Oreſtes came into Epirus, and ſhe was eaſily perſuaded by the foreign prince to withdraw herſelf, in her huſband's abſence, from a country which ſeemed to contribute ſo much to her ſorrows. Oreſtes, the better to ſecure the affections of Hermione, aſſaſſinated Neoptolemus, [Vid. Neoptolemus,] and retired to his kingdom of Argos. His old age was crowned with peace and ſecurity, and he died in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne to his ſon Tiſamenes, by Hermione. Three years after, the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponneſus, and baniſhed the deſcendants of Menelaus from the throne of Argos. Oreſtes died in Arcadia, as ſome ſuppoſe, by the bite of a ſerpent; and the Lacedæmonians, who had become his ſubjects at the death of Menelaus, were directed by an oracle to bring his bones to Sparta. They were, ſome time after, diſcovered at Tegea, and his ſtature appeared to be ſeven cubits, according to the traditions mentioned by Herodotus and others. The friendſhip of Oreſtes and of Pylades became proverbial, and the two friends received divine honors among the Scythians, and were worſhipped in temples. Pauſ. 1, 2, 4, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 1 & 3.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Strab. 9 & 13.—*Ovid. ORIBĂSUS, a celebrated phyſician, greatly eſteemed by the emperor Julian, in whoſe reign he floriſhed. He abridged the works of Galenus, and of all the moſt reſpectable writers on phyſic, at the requeſt of the emperor. He accompanied Julian into the eaſt, but his ſkill proved ineffectual in attempting to cure the fatal wound, which his benefactor had received. After Julian's death, he fell into the hands of the Barbarians. The beſt edition of his works is that of Dundas, 4to. L. ORĪCUM or ORĪCUS, a town of Epirus, on the Ionian ſea, founded by a colony from Colchis, according to Pliny. It was called Dardania, becauſe Helenus and Andromache, natives of Troy or Dardania, reigned over the country after the Trojan war. It had a celebrated harbour, and was greatly eſteemed by the Romans on account of its ſituation, but it was not well defended. The tree which produces the turpentine grew there in abundance. *Virg. ORIENS, in ancient geography, is taken for all the moſt eaſtern parts of the world, ſuch as Parthia, India, Aſſyria, &c.

ORIGEN, a Greek writer, as much celebrated for the eaſineſs of his manner, his humility, and modeſty, as for his learning and the ſublimity of his genius. He was ſirnamed Adamantus, from his aſſiduity, and became ſo rigid a Chriſtian that he made himſelf an eunuch, by following the literal ſenſe of a paſſage in the Greek teſtament, which ſpeaks of the voluntary eunuchs of Chriſt. He ſuffered martyrdom in his 69th year, A. C. 254. His works were excellent and numerous, and contained a number of homilies, commentaries on the holy ſcriptures, and different treatiſes, beſides the Hexapla, ſo called from its being divided into ſix columns, the firſt of which contained the Hebrew text, the ſecond the ſame text in Greek characters, the third the Greek verſion of the Septuagint, the fourth that of Aquila, the fifth that of Symmachus, and the ſixth Theodotion's Greek verſion. This famous work firſt gave the hint for the compilation of our Polyglot Bibles. The works of Origen have been learnedly edited by the Benedictine monks, though the whole is not yet completed, in four vols. fol. Paris, 1733, 1740, and 1759. The Hexapla was publiſhed in 8vo. at Lipſ. 1769, by Car. Frid. Bahrdt.

ORĪON, a celebrated giant, ſprung from the urine of Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury. Theſe three gods, as they travelled over Bœotia, met with great hoſpitality from Hyrieus, a peaſant of the country, who was ignorant of their dignity and character. They were entertained with whatever the cottage afforded, and, when Hyrieus had diſcovered that they were gods, becauſe Neptune told him to fill up Jupiter's cup with wine, after he had ſerved it before the reſt, the old man welcomed them by the voluntary ſacrifice of an ox. Pleaſed with with his piety, the gods promiſed to grant him whatever he required, and the old man, who had lately loſt his wife, to whom he had promiſed never to marry again, deſired them that, as he was childleſs, they would give him a ſon without another marriage. The gods conſented, and they ordered him to bury in the ground the ſkin of the victim, into which they had all three made water. Hyrieus did as they commanded, and, when nine months after, he dug for the ſkin, he found in it a beautiful child, whom he called Urion, ab urinâ. The name was changed into Orion by the corruption of one letter, as Ovid ſays, Perdidit antiquum littera prima ſonum. Orion ſoon rendered himſelf celebrated, and Diana took him among her attendants, and even became deeply enamoured of him. His gigantic ſtature, however, diſpleaſed Œnopion, king of Chios, whoſe daughter Hero or Merope he demanded in marriage. The king, not to deny him openly, promiſed to make him his ſon-in-law as ſoon as he delivered his iſland from wild beaſts. This taſk, which Œnopion deemed impracticable, was ſoon performed by Orion, who eagerly demanded his reward. Œnopion, on pretence of complying, intoxicated his illuſtrious gueſt, and put out his eyes on the ſea ſhore, where he had laid himſelf down to ſleep. Orion, finding himſelf blind when he awoke, was conducted by the ſound to a neighbouring forge, where he placed one of the workmen on his back, and, by his directions, went to a place where the riſing ſun was ſeen with the greateſt advantage. Here he turned his face towards the luminary, and, as it is reported, he immediately recovered his eye-ſight, and haſtened to puniſh the perfidious cruelty of Œnopion. It is ſaid, that Orion was an excellent workman in iron, and that he fabricated a ſubterraneous palace for Vulcan. Aurora, whom Venus had inſpired with love, carried him away into the iſland of Delos, to enjoy his company with greater ſecurity; but Diana, who was jealous of this, deſtroyed Orion with her arrows. Some ſay, that Orion had provoked Diana's reſentment by offering violence to Opis, one of her female attendants, or, according to others, becauſe he had attempted the virtue of the goddeſs herſelf. According to Ovid, Orion died of the bite of a ſcorpion, which the earth produced, to puniſh his vanity in boaſting that there was not on earth any animal which he could not conquer. Some ſay that Orion was ſon of Neptune and Euryale, and that he had received from his father the privilege and power of walking over the ſea without wetting his feet. Others make him ſon of Terra, like the reſt of the giants. He had married a nymph called Sida before his connection with the family of Œnopion; but Sida was the cauſe of her own death, by boaſting herſelf fairer than Juno. According to Diodorus, Orion was a celebrated hunter, ſuperior to the reſt of mankind by his ſtrength and uncommon ſtature. He built the port of Zancle, and fortified the coaſt of Sicily againſt the frequent inundations of the ſea, by heaping a mound of earth, called Pelorum, on which he built a temple to the gods of the ſea. After death, Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the conſtellations ſtill bears his name. The conſtellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the bull, was compoſed of 17 ſtars in the form of a man holding a ſword, which has given occaſion to the poets often to ſpeak of Orion's ſword. As the conſtellation of Orion, which riſes about the 9th day of March, and ſets about the 21ſt of June, is generally ſuppoſed to be accompanied, at its riſing, with great rains and ſtorms, it has acquired the epithet of aquoſus given it by Virgil. Orion was buried in the iſland of Delos, and the monument which the people of Tanagra, in Bœotia, ſhowed, as containing the remains of this celebrated hero, was nothing but a cenotaph. The daughters of Orion diſtinguiſhed themſelves as much as their father, and, when the oracle had declared that Bœotia ſhould not be delivered from a dreadful peſtilence before two of Jupiter's children were immolated on the altars, they joyfully accepted the offer, and voluntarily ſacrificed themſelves for the good of their country. Their names were Menippe and Metioche. They had been carefully educated by Diana, and Venus and Minerva had made them very rich and valuable preſents. The deities of hell were ſtruck at the patriotiſm of the two females, and immediately two ſtars were ſeen to ariſe from the earth, which ſtill ſmoaked with the blood, and they were placed in the heavens in the form of a crown. According to Ovid, their bodies were burned by the Thebans, and, from their aſhes, aroſe two perſons, whom the gods ſoon after changed into conſtellations. Diod. 4.—Homer. Od. 5, &c.—*Virg. ORŌDES, a prince of Parthia, who murdered his brother Mithridates, and ascended his throne. He defeated Crassus, the Roman triumvir, and poured melted gold down the throat of his fallen enemy, to reproach him of his avarice and ambition. He followed the interest of Cassius and Brutus at Philippi. It is said, that, when Orodes became old and infirm, his 30 children applied to him, and disputed, in his presence, their right to the succession. Phraates, the eldest of them, obtained the crown from his father, and, to hasten him out of the world, he attempted to poison him. The poison had no effect, and Phraates, still determined on his father's death, strangled him with his own hands, about 37 years before the Christian era. Orodes had then reigned about 50 years. Justin. 42, c. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.——Another, king of Parthia, murdered for his cruelty. Josephus 18. Jud.——A son of Artabanus, king of Armenia. *Tacit. The best edition is that of Havercamp, 4to. L. Bat. 1767.

Orospeda, a mountain of Spain. Strab. 3.

Orpheus, a ſon of Œager by the muſe Calliope. Some ſuppoſe him to be ſon of Apollo, to render his birth more illuſtrious. He received a lyre from Apollo, or, according to ſome, from Mercury, upon which he played with ſuch a maſterly hand that even the moſt rapid rivers ceaſed to flow, the ſavage beaſts of the foreſt forgot their wildneſs, and the mountains moved to liſten to his ſong. All nature ſeemed charmed and animated, and the nymphs were his conſtant companions. Eurydice was the only one who made a deep impreſſion on the melodious muſician, and their nuptials were celebrated. Their happineſs, however, was ſhort, Ariſtæus became enamoured of Eurydice, and, as ſhe fled from her purſuer, a ſerpent, that was lurking in the graſs, bit her foot, and ſhe died of the poiſoned wound. Her loſs was ſeverely felt by Orpheus, and he reſolved to recover her or periſh in the attempt. With his lyre in his hand, he entered the infernal regions, and gained an eaſy admiſſion to the palace of Pluto. The king of hell was charmed with the melody of his ſtrains, and according to the beautiful expreſſions of the poets, the wheel of Ixion ſtopped, the ſtone of Siſyphus ſtood ſtill, Tantalus forgot his perpetual thirſt, and even the furies relented. Pluto and Proſerpine were moved with his ſorrow, and conſented to reſtore him Eurydice, provided he forbore looking behind till he had come to the extremeſt borders of hell. The conditions were gladly accepted, and Orpheus was already in ſight of the upper regions of the air when he forgot his promiſes, and turned back to look at his long loſt Eurydice. He ſaw her, but ſhe inſtantly vaniſhed from his eyes. He attempted to follow her, but he was refuſed admiſſion, and the only comfort he could find was to ſooth his grief at the ſound of his muſical inſtrument in grottos, or on the mountains. He totally ſeparated himſelf from the ſociety of mankind; and the Thracian women, whom he had offended by his coldneſs to their amorous paſſion, or, according to others, by his unnatural gratifications, and impure indulgencies, attacked him while they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus, and after they had torn his body to pieces, they threw his head into the Hebrus, which ſtill articulated the words Eurydice! Eurydice! as it was carried down the ſtream into the Ægean ſea. Orpheus was one of the Argonauts, of which celebrated expedition he wrote a poetical account ſtill extant. This is doubted by Ariſtotle, who ſays, according to Cicero, that there never exiſted an Orpheus, but that the poems which paſs under his name, are the compoſitions of a Pythagorean philoſopher named Cercops. According to ſome of the moderns the Argonautica, and the other poems attributed to Orpheus, are the production of the pen of Onomacritus, a poet who lived in the age of Piſiſtratus, tyrant of Athens. Pauſanias, however, and Diodorus Siculus ſpeak of Orpheus as a great poet and muſician, who rendered himſelf equally celebrated by his knowledge of the art of war, by the extent of his underſtanding, and by the laws which he enacted. Some maintain that he was killed by a thunderbolt. He was buried at Pieria in Macedonia, according to Apollodorus. The inhabitants of Dion boaſted that his tomb was in their city, and the people of mount Libethrus, in Thrace, claimed the ſame honor, and farther obſerved, that the nightingales, which built their neſts near his tomb, ſang with greater melody than all other birds. Orpheus, as ſome report, after death received divine honors, the muſes gave an honorable burial to his remains, and his lyre became one of the conſtellations in the heavens. ORUS, or Horus, one of the gods of the Egyptians, ſon of Oſiris and of Iſis. He aſſiſted his mother in avenging his father, who had been murdered by Typhon. Orus was ſkilled in medicine, he was acquainted with futurity, and he made the good and the happineſs of his ſubjects the ſole object of his government. He was the emblem of the ſun among the Egyptians, and he was generally repreſented as an infant, ſwathed in variegated cloaths. OSCHOPHŎRIA, a feſtival obſerved by the Athenians. It receives its name απο του φερειν τας οσχας, from carrying boughs hung up with grapes, called οσχαι. Its original inſtitution is thus mentioned by Plut. in Theſ. Theſeus, at his return from Crete, forgot to hang out the white ſail, by which his father was to be apprized of his ſucceſs. This neglect was fatal to Ægeus, who threw himſelf into the ſea and periſhed. Theſeus no ſooner reached the land, than he ſent a herald to inform his father of his ſafe return, and in the mean time he began to make the ſacrifices which he vowed when he firſt ſet ſail from Crete. The herald, on his entrance into the city, found the people in great agitation. Some lamented the king's death, while others, elated at the ſudden news of the victory of Theſeus, crowned the herald with garlands in demonſtration of their joy. The herald carried back the garlands on his ſtaff to the ſea ſhore, and after he had waited till Theſeus had finiſhed his ſacrifice, he related the melancholy ſtory of the king's death. Upon this, the people ran in crouds to the city, ſhowing their grief by cries and lamentations. From that circumſtance therefore, at the feaſt of Oſchophoria, not the herald but his ſtaff is crowned with garlands, and all the people that are preſent always exclaim ελελευ, ιυ, ιυ, the firſt of which expreſſes haſte, and the others a conſternation or depreſſion of ſpirits. The hiſtorian further mentions, that Theſeus, when he went to Crete, did not take with him the uſual number of virgins, but that inſtead of two of them, he filled up the number with two youths of his acquaintance, whom he made paſs for women, by diſguiſing their dreſs, and by uſing them to the ointments and perfumes of women, as well as by a long and ſucceſsful imitation of their voice. The impoſition ſucceeded, their ſex was not diſcovered in Crete, and when Theſeus had triumphed over the Minotaur, he, with theſe two youths, led a proceſſion with branches in their hands, in the ſame habit which is ſtill uſed at the celebration of the Oſchophoria. The branches which were carried, were in honor of Bacchus or Ariadne, or becauſe they returned in autumn, when the grapes were ripe. Beſides this proceſſion, there was alſo a race exhibited, in which only young men, whoſe parents were both alive, were permitted to engage. It was uſual for them to run from the temple of Bacchus, to that of Minerva, which was on the ſea ſhore ſhore. The place where they ſtopped was called οσχοφοριον, becauſe the boughs which they carried in their hands were depoſited there. The rewards of the conqueror was a cup called πενλα πλεα, five-fold, becauſe it contained a mixture of five different things, wine, honey, cheeſe, meal, and oil. Plut. in Theſ.

Osci, a people between Campania and the country of the Volſci, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. Some ſuppoſe that they are the ſame as the Opici, the word Oſci being a diminutive or abbreviation of the other. The language, the plays, and ludicrous expreſſions of this nation, are often mentioned by the antients, and from their indecent tendency ſome ſuppoſe the word obſcœnum, (quaſi oſcenum), is derived. Tacit Ann. 4, c. 14.—Cic. Fam. 7, ep. 1.—Liv. 10, c. 20.—Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 730.

Osiris, a great deity of the Egyptians, ſon of Jupiter and Niobe. All the antients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god, but they all agree that as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civilize his ſubjects, to poliſh their morals, to give them good and ſalutary laws, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accompliſhed a reform at home, Oſiris reſolved to go and ſpread civilization in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Iſis, and of her faithful miniſter Hermes or Mercury. The command of his troops at home was left to the truſt of Hercules, a warlike officer. In his expedition Oſiris was accompanied by his brother Apollo, and by Anubis, Macedo, and Pan. His march was through Æthiopia, where his army was encreaſed by the addition of the Satyrs, a hairy race of monſters, who made dancing and playing on muſical inſtruments their chief ſtudy. He afterwards paſſed through Arabia, and viſited the greateſt part of the kingdoms of Aſia and of Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worſhip of the gods, and a reverence for the wiſdom of a ſupreme being. At his return home Oſiris found the minds of his ſubjects rouſed and agitated. His brother Typhon had raiſed ſeditions, and endeavoured to make himſelf popular. Oſiris, whoſe ſentiments were always of the moſt pacific nature, endeavoured to convince his brother of his ill conduct, but he fell a ſacrifice to the attempt. Typhon murdered him in a ſecret apartment, and cut his body to pieces, which were divided among the aſſociates of his guilt. Typhon, according to Plutarch, ſhut up his brother in a coffer and threw him into the Nile. The enquiries of Iſis diſcovered the body of her huſband on the coaſts of Phœnicia, where it had been conveyed by the waves, but Typhon ſtole it as it was carrying to Memphis, and he divided it among his companions, as was before obſerved. This cruelty incenſed Iſis; ſhe revenged her huſband's death, and with her ſon Orus, ſhe defeated Typhon and the partizans of his conſpiracy. She recovered the mangled pieces of her huſband's body, the genitals excepted, which the murderer had thrown into the ſea, and to render him all the honor which his humanity deſerved, ſhe made as many ſtatues of wax as there were mangled pieces of his body. Each ſtatue contained a piece of the fleſh of the dead monarch; and Iſis, after ſhe had ſummoned in her preſence one by one, the prieſts of all the different deities in her dominions, gave them each a ſtatue, intimating, that in doing that ſhe had preferred them to all the other communities of Egypt, and ſhe bound them by a ſolemn oath that they would keep ſecret that mark of her favor, and endeavour to ſhew their ſenſe of it by eſtabliſhing a form of worſhip, and paying divine honors to their prince. They were further directed to chuſe whatever animals they pleaſed to repreſent the perſon and the divinity of Oſiris, and they were enjoined to pay the greateſt reverence to that repreſentative of divinity, and to bury it when dead with the greateſt ſolemnity. To render their eſtabliſhment more popular, each ſacerdotal body had a certain portion of land allotted to them to maintain them, and to defray the expences which neceſſarily attended the ſacrifices and ceremonial rites. That part of the body of Oſiris which had not been recovered, was treated with more particular attention by Iſis, and ſhe ordered that it ſhould receive honors more ſolemn and at the ſame time more myſterious than the other members [Vid. Phallica.] As Oſiris had particularly inſtructed his ſubjects in cultivating the ground, the prieſt choſe the ox to repreſent him, and paid the moſt ſuperſtitious veneration to that animal. [Vid. Apis.] Oſiris, according to the opinion of ſome mythologiſts, is the ſame as the ſun, and the adoration which is paid by different nations to an Anubis, a Bacchus, a Dionyſius, a Jupiter, a Pan, &c. is the ſame as that which Oſiris received in the Egyptian temples.

temples. Iſis alſo after death received divine honors as well as her huſband, and as the ox was the ſymbol of the ſun, or Oſiris, ſo the cow was the emblem of the moon, or of Iſis. Nothing can give a clearer idea of the power and greatneſs of Oſiris than this inſcription, which has been found on ſome antient monuments: Saturn, the youngeſt of all the gods, was my father, I am Oſiris, who conducted a large and numerous army as far as the deſarts of India, and travelled over the greateſt part of the world, and viſited the ſtreams of the Iſter, and the remote ſhores of the ocean, diffuſing benevolence to all the inhabitants of the earth. Oſiris was generally repreſented with a cap on his head like a mitre, with two horns; he held a ſtick in his left hand, and in his right a whip with three thongs. Sometimes he appears with the head of a hawk, as that bird, by its quick and piercing eyes, is a proper emblem of the ſun. Plut. in Iſid. & Of.—Herodot. 2, c. 144.—Diod. 1.—*Homer. Ostia, a town built at the mouth of the river Tiber by Ancus Martius, king of Rome, about 16 miles diſtant from Rome. It had a celebrated harbour, and was ſo pleaſantly ſituated that the Romans generally ſpent a part of the year there as in a country ſeat. There was a ſmall tower in the port like the Pharos of Alexandria, built upon the wreck of a large ſhip which had been ſunk there, and which contained the obeliſks of Egypt, with which the Roman emperors intended to adorn the capital of Italy. In the age of Strabo the ſand and mud depoſited by the Tiber had choked the harbour, and added much to the ſize of the holy iſlands, which ſheltered the ſhips at the entrance of the river. Oſtia and her harbour called Portus, became gradually ſeparated, and are now at a conſiderable diſtance from the ſea. Flor. 1, c. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 33.—Mela 2, c. 4.—Sueton.—Plin.

Otho, M. Salvius, a Roman emperor deſcended from the antient kings of Etruria. He was one of Nero's favorites, and as ſuch he was raiſed to the higheſt offices of the ſtate, and made governor of Pannonia by the intereſt of Seneca, who wiſhed to remove him from Rome, leſt Nero's love for Poppæa ſhould prove his ruin. After Nero's death Otho conciliated the favor of Galba the new emperor; but when he did not gain his point, and when Galba had refuſed to adopt him as his ſucceſſor, he reſolved to make himſelf abſolute without any regard to the age or dignity of his friend. The great debts which he had contracted encouraged his avarice, and he cauſed Galba to be aſſaſſinated, and he made himſelf emperor. He was acknowledged by the ſenate and the Roman people, but the ſudden revolt of Vitellius in Germany rendered his ſituation precarious, and it was mutually reſolved that their reſpective right to the empire ſhould be decided by arms. Otho obtained three victories over his enemies, but in a general engagement near Brixellum, his forces were defeated, and he ſtabbed himſelf when all hopes of ſucceſs were vaniſhed, after a reign of about three months, on the 20th of April A. D. 69.

69. It has been juſtly obſerved, that the laſt moments of Otho's life were thoſe of a philoſopher. He comforted his ſoldiers who lamented his fortune, and he expreſſed his concern for their ſafety, when they earneſtly ſolicited to pay him the laſt friendly offices before he ſtabbed himſelf, and he obſerved that it was better that one man ſhould die, than that all ſhould be involved in ruin for his obſtinacy. His nephew was pale and diſtreſſed, fearing the anger and haughtineſs of the conqueror; but Otho comforted him, and obſerved, that Vitellius would be kind and affectionate to the friends and relations of Otho, ſince Otho was not aſhamed to ſay, that, in the time of their greateſt enmity, the mother of Vitellius had received every friendly treatment from his hands. He alſo burnt the letters which, by falling into the hands of Vitellius, might provoke his reſentment againſt thoſe who had favored the cauſe of an unfortunate general. Theſe noble and humane ſentiments in a man who was the aſſociate of Nero's ſhameful pleaſures, and who ſtained his hand in the blood of his maſter, have appeared to ſome wonderful, and paſſed for the features of policy, and not of a naturally virtuous and benevolent heart. Plut. in vitâ.—Suet.—Tacit. 2, Hiſt. c. 50, &c.—Juv. 2, v. 90.——Roſcius, a tribune of the people, who, in Cicero's conſulſhip, made a regulation to permit the Roman knights at public ſpectacles to have the 14 firſt rows after the ſeats of the ſenators. P. Ovĭdius Naso, a celebrated Roman poet born at Sulmo. As he was intended for the bar, his father ſent him early to Rome, and removed him to Athens in the ſixteenth year of his age. The progreſs of Ovid in the ſtudy of eloquence was great, but the father's expectations were fruſtrated; his ſon was born a poet, and nothing could deter him from purſuing his natural inclination, though he was often reminded that Homer lived and died in the greateſt poverty. Every thing he wrote was expreſſed in poetical numbers, as he himſelf ſays, et quod tentabam ſcribere verſus erat. A lively genius and a fertile imagination ſoon gained him admirers; the learned became his friends; Virgil, Propertius, Tibullus, and Horace, honored him with their correſpondence, and Auguſtus patronized him with the moſt unbounded liberality. Theſe favors, however, were but momentary, and the poet was ſoon after baniſhed to Tomos on the Euxine ſea, by the emperor. The true cauſe of this ſudden exile is unknown. Some attribute it to a ſhameful amour with Livia the wife of Auguſtus, while others ſupport that it aroſe from the knowledge which Ovid had of the unpardonable inceſt of the emperor with his daughter Julia. Theſe reaſons are indeed merely conjectural, the cauſe was of a very private and very ſecret nature, of which Ovid himſelf is afraid to ſpeak. It was, however, ſomething improper in the family and court of Auguſtus, as theſe lines ſeem to indicate:

Cur aliquid vidi? Cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi eſt?
Inſcius Actæon vidit ſine veſte Dianam.
Præda fuit canibus non minus ille ſuis.

Again,

Inſcia quod crimen viderunt lumina plector,
Peccatumque oculos eſt habuiſſe meum.

And in another place,

Perdiderunt cum me duo crimina, carmen et error,
Alterius facti culpa ſilenda mihi eſt.

In his baniſhment, Ovid betrayed his puſillanimity, and however afflicted and diſtreſſed his ſituation was, yet the flattery and impatience which he ſhowed in his writings writings are a disgrace to his pen, and expose him more to ridicule than pity. Though he prostituted his pen and his time to adulation, yet the emperor proved deaf to all entreaties, and refused to listen to his most ardent friends at Rome, who wished for the return of the poet. Ovid, who undoubtedly wished for a Brutus to deliver Rome of her tyrannical Augustus, continued his flattery even to meanness; and when the emperor died, he was so mercenary as to consecrate a small temple to the departed tyrant, on the shore of the Euxine, where he regularly offered frankincense every morning. Tiberius proved as regardless as his predecessor, to the entreaties which were made for Ovid, and the poet died in the 7th or 8th year of his banishment, in the 59th year of his age, A. D. 17, and was buried at Tomos. In the year 1508 of the Christian era, the following epitaph was found at Stain, in the modern kingdom of Austria.

Hic situs est vates quem Divi Cæsaris ira Augusti patriâ cedere jussit humo.
Sæpe miser voluit patriis occumbere terris,
Sed frustra! Hunc illi fata dedere locum.

This, however, is an imposition to render celebrated an obscure corner of the world, which never contained the bones of Ovid. The greatest part of Ovid's poems are remaining. His Metamorphoses in 15 books are extremely curious, on account of the many different mythological facts and traditions which they relate, but they can have no claim to an epic poem. In composing this, the poet was more indebted to the then existing traditions, and to the theogony of the antients, than to the powers of his own imagination. His Fasti were divided into 12 books, the same number as the constellations in the zodiac; but of these six have perished, and the learned world have reason to lament the loss of a poem, which must have thrown so much light upon the religious rites and ceremonies, festivals and sacrifices of the antient Romans, as we may judge from the six that have survived the ravages of time and barbarity. His Tristia, which are divided into five books, contain much elegance and softness of expression, as also his Elegies on different subjects. The Heroides are nervous, spirited, and diffuse, the poetry is excellent, the language varied, but the expressions are often too wanton and indelicate, a fault which is common in his compositions. His three books of Amorum, and the same number de Arte Amandi, with the other de Remedio Amoris, are written with great elegance, and contain many flowery descriptions; but the doctrine which they hold forth is dangerous, and they are to be read with caution, as they seem to be calculated to corrupt the heart, and sap the foundations of virtue and morality. His Ibis, which is written in imitation of a poem of Callimachus of the same name, is a satyrical performance. Besides these, there are extant some fragments of other poems, and among these some of a tragedy called Medea. The talents of Ovid as a dramatic writer have been disputed, and some have observed, that he who is so often void of sentiment, was not born to shine as a tragedian. Ovid has attempted perhaps too many sorts of poetry at once. On whatever he has written, he has totally exhausted the subject and left nothing unsaid. He every where paints nature with a masterly hand, and gives strength to the most vulgar expressions. It has been judiciously observed, that his poetry, after his banishment from Rome, was destitute of that spirit and vivacity which we admire in his other compositions. His Fasti are perhaps the best written of all his poems, and after them we may fairly rank his love verses, his Heroides, and after all his Metamorphoses, which were not totally finished when Augustus sent him into banishment. His Epistles from Pontus are the language of an abject and pusillanimous flatterer. However critics may censure the indelicacy and the inaccuracies of Ovid, it is to be acknowledged that his poetry contains great sweetness and elegance, and, like that of Tibullus, charms the ear and captivates the mind. Ovid married three wives, but of the last alone he speaks with fondness and affection. He had only one daughter, but by which of his wives is unknown; and she herself became mother of two children, by two husbands. The best editions of Ovid's works, are those of Burman, 4 vols. 4to. Amst. 1727; of L. Bat. 1670, in 8vo. and of Utrecht, in 12mo. 4 vols. 1713. *Ovid. Oxyrynchus, a town of Egypt on the Nile. Strab.

Ozīnes, a Perſian impriſoned by Craterus, becauſe he attempted to revolt from Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 10.

Ozŏlæ or Ozŏli, a people who inhabited the eaſtern parts of Ætolia, which were called Ozolea. This tract of territory lay at the north of the bay of Corinth, and extended about 12 miles northward. They received their name from the bad ſtench (ὀζη) of their bodies and of their cloathing, which was the raw hides of wild beaſts. Some derive it with more propriety from the ſtench of the ſtaguated water in the neighbouring lakes and marſhes. According to a fabulous tradition, they received their name from a very different circumſtance: During the reign of a ſon of Deucalion, a bitch brought into the world a ſtick inſtead of whelps. The ſtick was planted in the ground by the king, and it grew up to a large vine and produced grapes, from which the inhabitants of the country were called Ozolæ, not from ὀζειν, to ſmell bad, but from ὀζος, a branch or ſprout. The name of Ozolæ, on account of its indelicate ſignification, highly diſpleaſed the inhabitants, and they exchanged it ſoon for that of Ætolians. Pauſ. 10, c. 38.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.

Pacatianus, Titus Julius, a general of the Roman armies, who proclaimed himſelf emperor in Gaul, about the latter part of Philip's reign. He was ſoon after defeated, A. D. 249, and put to death, &c.

Pacŏrus, the eldeſt of the 30 ſons of Orodes, king of Parthia, ſent againſt Craſſus, whoſe army he defeated, and whom he took priſoner. He took Syria from the Romans, and ſupported the republican party of Pompey, and of the murderers of Julius Cæſar. He was killed in a battle by Ventidius Baſſus, B. C. 39, on the ſame day (9th of June) that Craſſus had been defeated. Flor. 4, c. 9.—Horat. 3, od. 6, v. 9.——A king of Parthia, who made a treaty of alliance with the Romans, &c. ——Another, intimate with king Decebalus.

Pactōlus, a celebrated river of Lydia, riſing in mount Tmolus, and falling into the Hermus after it has watered the city of Sardes. It was in this river that Midas waſhed himſelf when he turned into gold whatever he touched; and from that circumſtance it ever after rolled golden ſand, and received the name of Chryſorrhoas. It is called Tmolus by Pliny. Strabo obſerves, that it had no golden ſands in his age. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 142.—Strab. 18.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 86.—Herodot. 5, c. 110.—Plin. 33, c. 8.

Pactyas, a Lydian entruſted with the care of the treaſures of Cræſus at Sardes. The

The immenſe riches which he could command, corrupted him, and to make himſelf independent, he gathered a large army. He laid ſiege to the citadel of Sardes, but the arrival of one of the Perſian generals ſoon put him to flight. He retired to Cumæ and afterwards to Leſbos, where he was delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 154, &c.—Pauſ. 2, c. 35.

PĂDUA, a town called alſo Patavium, in the country of the Venetians, founded by Antenor immediately after the Trojan war. It was the native place of the hiſtorian Livy. The inhabitants were once ſo powerful that they could levy an army of 20,000 men. Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 251.

PADUS, (now called the Po) a river in Italy, known alſo by the name of Eridanus, which forms the northern boundary of the territories of Italy. It riſes in mount Veſulus, one of the higheſt mountains of the Alps, and after it has collected in its courſe the waters of above 30 rivers, diſcharges itſelf in an eaſtern direction into the Adriatic ſea by ſeven mouths, two of which only the Plana or Volana, and the Paduſa, were formed by nature. It was formerly ſaid that it rolled gold duſt in its ſands, which was carefully ſearched by the inhabitants. The conſuls C. Flaminius Nepos, and P. Furius Philus, were the firſt Roman generals who croſſed it. The Po is famous for the death of Phaeton, who, as the poets mention, was thrown down there by the thunderbolts of Jupiter. *Ovid. PALÆSTĪNUS, an antient name of the river Strymon.

PALÆTYRUS, the antient town of Tyre on the continent. Strab. 16.

PĂLĂMĒDES, a Grecian chief, ſon of Nauplius, king of Eubœa by Clymene. He was ſent by the Greek princes who were going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulyſſes to the camp, who, to withdraw himſelf from the expedition, pretended inſanity; and the better to impoſe upon his friends, uſed to harneſs different animals to a plough, and ſow ſalt inſtead of barley into the furrows. The deceit was ſoon perceived by Palamedes, he knew that the regret to part from his wife Penelope, whom he had lately married, was the only reaſon of the pretended inſanity of Ulyſſes; and to demonſtrate this, Palamedes took Telemachus, whom Penelope had lately brought into the world, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulyſſes ſhowed that he was not inſane, by turning the plough a different way not to hurt his child. This having been diſcovered, Ulyſſes was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war, but an immortal enmity aroſe between Ulyſſes and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca reſolved to take every opportunity to diſtreſs him, and when all his expectations were fruſtrated, he had the meanneſs to bribe one of his ſervants, and to make him dig a hole in his maſter's tent, and there conceal a large ſum of money. After this Ulyſſes forged a letter in Phrygian characters, which king Priam was ſuppoſed to have ſent to Palamedes.

Palamedes. In the letter the Trojan king ſeemed to entreat Palamedes to deliver into his hands the Grecian army, according to the conditions which had been previouſly agreed upon, when he received the money. This forged letter was carried by means of Ulyſſes before the princes of the Grecian army. Palamedes was ſummoned, and he made the moſt ſolemn proteſtations of innocence, but all was in vain, the money that was diſcovered in his tent ſerved only to corroborate the accuſation. He was found guilty by all the army and ſtoned to death. Homer is ſilent about the miſerable fate of Palamedes, and Pauſanias mentions that it had been reported by ſome that Ulyſſes and Diomedes had drowned him in the ſea as he was fiſhing on the coaſt. Philoſtratus, who mentions the tragical ſtory above-related, adds that Achilles and Ajax buried his body with great pomp on the ſea ſhore, and that they raiſed upon it a ſmall chapel, where ſacrifices were regularly offered by the inhabitants of Troas. Palamedes was a learned man as well as a ſoldier, and according to ſome he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of the four letters θ, ξ, χ, Φ, during the Trojan war. To him alſo is attributed the invention of dice and back-gammon; and it is ſaid that he was the firſt who regularly ranged an army in a line of battle, and who placed ſentinels round a camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watch word. Hygin. fab. 95, 105, &c.—Apollod. 2, &c.—*Dictyſ. PALANTIA, a town of Spain. Mela. 2, c. 6.

PĂLĀTĪNUS MONS, a celebrated hill, the largeſt of the ſeven hills on which Rome was built. It was upon it that Romulus laid the firſt foundation of the capital of Italy, in a quadrangular form, and there alſo he kept his court, as well as Tullus Hoſtilius, and Auguſtus, and all the ſucceeding emperors, from which circumſtance the word Palatium has ever ſince been applied to the reſidence of a monarch or prince. The Palatine hill received its name from the goddeſs Pales, or from the Palatini, who originally inhabited the place, or from balare or palare, the bleatings of ſheep, which were frequent there, or perhaps from the word palantes, wandering, becauſe Evander, when he came to ſettle in Italy, gathered all the inhabitants, and made them all one ſociety. Dio. Caſſ. 53.—Ital. 12, v. 709.—Liv. 1, c. 7 & 33.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 822.—Juv. 9, v. 23.—Martial. 1, ep. 71.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 3.—Cic. in Catil. 1.——Apollo, who was worſhipped on the Palatine hill, was alſo called Palatinus. His temple there had been built, or rather repaired, by Auguſtus, who had enriched it with a library, valuable for the various collections of Greek and Latin manuſcripts which it contained, as alſo for the Sibylline books depoſited there. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 17.

PALANTIUM, a town of Arcadia.

PALEIS, or PALÆ, a town in the iſland of Cephallenia. Pauſ. 6, c. 15.

PALES, the goddeſs of ſheepfolds and of paſtures among the Romans. She was worſhipped with great ſolemnity at Rome, and her feſtivals, called Palilia, were celebrated the very day that Romulus began to lay the foundation of the city of Rome. Virg. G. 3, v. 1 & 294.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 722, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 8.

PALFURIUS SURA, a writer removed from the ſenate by Domitian, who ſuſpected him of attachment to Vitellius, &c. Juv. 4, v. 53.

PALIBOTHRA, a city of India, ſuppoſed now to be Patna, or, according to others, Allahabad. Strab. 15.

PALĪCI, or PALISCI, two deities, ſons of Jupiter by Thalia, whom Æſchylus calls Ætna, in a tragedy which is now loſt, according to the words of Macrobius. The nymph Ætna when pregnant entreated her lover to remove her from the purſuits of Juno. The god concealed her in the bowels of the earth, and when the time of her delivery was come, the earth opened and brought into the world two children, who received the name of Palici, απο του παλιν ιξισθαι, becauſe they came again into the world from the bowels of the earth. Theſe deities were worſhipped with great ceremonies by the Sicilians, and near their temple were two ſmall lakes of ſulphureous water, which were ſuppoſed to have ſprung out of the earth, at the ſame time that they were born. Near theſe pools it was uſual to take the moſt ſolemn oaths, by thoſe who wiſhed to decide controverſies and quarrels. If any of the perſons who took the oaths perjured themſelves, they were immediately puniſhed in a ſupernatural manner; and thoſe whoſe oath, by the deities of the place, was ſincere, departed unhurt. The Palici had alſo an oracle which was conſulted upon great emergencies, and which rendered the trueſt and moſt unequivocal anſwers. In a ſuperſtitious age the altars of the Palici were ſtained with the blood of human ſacrifices, but this barbarous cuſtom was ſoon aboliſhed, and the deities were ſatisfied with their uſual offerings. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 585.—Ovid. Met. 5, v.

5, v. 506.—Diod. 2.—Macrob. Saturn. 5, c. 10.—Ital. 14, v. 219.

PALĪLIA, a festival celebrated by the Romans, in honor of the goddess Pales. The ceremony consisted in burning heaps of straw, and in leaping over them. No sacrifices were offered but the purifications were made with the smoke of horses' blood, and with the ashes of a calf that had been taken from the belly of his mother, after it had been sacrificed, and with the ashes of beans. The purification of the flocks was also made with the smoke of sulphur, of the olive, the pine, the laurel, and the rosemary. Offerings of mild cheese, boiled wine, and cakes of millet, were afterwards made to the goddess. This festival was observed on the 21st of April, and it was during the celebration that Romulus first began to build his city. Some call this festival Parilia quasi a pariendo, because the sacrifices were offered to the divinity for the fecundity of the flocks. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 774. Fast. 4, v. 721, &c. l. 6, v. 257.

PĂLĪNŪRUS, a skilful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and the waves of the sea, and at last came safe to the sea shore near Velia, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him to obtain his cloaths. His body was left unburied on the sea shore, and as, according to the religion of the ancient Romans, no person was suffered to cross the Stygian lake before 100 years were elapsed, if his remains had not been decently buried, we find Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, speaking to Palinurus, and assuring him, that though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place where his body was exposed should soon be adorned with a monument, and bear his name, and accordingly a promontory was called Palinurus, now Palinuro. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 513. l. 5, v. 840, &c. l. 6, v. 341.—Ovid. de Rem. 577.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Strab.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 28.

PALISCŌRUM, or PALĪCŌRUM STAGNUM, a sulphureous pool in Sicily. Vid. Palici.

PALIURUS, now Nahil, a river of Africa, with a town of the same name at its mouth, to the west of Egypt, on the Mediterranean. Strab. 17.

PALLĂDES, certain virgins who were consecrated to Jupiter by the Thebans of Egypt. Strab. 17.

PALLĂDIUM, a celebrated statue of Pallas. It was about three cubits high, and represented the goddess as sitting and holding a pike in her right hand, and in her left a distaff and a spindle. It fell down from heaven near the tent of Ilus, as that prince was building the citadel of Ilium. Some nevertheless suppose that it fell at Pessinus in Phrygia, or according to others, Dardanus received it as a present from his mother Electra. There are some authors who maintain that the Palladium was made with the bones of Pelops by Abaris; but Apollodorus seems to say, that it was no more than a piece of clock-work which moved of itself. However discordant the opinions of ancient authors be about this famous statue, it is universally agreed, that on its preservation depended the safety of Troy. This fatality was well known to the Greeks during the Trojan war, and therefore Ulysses and Diomedes were commissioned to steal it away. They effected their purpose, and if we rely upon the authority of some authors, they were directed how to carry it away by Helenus the son of Priam, who proved, in this, unfaithful to his country, because his brother Deiphobus, at the death of Paris, had married Helen, of whom he was enamoured. Minerva was displeased with the violence which was offered to her statue, and according to Virgil the Palladium itself appeared to have received life and motion, and by the flashes which started from its eyes, and its sudden springs from the earth, it seemed to shew the resentment of the goddess. The true Palladium, as some authors observe, was not carried away from Troy by the Greeks, but only one of the statues of similar size and shape, which were placed near it, to deceive whatever sacrilegious persons attempted to steal it. The Palladium, therefore, as they say, was conveyed safe from Troy to Italy by Æneas, and it was afterwards preserved by the Romans with the greatest secrecy and veneration, in the temple of Vesta, a circumstance which none but the vestal virgins knew. Herodian. 1, c. 14, &c.—*Ovid. PALLADIUS, a Greek physician whose treatise on fevers was edited 8vo. L. Bat. 1745.

PALLANTĒUM, a town of Italy, or perhaps more properly a citadel built by Evander on mount Palatine, from whence its name originates. Virgil says, it was called after Pallas, the grandfather of Evander; but Dionysius derives its name from Palantium, a town of Arcadia. Dionys. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 54 & 341.

PALLANTIA, a town of Spain, now Palencia, on the river Cea. Mela. 2, c. 6.

PALLANTIAS, a patronymic of Aurora, as being related to the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 12.

PALLANTIDES, the 50 sons of Pallas, the ſon of Pandion, and the brother of Ægeus. They were all killed by Theſeus, the ſon of Ægeus, whom they oppoſed when he came to take poſſeſſion of his father's kingdom. This oppoſition they ſhewed in hopes of ſucceeding to the throne, as Ægeus left no children, except Theſeus, whoſe legitimacy was even diſputed, as he was born at Trœzene. Plut. in Theſ.—Pauſ. 1.

PALLAS, a freed man of Claudius, famous for the power and the riches he obtained. He adviſed the emperor, his maſter, to marry Agrippina, and to adopt her ſon Nero for his ſucceſſor. It was by his means, and thoſe of Agrippina, that the death of Claudius was haſtened, and that Nero was raiſed to the throne. Nero forgot to whom he was indebted for the crown. He diſcarded Pallas, and ſome time after cauſed him to be put to death, that he might make himſelf maſter of his great riches, A. D. 61. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 53.

PALLAS, (adis) a daughter of Jupiter, the ſame as Minerva. The goddeſs received this name either becauſe ſhe killed the giant Pallas, or perhaps from the ſpear which ſhe ſeems to brandiſh in her hands (παλλειν). For the functions, power, and character of the goddeſs, vid. Minerva.

PALLAS, (antis) a ſon of king Evander, ſent with ſome troops to aſſiſt Æneas. He was killed by Turnus, the king of the Rutuli, after he had made a great ſlaughter of the enemy. *Virg. PAMPHŸLIA, a province of Aſia Minor anciently called Mopſopia, and bounded on the ſouth by a part of the Mediterranean called the Pamphylian ſea, weſt by Lycia, north by Piſidia, and eaſt by Cilicia. It abounded with paſtures, vines, and olives, and was peopled by a Grecian colony. Strab. 14.—Mela. 1.—Pauſ. 7, c. 3.—Plin. c. 26.—Liv. 37, c. 23 & 40.

PAN was the god of ſhepherds, huntſmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country. He was the ſon of Mercury, by Dryope, according to Homer. Some give him Jupiter and Calliſto for parents, others Jupiter and Ybis or Oneis. Lucian, Hyginus, &c. ſupport that he was the ſon of Mercury and Penelope, the daughter of Icarius, and that the god gained the affections of the princeſs under the form of a goat, as ſhe tended her father's flocks.

mount Taygetus, before her marriage with the king of Ithaca. Some authors maintain that Penelope became mother of Pan, during the abſence of Ulyſſes in the Trojan war, and that he was the offspring of all the ſuitors that frequented the palace of Penelope, whence he received the name of Pan, which ſignifies all or every thing. Pan was a monſter in appearance, he had two ſmall horns on his head, his complexion was ruddy, his noſe flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet, were thoſe of a goat. The education of Pan was entruſted to a nymph of Arcadia, called Sinoe, but the nurſe, according to Homer, terrified at the ſight of ſuch a monſter, fled away and left him. He was wrapped up in the ſkin of beaſts by his father, and carried to heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themſelves with the oddity of his appearance. Bacchus was greatly pleaſed with him, and gave him the name of Pan. The god of ſhepherds chiefly reſided in Arcadia, where the woods and the moſt rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with ſeven reeds, which he called Syrinx, in honor of a beautiful nymph of the ſame name, to whom he attempted to offer violence, and who was changed into a reed. He was continually employed in deceiving the neighbouring nymphs, and often with ſucceſs. Though deformed in his ſhape and features, yet he had the good fortune to captivate Diana, and of gaining her favor, by transforming himſelf into a beautiful white goat. He was alſo enamoured of a nymph of the mountains called Echo, by whom he had a ſon called Lynx. He alſo paid his addreſſes to Omphale, queen of Lydia, and it is well known in what manner he was received. [Vid. Omphale.] The worſhip of Pan was well eſtabliſhed particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on mount Lycæus. His feſtivals, called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of the Lupercalia. [Vid. Lupercalia.] The worſhip, and the different functions of Pan, are deduced from the mythology of the antient Egyptians. This god was one of the eight great gods of the Egyptians, who ranked before the other 12 gods, whom the Romans called Conſentes. He was worſhipped with the greateſt ſolemnity all over Egypt. The ſtatues repreſented him as a goat, not becauſe he was really ſuch, but this was done for myſterious reaſons. He was the emblem of fecundity, and they looked upon him as the principle of all things. The horns, as ſome obſerve, repreſented the rays of the ſun, and the brightneſs of the heavens was expreſſed by the vivacity and the ruddineſs of his complexion. The ſtar which he wore on his breaſt, was the ſymbol of the firmament, and his hairy legs and feet denoted the inferior parts of the earth, ſuch as the woods and plants. Some ſuppoſe that he appeared as a goat becauſe when the gods fled into Egypt, in their war againſt the giants, Pan tranſformed himſelf into a goat, an example which was immediately followed by all the deities. Pan, according to ſome, is the ſame as Faunus, and he is the chief of all the Satyrs. Plutarch mentions, that in the reign of Tiberius, an extraordinary voice was heard near the Echinades in the Ionian ſea, which exclaimed, that the great Pan was dead. This was readily believed by the emperor, and the aſtrologers were conſulted, but they were unable to explain the meaning of ſo ſupernatural a voice, which probably proceeded from the impoſition of one of the courtiers who attempted to terrify Tiberius. In Egypt, in the town of Mendes, which word alſo ſignifies a goat, there was a ſacred goat kept with the moſt ceremonious ſanctity. The death of this animal was always attended with the greateſt ſolemnities, and like that of another Apis, became the cauſe of an univerſal mourning. As Pan uſually terrified the inhabitants of the neighbouring country, that kind of fear which often ſeizes men, and which is only ideal and imaginary, has received from him the name of panic fear. This kind of terror has been exemplified not only in individuals, but in numerous armies, ſuch as that of Brennus, which was thrown into the greateſt conſternation at Rome, without any cauſe or plauſible reaſon. *Ovid. PANÆTIUS, a ſtoic philoſopher of Rhodes, 138 B. C. He ſtudied at Athens for ſome time, of which he refuſed to become a citizen, obſerving, that a good and modeſt man ought to be ſatisfied with one country. He came to Rome, where he reckoned among his pupils Lælius and Scipio the ſecond Africanus. To the latter he was attached by the cloſeſt ties of friendſhip and familiarity, he attended him in his expeditions, and partook of all his pleaſures and amuſements. To the intereſt of their countrymen at Rome the Rhodians were greatly indebted for their prosperity and the immunities which they for some time enjoyed. Panætius wrote a treatise on the duties of man, whose merit can be ascertained from the encomiums which Cicero bestows upon it. Cic. in offic. &c.——A tyrant of Leontini in Sicily, B. C. 613. Polyæn. 5.

PANATHENÆA, festivals in honor of Minerva the patroness of Athens. They were first instituted by Erichtheus or Orpheus, and called Athenæa, but Theseus afterwards renewed them and caused them to be celebrated and observed by all the tribes of Athens, which he had united into one, and from which reason the festivals received their name. Some suppose that they are the same as the Roman Quinquatria, as they are often called by that name among the Latins. In the first years of the institution, they were observed only during one day, but afterwards the time was prolonged, and the celebration was attended with greater pomp and solemnity. The festivals were two; the great Panathenæa (μεγαλα), which were observed every 5th year, beginning on the 22d of the month called Hecatombæon, or 7th of July, and the lesser Panathenæa (μικρα), which were kept every 3d year, or rather annually, beginning on the 21st or 20th of the month called Thargelion, corresponding to the 5th or 6th day of the month of May. In the lesser festivals there were three games conducted by ten presidents chosen from the ten tribes of Athens, who continued four years in office. On the evening of the first day there was a race with torches, in which men on foot, and afterwards on horseback, contended. The same was also exhibited in the greater festivals. The second combat was gymnical, and exhibited a trial of strength and bodily dexterity. The last was a musical contention, first instituted by Pericles. In the songs they celebrated the generous undertaking of Harmodius and Aristogiton, who opposed the Pisistratidæ, and of Thrasybulus, who delivered Athens from its thirty tyrants. Phrynis of Mitylene was the first who obtained the victory by playing upon the harp. There were besides other musical instruments, on which they played in concert, such as flutes, &c. The poets contended in four plays, called from their number τετραλογια. The last of these was a satire. There was also at Sunium an imitation of a naval fight. Whoever obtained the victory in any of these games was rewarded with a vessel of oil, which he was permitted to dispose of in whatever manner he pleased, and it was unlawful for any other person to transport that commodity. The conqueror also received a crown of the olives which grew in the groves of Academus, and were sacred to Minerva, and called μοριαι, from μορος, death, in remembrance of the tragical end of Hallirhotius the son of Neptune, who cut his own legs when he attempted to cut down the olive which had given the victory to Minerva in preference to his father, when these two deities contended about giving a name to Athens. Some suppose that the word is derived from μερος, a part, because these olives were given by contribution by all such as attended at the festivals. There was also a dance called Pyrrhichia, performed by young boys in armour, in imitation of Minerva, who thus expressed her triumph over the vanquished Titans. Gladiators were also introduced when Athens became tributary to the Romans. During the celebration no person was permitted to appear in dyed garments, and if any one transgressed he was punished according to the discretion of the president of the games. After these things, a sumptuous sacrifice was offered, in which every one of the Athenian boroughs contributed an ox, and the whole was concluded by an entertainment for all the company with the flesh that remained from the sacrifice. In the greater festivals, the same rites and ceremonies were usually observed, but with more solemnity and magnificence. Others were also added, particularly the procession, in which Minerva's sacred πεπλος, or garment, was carried. This garment was woven by a select number of virgins, called εργαστικαι, from ἐργον, work. They were superintended by two of the αρρηφορες, or young virgins, not above seventeen years of age nor under eleven, whose garments were white and set off with ornaments of gold. Minerva's peplus was of a white color, without sleeves, and embroidered with gold. Upon it were described the atchievements of the goddess, particularly her victories over the giants. The exploits of Jupiter and the other gods were also represented there, and from that circumstance men of courage and bravery are said to be αξια πεπλου, worthy to be pourtrayed in Minerva's sacred garment. In the procession of the peplus, the following ceremonies were observed. In the ceramicus, without the city, there was an engine built in the form of a ship, upon which Minerva's garment was hung as a sail, and the whole was conducted, not by beasts, as some have supposed, but by subterraneous machines, to the temple of Ceres Eleusinia, and from thence to the the citadel, where the peplus was placed upon Minerva's ſtatue, which was laid upon a bed woven or ſtrewed with flowers, which was called πλακις. Perſons of all ages, of every ſex and quality, attended the proceſſion, which was led by old men and women carrying olive branches in their hands, from which reaſon they were called θαλλοφοροι, bearers of green boughs. Next followed men of full age with ſhields and ſpears. They were attended by the μετοικοι, or foreigners, who carried ſmall boats as a token of their foreign origin, and from that account they were called σκαφηφοροι, boat bearers. After them came the women attended by the wives of the foreigners called ὑδριαφοροι, becauſe they carried water-pots. Next to theſe came young men crowned with millet and ſinging hymns to the goddeſs, and after them followed ſelect virgins of the nobleſt families, called κανηφοροι, baſket bearers, becauſe they carried baſkets, in which were certain things neceſſary for the celebration, with whatever utenſils were alſo requiſite. Theſe ſeveral neceſſaries were generally in the poſſeſſion of the chief manager of the feſtival called αρχιθεωρος, who diſtributed them when occaſion offered. The virgins were attended by the daughters of the foreigners, who carried umbrellas and little ſeats, from which they were named διφρηφοροι, ſeat, carriers. The boys, called παιδομικοι, as it may be ſuppoſed, led the rear cloathed in coats generally worn at proceſſions. The neceſſaries for this and every other feſtival were prepared in a public hall erected for that purpoſe, between the Piræan gate and the temple of Ceres. The management and the care of the whole was entruſted to the νομοφυλακες, or people employed in ſeeing the rites and ceremonies properly obſerved. It was alſo uſual to ſet all priſoners at liberty, and to preſent golden crowns to ſuch as had deſerved well of their country. Some perſons were alſo choſen to ſing ſome of Homer's poems, a cuſtom which was firſt introduced by Hipparchus the ſon of Piſiſtratus. It was alſo cuſtomary in this feſtival and every other quinquennial feſtival, to pray for the proſperity of the Platæans, whoſe ſervices had been ſo conſpicuous at the battle of Marathon. Plut. in Theſ.—*Pauſ. PANDĂRIA, or PANDATARIA, a ſmall iſland of the Tyrrhene ſea.

PANDĂRUS, a ſon of Lycaon, who aſſiſted the Trojans in their war againſt the Greeks. He went to the war without a chariot, and therefore he generally fought on foot. He broke the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans, and wounded Menelaus and Diomedes, and ſhewed himſelf brave and unuſually courageous. He was at laſt killed by Diomedes; and Æneas, who then carried him in his chariot, by attempting to revenge his death nearly periſhed by the hand of the furious enemy. Dictys Cret. 2, c. 35.—Homer. Il. 2 & 5.—Hygin. fab. 112.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 495.—Strab. 14.——A ſon of Alcanor killed with his brother Bitias by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 735.—A native of Crete puniſhed with death for being acceſſary to the theft of Tantalus. What this theft was is unknown. Some, however, ſuppoſe that Tantalus ſtole the ambroſia and the nectar from the tables of the gods to which he had been admitted, or that he carried away a dog which watched Jupiter's temple in Crete, in which crime Pandarus was concerned, and for which he ſuffered. Pandarus had two daughters, Camiro and Clytia, who were alſo deprived of their mother by a ſudden death, and left without friends or protectors. Venus had compaſſion upon them, and ſhe fed them with milk, honey, and wine. The goddeſſes were all equally intereſted in their welfare. Juno gave them wiſdom and beauty, Diana a handſome figure and regular features, and Minerva inſtructed them in whatever domeſtic accompliſhments can recommend a wife. Venus wiſhed ſtill to make their happineſs more complete, and when they were come to nubile years, the goddeſs prayed Jupiter to grant them kind and tender huſbands. But in her abſence the Harpyies carried away the virgins and delivered them to the Eumenides to ſhare the puniſhment which their father ſuffered. Pauſ. 10, c. 30.—Pindar.

PANDĂRUS or PANDAREUS, a man who had a daughter called Philomela. She was changed into a nightingale, after ſhe had killed, by miſtake, her ſon Itylus, whoſe death ſhe mourned in the greateſt melancholy. Some ſuppoſe him to be the ſame as Pandion, king of Athens.

PANDATARIA, an iſland on the coaſt of Lucania, now called Santa Maria.

PANDĒMUS, one of the ſirnames of the god of love, among the Egyptians and the Greeks, who diſtinguiſhed two Cupids, one of whom was the vulgar called Pandemus, and another of a purer and more celeſtial origin. Plut. in Erot.

PANDIA, a feſtival at Athens eſtabliſhed by Pandion, from whom it received its name, or becauſe it was obſerved in honor of Jupiter, who can τα παντα διγευειν, move and turn all things as he pleaſes. Some ſuppoſe that it concerned the moon, becauſe it does παντοτε ιεναι, move inceſſantly by ſhewing itſelf day and night, rather than the ſun which never appears but in the day time. It was celebrated after the Dionyſia, becauſe Bacchus is ſometimes taken for the ſun or Apollo, and therefore the brother, or, as ſome will have it, the ſon of the moon.

PANDĪON, a king of Athens, ſon of Erichthon and Paſithea, who ſucceeded his father, B. C. 1437. He became father of Procne and Philomela, Erechtheus and Butes. During his reign there was ſuch an abundance of corn, wine and oil, that it was publicly reported that Bacchus and Minerva had perſonally viſited Attica. He waged a ſucceſsful war againſt Labdacus king of Bœotia, and gave his daughter Procne in marriage to Tereus, king of Thrace, who had aſſiſted him. The treatment which Philomela received from her brother-in-law, Tereus, (Vid. Philomela) was the ſource of infinite grief to Pandion, and he died thro' exceſs of ſorrow, after a reign of 40 years. There was alſo another Pandion, ſon of Cecrops 2d. by Metiaduca, who ſucceeded to his father, B. C. 130. He was driven from his paternal dominions, and fled to Pylas, king of Megara, who gave him his daughter Pelia in marriage, and reſigned his crown to him. Pandion became father of four children, called from him Pandionidæ, Ægeus, Pallas, Niſus, and Lycus. The eldeſt of theſe children recovered his father's kingdom. Some authors have confounded the two Pandions together in ſuch an indiſcriminate manner, that they ſeem to have been only one and the ſame perſon. Many believe that Philomela and Procne were the daughters, not of Pandion the 1ſt, but of Pandion the 2d. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 676.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 48.——A ſon of Phineus and Cleopatra, deprived of his eye-ſight by his father. Apollod. 3, c. 15.——A ſon of Ægyptus and Hephæſtina.——A king of the Indies in the age of Auguſtus.

PANDŌRA, a celebrated woman, the firſt mortal female that ever lived, according to the opinion of the poet Heſiod. She was made with clay by Vulcan, at the requeſt of Jupiter, who wiſhed to puniſh the impiety and artifice of Prometheus, by giving him a wife. When this woman of clay had been made by the artiſt, and received life, all the gods vied in making her preſents. Venus gave her beauty and the art of pleaſing; the Graces gave her the power of captivating; Apollo taught her how to ſing; Mercury inſtructed her in eloquence; and Minerva gave her the moſt rich and ſplendid ornaments. From all theſe valuable preſents, which ſhe had received from the gods, the woman was called Pandora, which intimates that ſhe had received every neceſſary gift, παν δωρον. Jupiter after this gave her a beautiful box, which ſhe was ordered to preſent to the man who married her, and by the commiſſion of the god, Mercury conducted her to Prometheus. The artful mortal was ſenſible of the deceit, and as he had always diſtruſted Jupiter, as well as the reſt of the gods, ſince he had ſtolen fire away from the ſun to animate his man of clay, he ſent away Pandora without ſuffering himſelf to be captivated by her charms. His brother Epimetheus was not poſſeſſed of the ſame prudence and ſagacity. He married Pandora, and when he opened the box which ſhe preſented to him, there iſſued from it a multitude of evils and diſtempers, which diſperſed themſelves all over the world, and which, from that fatal moment, have never ceaſed to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one who remained at the bottom of the box, and it is ſhe alone who has the wonderful power of eaſing the labors of man, and of rendering his troubles and his ſorrows leſs painful in life. Heſiod. Theog. & Dieſ.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Pauſ. 1, c. 24.—Hygin. 14.——A daughter of Erechtheus king of Athens. She was ſiſter to Protogenia, who ſacrificed herſelf for her country at the beginning of the Bœotian war.

PANDŌRUS, a ſon of Erechtheus, king of Athens.

PANDOSIA, a town in the country of the Brutii, ſituate on a mountain. Alexander, king of the Moloſſi, died there. Strab. 6.——A town of Epirus. Plin. 4, c. 1.

PANDRŎSOS, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, ſiſter to Aglauros and Herſe. She was the only one of the ſiſters, who had not the fatal curioſity to open a baſket which Minerva had entruſted to their care, [Vid. Erichthonius,] for which ſincerity a temple was raiſed to her, near that of Minerva, and a feſtival inſtituted in her honor, called Pandroſia. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 738.—Apollod. 3.—Pauſ. 1, &c.

PANENUS or PANÆUS, a celebrated painter, who was for ſometime engaged in painting painting the battle of Marathon. Plin. 35.

Pangæus, a mountain of Thrace, antiently called Mons Caraminus, and joined to Mount Rhodope near the fources of the river Neftus. It was inhabited by four different nations. It was on this mountain that Lycurgus, the Thracian king, was torn to pieces, and that Orpheus called the attention of the wild beafts, and of the mountains and woods to liften to his fong. It abounded in gold and filver mines. Herodot. 5, c. 16, &c. l. 7, c. 113.—Virg. G. 4, v. 462.—Ovid. Faft. 3.—Thucyd. 2.—Lucan. 1, v. 679. l. 7, v. 482.

Paniasis, a man who wrote a poem upon Hercules, &c. Vid. Panyafis.

Panionium, a place at the foot of mount Mycale, near the town of Ephefus in Afia Minor, facred to Neptune of Helice. It was in this place that all the ftates of Ionia aſſembled, either to conſult for their own fafety and profperity, or to celebrate feſtivals, or to offer a facrifice for the good of all the nation, whence the name, παν ιωνιον all Ionia. The deputies of the twelve Ionian cities which aſſembled there were thofe of Miletus, Myus, Priene, Ephefus, Lebedos, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Phocæa, Teos, Chios, Samos, and Erythræ. If the bull offered in facrifice bellowed, it was accounted an omen of the higheft favor, as the found was particularly acceptable to the god of the fea, as in fome manner it refembled the roaring of the waves of the ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 148, &c.—Strab. 14.—Mela. 1, c. 17.

Panius, a place of Cœlo-Syria, where Antiochus defeated Scopas, B. C. 198.

Pannŏnia, a large country of Europe, bounded on the eaft by Upper Mœfia, fouth by Dalmatia, weft by Noricum, and north by the Danube. It was divided by the antients into Lower and Upper Pannonia. The inhabitants were of Celtic origin, and were firft invaded by J. Cæfar, and conquered in the reign of Tiberius. Philip and his fon Alexander fome ages before had fucceſſively conquered it. Sirmium was the antient capital of all Pannonia, which contains the modern provinces of Croatia, Carniola, Sclavonia, Boſnia, Windiſch, March, with part of Servia, and of the kingdoms of Hungary and Auſtria. Lucan. 3, v. 95. l. 6, v. 220.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 109.—Plin. 3.—Dion. Caſſ. 49.—Strab. 4 & 7.—Jornand.—Patere. 2, c. 9.—Suet. Aug. 20.

Panomphæus, a firname of Jupiter, either becauſe he was worſhipped by every nation on earth, or becauſe he heard the prayers and the ſupplications which were addreſſed to him, or becauſe the reſt of the gods derived from him their knowledge of futurity (πας omnis, ομφη vox). Ovid. Met. 11, v. 198.—Homer. Il. 8.

Panŏpe, or Panŏpēa, one of the Nereides, whom ſailors generally invoked in ſtorms. Her name ſignifies, giving every aſſiſtance, or ſeeing every thing. Heſiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 825.——One of the daughters of Theſpius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—A town of Phocis, called alſo Panopeus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 19.—Liv. 32, c. 18.—Pauſ. 10, c. 4.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 344.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 27. Od. 11, v. 580.

Panŏpes, a famous huntſman among the attendants of Aceſtes, king of Sicily, who was one of thoſe that engaged in the games exhibited by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 300.

Panŏpeus, a ſon of Phocus and Afterodia, who accompanied Amphitryon when he made war againſt the Teleboans. He was father to Epeus, who made the celebrated wooden horſe at the ſiege of Troy. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.——A town of Phocis, between Orchomenos and the Cephiſus. Pauſ. 10, c. 4.—Strab. 9.

Panopion, a Roman ſaved from death by the uncommon fidelity of his ſervant. When the aſſaſſins came to murder him as being proſcribed, the ſervant exchanged cloaths with his maſter, and let him eſcape by a back door. He afterwards went into his maſter's bed, and ſuffered himſelf to be killed as if Panopion himſelf. Val. Max.

Panopŏlis, the city of Pan, a town of Egypt, called alſo Chemmis. Pan had there a temple, where he was worſhipped with great ſolemnity, and repreſented in a ſtatue faſcino longiſſimo & erecto. Diod. 5.—Strab. 17.

Panormus, now called Palermo, a town of Sicily, built by the Phœnicians, on the north-weſt part of the iſland, with a good and capacious harbour. It was the ſtrongeſt hold of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and it was at laſt taken with difficulty by the Romans. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ital. 14, v. 262.——A town of the Thracian Cherſoneſus.——A town of Ionia, near Epheſus,——another in Crete,——in Macedonia,——Achaia,——Samos,——a Meſſenian who inſulted the religion of the Lacedæmonians. Vid. Gonippus.

Panotii, a people of Scythia, ſaid to have very large ears. Plin. 4, c. 13.

Pansa C. Vibius, a Roman conſul, who, with A. Hirtius, purſued the murderers of J. Cæſar, and was killed in a battle near Mutina. On his death-bed he adviſed young Octavius to unite his intereſt with that of Antony, if he wiſhed to revenge the death of Julius Cæſar, and from his friendly advice ſoon after roſe the celebrated ſecond triumvirate. Some ſuppoſe that Panſa was put to death by Octavius himſelf, or through him, by the phyſician Glicon, who poured poiſon into the wounds of his patient. Panſa and Hirtius were the two laſt conſuls who enjoyed the dignity of chief magiſtrates of Rome, with full power. The authority of the conſuls afterwards dwindled into a ſhadow. Paterc. 2, c. 6.—Dio. 46.—Ovid. Triſt. 3, el. 5.—Plut. & Appian.

PANTAGNOSTUS, a brother of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. Polyæn. 1.

PANTAGYAS, a ſmall river on the eaſtern coaſt of Sicily, which falls into the ſea, after running a ſhort ſpace in rough caſcades over rugged ſtones and precipices. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 689.—Ital. 14, v. 232.

PANTALEON, a king of Piſa, who preſided at the Olympic games, B. C. 664, after excluding the Eleans, who on that account expunged the Olympiad from the Faſti, and called it the 2d Anolympiad. They had called for the ſame reaſon the 8th the 1ſt Anolympiad, becauſe the Piſæans preſided.

PANTANUS LACUS, the lake of Leſina, is ſituated in Apulia at the mouth of the Frento. Plin. 3, c. 12.

PANTHIDES, a man who married Italia, the daughter of Themiſtocles.

PANTHEA, the wife of Abradates, celebrated for her beauty and conjugal affection. She was taken priſoner by Cyrus, who refuſed to viſit her, not to be enſnared by the power of her perſonal charms. She killed herſelf on the body of her huſband, who had been ſlain in a battle, &c. [Vid. Abradates.] Xenoph. Cyrop.

PANTHEON, a celebrated temple at Rome, built by Agrippa, in the reign of Auguſtus, and dedicated to all the gods. whence the name πας θεος. It was ſtruck with lightening ſome time after, and partly deſtroyed. Adrian repaired it, and it ſtill remains at Rome, converted into a chriſtian temple, the admiration of the curious. Plin. 36, c. 15.—Marcell. 16, c. 10.

PANTHEUS, or PANTHUS, a Trojan, ſon of Othryas the prieſt of Apollo. When his country was burnt by the Greeks, he followed the fortune of Æneas, and was killed. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 429.

PANTHOĬDES, a patronymic of Euphorbus, the ſon of Panthous. Pythagoras is ſometimes called by that name, as he aſſerted that he was Euphorbus during the Trojan war. Horat. 1, od. 28, v. 10.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 161.——A Spartan general, killed by Pericles at the battle of Tanagra.

PANTICAPÆUM, now Kerche, a town of Taurica Cherſoneſus, built by the Mileſians, and governed ſome time by its own laws, and afterwards ſubdued by the kings of Boſphorus. It was, according to Strabo, the capital of the European Boſphorus. Mithridates the Great died there. Plin.—Strab.

PANTICĂPES, a river of European Scythia, which falls into the Boryſthenes, ſuppoſed to be the Samara of the moderns. Herodot. 4, c. 54.

PANTILIUS, a buffoon ridiculed by Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 78.

PANYĂSIS, an antient Greek, uncle to the hiſtorian Herodotus. He celebrated Hercules in one of his poems, and the Ionians in another, and was univerſally eſteemed.

PAPHIA, a ſirname of Venus, becauſe the goddeſs was worſhipped at Paphos.—An antient name of the iſland of Cyprus.

PAPHLĂGŎNIA, now Penderachia, a country of Aſia Minor, ſituate at the weſt of the river Halys, by which it was ſeparated from Cappadocia. It was divided on the weſt from the Bithynians, by the river Parthenius. Herodot. 1, c. 72.—Strab. 4.—Mela.——Plin.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Cic. Rull 2, c. 2 & 19.

PAPHOS, now Baſo, a famous city of the iſland of Cyprus, founded, as ſome ſuppoſe, about 1184 years before Chriſt, by Agapenor, at the head of a colony from Arcadia. The goddeſs of beauty was particularly worſhipped there, and all male animals were offered on her altars, which, though 100 in number, daily ſmoked with the profuſion of Arabian frankincenſe. The inhabitants were very effeminate and laſcivious, and the young virgins were permitted by the laws of the place to get a dowry by proſtitution. Strab. 8, &c.—Plin. 2, c. 96.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 8.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 419, &c. l. 10, v. 51, &c.—Horat. 1. od. 30, v. 1.—Tacit. A. 3, c. 62. H. 2, c. 2.

PAPHUS, a ſon of Pygmalion, by a ſtatue which had been changed into a woman by Venus. [Vid. Pygmalion.] Ovid. Met. 10, v. 297.

PAPIA LEX, de peregrinis, by Papius, the tribune, A. U. C. 688, which required quired that all ſtrangers ſhould be driven away from Rome. It was afterwards confirmed and extended by the Junian law.—Another called Papia Poppæa, becauſe it was enacted by the tribunes, M. Papius Mutilus, and Q. Poppæus Secundus, who had received conſular power from the conſuls for ſix months. It was called the Julian law, after it had been publiſhed by order of Auguſtus, who himſelf was of the Julian family. Vid. Julia lex de Maritandis ordinibus.—Another to empower the high prieſt to chuſe 20 virgins for the ſervice of the goddeſs Veſta.—Another in the age of Auguſtus. It gave the patron a certain right to the property of his client, if he had left a ſpecified ſum of money, or if he had not three children.

PAPIĀNUS, a man who proclaimed himſelf emperor ſome time after the Gordians. He was put to death.

PAPIAS, an early chriſtian writer who firſt propagated the doctrine of the Millennium. There are remaining ſome hiſtorical fragments of his.

PAPINIANUS, a writer, A. D. 212. Vid. Æmylius Papinianus.

PAPINIUS, a tribune who conſpired againſt Caligula.——A man who deſtroyed himſelf, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 49.

PĀPIRIA, the wife of Paulus Æmylius. She was divorced. Plut.

PAPĪRIUS, a centurion engaged to murder Piſo, the proconſul of Africa. Tacit. Hiſt. 4, c. 49.——A patrician, choſen rex ſacrorum, after the expulſion of the Tarquins from Rome.——A Roman who wiſhed to gratify his unnatural deſires upon the body of one of his ſlaves called Publilius. The ſlave refuſed, and was inhumanly treated. This called for the interference of juſtice, and a decree was made, which forbad any perſon to be detained in fetters, but only for a crime that deſerved ſuch a treatment, and only till the criminal had ſuffered the puniſhment which the laws directed. Creditors alſo had a right to arreſt the goods, and not the perſon of their debtors. Liv. 8, c. 28.——Carbo, a Roman conſul who undertook the defence of Opimius, who was accuſed of condemning and putting to death a number of citizens on mount Aventinus without the formalities of a trial. His client was acquitted.——Curſor, a man who firſt erected a ſun-dial in the temple of Quirinus at Rome, B. C. 293; from which time the days began to be divided into hours.——A dictator who ordered his maſter of horſe to be put to death, becauſe he had fought and conquered the enemies of the republic without his conſent. The people interfered, and the dictator pardoned him. Curſor made war againſt the Sabines and conquered them, and alſo triumphed over the Samnites. His great ſeverity diſpleaſed the people. He floriſhed about 320 years before the chriſtian era. Liv. 9, c. 14.——One of his family, ſirnamed Prætextatus, from an action of his whilſt he wore the prætexta, a certain gown for young men. His father, of the ſame name, carried him to the ſenate houſe, where affairs of the greateſt importance were then in debate before the ſenators. The mother of young Papirius wiſhed to know what had paſſed in the ſenate; but Papirius, unwilling to betray the ſecrets of that auguſt aſſembly, amuſed his mother by telling her, that it had been conſidered whether it would be more advantageous to the republic to give two wives to one huſband, than two huſbands to one wife. The mother of Papirius was alarmed, and ſhe communicated the ſecret to the other Roman matrons, and on the morrow they aſſembled in the ſenate, petitioning that one woman might have two huſbands, rather than one huſband two wives. The ſenators were aſtoniſhed at this petition, but young Papirius unravelled the whole myſtery, and from that time it was made a law among the ſenators, that no young man ſhould for the future be introduced into the ſenate-houſe, except Papirius. This law was carefully obſerved till the age of Auguſtus, who permitted children of all ages to hear the debates of the ſenators. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 6.——Carbo, a friend of Cinna and Marius. He raiſed cabals againſt Sylla and Pompey, and was at laſt put to death by order of Pompey, after he had rendered himſelf odious by a tyrannical conſulſhip, and after he had been proſcribed by Sylla.——A conſul defeated by the armies of the Cimbri.—Craſſus, a dictator who triumphed over the Samnites.——A conſul murdered by the Gauls, &c.——A ſon of Papirius Curſor, who defeated the Samnites and dedicated a temple to Romulus Quirinus.——Maſo, a conſul who conquered Sardinia and Corſica, and reduced them into the form of a province. At his return to Rome, he was refuſed a triumph, upon which he introduced a triumphal proceſſion, and walked with his victorious army to the capitol, wearing a crown of myrtle on his head. His example was afterwards followed by ſuch generals as were refuſed a triumph by the Roman ſenate. Val. Max. 3, c. 6.——The family of the Papirii was patrician, and long diſtinguiſhed for its ſervices to the ſtate. It bore the different ſirnames of Craſſus, Curſor, Mugillanus, Maſo, Prætextatus, and Pætus, of which the three firſt branches became the moſt illuſtrious.

PAPIRIA LEX, by Papirius Carbo, A. U. C. 621.

C. 621. It required that in paſſing or rejecting laws in the comitia, the votes ſhould be given on tablets.——Another, by the tribune Papirius, which enacted that no perſon ſhould conſecrate any edifice, place, or thing, without the conſent and permiſſion of the people. Cic. pro domo 50.——Another, A. U. C. 563, to diminiſh the weight, and increaſe the value of the Roman as. ——Another, A. U. C. 421, to give the freedom of the city to the citizens of Aceræ. ——Another, A. U. C. 623. It was propoſed, but not paſſed. It recommended the right of chuſing a man tribune of the people as often as he wiſhed.

PAPPIA LEX was enacted to ſettle the rights of huſbands and wives if they had no children.——Another by which a perſon leſs than 50 years old, could not marry another of 60.

PARASIA, a country at the eaſt of Media.

PARASIUS, a ſon of Philonomia by a ſhepherd. He was expoſed on Erymanthus by his mother, with his twin brother Lycaſtus. Their lives were preſerved.

PARCÆ, powerful goddeſſes who preſided over the birth and the life of mankind. They were three in number, Clotho, Lacheſis, and Atropos, daughters of Nox and Erebus, according to Heſiod, or of Jupiter and Themis, according to the ſame poet in another poem. Some make them daughters of the ſea. Clotho, the youngeſt of the ſiſters, preſided over the moment in which we are born, and held a diſtaff in her hand; Lacheſis ſpun out all the events and actions of our life; and Atropos, the eldeſt of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of ſciſſars. Their different functions are well expreſſed in this antient verſe:

Clotho colum retinet, Lacheſis net, & Atropos occat.

The name of the Parcæ, according to Varro, is derived a partu or parturiendo, becauſe they preſided over the birth of men, and by corruption the word parca is formed, from parta or partus. The power of the Parcæ was great and extenſive. Some ſuppoſe that they were ſubjected to none of the gods but Jupiter, while others ſupport, that even Jupiter himſelf was obedient to their commands, and indeed we ſee the father of the gods in Homer's Iliad unwilling to ſee Patroclus periſh, yet obliged by the ſuperior power of the Fates to abandon him to his deſtiny. According to the more received opinions, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befalls us in the world, immediately proceeds from the Fates, or Parcæ. Some make them miniſters of the king of hell, and repreſent them as ſitting at the foot of his throne; others repreſent them as placed on radiant thrones, amidſt the celeſtial ſpheres, clothed in robes ſpangled with ſtars, and wearing crowns on their heads. According to Pauſanias, the names of the Parcæ were different from thoſe already mentioned. The moſt ancient of all, as the geographer obſerves, was Venus Urania, who preſided over the birth of men, the ſecond was Fortune, Ilithyia was the third. To theſe ſome add a fourth, Proſerpina, who often diſputes with Atropos the right of cutting the thread of human life. The worſhip of the Parcæ was well eſtabliſhed in ſome cities of Greece, and though mankind were well convinced that they were inexorable, and that it was impoſſible to mitigate them, yet they were eager to ſhew a proper reſpect to their divinity, by raiſing them temples and ſtatues. They received the ſame worſhip as the Furies, and their votaries yearly ſacrificed to them black ſheep, during which ſolemnity the prieſts were obliged to wear garlands of flowers. The Parcæ were generally repreſented as three old women with chaplets made with wool, and interwoven with the flowers of the Narciſſus. They were covered with a white robe, and fillet of the ſame color, bound with chaplets. One of them held a diſtaff, another the ſpindle, and the third was armed with ſciſſars, with which ſhe cut the thread which which her ſiſters had ſpun. Their dreſs is differently repreſented by ſome authors. Clotho appears in a variegated robe, and on her head is a crown of ſeven ſtars. She holds a diſtaff in her hand reaching from heaven to earth. The robe which Lacheſis wore, was variegated with a great number of ſtars, and near her were placed a variety of ſpindles. Atropos was clothed in black, ſhe held ſciſſars in her hand, with clues of thread of different ſizes, according to the length and ſhortneſs of the lives, whoſe deſtinies they ſeemed to contain. Hyginus attributes to them the invention of theſe Greek letters α, β, η, τ, υ, and others call them the ſecretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity. The Greeks call the Parcæ by the different names of μοιρα, αισα, κηρ, ειμαρμενη, which are expreſſive of their power and of their inexorable decrees. Heſiod. Theog. & *ſcut. PARENTIUM, a port and town of Iſtria. Plin. 3, c. 19.

PĂRIS, the ſon of Priam king of Troy, by Hecuba, alſo called Alexander. He was deſtined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country, and when his mother, in the firſt month of her pregnancy, had dreamed that ſhe ſhould bring forth a torch which would ſet fire to her palace, the ſoothſayers foretold the calamities which might be expected from the imprudence of her future ſon, and which would end in the deſtruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent ſo great and ſo alarming an evil, ordered his ſlave Archelaus to deſtroy the child as ſoon as born. The ſlave, either touched with humanity or influenced by Hecuba, did not deſtroy him, but was ſatisfied to expoſe him on mount Ida, where the ſhepherds of the place found him, and educated him as their own ſon. Some attribute the preſervation of his life before he was found by the ſhepherds, to the motherly tenderneſs of a ſhe bear who ſuckled him. Young Paris, though educated among ſhepherds and peaſants, gave early proofs of courage and intrepidity, and from his care in protecting the flocks of mount Ida againſt the rapacity of the wild beaſts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). He gained the eſteem of all the ſhepherds, and his graceful countenance and manly deportment recommended him to the favor of Œnone, a nymph of Ida, whom he married, and with whom he lived with the moſt perfect tenderneſs. Their conjugal peace was ſoon diſturbed. At the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the goddeſs of diſcord, who had not been invited to partake of the entertainment, ſhewed her diſpleaſure, by throwing into the aſſembly of the gods who were at the celebration of the nuptials, a golden apple, on which were written the words Detur pulchriori. All the goddeſſes claimed it as their own, the contention at firſt became general, but at laſt only three, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, wiſhed to diſpute their reſpective right to beauty. The gods, unwilling to become arbiters in an affair of ſo tender and ſo delicate a nature, appointed Paris to adjudge the prize of beauty to the faireſt of the goddeſſes, and indeed the ſhepherd ſeemed properly qualified to decide ſo great a conteſt, as his wiſdom was ſo well eſtabliſhed, and his prudence and ſagacity ſo well known. The goddeſſes appeared before their judge without any covering or ornament, and each tried by promiſes and entreaties to gain the attention of Paris, and to influence his judgment. Juno promiſed him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the faireſt woman in the world for his wife, as Ovid expreſſes it, Heroid. 17, v. 118.

Unaque cum regnum; belli daret altera laudem;
Tyndaridis conjux, Tertia dixit, eris.

After he had heard their ſeveral claims and promiſes, Paris adjudged the prize to Venus, and gave her the golden apple, to which, perhaps, ſhe ſeemed entitled, as the goddeſs of beauty. This deciſion of Paris in favor of Venus, drew upon the judge and his family the reſentment of the two other goddeſſes. Soon after Priam propoſed a conteſt among his ſons and other princes, and promiſed to reward the conqueror with one of the fineſt bulls of mount Ida. His emiſſaries were ſent to procure the animal, and it was found in the poſſeſſion of Paris, who reluctantly yielded it up. The ſhepherd was deſirous of obtaining again this favorite animal, and he went to Troy and entered the liſts of the combatants. He was received with the greateſt applauſe, and obtained the victory over his rivals, Neſtor, the ſon of Neleus; Cycnus, ſon of Neptune; Polites, Helenus, and Deiphobus, ſons of Priam. He alſo obtained a ſuperiority over Hector himſelf, and the prince, enraged to ſee himſelf conquered by an unknown ſtranger, purſued him cloſely, and Paris muſt have fallen a victim to his brother's reſentment, had he not fled to the altar of Jupiter.

This

This ſacred retreat preſerved his life, and Caſſandra, the daughter of Priam, ſtruck with the ſimilarity of the features of Paris with thoſe of her brothers, enquired his birth and his age. From theſe circumſtances ſhe ſoon diſcovered that he was her brother, and as ſuch ſhe introduced him to her father and to his children. Priam acknowledged Paris as his ſon, forgetful of the alarming dreams which had influenced him to meditate his death, and all jealouſy ceaſed among the brothers. Paris did not long ſuffer himſelf to remain inactive, he equipped a fleet, as if willing to redeem Heſione his father's ſiſter, whom Hercules had carried away, and obliged to marry Telamon the ſon of Æacus. This was the pretended motive of his voyage, but the cauſes were far different. Paris recollected that he was to be the huſband of the faireſt of women, and if he had been led to form thoſe expectations while he was an obſcure ſhepherd of Ida, he had now every plauſible reaſon to ſee them realized ſince he was acknowledged ſon of the king of Troy. Helen was the faireſt woman of the age, and Venus had promiſed her to him. On theſe grounds, therefore, he viſited Sparta, the reſidence of Helen who had married Menelaus. He was received with every mark of reſpect, but he abuſed the hoſpitality of Menelaus, and while the huſband was abſent in Crete, Paris perſuaded Helen to elope with him, and to fly to Aſia. Helen conſented, and Priam received her into his palace without difficulty, as his ſiſter was then detained in a foreign country, and as he wiſhed to ſhow himſelf as hoſtile as poſſible to the Greeks. This affair was ſoon productive of ſerious conſequences. When Menelaus had married Helen, all her ſuitors had bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to protect her perſon, and to defend her from every violence, [Vid. Helena], and therefore the injured huſband reminded them of their engagements, and called upon them to recover Helen. Upon this, all Greece took up arms in the cauſe of Menelaus, Agamemnon was choſen general of all the combined forces, and a regular war was begun. [Vid. Troja.] Paris, mean while, who had refuſed Helen to the petitions and embaſſies of the Greeks, armed himſelf with his brothers and ſubjects to oppoſe the enemy; but the ſucceſs of the war was neither hindered nor accelerated by his means. He fought with little courage, and at the very ſight of Menelaus, whom he had ſo recently injured, all his reſolution vaniſhed, and he retired from the front of the army where he walked before like a conqueror. In a combat with Menelaus, which he undertook at the perſuaſion of his brother Hector, Paris muſt have periſhed had not Venus interfered and ſtolen him from the reſentment of his adverſary. He nevertheleſs wounded, in another battle, Machaon, Euryphilus, and Diomedes, and according to ſome opinions, he killed with one of his arrows the great Achilles. [Vid. Achilles.] The death of Paris is differently related, ſome ſuppoſe that he was mortally wounded by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had been once in the poſſeſſion of Hercules, and that when he found himſelf languid on account of his wounds, he ordered himſelf to be carried to the feet of Œnone, whom he had baſely abandoned, and who, in the years of his obſcurity, had foretold him that he would ſolicit her aſſiſtance in his dying moments. He expired before he came into the preſence of Œnone, and the nymph, ſtill mindful of their former loves, threw herſelf upon his body and ſtabbed herſelf to the heart, after ſhe had plentifully bathed it with her tears. According to ſome authors, Paris did not immediately go to Troy when he left the Peloponneſus, but he was driven on the coaſts of Egypt, where Proteus, who was king of the country, detained him, and when he heard of the violence which had been offered to the king of Sparta, he kept Helen at his court, and permitted Paris to retire. PARMENĪDES, a Greek philoſopher of Elis, who floriſhed about 505 years before Chriſt.

Chriſt. He was the pupil of Xenophanes, or of Anaximander according to ſome. He maintained, that there were only two elements, fire and the earth; and he taught that the firſt generation of men was produced from the ſun. He firſt diſcovered that the earth was round, and habitable only in the two temperate zones, and that it was ſuſpended in the centre of the univerſe, in a fluid lighter than air, ſo that all bodies left to themſelves fell on its ſurface. There were, as he ſuppoſed, only two ſorts of philoſophy—one founded on reaſon, and the other on opinion. He digeſted this unpopular ſyſtem in verſes, of which a few fragments remain. Diog.

PARMENIO, a celebrated general in the armies of Alexander, who enjoyed the king's confidence, and was more attached to his perſon as a man than as a monarch. When Darius king of Perſia, offered Alexander all the country which lies at the weſt of the Euphrates, with his daughter Statira in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occaſion to obſerve, that he would without heſitation accept of theſe conditions if he were Alexander, ſo would I, were I Parmenio, replied the conqueror. This friendſhip, ſo true and inviolable, was ſacrificed to a moment of reſentment and ſuſpicion; and Alexander, who had too eagerly liſtened to a light and perhaps a falſe accuſation, ordered Parmenio and his ſon to be put to death, as if guilty of treaſon againſt his perſon. Parmenio was in the 70th year of his age, B. C. 330. He died in the greateſt popularity, and it has been judiciouſly obſerved, that Parmenio obtained many victories without Alexander, but Alexander not one without Parmenio. Curt. 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex.

PARNASSUS, a mountain of Phocis, antiently called Larnaſſos, from the boat of Deucalion (λαρναξ,) which was carried there in the univerſal deluge. It received the name of Parnaſſus from Parnaſſus the ſon of Neptune, by Cleobula, and was ſacred to the Muſes, and to Apollo and Bacchus. The ſoil was barren, but the vallies and the green woods that covered its ſides, rendered it agreeable, and fit for ſolitude and meditation. Parnaſſus is one of the higheſt mountains of Europe, and it is eaſily ſeen from the citadel of Corinth, though at the diſtance of about 80 miles. According to the computation of the antients, it is one day's journey round. At the north of Parnaſſus, there is a large plain about eight miles in circumference. The mountain, according to the poets, had only two tops, called Hyampea and Tithorea, on one of which the city of Delphi was ſituated, and thence it was called Biceps. Strab. 8, 9.—*Ovid. PAROS, a celebrated iſland among the Cyclades, about 7 miles ½ diſtant from Naxos, and 28 from Delos. According to Pliny, it is half as large as Naxos, that is, about 36 or 37 miles in circumference, a meaſure which ſome of the moderns have extended to 50 and even 80 miles. It has borne the different names of Pactia, Minoa, Hiria, Demetrias, Zacynthus, Cabarnis, and Hyleaſſa. It received the name of Paros, which it ſtill bears, from Paros, a ſon of Jaſon, or as ſome maintain of Parthaſius. The iſland of Paros was rich and powerful, and well known for its famous marble, which was always uſed by the beſt ſtatuaries. The beſt quarries were thoſe of Marpeſus, a mountain where ſtill caverns, of the moſt extraordinary depth, are ſeen by modern travellers, and admired as the ſources from whence the labyrinth of Egypt, and the porticoes of Greece received their ſplendor. According to Pliny, the quarries were ſo uncommonly deep, that in the cleareſt weather the workmen were obliged to uſe lamps, from which circumſtance the Greeks have called the marble Lychnites, worked by the light of lamps. Paros is alſo famous for the fine cattle which it produces, and for its partridges, and wild pigeons. The capital city was called Paros. It was firſt peopled by the Phœnicians, and afterwards a colony of Cretans ſettled in it. The Athenians made war againſt it, becauſe it had aſſiſted the Perſians in the invaſion of Greece, and took it, and it became a Roman province in the age of Pompey. Archilochus was born there. The Parian marbles, perhaps better known by the appellation of Arundelian, were engraved in this iſland in capital letters, B. C. 264. and, as a valuable chronicle, preſerved the moſt celebrated epochas of Greece from the year 1582, B. C. Theſe valuable pieces of antiquity were procured originally by M. de Peiriſc, a Frenchman, and afterwards purchaſed by the earl of Arundel, by whom they were given to the univerſity of Oxford, where they are ſtill to be ſeen. PARRHĂSIUS, a famous painter of Epheſus in the age of Zeuxis, about 415 years before Chriſt. He was a great maſter of his profeſſion, and particularly excelled in ſtrongly expreſſing the violent paſſions. He was bleſſed with a great genius, and much invention, and he was peculiarly happy in his deſigns. He acquired himſelf great reputation by his pieces, but by none more than that in which he allegorically repreſented the people of Athens, with all the injuſtice, the clemency, the fickleneſs, timidity, the arrogance and inconſiſtency, which ſo eminently characterized that celebrated nation. He once entered the liſts againſt Zeuxis, and when they had produced their reſpective pieces, the birds came to pick with the greateſt avidity the grapes which Zeuxis had painted. Immediately Parrhaſius exhibited his piece, and Zeuxis ſaid, remove your curtain that we may ſee the painting. The curtain was the painting, and Zeuxis acknowledged himſelf conquered by exclaiming, Zeuxis has deceived birds, but Parrhaſius has deceived Zeuxis himſelf. Parrhaſius grew ſo vain of his art, that he cloathed himſelf in purple, and wore a crown of gold, calling himſelf the king of painters. He was laviſh in his own praiſes, and by his vanity too often expoſed himſelf to the ridicule of his enemies. Plut. in Theſ. de Poet. aud.—Pauſ. 1, c. 28.—Plin. 35, v. 10.—Horat. 4, od. 8.——A ſon of Jupiter, or according to ſome, of Mars, by a nymph called Philonomia.

PARTHĀON, a ſon of Agenor and Epicaſte, who married Euryte, daughter of Hippodamus, by whom he had many children, among whom were Œneus and Sterope. Parthaon was brother to Demonice, the mother of Evenus by Mars, and alſo to Molus, Pylus, and Theſtius. He is called Portheus by Homer. Il. 14.——Apollod. 1, c. 7.——Hygin. fab. 129 & 239.——A ſon of Peripetus and father of Ariſtas. Pauſ. 8.

PARTHĔNIÆ & PARTHĔNII, a certain number of deſperate citizens of Sparta. During the Meſſenian war the Spartans were abſent from their city for the ſpace of ten years, and it was unlawful for them to return, as they had bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath not to reviſit Sparta before they had totally ſubdued Meſſenia. This long abſence alarmed the Lacedæmonian women, as well as the magiſtrates. The Spartans were reminded by their wives that if they continued in their reſolution, the ſtate muſt at laſt decay for want of citizens, and when they had duly conſidered this embaſſy, they empowered all the young men in the army who had come to the war while yet under age, and who therefore were not bound by the oath, to return to Sparta, and by a familiar and promiſcuous intercourſe with all the unmarried women of the ſtate, to raiſe a future generation. It was carried into execution, and the children that ſprang from this union were called Partheniæ, or ſons of virgins, (παρθενῶν). The war with Meſſenia was ſome time after ended, and the Spartans returned victorious; but the cold indifference with which they looked upon the Partheniæ was attended with ſerious conſequences. The Partheniæ knew they had no legitimate fathers, and no inheritance, and that therefore their life depended upon their own exertions. This drove them almoſt to deſpair. They joined with the Helots, whoſe maintenance was as precarious as their own, and it was mutually agreed to murder all the citizens of Sparta, and to ſeize their poſſeſſions. This maſſacre was to be done at a general aſſembly, and the ſignal was the throwing of a cap in the air. The whole, however, was diſcovered thro' the diffidence and apprehenſions of the Helots, and when the people had aſſembled, the Partheniæ diſcovered that all was known, by the voice of a crier, who proclaimed that no man ſhould throw up his cap. The Partheniæ, tho' apprehenſive of puniſhment, were not viſibly treated with greater ſeverity; their calamitous condition was attentively examined, and the Spartans, afraid of another conſpiracy and awed by their numbers, permitted them to ſail for Italy, with Phalantus their ring-leader at their head. They ſettled in Magna Græcia, and built Tarentum, about 707 years before before Chriſt. Juſtin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6. Pauſ. in Lacon, &c.—Plut. in Apoph.

PARTHĔNIUS, a river of Paphlagonia, which, after ſeparating Bithynia, falls into the Euxine ſea, near Seſamum. It received its name either becauſe the virgin Diana, (παρθένος) bathed herſelf there, or perhaps it received it from the purity and mildneſs of its waters. Herodot. 2, c. 104.—Plin. 6, c. 2.——A mountain of Arcadia, where Telephus had a temple. PARTHĔNON, a temple of Athens, ſacred to Minerva. It was deſtroyed by the Perſians, and afterwards rebuilt by Pericles, in a more magnificent manner. All the circumſtances which related to the birth of Minerva were beautifully and minutely repreſented in baſs-relief, on the front of the entrance. The ſtatue of the goddeſs, 26 cubits high, and made of gold and ivory, paſſed for one of the maſter pieces of Phidias. Plin. 34.

PARTHĔNŎPÆUS, a ſon of Meleager and Atalanta, or according to ſome of Milanion and another Atalanta. PARTHIA, a celebrated country of Aſia, bounded on the weſt by Media, ſouth by Carmania, north by Hyrcania, and eaſt by Aria, &c. containing, according to Ptolemy, 25 large cities, the moſt capital of which was called Hecatompylos, from its hundred gates. Some ſuppoſe that the preſent capital of the country is built on the ruins of Hecatompylos. According to ſome authors the Parthians were Scythians by origin, who made an invaſion on the more ſouthern provinces of Aſia, and at laſt fixed their reſidence near Hyrcania. They long remained unknown and unnoticed, and became ſucceſſively tributary to the empire of the Aſſyrians, Medes, and Perſians. When Alexander invaded Aſia, the Parthians ſubmitted, like the other dependent provinces of Perſia, and they were for ſome time under the power of Eumenes, Antigonus, Seleucus Nicanor, and Antiochus, till the rapacity and oppreſſion of Agathocles, a lieutenant of the latter, roufed their ſpirit, and fomented rebellion. Arſaces, a man of obſcure origin, but bleſſed with great military powers, placed himſelf at the head of his countrymen, and laid the foundation of the Parthian empire, about 250 years before the Chriſtian era. The Macedonians attempted in vain to recover it, a race of active and vigilant princes, who aſſumed the ſirname of Arſacides, from the founder of their kingdom, encreaſed its power, and rendered it ſo formidable, that, while it poſſeſſed 18 kingdoms between the Caſpian and Arabian ſeas, it even diſputed the empire of the world with the Romans, and could never be ſubdued by that nation, which had ſeen no people on earth unconquered by their arms. It remained a kingdom till the reign of Artabanus, who was killed about the year 229 of the Chriſtian era, and from that time it became a province of the newly re-eſtabliſhed kingdom of Perſia, under Artaxerxes. The Parthians were naturally ſtrong and warlike, and were eſteemed the moſt expert horſemen and archers in the world. The peculiar cuſtom of diſcharging their arrows while they were retiring full ſpeed, has been greatly celebrated by the antients, particularly by the poets, who all obſerve that their flight was more formidable than their attacks. This manner of fighting, and the wonderful addreſs and dexterity with which it was performed, gained them many victories. They were addicted much to drinking, and to every manner of lewdneſs, and their laws permitted them to raiſe children even by their mothers and ſiſters. Strab. 2, 6, &c.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—*Virg. PARYSĂTIS, a Perſian princeſs, wife of Darius Ochus, by whom ſhe had Artaxerxes, Memnon, and Cyrus the younger. She was ſo extremely partial to her younger ſon, that ſhe committed the greateſt cruelties to encourage his ambition, and ſhe ſupported him with all her intereſt in his rebellion againſt his brother Memnon. The death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa, was revenged with the groſſeſt barbarity, and Paryſatis ſacrificed to her reſentment all ſuch as ſhe found concerned in his fall. She alſo poiſoned Statira the wife of her ſon Artaxerxes, and ordered one of the eunuchs of the court to be flead alive, and his ſkin to be ſtretched on two poles before her eyes, becauſe he had, by order of the king, cut off the hand and the head of Cyrus. PASIPHAE, a daughter of the Sun and of Perſeis, who married Minos king of Crete. She diſgraced herſelf by her unnatural paſſion for a bull, which, according to ſome authors, ſhe was enabled to gratify by means of the artiſt Dædalus. This celebrated bull had been given to Minos by Neptune, to be offered on his altars. But as the monarch refuſed to ſacrifice the animal on account of his beauty, the god revenged his diſobedience by inſpiring Paſiphae with an unnatural love for it. This fabulous tradition, which is univerſally believed by the poets, who obſerve that the Minotaur was the fruit of this infamous commerce, is refuted by ſome writers, who ſuppoſe that the infidelity of Paſiphae to her huſband was betrayed in her affection for an officer called Taurus; and that Dædalus, by permitting his houſe to be the aſylum of the two lovers, was looked upon as acceſſary to the gratification of Paſiphae's luſt. From this amour with Taurus, as it is farther remarked, the queen became mother of twins, and the name of Minotaurus ariſes from the reſemblance of the children to the huſband and the lover of Paſiphae. Minos had four ſons by Paſiphae, Caſtreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, and Androgeus, and three daughters, Hecate, Ariadne, and Phædra. PĀTRŌCLES, a man who wrote an hiſtory of the world. Strab.

PĀTRŌCLUS, one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war, ſon of Menœtius, by Sthenele, whom ſome call Philomela, or Polymela. The accidental murder of Clytonymus, the ſon of Amphidamus, in the time of his youth, obliged him to fly from Opus, where his father reigned. He retired to the court of Peleus king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the moſt intimate friendſhip with Achilles the monarch's ſon. When the Greeks went to the Trojan war, Patroclus alſo accompanied them at the expreſs command of his father, who had viſited the court of Peleus, and he embarked with 10 ſhips from Phthia. He was the conſtant companion of Achilles, he lodged in the ſame tent, and when his friend refuſed to appear in the field of battle, becauſe he had been offended by Agamemnon, Patroclus imitated his example, and by his abſence was the cauſe of the overthrow of the Greeks. But at laſt Neſtor prevailed upon him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. The valor of Patroclus, together with the terror which the ſight of the arms of Achilles inſpired, ſoon routed the victorious armies of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for ſafety. He would have broken down the walls of the city, but Apollo, who intereſted himſelf for the Trojans, placed himſelf to oppoſe him, and Hector, at the inſtigation of the god, diſmounted from his chariot to attack him, as he attempted to ſtrip one of the Trojans whom he had ſlain. The engagement was obſtinate, but at laſt Patroclus was overpowered by the valor of Hector, and the interpoſition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, and Hector would have ſevered his head from his body had not Ajax and Menelaus intervened. His body was at laſt recovered and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the bittereſt lamentations. His funeral was obſerved with the greateſt ſolemnity. Achilles ſacrificed near the burning pile twelve young Trojans, beſides four of his horſes and two of his dogs, and the whole was concluded by the exhibition of funeral games, in which the conquerors were liberally rewarded by Achilles. The death of Patroclus, as it is deſcribed by Homer, gave riſe to new events, Achilles forgot his reſentment againſt Agamemnon, and entered the field to avenge the fall of his friend, and his anger was gratified only by the ſlaughter of Hector, who had more powerfully kindled his wrath by appearing at the head of the Trojan armies in the armour which had been taken from the body of Patroclus. The patronymic of Actorides is often applied to Patroclus, becauſe Actor was father to Menœtius. Dictys. Cret. 1, &c.—Homer Il. 9, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 13—Hygin. fab. 97 & 275.—*Ovid. PATROUS, a ſirname of Jupiter among the Greeks, repreſented by his ſtatues as having three eyes, which ſome ſuppoſe to ſignify that he reigned in three different places, in heaven, on earth, and in hell. Pauſ. 2.

PATULCIUS, a ſirname of Janus, which he received a pateo, becauſe the doors of his temple were always open in the time of war. Some ſuppoſe that he received it becauſe he preſided over gates, or becauſe the year began by the celebration of his feſtivals. Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 129.

PAULA, the firſt wife of the emperor Heliogabalus. She was daughter of the prefect of the pretorian guards. The emperor divorced her, and Paula retired to ſolitude and obſcurity with compoſure.

PAULĪNA, a Roman lady who married Saturninus, a governor of Syria, in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius. Her conjugal peace was diſturbed, and violence was offered to her virtue by a young man called Mundus, who was enamoured of her, and who had cauſed her to come to the temple of Iſis by means of the prieſts of the goddeſs, who declared that Anubis wiſhed to communicate to her ſomething of moment. Saturninus complained to the emperor of the violence which had been offered to his wife, and the temple of Iſis was overturned and Mundus baniſhed, &c. *Joſeph. PAULUS ÆMYLIUS, a Roman, ſon of the Æmylius who fell at Cannæ, was celebrated for his victories, and received the ſirname of Macedonicus from his conqueſt of Macedonia. In the early part of life he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his uncommon application, and by his fondneſs for military diſcipline. His firſt appearance in the field was attended with great ſucceſs, and the barbarians that had revolted in Spain were reduced with the greateſt facility under the power of the Romans. In his firſt conſulſhip his arms were directed againſt the Ligurians whom he totally ſubjected. His applications for a ſecond conſulſhip proved abortive; but when Perſeus the king of Macedonia had declared war againſt Rome, the abilities of Paulus were remembered, and he was honored with the conſulſhip about the 60th year of his age. After this appointment he behaved with uncommon vigor, and ſoon a general engagement was fought near Pydna. The Romans obtained the victory, and Perſeus ſaw himſelf deſerted by all his ſubjects. In two days the conqueror made himſelf maſter of all Macedonia, and ſoon after the fugitive monarch was brought into his preſence. Paulus did not exult over his fallen enemy, but when he had gently rebuked him for his temerity in attacking the Romans, he addreſſed himſelf in a pathetic ſpeech to the officers of his army who ſurrounded him, and feelingly enlarged on the inſtability of fortune, and the viciſſitude of all human affairs. When he had finally ſettled the government of Macedonia with ten commiſſioners from Rome, and after he had ſacked 70 cities of Epirus, and divided the booty amongſt his ſoldiers, Paulus returned to Italy. He was received with the uſual acclamations, and though ſome of the ſeditious ſoldiers attempted to prevent his triumphal entry into the capitol, yet three days were appointed to exhibit the fruits of his victories. Perſeus with his wretched family adorned the triumph of the conqueror, and as they were dragged through the ſtreets before the chariot of Paulus, they drew tears of compaſſion from the people. The riches which the Romans derived from this conqueſt were immenſe, and the people were freed from all taxes till the conſulſhip of Hirtius and Panſa; but while every one of the citizens received ſome benefit from the victories of Paulus, the conqueror himſelf was poor, and appropriated for his own uſe nothing of the Macedonian treaſures except the library of Perſeus. In the office of cenſor, to which he was afterwards elected, Paulus behaved with the greateſt moderation, and at his death, which happened about 168 years before the Chriſtian era, not only the Romans, but their very enemies confeſſed, by their lamentations, the loſs which they had ſuſtained. He had married Papiria, by whom he had two ſons, one of which was adopted by the family of Maximus, and the other in that of Scipio Africanus. He had alſo two daughters, one of whom married a ſon of Cato, and the other Ælius Tubero. He afterwards divorced Papiria, and when his friends wiſhed to reprobate his conduct in doing ſo, by obſerving that ſhe was young and handſome, and that ſhe had made him father of a fine family, Paulus replied that the ſhoe which he then wore was new and well made, but that he was obliged to leave it off, though no one but himſelf, [illegible]

he ſaid, knew where it pinched him. He married a ſecond wife by whom he had two ſons, whoſe ſudden death exhibited to the Romans in the moſt engaging view, their father's philoſophy and ſtoiciſm. The elder of theſe ſons died five days before Paulus triumphed over Perſeus, and the other three days after the public proceſſion. This domeſtic calamity did not ſhake the firmneſs of the conqueror; yet before he retired to a private ſtation, he harangued the people, and in mentioning the ſeverity of fortune upon his family, he expreſſed his wiſh that every evil might be averted from the republic by the ſacrifice of the domeſtic proſperity of an individual. Plut. in vitâ.—Liv. 43, 44, &c.—Juſtin. 33, c. 1, &c.——Samoſatemus, an author in the reign of Gallienus.——Maximus. *Vid. His advice was rejected, and the battle of Cannæ, ſo glorious to Annibal, and ſo fatal to Rome, ſoon followed. Paulus was wounded, but when he might have eſcaped from the ſlaughter, by accepting a horſe generouſly offered by one of his officers, he diſdained to fly, and periſhed by the darts of the enemy. Horat. od. 12, v. 38.—Liv. 22, c. 39.——Julius, a Latin poet in the age of Adrian and Antoninus. PAVOR, an emotion of the mind, which received divine honors among the Romans. Tullus Hoſtilius, the third king of Rome, was the firſt who built her temples, and raiſed altars to her honor, as alſo to Pallor, the goddeſs of Paleneſs. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.

PAUSANIAS, a Spartan general, who greatly ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Platæa, againſt the Perſians. The Greeks were very ſenſible of his ſervices, and they rewarded his merit with a tenth of the ſpoils taken from the Perſians. He was afterwards ſet at the head of the Spartan armies, and extended his conqueſts in Aſia; but the haughtineſs of his behaviour created him many enemies, and the Athenians ſoon obtained a ſuperiority in the affairs of Greece. Pauſanias was diſſatisfied with his countrymen, and he offered to betray Greece to the Perſians, if he received in marriage, as the reward of his perfidy, the daughter of their monarch. His intrigues were diſcovered by means of a youth, who was intruſted with his letters to Perſia, and who refuſed to go, on the recollection that ſuch as had been employed in that office before had never returned. The letters were given to the Ephori of Sparta, and the perfidy of Pauſanias laid open. He fled for ſafety to a temple of Minerva, and as the ſanctity of the place ſcreened him from the violence of his purſuers, the ſacred building was ſurrounded with heaps of ſtones, the firſt of which was carried there by the indignant mother of the unhappy man. He was ſtarved to death in the temple, and died about 471 years before the Chriſtian era. There was a feſtival and ſolemn games inſtituted in his honor, in which only free-born Spartans contended. There was alſo an oration ſpoken in his praiſe, in which his actions were celebrated, particularly the battle of Platæa, and the defeat of Mardonius. *C. He was groſsly and unnaturally abuſed by Attalus one of the friends of Philip, and when he complained of the injuries he had received, the king in ſome meaſure diſregarded his remonſtrances, and wiſhed them to be forgot. This incenſed Pauſanias, he reſolved to revenge himſelf, and when he had heard from his maſter Hermocrates the ſophiſt, that the moſt effectual way to render himſelf illuſtrious, was to murder a perſon who had ſignalized himſelf by uncommon actions; he ſtabbed Philip as he entered a public theatre. After this bloody action he attempted to make his eſcape to his chariot, which waited for him at the door of the city, but he was ſtopped accidentally by the twig of a vine and fell down. Attalus, Perdiccas, and other friends of Philip, who purſued him, immediately fell upon him, and diſpatched him. Some ſupport that Pauſanias committed this murder at the inſtigation of Olympias, the wife of Philip, and of her ſon Alexander. Diod. 16.—Juſtin. 9.—Plut. in Apoph.——A king of Macedonia, depoſed by Amyntas after a year's reign. Diod.——Another who attempted to ſeize upon the kingdom of Macedonia, from which he was prevented by Iphicrates the Athenian.——A friend of Alexander the Great, made governor of Sardis.——A phyſician in the age of Alexander. Plut.——A celebrated orator, and hiſtorian, who ſettled at Rome, *A. in the Ionic dialect, in which he gives, with great precision and geographical knowledge, an account of the situation of its different cities, their antiquities, and the several curiosities which they contained. He has also interwoven mythology in his historical account, and introduced many fabulous traditions and superstitious stories. In each book the author treats of a separate country, such at Attica, Arcadia, Messenia, Elis, &c. Some suppose that he gave a similar description of Phœnicia and Syria. There was another Pausanias, a native of Cæsaræa in Cappadocia, who wrote some declamations, and who is often confounded with the historian of that name.—The best edition of Pausanias, is that of Khunius, fol. Lipsi. 1696.——A Lacedæmonian who wrote a partial account of his country.——A statuary of Apollonia. Paus. 10, c. 9.——A king of Sparta, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, who died 397 B. Pausias, a painter of Sicyon, the first who understood how to apply colors to wood or ivory, by means of fire. He made a beautiful painting of his mistress Glycere, whom he represented as sitting on the ground, and making garlands with flowers, and from this circumstance the picture, which was bought afterwards by Lucullus for two talents, received the name of Stephanoplocon. Some time after the death of Pausias, the Sicyonians were obliged to part with the pictures they possessed, to deliver themselves from an enormous debt, and M. Scaurus the Roman, bought them all, in which were those of Pausias, to adorn the theatre, which had been built during his edileship. Pausias lived about 350 years before Christ. Plin. 35, c. 11.

Pausilypus, a mountain near Naples, which receives its name from the beauty of its situation, (παυω λυπη cessare facio dolor). The natives show there the tomb of Virgil, and regard it with the highest veneration. There were near some fish ponds belonging to the emperor. The mountain is now famous for a subterraneous passage near half a mile in length, and 22 feet in breadth, which affords a safe and convenient passage to travellers. Stat. 4. Sylv. 4, v. 52.—Plin. 9, c. 53.—Strab. 5.—Seneca ep. 5, & 57.

Pax, an allegorical divinity among the antients. The Athenians raised her a statue, which represented her as holding Plutus the god of wealth in her lap, to intimate that peace gives rise to prosperity and to opulence, and they were the first who erected an altar to her honor after the victories obtained by Timotheus over the Lacedæmonian power, tho' Plutarch asserts it had been done after the conquests of Cimon over the Persians. She was represented among the Romans with the horn of plenty, and also carrying an olive branch in her hand. The emperor Vespasian built her a celebrated temple at Rome, which was consumed by fire in the reign of Commodus. It was customary for men of learning to assemble in that temple, and even to deposit their writings there, as in a place of the greatest security. Therefore when it was burnt, not only books, but also many valuable things, jewels, and immense treasures were lost in the general conflagration. C. Nep. in Timoth. 2.—Plut. in Cim.

Pegăsium Stagnum, a lake near Epheſus, which aroſe from the earth when Pegaſus ſtruck it with his foot.

Pegăsus, a winged horſe ſprung from the blood of Meduſa, when Perſeus had cut off her head. He received his name from his being born, according to Heſiod, near the ſources (πηγη) of the ocean. As ſoon as born he left the earth, and flew up into heaven, or rather, according to Ovid, he fixed his reſidence on mount Helicon, where, by ſtriking the earth with his foot, he inſtantly raiſed a fountain, which has been called Hippocrene. He became the favorite of the Muſes, and being afterwards tamed by Neptune or Minerva, he was given to Bellerophon to conquer the Chimæra. No ſooner was this fiery monſter deſtroyed, than Pegaſus threw down his rider, becauſe he was a mortal, or rather according to the more received opinion, becauſe he attempted to fly to heaven. This act of temerity in Bellerophon, was puniſhed by Jupiter, who ſent an inſect to torment Pegaſus, which occaſioned the melancholy fall of his rider. Pegaſus continued his flight up to heaven, and was placed among the conſtellations by Jupiter. Perſeus, according to Ovid, was mounted on the horſe Pegaſus, when he deſtroyed the ſea monſter which was going to devour Andromache. Heſiod. Theog.—Horat. 4, od. 11.—*Homer. Pelasgi, a people of Greece, ſuppoſed to be one of the moſt antient in the world. They firſt inhabited Argolis in Peloponneſus, which from them received the name of Pelaſgia, and about 1883 years before the Chriſtian era, they paſſed into Æmonia, and were afterwards diſperſed in ſeveral parts of Greece. Some of them fixed their habitation in Epirus, others in Crete, others in Italy, and others in Leſbos. From theſe different changes of ſituation in the Pelaſgians, all the Greeks are indiſcriminately called Pelaſgians, and their country Pelaſgia, though, more properly ſpeaking, it ſhould be confined to Theſſaly, Epirus, and Peloponneſus, in Greece. Some of the Pelaſgians, that had been driven from Attica, ſettled in Lemnos, where ſome time after they carried ſome Athenian women, whom they had ſeized in an expedition on the coaſt of Attica. They raiſed ſome children by theſe captive females, but they afterwards deſtroyed them with their mothers, through jealouſy, becauſe they differed in manners as well as language from them. This horrid murder was attended by a dreadful peſtilence, and they were ordered, to expiate their crime, to do whatever the Athenians commanded them. This was to deliver their poſſeſſions into their hands. The Pelaſgians ſeem to have received their name from Pelaſgus the firſt king, and founder of their nation. Pauſ. 8, c. 1.—Strab. 5. —Herodot. 1.—Plut. in Rom.—Virg. Æn. 1.—*Ovid. Pelasgia, or Pelasgiotis, a country of Greece, whoſe inhabitants are called Pelaſgi, or Pelaſgiotæ. Every country of Greece, and all Greece in general, is indiſcriminately called Pelaſgia, though the name ſhould be more particularly confined to a part of Theſſaly, ſituate between the Peneus, the Aliacmon, and the Sperchius. The maritime borders of this part of Theſſaly were afterwards called Magneſia, though the ſea or its ſhore ſtill retained the name of Pelaſgicus Sinus, now the gulf of Volo. Pelaſgia is alſo one of the antient names of Epirus, as alſo of Peloponneſus. Vid. Pelaſgi.

PELEUS, a king of Theſſaly, ſon of Æacus and Endeis, the daughter of Chiron. He married Thetis, one of the Nereids, and was the only one among mortals who married an immortal. He was acceſſary to the death of his brother Phocus, and on that account he was obliged to leave his father's dominions. He retired to the court of Eurytus, the ſon of Actor, who reigned at Phthia, or according to the leſs received opinion of Ovid, he fled to Ceyx, king of Trachinia. He was purified of his murder by Eurytus, with the uſual ceremonies, and the monarch gave him his daughter Antigone in marriage. Some time after this, Peleus and Eurytus went to the chaſe of the Calydonian boar, where the father-in-law was accidentally killed by an arrow which his ſon-in-law had aimed at the beaſt. This unfortunate event obliged him to baniſh himſelf from the court of Phthia, and he retired to Iolchos, where he was purified of the murder of Eurytus, by Acaſtus the king of the country. His reſidence at Iolchos was ſhort, Aſtydamia, the wife of Acaſtus, became enamoured of him; and when ſhe found him inſenſible to her paſſionate declaration, ſhe accuſed him of attempts upon her virtue. The monarch partially believed the accuſations of his wife, but not to violate the laws of hoſpitality, by putting him inſtantly to death, he ordered his officers to conduct him to mount Pelion, on pretence of hunting, and there to tie him to a tree, that he might become the prey of the wild beaſts of the place. The orders of Acaſtus were faithfully obeyed, but Jupiter, who knew the innocence of his grandſon Peleus, ordered Vulcan to ſet him at liberty. As ſoon as he had been delivered from danger, Peleus aſſembled his friends to puniſh the ill-treatment which he had received from Acaſtus. He forcibly took Iolchos, drove the king from his poſſeſſions, and put to death the wicked Aſtydamia. After the death of Antigone, Peleus courted Thetis, of whoſe ſuperior charms Jupiter himſelf had been enamoured. His pretenſions, however, were rejected, and as he was a mortal, the goddeſs fled from him with the greateſt abhorrence; and the more effectually to evade his enquiries, ſhe generally aſſumed the ſhape of a bird, or a tree, or of a tygreſs. Peleus became more animated from her refuſal, he offered a ſacrifice to the gods, and Proteus informed him that to obtain Thetis he muſt ſurprize her while ſhe was aſleep in her grotto, near the ſhores of Theſſaly. This advice was immediately followed, and Thetis, unable to eſcape from the graſp of Peleus, at laſt conſented to marry him. Their nuptials were celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnity, and all the gods attended, and made them each the moſt valuable preſents. The goddeſs of diſcord was the only one of the deities who was not preſent, and ſhe puniſhed this ſeeming neglect by throwing an apple into the midſt of the aſſembly of the gods, with the inſcription of detur pulchriori. [Vid. Diſcordia.] From the marriage of Peleus and Thetis was born Achilles, whoſe education was early entruſted to the Centaur Chiron, and afterwards to Phœnix, the ſon of Amyntor. Achilles went to the Trojan war, at the head of his father's troops, and Peleus gloried in having a ſon who was ſuperior to all the Greeks in valor, and intrepidity. The death of Achilles was the ſource of grief to Peleus; and Thetis, to comfort her huſband, promiſed him immortality, and ordered him to retire into the grottos of the iſland of Leuce, where he would ſee and converſe with the manes of his ſon. Peleus had a daughter called Polydora, by Antigone. *Homer. Il.—Eurip. in Androm.—Catull. de Nupt. Pel. & Thet. —Ovid. PELIADES, the daughters of Pelias. Vid. Pelias.

PELIAS, the twin brother of Neleus, was ſon of Neptune by Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. His birth was concealed from the world by his mother, who wiſhed her father to be ignorant of her incontinence. He was expoſed in the woods, but his life was preſerved by ſhepherds, and he received the name of Pelias, from a ſpot of the color of lead in his face. Sometime after this adventure, Tyro married Cretheus, ſon of Æolus, king of Iolchos, and became mother of three children, of whom Æſon was the eldeſt. Meantime Pelias viſited his mother, and was received in her family, and after the death of Cretheus, he unjuſtly ſeized the kingdom, which belonged to the children of Tyro, by the deceaſed monarch. To ſtrengthen himſelf in his uſurpation, Pelias conſulted the oracle, and when he was told to beware of one of the deſcendants of Æolus, who ſhould come to his court with one foot ſhod, and the other bare, he privately removed the ſon of Æſon, after he had publicly declared that he was dead. Theſe precautions proved abortive. Jaſon the ſon of Æſon, who had been educated by Chiron, returned to Iolchos, when arrived to years of maturity, and as he had loſt one of his ſhoes in croſſing the river Anaurus, or the Evenus, Pelias immediately perceived ceived that this was the perſon whom he was adviſed ſo much to dread. His unpopularity prevented him from acting with violence againſt a ſtranger, whoſe uncommon dreſs, and commanding aſpect, had raiſed admiration in his ſubjects. But his aſtoniſhment was excited when he ſaw Jaſon arrive at his palace, with his friends and his relations, and boldly demand the kingdom which he uſurped. Pelias was conſcious that his complaints were well founded, and therefore, to divert his attention, he told him that he would voluntarily reſign the crown to him, if he went to Colchis to avenge the death of Phryxus, the ſon of Athamas, whom Æetes had cruelly murdered. He further obſerved, that the expedition would be attended with the greateſt glory, and that nothing but the infirmities of old age had prevented him himſelf from vindicating the honor of his country, and the injuries of his family by puniſhing the aſſaſſin. This ſo warmly recommended, was as warmly accepted by the young hero, and his intended expedition was made known all over Greece. [Vid. Jaſon.] During the abſence of Jaſon, in the Argonautic expedition, Pelias murdered Æſon and all his family; but according to the more received opinion of Ovid, Æſon was ſtill living when the Argonauts returned, and he was reſtored to the vigor of youth by the magic of Medea. This ſudden change in the vigor and the conſtitution of Æſon, aſtoniſhed all the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias, who had received the patronymic of Peliades, expreſſed their deſire to ſee their father's infirmities vaniſh, by the ſame powerful arts. Medea, who wiſhed to avenge the injuries which her huſband Jaſon had received from Pelias, raiſed the deſires of the Peliades, by cutting an old ram to pieces, and boiling the fleſh in a cauldron, and afterwards turning it into a fine young lamb. After they had ſeen this ſucceſsful experiment, the Peliades cut their father's body to pieces, after they had drawn all the blood from his veins, on the aſſurance that Medea would repleniſh them by her incantations. The limbs were immediately put into a cauldron of boiling water, but Medea ſuffered the fleſh to be totally conſumed, and refuſed to give the Peliades the promiſed aſſiſtance, and the bones of Pelias did not even receive a burial. The Peliades were four in number, Alceſte, Piſidice, Pelopea, and Hippothoe, to whom Hyginus adds Meduſa. Their mother's name was Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias, or Philomache, the daughter of Amphion. After this parricide, the Peliades fled to the court of Admetus, where Acaſtus, the ſon-in-law of Pelias, purſued them, and took their protector priſoner. The Peliades died, and were buried in Arcadia. Hygin. fab. 12, 13 & 14.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 3 & 4.—Pauſ. 8, c. 11.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Seneca in Med.—Apollon. Arg. 1.—*Pindar. PELION & Pelios, a celebrated mountain of Theſſaly, whoſe top is covered with pine trees. In their wars againſt the gods, the giants, as the poets mention, placed mount Oſſa upon Pelion, to ſcale the heavens with more facility. The celebrated huge ſpear of Achilles, which none but the hero could wield, had been cut down on this mountain, and was thence called Pelias. PELLA, a celebrated town of Macedonia, which became the capital of the country after the ruin of Edeſſa. Philip, king of Macedonia, was educated there, and Alexander the Great was born there, whence he is often called Pellæus juvenis. The tomb of the poet Euripides was in the neighbourhood. PĔLŏPĒA, or PĔLŏPĪA, a daughter of Thyeſtes the brother of Atreus. She had a ſon by her father, who had offered her violence in a wood, without knowing that ſhe was his own daughter. Some ſuppoſe that Thyeſtes purpoſely committed this inceſt, as the oracle had informed him that his wrongs ſhould be avenged, and his brother deſtroyed by a ſon who ſhould be born from him and his daughter. This proved too true. Pelopea afterwards married her uncle Atreus, who kindly received in his houſe his wife's illegitimate child, called Ægyſthus, becauſe preſerved by goats, (αἶγες) when expoſed in the mountains. Ægyſthus became his uncle's murderer. [Vid. Ægyſthus.] Hygin. fab 87, &c.—Ælian. V. H. 12.—Ovid. in Ib. v. 359. Seneca. in Agam.

PELŏPĪA, a daughter of Niobe.——A daughter of Pelias.——The mother of Cycnus.

PELOPĬDAS, a celebrated general of Thebes, ſon of Hippoclus. He was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, and was remarkable for his immenſe poſſeſſions, which he beſtowed with great liberality to the poor and neceſſitous. Many were the objects of his generoſity, but when Epaminondas had refuſed to accept his preſents, Pelopidas diſregarded all his wealth, and preferred before it the enjoyment of his friend's converſation and of his poverty. From their friendſhip and intercourſe the Thebans derived the moſt conſiderable advantages. No ſooner had the intereſt of Sparta prevailed at Thebes, and the friends of liberty and national independence been baniſhed from the city, than Pelopidas, who was in the number of the exiles, reſolved to free his country from foreign ſlavery. His plan was bold and animated, and his deliberations were ſlow. Mean while Epaminondas, who had been left by the tyrants at Thebes, as being in appearance a worthleſs and inſignificant philoſopher, animated the youths of the city, and at laſt Pelopidas, with eleven of his aſſociates, entered Thebes, and eaſily maſſacred the friends of the tyranny, and freed their country from foreign maſters. After this ſucceſsful enterprize, Pelopidas was unanimouſly placed at the head of the government, and ſo confident were the Thebans of his abilities as a general and a magiſtrate, that they ſucceſſively re-elected him 13 times to fill the honorable office of governor of Bœotia. Epaminondas ſhared with him the ſovereign power, and it was to their valor and prudence that the Thebans were indebted for a celebrated victory at the battle of Leuctra. In a war which Thebes carried on againſt Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ, Pelopidas was appointed commander, but his imprudence in truſting himſelf unarmed into the enemy's camp nearly proved fatal to him. He was taken priſoner, but Epaminondas reſtored him to liberty. The perfidy of Alexander irritated him, and he was killed bravely fighting in a celebrated battle in which his troops obtained the victory, B. C. 364 years. He received an honorable burial, the Thebans ſhewed their ſenſe for his merit by their lamentations, they ſent a powerful army to revenge his death by the deſtruction of the tyrant of Pheræ and his relations, and his children were preſented with immenſe donations by the cities of Theſſaly. Pelopidas is admired for his valor, as he never engaged an enemy without obtaining the advantage. The impoveriſhed ſtate of Thebes before his birth, and after his fall, plainly demonſtrates the ſuperiority of his genius and of his abilities, and it has been juſtly obſerved that with Pelopidas and Epaminondas the glory and the independence of the Thebans roſe and ſet. *Plut. & C. PELOPONNESIĂCUM BELLUM, a celebrated war which continued for 27 years between the Athenians and the inhabitants of Peloponneſus with their reſpective allies. It is the moſt famous and the moſt intereſting of all the wars which have happened between the inhabitants of Greece; and for the minute and circumſtantial deſcription which we have of the events and revolutions which mutual animoſity produced, we are indebted more particularly to the correct and authentic writings of Thucydides and of Xenophon. The circumſtances which gave birth to this memorable war are theſe: the power of Athens under the prudent and vigorous adminiſtration of Pericles, was already extended over Greece, and it had procured itſelf many admirers and more enemies, when the Corcyreans, who had been planted by a Corinthian colony, refuſed to pay to their founders thoſe marks of reſpect and reverence which among the Greeks every colony was obliged to pay to its mother country. The Corinthians wiſhed to puniſh that infidelity, and when when the people of Epidamnus, a conſiderable town on the Adriatic, had been invaded by ſome of the barbarians of Illyricum, the people of Corinth gladly granted to the Epidamnians that aſſiſtance which had in vain been ſolicited from the Corcyreans their founders and their patrons. The Corcyreans were offended at the interference of Corinth in the affairs of their colony; they manned a fleet, and obtained a victory over the Corinthian veſſels which had aſſiſted the Epidamnians. The ſubſequent conduct of the Corcyreans, and their inſolence to ſome of the Elians who had furniſhed a few ſhips to the Corinthians, provoked the Peloponneſians, and the diſcontent became general. Ambaſſadors were ſent by both parties to Athens to claim its protection and to juſtify theſe violent proceedings. The greateſt part of the Athenians heard their various reaſons with moderation and with compaſſion, but the enterprizing ambition of Pericles prevailed, and when the Corcyreans had reminded the people of Athens, that in all the ſtates of Peloponneſus they had to dread the moſt malevolent enemies, and the moſt inſidious of rivals, they were liſtened to with attention and were promiſed ſupport. This ſtep was no ſooner taken than the Corinthians appealed to the other Grecian ſtates, and particularly to the Lacedæmonians. Their complaints were accompanied by thoſe of the people of Megara and of Ægina, who bitterly inveighed againſt the cruelty, injuſtice, and inſolence of the Athenians. This had due weight with the Lacedæmonians, who had long beheld with concern and with jealouſy the ambitious power of the Athenians, and they determined to ſupport the cauſe of the Corinthians. However, before they proceeded to hoſtilities, an embaſſy was ſent to Athens to repreſent the danger of entering into a war with the moſt powerful and floriſhing of all the Grecian ſtates. This alarmed the Athenians, but when Pericles had eloquently ſpoken of the reſources and the actual ſtrength of the republic and of the weakneſs of the allies, the clamors of his enemies were ſilenced, and the anſwer which was returned to the Spartans was taken as a declaration of war. The Spartans were ſupported by all the republics of the Peloponneſus except Argos and part of Achaia, beſides the people of Megara, Bœotia, Phocis, Locris, Leucas, Ambracia, and Anactorium. The Platæans, the Leſbians, Carians, Chians, Meſſenians, Acarnanians, Zacynthians, Corcyreans, Dorians, and Thracians were the friends of the Athenians, with all the Cyclades except Eubœa, Samos, Melos, and Thera. The firſt blow had already been ſtruck, May 7, A. C. 431, by an attempt of the Bœotians to ſurprize Platæa, and therefore Archidamus king of Sparta, who had in vain recommended moderation to the allies, entered Attica at the head of an army of 60,000 men, and laid waſte the country by fire and ſword. Pericles, who was at the head of the government, did not attempt to oppoſe them in the field, but a fleet of 150 ſhips ſet ſail without delay to ravage the coaſts of the Peloponneſus. Megara was alſo depopulated by an army of 20,000 men, and the campaign of the firſt year of the war was concluded in celebrating with the moſt ſolemn pomp the funerals of ſuch as had nobly fallen in battle. The following year was remarkable for a peſtilence which raged in Athens, and which deſtroyed the greateſt part of the inhabitants. The public calamity was ſtill heightened by the approach of the Peloponneſian army on the borders of Attica, and by the unſucceſsful expedition of the Athenians againſt Epidaurus and in Thrace. The peſtilence which had carried away ſo many of the Athenians proved alſo fatal to Pericles, and he died about two years and ſix months after the commencement of the Peloponneſian war. The following years did not give riſe to deciſive events, but the revolt of Leſbos from the alliance of the Athenians was productive of freſh troubles. Mitylene, the capital of the iſland, was recovered, and the inhabitants treated with the greateſt cruelty. The iſland of Corcyra became alſo the ſeat of new ſeditions, and thoſe citizens who had been carried away priſoners by the Corinthians, and for political reaſons treated with lenity, and taught to deſpiſe the alliance of Athens, were no ſooner returned home than they raiſed commotions, and endeavoured to perſuade their countrymen to join the Peloponneſian confederates. This was ſtrongly oppoſed, but both parties obtained by turns the ſuperiority, and maſſacred, with the greateſt barbarity, all thoſe who obſtructed their views. Some time after Demoſthenes the Athenian general invaded Ætolia, where his arms were attended with the greateſt ſucceſs. He alſo fortified Pylos in the Peloponneſus, and gained ſo many advantages over the confederates that they ſued for peace, which the inſolence of Athens refuſed. The fortune of the war ſoon after changed, and the Lacedæmonians, under the prudent conduct of Braſidas, made themſelves maſters of many valuable places in Thrace. But this victorious progreſs was ſoon ſtopped by the death of their general, and that of Cleon the Athenian commander, and the pacific diſpoſition of Nicias, who was now at the head of Athens, made overtures of peace and univerſal tranquillity. Pliſtoanax, the the king of the Spartans, wiſhed them to be accepted, but the intrigues of the Corinthians prevented the diſcontinuation of the war, and therefore hoſtilities began a-new. But while war was carried on with various ſucceſs in different parts of Greece, the Athenians engaged in a new expedition, they yielded to the perſuaſive eloquence of Gorgias of Leontium, and the ambitious views of Alcibiades, and ſent a fleet of 20 ſhips to aſſiſt the Sicilian ſtates againſt the tyrannical power of Syracuſe, B. C. 416. This was warmly oppoſed by Nicias, but the eloquence of Alcibiades prevailed, and a powerful fleet was ſent againſt the capital of Sicily. Theſe vigorous, though impolitic meaſures of the Athenians, were not viewed with indifference by the confederates. Syracuſe, in her diſtreſs, implored the aſſiſtance of Corinth, and Gylippus was ſent to direct her operations, and to defend her againſt the power of her enemies. The events of battles were dubious, and though the Athenian army was animated, by the prudence and intrepidity of Nicias, and the more haſty courage of Demoſthenes, yet the good fortune of Syracuſe prevailed, and after a campaign of two years of bloodſhed, the fleets of Athens were totally ruined, and the few ſoldiers that ſurvived the deſtructive ſiege made priſoners of war. So fatal a blow threw the people of Attica into conſternation and deſpair, and while they ſought for reſources at home, they ſeverely felt themſelves deprived of ſupport abroad, their allies were alienated by the intrigues of the enemy, and rebellion was fomented in their dependent ſtates and colonies on the Aſiatic coaſt. The threatened ruin however was timely averted, and Alcibiades, who had been treated with cruelty by his countrymen, and who had for ſome time reſided in Sparta, and directed her military operations, now exerted himſelf to defeat the deſigns of the confederates, by inducing the Perſians to eſpouſe the cauſe of his country. But a ſhort time after the internal tranquillity of Athens was diſturbed, and Alcibiades, by wiſhing to aboliſh the democracy, called away the attention of his fellow-citizens from the proſecution of a war which had already coſt them ſo much blood. This, however, was but momentary, the Athenians ſoon after obtained a naval victory, and the Peloponneſian fleet was defeated by Alcibiades. The Athenians beheld with rapture the ſucceſs of their arms, but when their fleet, in the abſence of Alcibiades, had been defeated and deſtroyed near Andros, by Lyſander, the Lacedæmonian admiral, they ſhewed their diſcontent and mortification by eagerly liſtening to the accuſations which were brought againſt their naval leader, to whom they gratefully had acknowledged themſelves indebted for their former victories. Alcibiades was diſgraced in the public aſſembly, and ten commanders were appointed to ſucceed him in the management of the republic. This change of admirals, and the appointment of Callicratidas to ſucceed Lyſander, whoſe office had expired with the revolving year, produced new operations. The Athenians fitted out a fleet, and the two nations decided their ſuperiority near Arginuſæ, in a naval battle. Callicratidas was killed, and the Lacedæmonians conquered, but the rejoicings which the intelligence of this victory occaſioned, were ſoon ſtopped, when it was known that the wrecks of ſome of the diſabled ſhips of the Athenians, and the bodies of the ſlain had not been ſaved from the ſea. The admirals were accuſed in the tumultuous aſſembly, and immediately condemned. Their ſucceſſors in office were not ſo prudent, but they were more unfortunate in their operations. Lyſander was again placed at the head of the Peloponneſian forces, inſtead of Eteonicus, who had ſucceeded to the command at the death of Callicratidas. The age and the experience of this general ſeemed to promiſe ſomething deciſive, and indeed an opportunity was not long wanting for the diſplay of his military character. The ſuperiority of the Athenians, over that of the Peloponneſians, rendered the former inſolent, proud, and negligent, and when they had imprudently forſaken their ſhips to indulge their indolence, or purſue their amuſements on the ſea ſhore at Ægoſpotamos, Lyſander attacked their fleet, and his victory was complete. Of one hundred and eighty ſail, only nine eſcaped, eight of which fled under the command of Conon, to the iſland of Cyprus, and the other carried to Athens the melancholy news of the defeat. The Athenian priſoners were all maſſacred, and when the Peloponneſian conquerors had extended their dominion over the ſtates and communities of Europe and Aſia, which formerly acknowledged the power of Athens, they returned home to finiſh the war by the reduction of the capital of Attica. The ſiege was carried on with vigor, and ſupported with firmneſs, and the firſt Athenian who mentioned capitulation to his countrymen, was inſtantly ſacrificed to the fury and the indignation of the populace, and all the citizens unanimouſly declared, that the ſame moment would terminate their independence and their lives. This animated language, however, was not long continued, the ſpirit of faction was not yet extinguiſhed at Athens, and it proved perhaps more deſtructive to the public liberty than the operations and assaults of the Peloponnesian besiegers. During four months, negociations were carried on with the Spartans, by the aristocratical part of the Athenians. and at last it was agreed, that to establish the peace, the fortifications of the Athenian harbours must be demolished, together with the long walls which joined them to the city; all their ships, except 12, were to be surrendered to the enemy: they were to resign every pretension to their ancient dominions abroad; to recall from banishment all the members of the late aristocracy; to follow the Spartans in war, and, in the time of peace, to frame their constitution according to the will and the prescriptions of their Peloponnesian conquerors. The terms were accepted, and the enemy entered the harbour, and took possession of the city, that very day on which the Athenians had been accustomed to celebrate the anniversary of the immortal victory which their ancestors had obtained over the Persians about 76 years before, near the island of Salamis. The walls and fortifications were instantly levelled with the ground, and the conquerors observed, that in the demolition of Athens, succeeding ages would fix the era of Grecian freedom. The day was concluded with a festival, and the recitation of one of the tragedies of Euripides in which the misfortunes of the daughter of Agamemnon, who was reduced to misery, and banished from her father's kingdom, excited a kindred sympathy in the bosom of the audience, who melted into tears at the recollection that one moment had likewise reduced to misery and servitude, the capital of Attica, which was once called the common patroness of Greece, and the scourge of Persia. This memorable event happened about 404 years before the Christian era, and 30 tyrants were appointed by Lysander over the government of the city. *Xen. Græc. Hist.—Plut. in Lys. Per. Alcib. PELOPONNĒSUS, a celebrated peninsula, which comprehends the most southern parts of Greece. It received this name from Pelops, who settled there, as the name indicates (πηλοπος νησος, the island of Pelops). It had been called before Argia, Pelasgia, and Argolis, and in its form, it has been observed by the moderns, highly to resemble the leaf of the plane tree. Its present name is Morea, which seems to be derived either from the Greek word μορεα, or the Latin morus, which signifies a mulberry tree, which is found there in great abundance. The antient Peloponnesus was divided into six different provinces, Messenia, Laconia, Elis, Arcadia, Achaia propria, and Argolis, to which some add Sicyon. These provinces all bordered on the sea shore, except Arcadia. The Peloponnesus was conquered, some time after the Trojan war, by the Heraclidæ or descendants of Hercules, who had been forcibly expelled from it. The inhabitants of this peninsula rendered themselves illustrious like the rest of the Greeks by their genius, their fondness for the fine arts, the cultivation of learning, and the profession of arms, but in nothing more than by a celebrated war which they carried on against Athens and her allies for 27 years, and which from them received the name of the Peloponnesian war. [Vid. Peloponnesiacum bellum.] The Peloponnesus scarce extended 200 miles in length, and 140 in breadth. It was separated from Greece by the narrow isthmus of Corinth, which, as being only five miles broad, Demetrius, Cæsar, Nero, and some others, attempted in vain to cut, to make a communication between the bay of Corinth, and the Saronicus sinus. Strab. 8.—Thucyd.—Diod. 12, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 21. l. 8, c. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 4.—Herodot.

PELOPĒA MŒNIA, is applied to the cities of Greece, but more particularly to Mycenæ and Argos, where the descendants of Pelops reigned. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 193.

PELOPS, a celebrated prince, son of Tantalus king of Phrygia. His mother's name was Eurÿanassa, or according to others Euprytone, or Eurystemista, or Dione. He was murdered by his father, who wished to try the divinity of the gods who had visited Phrygia, by placing on their table the limbs of his son. The Gods perceived his perfidious cruelty, and they refused to touch the meat, except Ceres, whom the recent loss of her daughter had rendered melancholy and inattentive. She eat one of the shoulders of Pelops, and therefore when Jupiter had had compassion on his fate, and restored him to life, he placed a shoulder of ivory instead of that which Ceres had devoured. This shoulder had an uncommon power, and it could heal by its very touch, every complaint, and remove every disorder. Some time after, the kingdom of Tantalus was invaded by Tros, king of Troy, on pretence that he had carried away his son Ganymedes. This rape had been committed by Jupiter himself; the war, nevertheless, was carried on, and Tantalus, defeated and ruined, was obliged to fly with his son Pelops, and to seek a shelter in Greece. This tradition is confuted by some who support, that Tantalus did not fly into Greece, as he had been sometime before confined by Jupiter in the infernal regions for his impiety, piety, and therefore Pelops was the only one whom the enmity of Tros perſecuted. Pelops came to Piſa, where he became one of the ſuitors of Hippodamia, the daughter of king Œnomaus, and he entered the liſts againſt the father, who promiſed his daughter only to him, who could out-run him in a chariot race. Pelops was not terrified at the fate of the 13 lovers, who before him had entered the courſe againſt Œnomaus, and had, according to the conditions propoſed, been put to death when conquered. He previouſly bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and therefore he eaſily obtained the victory. [Vid. Œnomaus.] He married Hippodamia, and threw headlong into the ſea Myrtilus, when he claimed the reward of his perfidy. According to ſome authors, Pelops had received ſome winged horſes from Neptune, with which he was enabled to out-run Œnomaus. When he had eſtabliſhed himſelf on the throne of Piſa, Hippodamia's poſſeſſion, he extended his conqueſts over the neighbouring countries, and from him the peninſula, of which he was one of the monarchs, received the name of Peloponneſus. Pelops, after death, received divine honors, and he was as much revered above all the other heroes of Greece, as Jupiter was above the reſt of the gods. He had a temple at Olympia, near that of Jupiter, where Hercules conſecrated to him a ſmall portion of land, and offered to him a ſacrifice. The place where this ſacrifice had been offered was religiouſly obſerved, and the magiſtrates of the country yearly, on coming upon office, made there an offering of a black ram. During the ſacrifice, the ſoothſayer was not allowed, as at other times, to have a ſhare of the victim, but he alone who furniſhed the wood, was permitted to take the neck. The wood for ſacrifices as may be obſerved, was always furniſhed by ſome of the prieſts, to all ſuch as offered victims, and they received a price equivalent to what they gave. The white poplar was generally uſed in the ſacrifices made to Jupiter and to Pelops The children of Pelops by Hippodamia were Pitheus, Trœzen, Atreus, Thyeſtes, &c. beſides ſome by concubines. The time of his death is unknown, though it is univerſally agreed, that he ſurvived for ſome time Hippodamia. Some ſuppoſe that the Palladium of the Trojans was made with the bones of Pelops. His deſcendants were called Pelopidæ. Pindar, who in his firſt Olympic ſpeaks of Pelops, confutes the traditions of his ivory ſhoulder, and ſays, that Neptune took him up to heaven to become the cup-bearer to the gods, from which he was expelled, when the impiety of Tantalus wiſhed to make mankind partake of the nectar and the entertainments of the gods. Some ſuppoſe that Pelops firſt inſtituted the Olympic games in honor of Jupiter, and to commemorate the victory which he had obtained over Œnomaus. Pauſ. 5, c. 1, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Diod. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 1, c. 18.—*Pindar. PELORIA, a feſtival obſerved by the Theſſalians, in commemoration of the news which they received by one Pelorius, that the mountains of Tempe had been ſeparated by an earthquake, and that the waters of the lake which lay there ſtagnated, had found a paſſage into the Alpheus, and left behind a vaſt, pleaſant, and moſt delightful plain, &c. Athen. 3.

PELŌRUS, (v. is-idis, v. ias-iados) now cape Faro, one of the three great promontories of Sicily. It lies near the coaſt of Italy, and received its name from Pelorus, the pilot of the ſhip which carried Annibal away from Italy. This celebrated general, as it is reported, was carried by the tides into the ſtreights of Charybdis, and as he was ignorant of the coaſt, he aſked the pilot of his ſhip the name of the promontory, which appeared at a diſtance. The pilot told him, it was one of the capes of Sicily, but Annibal gave no credit to his information, and murdered him on the ſpot on the apprehenſion that he would betray him into the hands of the Romans. He was, however, ſoon convinced of his error, and found that the pilot had ſpoken with great fidelity, and therefore, to pay honor to his memory, and to atone for his cruelty, he gave him a magnificent funeral, and ordered that the promontory ſhould bear his name, and from that time it was called Pelorum. Some ſuppoſe that this account is falſe, and they obſerve, that it bore that name before the age of Annibal. Val. Max. 9, c. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 411, & 687.—*Ovid. PELTÆ, a town of Phrygia.

PĒLŪSIUM, now Tineh, a town of Egypt, ſituate at the entrance of one of the mouths of the Nile, called from it Peluſian. It is about 20 ſtadia from the ſea, and it has received the name of Peluſium from the lakes and marſhes, (πηλὸς) which are in its neighbourhood. It was the key of Egypt on the ſide of Phœnicia, as it was impoſſible to enter the Egyptian territories without paſſing by Peluſium, and therefore on that account it was always well fortified and and garriſoned, as it was of ſuch importance for the ſecurity of the country. It produced lentils, and was celebrated for the linen ſtuffs made there. It is now in ruins. Mela. 2, c. 9.—Colum. 5, c. 10.—Sil. It. 3, v. 25.—Lucan. 8, v. 466. l. 9, v. 83. l. 10, v. 53.—Liv. 44, c. 19. l. 45, c. 11.—Strab. 17.—Virg. G. 1, v. 228.

PĔNĀTES, certain inferior deities among the Romans, who preſided over houſes and the domeſtic affairs of families. They were called Penates, becauſe they were generally placed in the innermoſt, and moſt ſecret parts of the houſe, in penitiſſimâ ædium parte, quod, as Cicero ſays, penitus inſident. The place where they ſtood was afterwards called penetralia, and they themſelves received the name of Penetrales. It was in the option of every maſter of a family to chuſe his Penates, and therefore Jupiter, and ſome of the ſuperior gods are often invoked as patrons of domeſtic affairs. According to ſome, the gods Penates were divided into four claſſes; the firſt comprehended all the celeſtial, the ſecond the ſea gods, the third the gods of hell, and the laſt all ſuch heroes as had received divine honors after death. The Penates were originally the manes of the dead, but when ſuperſtition had taught mankind to pay uncommon reverence to the ſtatues and images of their deceaſed friends, their attention was ſoon exchanged for regular worſhip, and they were admitted by their votaries to ſhare immortality and power over the world, with a Jupiter or a Minerva. The ſtatues of the Penates were generally made with wax, ivory, ſilver, or earth, according to the affluence of the worſhipper, and the only offerings they received were wine, incenſe, fruits, and ſometimes the ſacrifice of lambs, ſheep, goats, &c. In the early ages of Rome, human ſacrifices were offered to them; but Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins, aboliſhed this unnatural cuſtom. When offerings were made to them, their ſtatues were crowned with garlands, poppies, or garlick, and beſides the monthly day that was ſet apart for their worſhip, their feſtivals were celebrated during the Saturnalia. Some have confounded the Lares and the Penates, but they were different. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27. Ver. 2.—Dionyſ. 1.

PENDALIUM, a promontory of Cyprus.

PĒNEIA, or PENĒIS, an epithet applied to Daphne, as daughter of Peneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452.

PENELIUS, one of the Greeks killed in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.

PĒNĔLŎPE, a celebrated princeſs of Greece, daughter of Icarius, and wife of Ulyſſes, king of Ithaca. Her marriage with Ulyſſes was celebrated about the ſame time that Menelaus married Helen, and ſhe retired with her huſband to Ithaca, againſt the inclination of her father, who wiſhed to detain her at Sparta, her native country. She ſoon after became mother of Telemachus, and was obliged to part with great reluctance from her huſband, whom the Greeks obliged to go to the Trojan war. [Vid. Palamedes.] The continuation of hoſtilities for ten years, made her ſad and melancholy; but when Ulyſſes did not return like the other princes of Greece at the concluſion of the war, her fears and her anxieties were increaſed. As ſhe received no intelligence of his ſituation, ſhe was ſoon beſet by a number of importuning ſuitors, who wiſhed her to believe that her huſband was ſhipwrecked, and that therefore ſhe ought not longer to expect his return, but forget his loſs, and fix her choice and affections on one of her numerous admirers. She received their addreſſes with coldneſs and diſdain; but as ſhe was deſtitute of power, and a priſoner as it were in their hands, ſhe yet flattered them with hopes and promiſes, and declared that ſhe would make choice of one of them, as ſoon as ſhe had finiſhed a piece of tapeſtry, on which ſhe was employed. The work was done in a dilatory manner, and ſhe baffled their eager expectations, by undoing in the night, what ſhe had done in the day-time. This artifice of Penelope has given riſe to the proverb of Penelope's web, which is applied to whatever labor can never be ended. The return of Ulyſſes, after an abſence of twenty years, however, delivered her from fears, and from her dangerous ſuitors. Penelope is deſcribed by Homer as a model of female virtue and chaſtity, but ſome more modern writers diſpute her claims to modeſty, and continence, and they repreſent her as the moſt debauched and voluptuous of her ſex. According to their opinions therefore, ſhe liberally gratified the deſires of her ſuitors, in the abſence of her huſband, and had a ſon whom ſhe called Pan, as if to ſhew that he was the offſpring of all her admirers. Some however, ſuppoſe, that Pan was ſon of Penelope by Mercury, and that he was born before his mother's marriage with Ulyſſes. The god, as it is ſaid, deceived Penelope, under the form of a beautiful goat, as ſhe was tending her father's flocks on one of the mountains of Arcadia. After the return of Ulyſſes, Penelope had a daughter, who was called Ptoliporthe, but if we believe the traditions that were long preſerved at Matinea, Ulyſſes repudiated his wife for her incontinence during his abſence, and Penelope fled to Sparta, and afterwards to Mantinea, where ſhe died and was buried. After the death of Ulyſſes, according cording to Hyginus, she married Telegonus, her husband's son by Circe, by order of the goddess Minerva. Some say that her original name was Arnea, or Amirace, and that she was called Penelope, when some river birds called Penelopes had saved her from the waves of the sea, when her father had exposed her. Icarius had attempted to destroy her, because the oracles had told him that his daughter by Peribœa would be the most dissolute of her sex, and a disgrace to his family. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 3, c. 12.—*Homer. Pēneus, a river of Thessaly, rising on mount Pindus, and falling into the Thermean gulf, after a wandering course between mount Ossa and Olympus, through the plains of Tempe. It received its name from Peneus, a son of Oceanus, and Tethys. The Peneus antiently inundated the plains of Thessaly, till an earthquake separated the mountains Ossa and Olympus, and formed the beautiful vale of Tempe, where the waters formerly stagnated. From this circumstance, therefore, it obtained the name of Araxes, ab ἀραξασω, scindo. Daphne, the daughter of the Peneus, according to the fables of the mythologists, was changed into a laurel on the banks of this river. This tradition arises from the quantity of laurels which grow near the Peneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—*Virg. Pentapŏlis, a town of India.——A part of Africa near Cyrene. It received this name on account of the five cities which it contained; Cyrene, Arsinoe, Berenice, Ptolemais or Barce, and Apollonia. Plin. 5, c. 5.——Also part of Palestine, containing the five cities of Gaza, Gath, Ascalon, Azotus, and Ekron.

Pentelĭcus, a mountain of Attica, where were found quarries of beautiful marble. Strab. 9.

Penthesĭlēa, a queen of the Amazons, daughter of Mars. She came to assist Priam in the last years of the Trojan war, and fought against Achilles, by whom she was slain. The hero was so struck with the beauty of Penthesilea, when he stripped her of her arms, that he even shed tears for having too violently sacrificed her to his fury. Thersites laughed at the partiality of the hero, for which ridicule he was instantly killed. Lycophron says, that Achilles slew Thersites because he had put out the eyes of Penthesilea when she was yet alive. The scholiast of Lycophron differs from that opinion, and declares, that it was commonly believed, that Achilles offered violence to the body of Penthesilea when she was dead, and that Thersites was killed because he had reproached the hero of this infamous action, in the presence of all the Greeks. The death of Thersites so offended Diomedes that he dragged the body of Penthesilea out of the camp, and threw it into the Scamander. It is generally supposed, that Achilles was enamoured of the Amazon before he fought with her, and that she had by him a son called Cayster. Dictys. Cret. 3 & 4.—Paus. 10, c. 31.—*Q. Pentheus, son of Echion and Agave, was king of Thebes in Bœotia. His refusal to acknowledge the divinity of Bacchus was attended with the most fatal consequences. He forbad his subjects to pay adoration to this new god; and when the Theban women had gone out of the city to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus, Pentheus, apprized of the debauchery which attended the solemnity, ordered the god himself, who conducted the religious multitude, to be seized. His orders were obeyed with reluctance, but when the doors of the prison in which Bacchus had been confined, opened of their own accord, Pentheus became more irritated, and commanded his soldiers to destroy the whole band of the bacchanals. This, however, was not executed, for Bacchus inspired the monarch with the ardent desire of seeing the celebration of the orgies. Accordingly he hid himself in a wood on mount Cithæron, from whence he could see all the ceremonies unperceived. But here his curiosity soon proved fatal, he was descried by the bacchanals, and they all rushed upon him. His mother was the first who attacked him, and her example was instantly followed by her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, and his body was torn to pieces. Euripides introduces Bacchus among his priestesses, when Pentheus was put to death; but Ovid, who relates the whole in the same manner, differs from the Greek poet only in saying, that not Bacchus himself, but one of his priests was present. The tree on which the Bacchanals found Pentheus, was cut down by the Corinthians, by order of the oracle, and with it two statues of the god of wine were made, and placed in the forum. Hygin. fab. 184.—Theocrit. 26.—*Ovid. PENTHĬLUS, a ſon of Oreſtes by Erigone, the daughter of Ægyſthus, who reigned conjointly with his brother Tiſamenus at Argos. He was driven ſome time after from his throne by the Heraclidæ, and he retired to Achaia, and thence to Leſbos, where he planted a colony. Pauſ. 4.—Strab. 13.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.

PENTHĬLUS, a prince of Paphos, who aſſiſted Xerxes with 12 ſhips. He was ſeized by the Greeks, to whom he communicated many important things concerning the ſituation of the Perſians, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 195.

PEPĂRĒTHOS, a ſmall iſland of the Ægean ſea, on the coaſt of Macedonia, about 20 miles in circumference. It abounded in olives, and its wines have always been reckoned excellent. They were not, however, palatable before they were ſeven years old. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 470.—Liv. 28, c. 5. l. 31, c. 28.

PERCŌPE, a city which aſſiſted Priam during the Trojan war. Vid. Percote.

PERCOSIUS, a man acquainted with futurity. He attempted in vain to diſſuade his two ſons to go to the Trojan war, by telling them that they ſhould periſh there.

PERCŌTE, a town on the Helleſpont, between Abydos and Lampſacus, near the ſea ſhore. Artaxerxes gave it to Themiſtocles, to maintain his wardrobe. It is ſometimes called Percope. Herodot. 1, c. 117.—Hom.

PERDICCAS, the fourth king of Macedonia, B. C. 729, was deſcended from Temenus. He encreaſed his dominions by conqueſt, and in the latter part of his life, he ſhewed his ſon Argeus where he wiſhed to be buried, and told him that as long as the bones of his deſcendants and ſucceſſors on the throne of Macedonia were laid in the ſame grave, ſo long would the crown remain in their family. Theſe injunctions were obſerved till the time of Alexander, who was buried out of Macedonia. Herodot. 7 & 8.—Juſtin. 7, c. 2.——Another, king of Macedonia, ſon of Alexander. He reigned during the Peloponneſian war, and aſſiſted the Lacedæmonians againſt Athens. He behaved with great courage on the throne, and died B. C. 413, after a long reign of glory and independence, during which he had ſubdued ſome of his barbarian neighbours.——Another, king of Macedonia, who was ſupported on his throne by Iphicrates the Athenian, againſt the inſtruſions of Pauſanias. He was killed in a war againſt the Illyrians, B. C. 360. Juſtin. 7, &c.——One of the friends and favorites of Alexander the Great. At the king's death he wiſhed to make himſelf abſolute, and the ring which he had received from the hand of the dying Alexander, ſeemed in ſome meaſure to favor his pretenſions. The better to ſupport his claims to the throne, he married Cleopatra, the ſiſter of Alexander, and ſtrengthened himſelf by making a league with Eumenes. His ambitious views were eaſily diſcovered by Antigonus, and the reſt of the generals of Alexander, who all wiſhed, like Perdiccas, to ſucceed to the kingdom and honors of the deceaſed monarch. Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, leagued with Antigonus againſt him, and after much bloodſhed on both ſides, Perdiccas was totally ruined, and at laſt aſſaſſinated in his tent in Egypt, by his own officers, about 321 years before the Chriſtian era. Perdiccas had not the prudence and the addreſs which were neceſſary to conciliate the eſteem and gain the attachment of his fellow ſoldiers, and this impropriety of his conduct alienated the heart of his friends, and at laſt proved his deſtruction. Plut. in Alex.—Diod. 17 & 18.—Curt. 10.—*C. PERDIX, a young Athenian, ſon of the ſiſter of Dædalus. He invented the ſaw, and ſeemed to promiſe to become a greater artiſt than had ever been known. His uncle was jealous of his riſing fame, and he threw him down from the top of a tower, and put him to death. Perdix was changed into a bird which bears his name. Hygin. fab. 39 & 274.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 220, &c.

PERENNIS, a favorite of the emperor Commodus. He is deſcribed by ſome as a virtuous and impartial magiſtrate, while others paint him as a cruel, violent, and oppreſſive tyrant, who committed the greateſt barbarities to enrich himſelf. He was put to death for aſpiring to the empire. Herodian.

PEREUS, a ſon of Elatus and Laodice, grandſon of Arcas. Pauſ. 8. c. 4.

PERGA, a town of Pamphylia. Liv. 38, c. 57.

PERGĂMUS, Pergama, (plur.) the citadel of the city of Troy. The word is often uſed for Troy. It was ſituated in the moſt elevated part of the town, on the ſhores of the the river Scamander. Xerxes mounted to the top of this citadel when he reviewed his troops as he marched to invade Greece. Herodot. 7, c. 43.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 466, &c.

PERGĂMUS, now Bergamo, a town of Myſia, on the banks of the Caycus. It was the capital of a celebrated empire called the kingdom of Pergamus, which was founded by Philæterus, an eunuch, whom Lyſimachus, after the battle of Ipſus, had entruſted with the treaſures which he had obtained in the war. Philæterus made himſelf maſter of the treaſures and of Pergamus, in which they were depoſited, B. C. 283, and laid the foundations of an empire, over which he himſelf preſided for 20 years. His ſucceſſors began to reign in the following order: His nephew Eumenes aſcended the throne 263 B. C.; Attalus, 241; Eumenes the ſecond, 197; Attalus Philadelphus, 159; Attalus Philomator, 138, who, B. C. 133, left the Roman people heirs to his kingdom, as he had no children. The right of the Romans, however, was diſputed by an uſurper, who claimed the empire as his own, and Aquilius the Roman general was obliged to conquer the different cities one by one, and to gain their ſubmiſſion by poiſoning the waters which were conveyed to their houſes, till the whole was reduced into the form of a dependent province. The capital of the kingdom of Pergamus was famous for a library of 200,000 volumes, which had been collected by the different monarchs who had reigned there. This noble collection was afterwards tranſported to Egypt by Cleopatra, with the permiſſion of Antony, and it adorned and enriched the Alexandrian library, till it was moſt fatally deſtroyed by the Saracens, A. D. 642. Parchment was firſt invented and made uſe of, at Pergamus, to tranſcribe books, as Ptolemy king of Egypt had forbidden the exportation of papyrus from his kingdom, in order to prevent Eumenes from making a library as valuable and as choice as that of Alexandria. From this circumſtance parchment has been called charta pergamena. Galenus the phyſician, and Apollodorus the mythologiſt were born there. Æſculapius was the chief deity of the country. Plin. 5 & 15.—Iſid. 6, c. 11.—Strab. 13.—Liv. 29, c. 11. l. 31, c. 46.—Plin. 10, c. 21. l. 13, c. 11.——A ſon of Neoptolemus and Andromache, who, as ſome ſuppoſe, founded Pergamus in Aſia. Pauſ. 1, c. 11.

PERGE, a town of Pamphylia. Strab. 14.

PERGUS, a lake of Sicily near Enna, where Proſerpine was carried away by Pluto. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 386.

PERIANDER, a tyrant of Corinth, ſon of Cypſelus. The firſt years of his government were mild and popular, but he ſoon learnt to become oppreſſive, when he had conſulted the tyrant of Sicily about the ſureſt way of reigning. He received no other anſwer but whatever explanation he wiſhed to place on the Sicilian tyrant's having, in the preſence of his meſſenger, plucked in a field, all the ears of corn which ſeemed to tower above the reſt. Periander underſtood the meaning of this anſwer. He immediately ſurrounded himſelf with a numerous guard, and put to death the richeſt and moſt powerful citizens of Corinth. He was not only cruel to his ſubjects, but his family alſo were objects of his vengeance. He committed inceſt with his mother, and put to death his wife Meliſſa, upon falſe accuſation. He alſo baniſhed his ſon Lycophron to the iſland of Corcyra, becauſe the youth pitied the miſerable end of his mother, and deteſted the barbarities of his father. Periander died about 585 years before the Chriſtian era, and by the meanneſs of his flatterers, he was reckoned one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. Though he was tyrannical, yet he patronized the fine arts; he was fond of peace, and he ſhewed himſelf the friend and the protector of genius and of learning. He uſed to ſay, that a man ought ſolemnly to keep his word, but not to heſitate to break it if ever it claſhed with his intereſt. He ſaid alſo, that not only crimes ought to be puniſhed, but alſo every wicked and corrupted thought. Diog. in vita.—Ariſt. 5, Polit.—Pauſ. 2.——A tyrant of Ambracia, whom ſome rank with the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, and not the tyrant of Corinth.——A man diſtinguiſhed as a phyſician, but contemptible as a poet. Plut.—Lucan.

PERIARCHUS, a naval commander of Sparta conquered by Conon. Diod.

PERIBŒA, the ſecond wife of Œneus, king of Calydon, was daughter of Hipponous. She became mother of Tydeus. Some ſuppoſe that Œneus debauched her, and afterwards married her. Hygin. fab. 69.——A daughter of Alcathous, ſold by her father on ſuſpicion that ſhe was courted by Telamon, ſon of Æacus, king of Ægina. She was carried to Cyprus, where Telamon the founder of Salamis married her, and ſhe became mother of Ajax. She alſo married Theſeus, according to ſome. She is alſo called Eribœa. Pauſ. 1, c. 17, & 42.—Hygin. 97.——The wife of Polybus, king of Corinth, who educated Œdipus as her own child.——A daughter of Eurymedon, who became mother of Nauſithous by Neptune.——The mother of Penelope, according to ſome authors.

PERI-

Peribomius, a noted debauchee, &c. Juv. 2, v. 16.

Perĭcles, an Athenian of a noble family, ſon of Xanthippus and Agariſte. He was naturally endowed with great powers, which he improved by attending the lectures of Damon, of Zeno, and of Anaxagoras. Under theſe celebrated maſters he became a commander, a ſtateſman, and an orator, and gained the affections of the people by his uncommon addreſs and well directed liberality. When he took a ſhare in the adminiſtration of public affairs, he rendered himſelf popular by oppoſing Cimon, who was the favorite of the nobility, and to remove every obſtacle which ſtood in the way of his ambition, he leſſened the dignity and the power of the court of the Areopagus, whom the people had been taught for ages to reſpect and to venerate. He alſo attacked Cimon, and cauſed him to be baniſhed by the oſtraciſm. Thucydides alſo, who had ſucceeded Cimon on his baniſhment, ſhared the ſame fate, and Pericles remained for 15 years the ſole miniſter, and as it may be ſaid the abſolute ſovereign of a republic which always ſhowed itſelf ſo jealous of its liberties, and which diſtruſted ſo much the honeſty of her magiſtrates. In his miniſterial capacity Pericles did not enrich himſelf, but the proſperity of Athens was the object of his adminiſtration. He made war againſt the Lacedæmonians, and reſtored the temple of Delphi to the care of the Phocians, who had been illegally deprived of that honorable truſt. He obtained a victory over the Sicyonians near Nemæa, and waged a ſucceſsful war againſt the inhabitants of Samos at the requeſt of his favorite miſtreſs Aſpaſia. The Peloponneſian war was fomented by his ambitious views [Vid. Peloponneſiacum bellum], and when he had warmly repreſented the floriſhing ſtate, the opulence, and actual power of his country, the Athenians did not heſitate a moment to undertake a war againſt the moſt powerful republics of Greece, a war which continued for 27 years, and which was concluded by the deſtruction of their empire, and the demolition of their walls. The arms of the Athenians were for ſome time crowned with ſucceſs, but an unfortunate expedition raiſed clamors againſt Pericles, and the enraged populace attributed all their loſſes to him, and to make atonement for their ill ſucceſs, they condemned him to pay 50 talents. This loſs of popular favor by republican caprice, did not ſo much affect Pericles as the recent death of all his children, and when the tide of unpopularity was paſſed by, he condeſcended to come into the public aſſembly, and to view with ſecret pride the contrition of his fellow citizens, who univerſally begged his forgiveneſs for the violence which they had offered to his miniſterial character. He was again reſtored to all his honors, and if poſſible inveſted with more power and more authority than before, but the dreadful peſtilence which had diminiſhed the number of his family, proved fatal to him, and about 429 years before Chriſt, in his 70th year, he fell a ſacrifice to that terrible malady, which robbed Athens of ſo many of her citizens. Pericles was for 40 years at the head of the adminiſtration, 25 years with others, and 15 alone, and the floriſhing ſtate of the empire during his government gave occaſion to the Athenians publicly to lament his loſs, and venerate his memory. As he was expiring, and ſeemingly ſenſeleſs, his friends that ſtood around his bed expatiated with warmth on the moſt glorious actions of his life, and the victories which he had won, when he ſuddenly interrupted their tears and converſation, by ſaying that in mentioning the exploits that he had atchieved, and which were common to him with all generals, they had forgot to mention a circumſtance which reflected far greater glory upon him as a miniſter, a general, and above all, as a man. It is, ſays he, that not a citizen in Athens has been obliged to put on mourning on my account. The Athenians were ſo pleaſed with his eloquence that they compared it to thunder and lightning, and as to another father of the gods, they gave him the ſirname of Olympian. The poets, his flatterers, ſaid that the goddeſs of perſuaſion, with all her charms and her attraction, dwelt upon his tongue. When he marched at the head of the Athenian armies, Pericles obſerved that he had the command of a free nation that were Greeks, and citizens of Athens. He alſo declared that not only the hand of a magiſtrate, but alſo his eyes and his tongue ſhould be pure and undefiled. Yet great and venerable as this character may appear, we muſt not forget the follies of Pericles. His vicious partiality for the celebrated courtezan Aſpaſia, ſubjected him to the ridicule and the cenſure of his fellow citizens; but if he triumphed over ſatire and malevolent remarks, the Athenians had occaſion to execrate the memory of a man who by his example corrupted the purity and innocence of their morals, and who made licentiouſneſs reſpectable, and the indulgence of every impure deſire the qualification of the ſoldier as well as of the ſenator. Pericles loſt all his legitimate children by the peſtilence, and to call a natural ſon by his own name he was obliged to repeal a law which he had made againſt ſpurious children, and which he had enforced with great ſeverity. This ſon, called Pericles, became one of the ten generals who ſucceeded Alcibiades in the adminiſtration of affairs, and like his colleagues he was condemned to death by the Athenians, after the unfortunate battle of Arginuſæ. Pauſ. 1, c. 25.—Plut. in vitâ.—Quintil. 12, c. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—*Ælian V. Perilāus, an officer in the army of Alexander the Great. Curt. 10.——A tyrant of Argos.

Perilēus, a ſon of Icarius and Peribœa.

Perilla, a daughter of Ovid the poet. She was extremely fond of poetry and literature. Ovid. Faſt. 3, el. 7, v. 1.

Perillus, an ingenious artiſt at Athens, who made a brazen bull for Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum. This machine was fabricated to put criminals to death by burning them alive, and it was ſuch that their cries were like the roaring of a bull. When Perillus gave it Phalaris, the tyrant made the firſt experiment upon the donor, and cruelly put him to death by lighting a ſlow fire under the belly of the bull. Plin. 34, c. 8.—Ovid. in art. am. 1, v. 653, in ib. 439.——A lawyer and uſurer in the age of Horace. Horat. 2, ſat. 3, v. 75.

Perimēde, a daughter of Æolus, who married Achelous.——The wife of Licymnius.——A woman ſkilled in the knowledge of herbs and of enchantments. Theocrit. 2.

Perimēla, a daughter of Hippodamas, thrown into the ſea for receiving the addreſſes of the Achelous. She was changed into an iſland in the Ionian ſea, and became one of the Echinades. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 690.

Perinthia, a play of Menander's. Terent. And. prol. 9.

Pĕrinthus, a town of Thrace, in the Propontis, antiently ſirnamed Mygdonica. It was afterwards called Heraclea, in honor of Hercules, and now Erekli. Mela. 2, c. 2.—Pauſ. 1, c. 29.—Plin. 4, c. 11.—Liv. 33, c. 30.

Peripatetĭci, a ſect of philoſophers at Athens, diſciples to Ariſtotle. They received this name from the place where they were taught, called Peripaton, in the Lyceum, or becauſe they received the philoſopher's lectures as they walked (περιπατουντες). The Peripatetics acknowledged the dignity of human nature, and placed their ſummum bonum not in the pleaſures of paſſive ſenſation, but in the due exerciſe of the moral and intellectual faculties. The habit of this exerciſe, when guided by reaſon, conſtituted the higheſt excellence of man. The philoſopher contended that our own happineſs chiefly depends upon ourſelves, and tho' he did not require in his followers that ſelf-command to which others pretended, yet he allowed a moderate degree of perturbation, as becoming human nature, and he conſidered a certain ſenſibility of paſſion totally neceſſary, as by reſentment we are enabled to repel injuries, and the ſmart which paſt calamities have inflicted, renders us careful to avoid the repetition. Cic. Acad. 2, &c.

Periphas, a man who attempted, with Pyrrhus, Priam's palace, &c. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 476.——A ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——One of the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 449.——One of the firſt kings of Attica, before the age of Cecrops, according to ſome authors.

Periphātus, a robber of Attica, ſon of Vulcan, deſtroyed by Theſeus. He is alſo called Corynetes.

Periphēmus, an antient hero of Greece, to whom Solon ſacrificed at Salamis, by order of the oracle.

Perisades, a people of Illyricum.

Peristhĕnes, a ſon of Ægyptus. Ap.

Peritanus, an Arcadian who enjoyed the company of Helen after her elopement with Paris.

Peritas, a favorite dog of Alexander the Great, in whoſe honor the monarch built a city.

Peritonium, a town of Egypt, on the weſtern ſide of the Nile, eſteemed of great importance, as being one of the keys of the country. Antony was defeated there by C. Gallus, the lieutenant of Auguſtus.

Permessus, a river of Bœotia, riſing in mount Helicon, and flowing all round it. It received its name from Permeſſus the father of a nymph called Aganippe, who alſo gave her name to one of the fountains of Helicon. The river Permeſſus, as we as the fountain Aganippe, were sacred to the Muses. Strab. 8.—Propert. 2, el. 8.

PERO, or PERONE, a daughter of Neleus, king of Pylos, by Chloris. She married Bias son of Amythaon, because he had, according to her father's desire, recovered some oxen which Hercules had stolen away. Homer. Od. 12.—Propert. 2, el. 2, v. 17.—Paus. 4, c. 36.——A daughter of Cimon, remarkable for her filial affection. When her father had been sent to prison, where his judges had condemned him to starve, she supported his life by giving him the milk of her breasts, as to her own child. Val. Max. 5, c. 4.

PEROE, a fountain of Bœotia, called after Peroe, a daughter of the Asopus. Paus. 9, c. 4.

PEROLA, a Roman who meditated the death of Hannibal in Italy. His father Pacuvius dissuaded him from assassinating the Carthaginian general.

PERPENNA, M. a Roman who conquered Aristonicus in Asia, and took him prisoner. He died B. C. 130.——Another who joined the rebellion of Sertorius, and opposed Pompey. He was defeated by Metellus, and some time after he had the meanness to assassinate Sertorius, whom he had invited to his house. He fell into the hands of Pompey, who ordered him to be put to death. Plut. in Sert.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.—A Greek who obtained the consulship at Rome. Val. Max. 3, c. 4.

PERPERĒNE, a place of Phrygia, where, as some suppose, Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to Venus. Strab. 5.

PERRANTHES, a hill of Epirus, near Ambracia. Liv. 38, c. 4.

PERRHÆBIA, a part of Thessaly, situate on the borders of the Peneus, extending between the town of Atrax and the vale of Tempe. The inhabitants were driven from their possessions by the Lapithæ, and retired into Ætolia, where part of the country received the name of Perrhæbia. Propert. 2, el. 5, v. 33.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 33, c. 34. l. 39, c. 34.

PERSA, or PERSEIS, one of the Oceanides, mother of Æetes, Circe, and Pasiphae, by Apollo. Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 3.

PERSÆ, the inhabitants of Persia. Vid. Persia.

PERSÆUS, a philosopher intimate with Antigonus, by whom he was appointed over the Acrocorinth. He flourished B. C. 274. Diog. Laert. in Zenon.

PERSĒE, a fountain near Mycenæ, in Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 16.

PERSĒIS, one of the Oceanides.——A patronymic of Hecate as daughter of Perses. Ovid Met. 7, v. 69.

PERSĔPHŎNE, a daughter of Jupiter and Ceres, called also Proserpine. [Vid. Proserpina.]——The mother of Amphion by Jasus.

PERSĔPŎLIS, a celebrated city, the capital of the Persian empire. It was laid in ruins by Alexander after the conquest of Darius. The reason of this is unknown. Diodorus says that the sight of about 800 Greeks, whom the Persians had shamefully mutilated, so irritated Alexander that he resolved to punish the barbarity of the inhabitants of Persepolis, and of the neighbouring country, by permitting his soldiers to plunder their capital. Others suppose that Alexander set it on fire at the instigation of Thais, one of his courtezans, when he had passed the day in drinking, and in riot and debauchery. The ruins of Persepolis, now Estakar, or Tehel-minar, still astonish the modern traveller by their grandeur and magnificence. Curt. 5, c. 7.—Diod. 17, &c.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 11, c. 14.

PERSES, a son of Perseus and Andromeda. From him the Persians, who were originally called Cephenes, received their name. Herodot. 7, c. 61.——A king of Macedonia. Vid. Perseus.

PERSEUS a son of Jupiter and Danae, the daughter of Acrisius. As Acrisius had confined his daughter in a brazen tower to prevent her becoming a mother, because he was to perish, according to the words of an oracle, by the hands of his daughter's son, Perseus was no sooner born (Vid. Danae) than he was thrown into the sea with his mother Danae. The hopes of Acrisius were frustrated; the slender boat which carried Danae and her son was driven by the winds upon the coasts of the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where they were found by a fisherman called Dictys, and carried to Polydectes the king of the place. They were treated with great humanity, and Perseus was entrusted to the care of the priests of Minerva's temple. His rising genius and manly courage, however, soon displeased Polydectes, and the monarch, who wished to offer violence to Danae, feared the resentment of her son. Yet Polydectes resolved to remove every obstacle. He invited all his friends to a sumptuous entertainment, and it was requisite that all such as came, should present the monarch with a beautiful horse. Perseus was in the number of the invited, and the more particularly so, as Polydectes knew that he could not receive from him the present which he expected from all the rest. Nevertheless Perseus, who wished not to appear inferior to the others in magnificence, told the king that as he could not give him a horse, he would bring him the head of Medusa, the only one of the Gorgons who was ſubject to mortality. The offer was doubly agreeable to Polydectes, as it would remove Perſeus from Seriphos, and on account of its ſeeming impoſſibility, the attempt might perhaps end in his ruin. But the innocence of Perſeus was patronized by the gods. Pluto lent him his helmet, which had the wonderful power of making its bearer inviſible; Minerva gave him her buckler, which was as reſplendent as glaſs; and he received from Mercury wings and the talaria, with a ſhort dagger made of diamonds, and called harpe. According to ſome it was from Vulcan, and not from Mercury, that he received the harpe, which was in form like a ſcythe. With theſe arms Perſeus began his expedition, and traverſed the air, conducted by the goddeſs Minerva. He went to the Graiæ, the ſiſters of the Gorgons, who, according to the poets, had wings like the Gorgons, but only one eye and one tooth between them all, of which they made uſe of, each in her turn. They were three in number, according to Æſchylus and Apollodorus; or only two, according to Ovid and Heſiod. With Pluto's helmet, which rendered him inviſible, Perſeus was enabled to ſteal their eye and their tooth while they were aſleep, and he returned them only when they had informed him where their ſiſters the Gorgons reſided. When he had received every neceſſary information, Perſeus flew to the habitation of the Gorgons, which was ſituate beyond the weſtern ocean, according to Heſiod and Apollodorus; or in Libya according to Ovid and Lucan; or in the deſarts of Aſiatic Scythia, according to Æſchylus, he found theſe monſters aſleep, and as he knew that if he fixed his eyes upon them, he ſhould be inſtantly changed into a ſtone, he continually looked on his ſhield, which reflected all the objects as clearly as the beſt of glaſſes. He approached them, and with a courage which the goddeſs Minerva ſupported, he cut off Meduſa's head with one blow. The noiſe awoke the two immortal ſiſters, but Pluto's helmet rendered Perſeus inviſible, and the attempts of the Gorgons to revenge Meduſa's death proved fruitleſs, the conqueror made his way through the air, and from the blood which dropped from Meduſa's head ſprang all thoſe innumerable ſerpents which have ever ſince infeſted the ſandy deſerts of Libya. Chryſaor alſo, with his golden ſword, ſprung from theſe drops of blood, as well as the horſe Pegaſus, which immediately flew through the air, and ſtopped on mount Helicon, where he became the favorite of the Muſes. Mean time Perſeus had continued his journey acroſs the deſerts of Libya, but the approach of night obliged him to alight in the territories of Atlas, king of Mauritania. He went to the monarch's palace, where he hoped to find a kind reception by announcing himſelf as the ſon of Jupiter, but in this he was diſappointed. Atlas recollected that, according to an antient oracle, his gardens were to be robbed of their fruit by one of the ſons of Jupiter, and therefore he not only refuſed Perſeus the hoſpitality he demanded, but he even offered violence to his perſon. Perſeus finding himſelf inferior to his powerful enemy, ſhowed him Meduſa's head, and inſtantly Atlas was changed into a large mountain which bore the ſame name in the deſerts of Africa. On the morrow Perſeus continued his flight, and as he paſſed acroſs the territories of Libya, he diſcovered, on the coaſts of Æthiopia, the naked Andromeda, expoſed to a ſea monſter. He was ſtruck at the ſight, and offered her father Cepheus to deliver her from inſtant death if he obtained her in marriage as a reward of his labors. Cepheus conſented, and immediately Perſeus raiſing himſelf in the air, flew towards the monſter, which was advancing to devour Andromeda, and he plunged his dagger in his right ſhoulder, and deſtroyed it. This happy event was attended with the greateſt rejoicings. Perſeus raiſed three altars to Mercury, Jupiter, and Pallas, and after he had offered the ſacrifice of a calf, a bullock, and a heifer, the nuptials were celebrated with the greateſt feſtivity. The univerſal joy, however, was ſoon diſturbed. Phineus, Andromeda's uncle, entered the palace with a number of armed men, and attempted to carry away the bride, whom he had courted and admired long before the arrival of Perſeus. The father and mother of Andromeda interfered, but in vain; a bloody battle enſued, and Perſeus muſt have fallen a victim to the rage of Phineus, had not he defended himſelf at laſt with the ſame arms which proved fatal to Atlas. He ſhewed the Gorgon's head to his adverſaries, and they were inſtantly turned to ſtone, each in the poſture and attitude in which he then ſtood. The friends of Cepheus, and ſuch as ſupported Perſeus, ſhared not the fate of Phineus, as the hero had previouſly warned them of the power of Meduſa's head, and of the ſervices which he received from it. Soon after this memorable adventure Perſeus retired to Seriphos, at the very moment that his mother, Danae, fled to the altar of Minerva to avoid the purſuit of Polydectes, who attempted to offer her violence. Dictys, who had ſaved her from the ſea, and who as ſome ſay was the brother of Polydectes, defended her againſt againſt the attempts of her enemies, and therefore Perſeus, ſenſible of his merit and of his humanity, placed him on the throne of Seriphos, after he had with Meduſa's head turned into ſtones the wicked Polydectes, and the officers who were the aſſociates of his guilt. He afterwards reſtored to Mercury his talaria and his wings, to Pluto his helmet, to Vulcan his ſword, and to Minerva her ſhield; but as he was more particularly indebted to the goddeſs of wiſdom for her aſſiſtance and protection, he placed the Gorgon's head on her ſhield, or rather, according to the more received opinion, on her ægis. After he had finiſhed theſe celebrated exploits, Perſeus expreſſed a wiſh to return to his native country, and accordingly he embarked for the Peloponneſus, with his mother and Andromeda. When he reached the Peloponneſian coaſts he was informed that Teutamias, king of Lariſſa, was then celebrating funeral games in honor of his father. This intelligence drew him to Lariſſa to ſignalize himſelf in throwing the quoit, of which, according to ſome, he was the inventor. But here he was attended by an evil fate, and had the misfortune to kill a man with a quoit which he had thrown in the air. This was no other than his grandfather Acriſius, who, on the firſt intelligence that his grandſon had reached the Peloponneſus, fled from his kingdom of Argos to the court of his friend and ally Teutamias, to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle which had obliged him to treat his daughter with ſo much barbarity. Some ſuppoſe with Pauſanias, that Acriſius had gone to Lariſſa to be reconciled to his grandſon, whoſe fame had been ſpread in every city of Greece; and Ovid maintains that the grandfather was under the ſtrongeſt obligations to his ſon-in-law, as thro' him he had received his kingdom, from which he had been forcibly driven by the ſons of his brother Prœtus. This unfortunate murder greatly depreſſed the ſpirits of Perſeus: by the death of Acriſius he was entitled to the throne of Argos, but he refuſed to reign there; and to remove himſelf from a place which reminded him of the parricide he had unfortunately committed, he exchanged his kingdom for that of Tirynthus, and the maritime coaſt of Argolis, where Megapenthes the ſon of Prœtus then reigned. When he had finally ſettled in this part of the Peloponneſus, he determined to lay the foundations of a new city, which he made the capital of his dominions, and which he called Mycenæ, becauſe the pommel of his ſword, called by the Greeks myces, had fallen there. The time of his death is unknown, yet it is univerſally agreed that he received divine honors like the reſt of the antient heroes. He had ſtatues at Mycenæ, and in the iſland of Seriphos, and the Athenians raiſed him a temple, in which they conſecrated an altar in honor of Dictys, who had treated Danae and her infant ſon with ſo much paternal tenderneſs. The Egyptians alſo paid particular honor to his memory, and aſſerted that he often appeared among them wearing ſhoes two cubits long, which was always interpreted as a ſign of fertility. Perſeus had by Andromeda, Alceus, Sthenelus, Neſtor, Electryon, and Gorgophone, and after death, according to ſome mythologiſts, he became a conſtellation in the heavens. Herodot. 2, c. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Pauſ. 2, c. 16 & 18. l. 3, c. 17, &c.—*Apollon. PERSEUS, or PERSES, a ſon of Philip king of Macedonia. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf like his father, by his enmity to the Romans, and when he had made ſufficient preparations, he declared war againſt them. His operations, however, were ſlow and injudicious, he wanted courage and reſolution, and though he at firſt obtained ſome advantages over the Roman armies, yet his avarice and his timidity proved deſtructive to his cauſe. When Paulus was appointed to the command of the Roman armies in Macedonia, Perſeus ſhewed his inferiority by his imprudent encampments, and when he had at laſt yielded to the advice of his officers, who recommended a general engagement, and drawn up his forces near the walls of Pydna, B. C. 168, he was the firſt who ruined his own cauſe, and by flying as ſoon as the battle was begun, he left the enemy maſters of the field. From Pydna, Perſeus fled to Samothrace, but he was ſoon diſcovered in his obſcure retreat, and brought into the preſence of the Roman conqueror, where the meanneſs of his behaviour expoſed him to ridicule, and not to mercy. He was carried to Rome, and dragged along the ſtreets of the city to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. His family were alſo expoſed to the ſight of the Roman populace, who ſhed tears on viewing in their ſtreets, dragged like a ſlave, a monarch who had once defeated their armies, and ſpread alarm all over Italy, by the greatneſs of his military preparations, and by his bold undertakings. Perſeus died in priſon, or according to ſome, he was put to a ſhameful death the first year of his captivity. He had two sons, Philip and Alexander, and one daughter whose name is not known. Alexander the younger of these was hired to a Roman carpenter, and led the greatest part of his life in obscurity, till his ingenuity raised him to notice. He was afterwards made secretary to the senate. Liv. 40, &c.—Justin. 33, c. 1, &c.—Plut. in Paulo.—Flor. 2, c. 12.—Propert. 4. el. 12, v. 39.

PERSIA, a celebrated kingdom of Asia, which in its antient state extended from the Hellespont to the Indus, above 2800 miles, and from Pontus to the shores of Arabia above 2000 miles. As a province, Persia was but small, and according to the description of Ptolemy, it was bounded on the north by Media, west by Susiana, south by the Persian gulph, and east by Carmania. The empire of Persia, or the Persian monarchy, was first founded by Cyrus the Great, about 559 years before the Christian era, and under the succeeding monarchs it became one of the most considerable and powerful kingdoms of the earth. The kings of Persia began to reign in the following order: Cyrus, B. C. 559: Cambyses 529; and after the usurpation of Smerdis for 7 months, Darius 521: Xerxes the Great 485: Artabanus 7 months, and Artaxerxes Longimanus 464: Xerxes II. 425: Sogdianus 7 months, 424: Darius II. or Nothus 423: Artaxerxes II. or Memnon 404: Artaxerxes III. or Ochus, 358: Arses or Arogus 337, and Darius III. or Codomanus, 335, who was conquered by Alexander the Great 331. The destruction of the Persian monarchy by the Macedonians was easily effected, and from that time Persia became tributary to the Greeks. After the death of Alexander, when the Macedonian empire was divided among the officers of the deceased conqueror, Seleucus Nicanor made himself master of the Persian provinces, till the revolt of the Parthians introduced new revolutions in the east. Persia was partly reconquered from the Greeks, and remained tributary to the Parthians for near 500 years. After this the sovereignty was again placed into the hands of the Persians, by the revolt of Artaxerxes, a common soldier, A. D. 229, who became the founder of the second Persian monarchy, which proved so inimical to the power of the Roman emperors. In their national character, the Persians were warlike, they were early taught to ride, and to handle the bow, and by the manly exercises of hunting, they were inured to bear the toils and fatigues of a military life. Their national valor, however, soon degenerated, and their want of employment at home soon rendered them unfit for war. In the reign of Xerxes, when the empire of Persia was in its most flourishing state, a small number of Greeks were enabled repeatedly to repel for three successive days, an almost innumerable army. This celebrated action, which happened at Thermopylæ, shews in a strong light the superiority of the Grecian soldiers over the Persians, and the battles that before, and a short time after, were fought between the two nations at Marathon, Salamis, Platæa and Mycale, are again an incontestible proof that these Asiatics had more reliance upon their numbers and upon the splendor and richness of their arms, than upon the valor and the discipline of their troops. Their custom, too prevalent among eastern nations, of introducing luxury into the camp, proved also in some measure destructive to their military reputation, and the view which the antients give us of the army of Xerxes, of his cooks, stage-dancers, concubines, musicians, and perfumers, is no very favorable sign of the sagacity of a monarch, who, by his nod, could command millions of men to flock to his standard. In their religion the Persians were very superstitious, they paid the greatest veneration to the sun, the moon, and the stars, and they offered sacrifices to fire, but the supreme deity was never represented by statues among them. They permitted polygamy, and it was no incest among them to marry a sister, or a mother. In their punishments they were extremely severe, even to barbarity. The monarch always appeared with the greatest pomp and dignity; his person was attended by a guard of 15,000 men, and he had besides, a body of 10,000 chosen horsemen, called immortal. He stiled himself, like the rest of the eastern monarchs, the King of kings, as expressive of his greatness and his power. The Persians were formerly called Cephenes, Achæmenians, and Artæi, and they are often confounded with the Parthians by the antient poets. They received the name of Persians from Perses the son of Perseus and Andromeda, who is supposed to have settled among them. Persepolis was the capital of the country. Curt. 4, &c.—*Plut. in Artax. Aulus Persius Flaccus, a Latin poet of Volaterræ. He was of an equeſtrian family, and he made himſelf known by his intimacy with the moſt illuſtrious Romans of the age. The early part of his life was ſpent in his native town, and at the age of ſixteen he was removed to Rome, where he ſtudied philoſophy under Cornutus the celebrated Stoic. He alſo received the inſtructions of Palemon the grammarian, and Virginius the rhetorican. Naturally of a mild diſpoſition, his character was unimpeached, his modeſty remarkable, and his benevolence univerſally admired. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſatyrical humor, and made the faults of the orators and poets of his age the ſubject of his poems. He did not even ſpare Nero, and the more effectually to expoſe the emperor to ridicule, he introduced into his ſatires ſome of his verſes. The torva mimalloneis implerunt cornua bombis, with the three following verſes, are Nero's, according to ſome. But though he was ſo ſevere upon the vicious and ignorant, he did not forget his friendſhip for Cornutus, and he ſhowed his regard for his character and abilities by making mention of his name with great propriety in his ſatires. It was by the advice of his learned preceptor that he corrected one of his poems in which he had compared Nero to Midas, and at his repreſentation he altered the words Auriculas aſini Mida rex habet, into Auriculas aſini quis non habet? Perſius died in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 62, and left all his books, which conſiſted of ſeven hundred volumes, and a large ſum of money, to his preceptor, but Cornutus only accepted the books, and returned the money to the ſiſters and friends of the deceaſed. The ſatires of Perſius are ſix in number, blamed by ſome for obſcurity of ſtyle and of language. But tho' they may appear almoſt unintelligible to ſome, it ought to be remembered that they were read with pleaſure and with avidity by his contemporaries, and that the only difficulties which now appear to the moderns, ariſe from their not knowing the various characters which they deſcribed, the vices which they laſhed, and the errors which they cenſured. The ſatires of Perſius are generally printed with thoſe of Juvenal, the beſt editions of which will be found to be Hennin. 4to L. Bat. 1695, and Hawkey, 12mo. Dublin 1746. The beſt edition of Perſius, ſeparate, is that of Meric Caſaubon, 12mo. Lond. 1647.—A man whoſe quarrel with Rupilius, is mentioned in a ridiculous manner by Horat. Sat. 7. He is called Hybrida, as being ſon of a Greek by a Roman woman.

Pertinax, Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor after the death of Commodus. He was deſcended from an obſcure family, and, like his father, who was either a ſlave or the ſon of a manumitted ſlave, he for ſome time followed the mean employment of drying wood and making charcoal. His indigence, however, did not prevent him from receiving a liberal education, and indeed he was for ſome time employed in teaching a number of pupils the Greek and the Roman languages in Etruria. He left this laborious profeſſion for a military life, and by his valor and intrepidity he gradually roſe to offices of the higheſt truſt in the army, and was made conſul by M. Aurelius for his eminent ſervices. He was afterwards entruſted with the government of Mœſia, and at laſt he preſided over the city of Rome as governor. When Commodus was murdered, Pertinax was univerſally ſelected to ſucceed to the imperial throne, and his refuſal, and the plea of old age and encreaſing infirmities, did not prevent his being ſaluted emperor and Auguſtus. He acquieſced with reluctance, but his mildneſs, his economy, and the popularity of his adminiſtration, convinced the ſenate and the people of the prudence and the juſtice of their choice. He forbad his name to be inſcribed on ſuch places or eſtates as were part of the imperial domain, and exclaimed that they belonged not to him but to the public. He melted all the ſilver ſtatues which had been raiſed to his vicious predeceſſor, and he expoſed to public ſale, all his concubines, his horſes, his arms, and all the inſtruments of his pleaſure and extravagance. With the money raiſed from theſe he enriched the empire, and was enabled to aboliſh all the taxes which Commodus had laid on the rivers, ports, and highways, through the empire. This patriotic adminiſtration gained him the affection of the worthieſt and moſt diſcerning of his ſubjects, but the extravagant and luxurious raiſed their clamors againſt him, and when Pertinax attempted to introduce among the pretorian guards that diſcipline which was ſo neceſſary to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of Rome, the flames of rebellion were kindled, and the minds of the ſoldiers totally alienated. Pertinax was apprized of this mutiny, but he refuſed to fly at the hour of danger. He ſcorned the advice of his friends who wiſhed him to withdraw from the impending ſtorm, and he unexpectedly appeared before the ſeditious pretorians, and without fear or concern, boldly aſked them whether they who were bound to defend the perſon of their prince and emperor, were come to betray him and to ſhed his blood. His undaunted aſſurance and his intrepidity would have had the deſired effect, and the ſoldiers had already begun to retire, when one of the moſt ſeditious advanced and darted his javelin at the emperor's breaſt, exclaiming, the ſoldiers ſend you this. The reſt immediately followed the example, and Pertinax muffling up his head, and calling upon Jupiter to avenge his death, remained unmoved, and was inſtantly diſpatched. His head was cut off and carried upon the point of a ſpear as in triumph to the camp. This happened on the 28th of March, A.D. 193. Pertinax reigned only 87 days, and his death was the more univerſally lamented as it proceeded from a ſeditious tumult, and robbed the Roman empire of a wiſe, virtuous, and benevolent emperor. Dio.—Herodian.——Capitol.

PERŬSIA, now Perugia, an antient town of Etruria on the Tyber, built by Ocnus. L. Antonius was beſieged there by Auguſtus and obliged to ſurrender. Strab. 5. —Lucan 1, v. 41.—Paterc. 2, c. 74.—Liv. 9, c. 37. l. 10, c. 30 & 37.

PETRÆA, one of the Oceanides. Heſiod. Th.——A part of Arabia, which has Syria at the eaſt, Egypt on the weſt, Paleſtine on the north, and Arabia Felix at the ſouth. This part of Arabia was rocky, whence it has received its name. It was for the moſt part alſo covered with barren ſands, and was interſperſed with ſome fruitful ſpots. Its capital was called Petra.

PETREIUS, a Roman ſoldier who killed his tribune during the Cimbrian wars, becauſe he heſitated to attack the enemy. He was rewarded for his valor with a crown of graſs. Plin. 22, c. 6.——A lieutenant of C. Antonius who defeated the troops of Catiline. He took the part of Pompey againſt Julius Cæſar. When Cæſar had been victorious in every part of the world, Petreius, who had retired into Africa, atrempted to deſtroy himſelf by fighting with his friend king Juba in ſingle combat. Juba was killed firſt, and Petreius obliged one of his ſlaves to run him through. Salluſt. Catil. —Appian.—Cæſ. 1, Civ.——A centurion in Cæſar's army in Gaul, &c. Some read Petronius.

PETRĪNUM, a town of Campania. Horat. 1, ep. 5, v. 5.

PETRŌNIA, the wife of Vitellius. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 64.

PETRŌNIUS, a governor of Egypt appointed to ſucceed Gallus. He behaved with great humanity to the Jews, and made war war againſt Candace queen of Æthiopia. Strab. 17.——A favorite of Nero, put to death by Galba.—A governor of Britain.—A tribune killed in Parthia with Craſſus.—A man baniſhed by Nero to the Cyclades, when Piſo's conſpiracy was diſcovered. Tacit. An. 15.——A governor of Britain in Nero's reign. He was put to death by Galba's orders.——Maximus, a Roman emperor. Vid. Maximus.——Arbiter, a favorite of the emperor Nero, and one of the miniſters and aſſociates of all his pleaſures and his debauchery. He was naturally fond of pleaſure and effeminate, and he paſſed his whole nights in revels and the days in ſleep. He indulged himſelf in all the delights and gaieties of life, but though he was the moſt voluptuous of the age, yet he moderated his pleaſures, and wiſhed to appear curious and refined in luxury and extravagance. Whatever he did ſeemed to be performed with an air of unconcern and negligence, he was affable in his behaviour, and his witticiſms and ſatirical remarks appeared artleſs and natural. He was appointed proconſul of Bithynia, and afterwards he was rewarded with the conſulſhip, in both of which honorable employments he behaved with all the dignity which became one of the ſucceſſors of a Brutus or a Scipio. With his office he laid down his artificial gravity, and gave himſelf up to the purſuit of pleaſure, the emperor became more attached to him, and ſeemed fonder of his company, but he did not long enjoy the imperial favors. Tigellinus, likewiſe one of Nero's favorites, jealous of his fame, accuſed him of conſpiring againſt the emperor's life. The accuſation was credited, and Petronius immediately reſolved to withdraw himſelf from Nero's puniſhments by a voluntary death. This was performed in a manner altogether unprecedented, A. D. 66. Petronius ordered his veins to be opened, but without the eagerneſs of terminating his agonies he had them cloſed at invervals. Some time after they were opened, and as if he wiſhed to die in the ſame careleſs and unconcerned manner as he had lived, he paſſed his time in diſcourſing with his friends upon trifles, and liſtened with the greateſt avidity to love verſes, amuſing ſtories, or laughable epigrams. Sometimes he manumitted his ſlaves or puniſhed them with ſtripes. In this ludicrous manner he ſpent his laſt moments till nature was exhauſted, and before he expired he wrote an epiſtle to the emperor, in which he had deſcribed with a maſterly hand his nocturnal extravagances, and the daily impurities of his actions. This letter was carefully ſealed, and after he had conveyed it privately to the emperor, Petronius broke his ſignet, that it might not after his death become a ſnare to the innocent. Petronius diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings as well as by his luxury and voluptuouſneſs. He is the author of many elegant but obſcene compoſitions ſtill extant, among which is a poem on the civil wars of Pompey and Cæſar, ſuperior in ſome reſpects to the Pharſalia of Lucan. There is alſo the feaſt of Trimalcion, in which he paints with too much licentiouſneſs, the pleaſures and the debaucheries of a corrupted court and of an extravagant monarch—reflections on the inſtability of human life——a poem on the vanity of dreams—another on the education of the Roman youth—two treatiſes, &c. The beſt editions of Petronius are thoſe of Burman, 4to. Utr. 1709, and Reineſius, 8vo. 1731.

Pettius, a friend of Horace, to whom the poet addreſſed his eleventh epode.

Peuce, a ſmall iſland at the mouth of the Danube. The inhabitants are called Peucæ, and Peucini. Strab. 7.—Lucan. 3, v. 202.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

Peucestes, a Macedonian ſet over Egypt by Alexander. He received Perſia at the general diviſion of the Macedonian empire at the king's death. He behaved with great cowardice after he had joined himſelf to Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum.—Plut.—Curt. 4, c. 8.——An iſland which was viſited by the Argonauts at their return from the conqueſt of the golden fleece.

Peucĕtia, a part of Italy near Campania, called alſo Meſapia and Calabria. It received its name from Peucetus the ſon of Lycaon of Arcadia. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 513.

Peucīni, a nation of Germany, called alſo Baſternæ. Tacit. de Germ. 46.

Phacusa, a town of Egypt, on the eaſtern mouth of the Nile.

Phæa, a celebrated ſow which infeſted the neighbourhood of Cromyon. It was deſtroyed by Theſeus as he was travelling from Trœzene to Athens to make himſelf known to his father. Some ſuppoſed that the boar of Calydon ſprang from this ſow. Phæa, according to ſome authors, was no other than a woman who proſtituted herſelf to ſtrangers, whom ſhe murdered, and afterwards plundered. Plut. in Theſ.—Strab. 8.

PHÆĀCIA, an iſland of the Ionian ſea, near the coaſt of Epirus, anciently called Scheria, and afterwards Corcyra. The inhabitants, called Phæaces, were a luxurious and diſſolute people, from which reaſon a glutton was generally ſtigmatized by the epithet of Phæax. When Ulyſſes was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Phæacia, Alcinous was then king of the iſland, whoſe gardens have been greatly celebrated. Horat. 1, ep. 15, v. 24.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 719.—Strab. 6 & 7.—Propert. 3, el. 2, v. 13.

PHÆAX, an inhabitant of the iſland of Phæacia. Vid. Phæacia.——A man who ſailed with Theſeus to Crete.——An Athenian who oppoſed Alcibiades in his adminiſtration.

PHÆCASIA, one of the Sporades in the Ægean. Plin. 4, c. 12.

PHÆDĪMUS, one of Niobe's children. Apollod. 3, c. 5.——A Macedonian general who betrayed Eumenes to Antigonus.——A celebated courier of Greece. Stat. 6.

PHÆDON, an Athenian put to death by the 30 tyrants. His daughters, to eſcape the oppreſſors and preſerve their chaſtity, threw themſelves together into a well.——A diſciple of Socrates. He had been ſeized by pirates in his younger days, and the philoſopher, who ſeemed to diſcover ſomething uncommon and promiſing in his countenance, bought his liberty for a ſum of money, and ever after eſteemed him. Phædon, after the death of Socrates, returned to Elis his native country, where he founded a ſect of philoſophers called Elean. The name of Phædon is affixed to one of the dialogues of Plato. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 11.—Diog.——An archon at Athens, when the Athenians were directed by the oracle to remove the bones of Theſeus to Attica. Plut. in Theſ.

PHÆDRA, a daughter of Minos and Paſiphae, who married Theſeus, by whom ſhe became mother of Acamas and Demophoon. They had already lived for ſome time in conjugal felicity, when Venus, who hated all the deſcendants of Apollo, becauſe that god had diſcovered her amours with Mars, inſpired Phædra with an unconquerable paſſion for Hippolytus the ſon of Theſeus, by the amazon Hippolyte. This ſhameful paſſion Phædra long attempted to ſtifle, but in vain; and therefore, in the abſence of Theſeus, ſhe addreſſed Hippolytus with all the impatience of a deſponding lover. Hippolytus rejected her with horror and diſdain; but Phædra, incenſed on account of the reception ſhe had met, reſolved to puniſh his coldneſs and refuſal. At the return of Theſeus ſhe accuſed Hippolytus of attempts upon her virtue. The credulous father liſtened to the accuſation, and without hearing the defence of Hippolytus, he baniſhed him from his kingdom, and implored Neptune, who had promiſed to grant three of his requeſts, to puniſh him in ſome exemplary manner. As Hippolytus fled from Athens, his horſes were ſuddenly terrified by a huge ſea-monſter, which Neptune had ſent on the ſhore. He was dragged through precipices and over rocks, and he was trampled under the feet of his horſes, and cruſhed under the wheels of his chariot. When the tragical end of Hippolytus was known at Athens, Phædra confeſſed her crime, and hung herſelf in deſpair, unable to ſurvive one whoſe death her wickedneſs and guilt had occaſioned. The death of Hippolytus, and the infamous paſſion of Phædra, are the ſubject of one of the tragedies of Euripides and of Seneca. Phædra was buried at Trœzene, where her tomb was ſtill ſeen in the age of the geographer Pauſanias, near the temple of Venus, which ſhe had built to render the goddeſs favorable to her inceſtuous paſſion. There was near her tomb a myrtle, whoſe leaves were all full of ſmall holes, and it was reported, that Phædra had done this with a hair pin, when the vehemence of her paſſion had rendered her melancholy and almoſt deſperate. She was repreſented in a painting in Apollo's temple at Delphi, as ſuſpended in the air, while her ſiſter Ariadne ſtood near to her, and fixed her eyes upon her. Plut. in Theſ.—Pauſ. 1, c. 22. l. 2, c. 32.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 47, & 243.—Eurip. Senec. & in Hippol.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 445.—Ovid. Heroid. 4.

PHÆDRIA, a village of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 35.

PHÆDRUS, one of the diſciples of Socrates. Cic. de Nat. D. 1.——An Epicurean philoſopher.——A Thracian, who became one of the freed men of the emperor Auguſtus. He tranſlated into iambic verſes, the fables of Æſop, in the reign of the emperor Tiberius. They are divided into five books, valuable for their preciſion, purity, elegance, and ſimplicity. They remained long buried in oblivion, till they were diſcovered in the library of St. Remi, at Rheims, and publiſhed by Peter Pithou, a Frenchman, at the end of the 16th century. Phædrus was for ſome time perſecuted by Sejanus, becauſe this corrupt miniſter believed that he was ſatiriſed and abuſed in the encomiums which the poet every where pays to virtue. The beſt editions of Phædrus, are thoſe of Burman, 4to. Leyd. 1727. Hoogſtraten, 4to. Amſt. 1701, and Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754.

PHÆSANA, a town of Arcadia.

PHÆSTUM, a town of Crete.——Another of Macedonia. Liv. 36, c. 13.

PHAĔTON, a ſon of the Sun, or Phœbus, and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was ſon of Cephalus and Aurora, according to Heſiod and Pauſanias, or of Tithonus and Aurora, according to Apollodorus. He is, however, more generally acknowledged to be the ſon of Phœbus and Clymene. Phaeton was naturally of a lively diſpoſition, and a handſome figure. Venus became enamoured of him, and entruſted him with the care of one of her temples. This diſtinguiſhing favor of the goddeſs, rendered him vain and aſpiring, and when Epaphus, the ſon of Io, had told him, to check his pride, that he was not the ſon of Phœbus, Phaeton reſolved to know his true origin, and at the inſtigation of his mother he viſited the palace of the ſun. He begged Phœbus, that if he really were his father, he would give him inconteſtible proofs of his paternal tenderneſs, and convince the world of his legitimacy. Phœbus ſwore by the Styx, that he would grant him whatever he required, and no ſooner was the oath uttered, than Phaeton demanded of him to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus repreſented the impropriety of ſuch a requeſt, and the dangers to which it would expoſe him; but in vain, and as the oath was inviolable, and Phaeton unmoved, the father inſtructed his ſon how he was to proceed in his way through the regions of the air. His explicit directions were forgotten, or little attended to; and no ſooner had Phaeton received the reins from his father, than he betrayed his ignorance and incapacity to guide the chariot. The flying horſes became ſenſible of the confuſion of their driver, and immediately departed from the uſual track. Phaeton repented too late of his raſhneſs, and already heaven and earth were threatened with an univerſal conflagration, when Jupiter, who had perceived the diſorder of the horſes of the ſun, ſtruck the rider with one of his thunderbolts, and hurled him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body, conſumed with fire, was found by the nymphs of the place, and honored with a decent burial. His ſiſters mourned his unhappy end, and were changed into poplars by Jupiter. [Vid. Phaetontiades.] According to the poets, while Phaeton was unſkillfully driving the chariot of his father, the blood of the Æthiopians was dried up and their ſkin became black, a color which is ſtill preſerved among the greateſt part of the inhabitants of the torrid zone. The territories of Libya were alſo parched up, according to the ſame tradition, on account of their too great vicinity to the ſun; and ever ſince Africa, unable to recover her original verdure and fruitfulneſs, has exhibited a ſandy country, and uncultivated waſte. According to thoſe who explain this poetical fable, Phaeton was a Ligurian prince, who ſtudied aſtronomy, and in whoſe age the neighbourhood of the Po was viſited with uncommon heats. The horſes of the Sun are called Phaetontis equi, either becauſe they were guided by Phaeton, or from the Greek word (φοιβω), which expreſſes the ſplendor and luſtre of that luminary. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 105.—Heſiod. Theog.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 17. l. 2, fab. 1, &c.—Apollon. 4, Arg.—Horat. 4, od. 11.—Senec. in Medea.—Apollod.—Hygin. fab. 156.

PHALANNA, a town of Perrhæbia. Liv. 42, c. 54.

PHALANTHUS, a Lacedæmonian, who founded Tarentum in Italy, at the head of the Partheniæ. His father's name was Aracus. As he went to Italy he was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt, and carried to ſhore by by a dolphin, and from that reaſon, there was a dolphin placed near his ſtatue in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. [Vid. Partheniæ.] He received divine honors after death. Juſtin. 3, c. 4.—Pauſ. 10, c. 10.—Horat. 2, od. 6.——A town and mountain of the ſame name in Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 35.

PHĂLĂRIS, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who made uſe of the moſt excruciating torments to puniſh his ſubjects on the ſmalleſt ſuſpicion. Perillus made him a brazen bull, and when he had preſented it to Phalaris, the tyrant ordered the inventor to be ſeized, and the firſt experiment to be made on his body. Theſe cruelties did not long remain unrevenged, the people of Agrigentum revolted in the tenth year of his reign, and put him to death in the ſame manner as he had tortured Perillus, and many of his ſubjects, after him, B. C. 552. The brazen bull of Phalaris was carried by Amilcar to Carthage; when that city was taken by Scipio, it was delivered again to the inhabitants of Agrigentum by the Romans. There are now ſome letters extant written by a certain Abaris to Phalaris with their reſpective anſwers, but they are ſuppoſed by ſome to be ſpurious. The beſt edition is that of the learned Boyle, Oxon, 1718. Cic. in Verr. 4, ad Attic. 7, ep. 12, de offic. 2.—Ovid. de art. am. 1, v. 663.—Juv. 8, v. 81.—Plin. 34, c. 8.—Diod.——A Trojan killed by Turnus. *Virg. PHALĒRON, or PHALERUM, or Phalera, (orum), or Phalereus portus, an ancient harbour of Athens, about 25 ſtadia from the city, which for its ſituation and ſmallneſs was not very fit for the reception of many ſhips.——A place of Theſſaly.

PHALLĪCA, feſtivals obſerved by the Egyptians in honor of Oſiris. They receive their name from φαλλος; ſimulachrum lignæum membri virilis. The inſtitution originated in this: after the murder of Oſiris, Iſis was unable to recover among the other limbs the privities of her huſband, and therefore, as ſhe paid particular honor to every part of his body, ſhe diſtinguiſhed that which was loſt with more honor, and paid it more attention. Its repreſentation, called phallus was made with wood, and carried during the ſacred feſtivals which were inſtituted in honor of Oſiris. The people held it in the greateſt veneration, it was looked upon as an emblem of fecundity, and the mention of it among the antients, never conveyed any impure thought or laſcivious reflection. The feſtivals of the phallus were imitated by the Greeks, and introduced into Europe by the Athenians, who made the proceſſion of the phallus part of the celebration of the Dionyſia of the god of wine. Thoſe that carried the phallus at the end of a long pole, were called phallophori. They generally appeared among the Greeks beſmeared with the dregs of wine, covered with ſkins of lambs, and wearing on their heads a crown of ivy. *Lucian. de Deâ. PHANETA, a town of Epirus. Liv. 32, c. 28.

PHANŎCLES, an elegiac poet of Greece, who wrote a poem upon that unnatural ſin of which Socrates is accuſed by ſome. He ſupported that Orpheus had been the firſt who diſgraced himſelf by that filthy indulgence. Some of his fragments are remaining.

PHANODĒMUS, an hiſtorian who wrote on the antiquities of Attica.

PHANTASIA, a daughter of Nicarchus of Memphis in Egypt. Some have ſuppoſed that ſhe wrote a poem on the Trojan war, and another on the return of Ulyſſes to Ithaca, from which compoſitions Homer copied the greateſt part of his Iliad and Odyſſey, when he viſited Memphis, where they were depoſited.

PHANUS, a ſon of Bacchus, who was among the Argonauts. Apollod.

PHAON, a boatman of Mitylene in Leſbos. He received a ſmall box of ointment from Venus, who had preſented herſelf to him in the form of an old woman, to be carried over into Aſia, and as ſoon as he had rubbed himſelf with what the box contained, he became one of the moſt beautiful men of his age. Many were captivated with the charms of Phaon, and among others, Sappho, the celebrated poeteſs. Phaon gave himſelf up to the pleaſures of Sappho's company, but however, he ſoon conceived a diſdain for her, and Sappho, mortified at his coldneſs, threw herſelf into the ſea. Some ſay that Phaon was beloved by the goddeſs of beauty, who concealed him for ſome time among lettuces. Ælian ſays, that Phaon was killed by a man whoſe bed he was defiling. *Ælian. V. PHARNABAZUS, a ſatrap of Perſia, ſon of a perſon of the ſame name, B. C. 409. He aſſiſted the Lacedæmonians againſt the Athenians, and gained their eſteem by his friendly behaviour and ſupport. His conduct, however, towards Alcibiades was of the moſt perfidious nature, and he did not ſcruple to betray to his mortal enemies the man he had long honored with his friendſhip. C. Nep. in Alc.—Plut.——An officer under Eumenes. ——A king of Iberia.

PHARNACE, a town of Pontus. Plin. 6, c. 4.

PHARNACES, a ſon of Mithridates, king of Pontus, who favored the Romans againſt his father. He revolted againſt Mithridates, and even cauſed him to be put to death, according to ſome accounts. In the civil wars of Julius Cæſar and Pompey, he intereſted himſelf for neither of the contending parties, upon which Cæſar turned his arms againſt him, and conquered him. It was to expreſs the celerity of his operations in conquering Pharnaces, that the victorious Roman made uſe of theſe words, Veni, vidi, vici. Flor. 3.—Suet. in Cæſ. 37.—Paterc. 2, c. 55.——A king of Pontus, who made war with Eumenes, B. C. 181.——A king of Cappadocia.——A librarian of Atticus. Cic. ad Att.

PHARNAPATES, a general of Orodes, king of Parthia, killed in a battle by the Romans.

PHARNASPES, the father of Caſſandra the mother of Cambyſes.

PHARNUS, a king of Media, conquered by Ninus king of Aſſyria.

PHAROS, a ſmall iſland in the bay of Alexandria, about ſeven furlongs diſtant from the continent. It was joined to the Egyptian ſhore with a cauſeway by Dexiphanes, B. C. 284, and upon it was built a celebrated tower, in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, and Philadelphus, by Soſtratus, the ſon of Dexiphanes. This tower, which was called the tower of Pharos, and which paſſed for one of the ſeven wonders of the world, was built with white marble, and could be ſeen at the diſtance of 100 miles. On the top, fires were conſtantly kept to direct ſailors in the bay, which was dangerous and difficult of acceſs. The building of this tower coſt the Egyptian monarch 800 talents, which are equivalent to above 165,000l. Engliſh, if Attic, or if Alexandrian, double that ſum. There was this inſcription upon it, King Ptolemy to the gods the ſaviors, for the benefit of ſailors; but Soſtratus the architect, wiſhing to claim all the glory, engraved his own name upon the ſtones, and afterwards filled the hollow with mortar, and wrote the above mentioned inſcription. When the mortar had decayed by time, Ptolemy's name diſappeared, and the following inſcription then became viſible: Soſtratus the Cnidian, ſon of Dexiphanes, to the gods the ſaviors, for the benefit of ſailors. The word Pharius is often uſed as Egyptian. Lucan. 2, v. 636. l. 3, v. 260. l. 6, v. 308. l. 9, v. 1005, &c.—*Ovid. now called Leſina. Mela. 2, c. 7.——The emperor Claudius ordered a tower to be built at the entrance of the port of Oſtia, for the benefit of ſailors, and it likewiſe bore the name of Pharos, an appellation afterwards given to every other edifice which was raiſed to direct the courſe of ſailors, either with lights, or by ſignals. Juv. 11, v. 76.—Suet.

PHARSĂLUS, now Farſa, a town of Theſſaly, in whoſe neighbourhood is a large plain called Pharſalia, famous for a battle which was fought there between Julius Cæſar and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. In that battle, which was fought on the 12th of May, B. C. 48, Cæſar loſt about 200 men, or according to others 1200. Pompey's loſs was 15,000, or 25,000, according to others, and 24,000 of his army were made priſoners of war by the conqueror. Lucan. 1, &c.—Plut. in Pomp. & Cæſ.—Appian. Civ.—*Cæſar. PHASIS, a ſon of Phœbus and Ocyroe.——A river of Colchis riſing in the mountains of Armenia, now called Faoæ. It is famous for the expedition of the Argonauts, who entered it, after a long and perilous voyage, from which reaſon all dangerous voyages have been proverbially intimated by the words of ſailing to the Phaſis. There were on the banks of the Phaſis a great number of large birds, of which, according to ſome of the antients, the Argonauts brought ſome to Greece, and which were called on that account pheaſants. The Phaſis was reckoned by the antients one of the largeſt rivers of Aſia. Plin. 10, c. 48.—Martial. 13, ep. 62.—Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c 19.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Pauſ. 4, c. 44.—Orpheus.

PHERĒCRĂTES, a comic poet of Athens, in the age of Plato and Ariſtophanes. He is ſuppoſed to have written 21 comedies, of which only few verſes remain. He introduced living characters on the ſtage, but never abuſed the liberty which he had taken either by ſatire or defamation. He invented a ſort of verſe, which from him has been called Pherecratian. It conſiſted of the three laſt feet of an hexameter verſe, of which the firſt was always a ſpondee, as for inſtance, the third verſe of Horace's 1, od. 5. Grato Pyrrha ſub antro.——Another deſcended from Deucalion. Cic. Tuſ.

PHERECȳDES, a philoſopher of Syros, diſciple to Pittacus, one of the firſt who delivered his thoughts in proſe. He was acquainted with the periods of the moon, and foretold eclipſes with the greateſt accuracy. The doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, was firſt ſupported by him, as alſo that of the metempſychoſis. Pythagoras was one of his diſciples, remarkable for his eſteem and his attachment to his learned maſter. When Pherecydes lay dangerouſly ill in the iſland of Delos, Pythagoras haſtened to give him every aſſiſtance in his power, and when all his efforts had proved ineffectual, he buried him, and after he had paid him the laſt offices, he retired to Italy. Some, however, ſuppoſe, that Pherecydes threw himſelf down from a precipice as he was going to Delphi, or according to others, he fell a ſacrifice to the louſy diſeaſe, B. C. 515, in the 85th year of his age. Diog.—Lactant.——An hiſtorian of Leros ſirnamed the Athenian. He wrote an hiſtory of Attica, now loſt, in the age of Darius Hyſtaſpes.——A tragic poet.

PHERETIAS, a patronymic of Admetus, ſon of Pheres. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 291.

PHERETĪMA, the wife of Battus, king of Cyrene, and mother of Arceſilaus. After her ſon's death, ſhe recovered the kingdom by means of Amaſis king of Egypt, and to avenge the murder of Arceſilaus, ſhe cauſed all his aſſaſſins to be crucified round the walls of Cyrene, and ſhe cut off the breaſts of their wives, and hung them up near the bodies of their huſbands. It is ſaid that ſhe was devoured alive by worms, a puniſhment which, according to ſome of the antients, was inflicted by Providence for her unparalleled cruelties. Polyæn. 8.—Herodot. 4, c. 204, &c.

PHERINUM, a town of Theſſaly.

PHERON, a king of Egypt, who ſucceeded Seſoſtris. He was blind, and he recovered his ſight by waſhing his eyes, according to the directions of the oracle, in the urine of a woman who had never had any unlawful connections. He tried his wife firſt, but ſhe appeared to have been faithleſs to his bed, and ſhe was burnt with all thoſe whoſe urine could not reſtore ſight to the king. He married the woman whoſe urine proved beneficial. Herodot. 2, c. 111.

PHIĂLE, one of Diana's nymphs. Ovid. Met. 3.——A celebrated courtezan. Juv. 10, v. 238.

PHICORES, a people near the Palus Mæotis. Mela. 1, c. 19.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated ſtatuary of Athens, who died B. C. 432. He made a ſtatue of Minerva at the requeſt of Pericles, which was placed in the Pantheon. It was made with ivory and gold, and meaſured 39 feet in height. His preſumption raiſed him many enemies, and he was accuſed of having carved his own image and that of Pericles on the ſhield of the ſtatue of the goddeſs, for which he was baniſhed from Athens by the clamorous populace. He retired to Elis, where he determined to revenge the ill-treatment he had received from his countrymen, by making a ſtatue which ſhould eclipſe the fame of that of Minerva. He was ſucceſsful in the attempt, and the ſtatue he made of Jupiter Olympius was always reckoned the beſt of all his pieces, and has paſſed for one of the wonders of the world. The people of Elis were ſo ſenſible of his merit, and of the honor he had done to their city, that they appointed his deſcendants to the honorable office of keeping clean that magnificent ſtatue, and of preſerving it from injury.

PHILÆNI, two brothers of Carthage. When a conteſt aroſe between the Cyreneans and Carthaginians, about the extent of their territories, it was mutually agreed, that, at a ſtated hour, two men ſhould depart from each city, and that whenever they met, there they ſhould fix the boundaries of their country. The Philæni accordingly departed from Carthage, and met the Cyreneans, when they had advanced far into their terri ories. This produced a quarrel, and the Cyreneans ſupported, that the Philæni had left Carthage before the appointment, and that therefore they muſt retire, or be buried in the ſand. The Philæni refuſed, upon which they were overpowered by the Cyreneans, and accordingly buried in the ſand. The Carthaginians, to commemorate the patriotic deeds of the Philæni, who had ſacrificed their lives that the extent of their country might not be diminiſhed, raiſed two altars on the place where their bodies had been buried, which they called Philænorum aræ. Theſe altars were the boundaries of the Carthaginian dominions, which on the other ſide extended as far as the columns of Hercules, which is about 2000 miles, or according to the accurate obſervations of the moderns, only 1420 geographical miles. Salluſt. de bell. Jug. 19 & 79.—Sil. It. 15, v. 704.

PHILIPPŎPŎLIS, a town of Thrace, near the Hebrus, built by Philip, the father of Alexander. Liv. 39, c. 53.——Of Theſſaly, called Philippi.

PHILIPPUS 1ſt, ſon of Argeus, ſucceeded his father on the throne of Macedonia, and reigned 38 years B. C. 40.—The ſecond of that name was the fourth ſon of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. He was ſent to Thebes as an hoſtage by his father, where he learnt the art of war under Epaminondas, and ſtudied with the greateſt care the manners and the purſuits of the Greeks. He was re-called to Macedonia, and at the death of his brother Perdiccas, he aſcended the throne as guardian and protector of the youthful years of his nephew. His ambition, however, ſoon diſcovered itſelf, and he made himſelf independent. The valor of a prudent general, and the policy of an experienced ſtateſman ſeemed requiſite to enſure his power. The neighbouring nations, ridiculing the youth and inexperience of the new king of Macedonia, appeared in arms, but Philip ſoon convinced them of their error. Unable to meet them as yet in the field of battle, he ſuſpended their fury by preſents, and ſoon turned his arms againſt Amphipolis, a colony tributary to the Athenians. Amphipolis was conquered, and added to the kingdom of Macedonia, and Philip meditated no leſs than the deſtruction of a republic which had rendered itſelf ſo formidable to the reſt of Greece, and had even claimed ſubmiſſion from the princes of Macedonia. His deſigns, however, were as yet immature, and before he could make Athens an object of conqueſt, the Thracians and the Illyrians demanded his attention. He made himſelf maſter of a Thracian colony, to which he gave the name of Philippi, and from which he received the greateſt advantages on account of the golden mines in the neighbourhood. In the midſt of his political proſperity, Philip did not neglect the honor of his family. He married Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus, king of the Moloſſi, and when ſome time after he became father of Alexander, the monarch, conſcious of the ineſtimable advantages which ariſe from the leſſons, the example, and the converſation of a learned and virtuous preceptor, wrote a letter with his own hand to the philoſopher Ariſtotle, and begged him to retire from his uſual purſuits, and to dedicate his whole time to the inſtruction of the young prince. Every thing ſeemed now to conſpire to his aggrandizement, and hiſtorians have obſerved that Philip received in one day the intelligence of three things which could gratify the moſt unbounded ambition, and flatter the hopes of the moſt aſpiring monarch: the birth of a ſon, an honorable crown at the Olympic games, and a victory over the barbarians of Illyricum. But all theſe encreaſed rather than ſatiated his ambition, he declared his inimical ſentiments againſt the power of Athens and the independence of all Greece, by laying ſiege to Olynthus, a place, which, on account of its ſituation and conſequence, would prove moſt injurious to the intereſts of the Athenians, and moſt advantageous to the intrigues and military operations of every Macedonian prince. The Athenians, rouſed by the eloquence of Demoſthenes, ſent 17 veſſels and 2,000 men to the aſſiſtance of Olynthus, but the money of Philip prevailed over all their efforts. The greateſt part of the citizens ſuffered themſelves to be bribed by the Macedonian gold, and Olynthus ſurrendered to the enemy, and was inſtantly reduced to ruins. His ſucceſſes were as great in every part of Greece, he was declared head of the Amphictyonic council, and was entruſted with the care of the ſacred temple of Apollo at Delphi. If he was recalled to Macedonia, it was only to add freſh laurels to his crown, by victories over his enemies in Illyricum and Theſſaly. By aſſuming the maſk of a moderator and peace-maker he gained confidence, and in attempting to protect the Peloponneſians againſt the encroaching power of Sparta, he rendered his cauſe popular, and by ridiculing the inſults that were offered to his perſon as he paſſed through Corinth, he diſplayed to the world his moderation, and philoſophic virtues. In his attempts to make himſelf maſter of Eubœa, Philip was unſucceſsful; and Phocion, who deſpiſed his gold as well as his meanneſs, obliged him to evacuate an iſland whoſe inhabitants were as inſenſible to the charms of money, as they were unmoved at the horrors of war, and the bold efforts of a vigilant enemy. From Eubœa he turned his arms againſt the Scythians, but the advantages he obtained over this indigent nation were inconſiderable, and he again made Greece an object of plunder and rapine. He advanced far into Bœotia, and a general engagement was fought at Chæronea. The fight was long and bloody, but Philip obtained the victory. His behaviour after the battle reflects great diſgrace upon him as a man, and as a monarch. In the hour of feſtivity, and during the entertainment which he had given to celebrate the trophies he had won, Philip ſallied from his camp, and with the inhumanity of a brute, he inſulted the bodies of the ſlain, and exulted over the calamities of the priſoners of war. His inſolence, however, was checked when Demades, one of the Athenian captives, reminded him of his meanneſs, by exclaiming, Why do you, O king, act the part of a Therſites, when you can repreſent with ſo much dignity the elevated character of an Agamemnon. The reproof was felt, Demades received his liberty, and Philip learned how to gain popularity even among his fallen enemies, by relieving their wants and eaſing their diſtreſſes. At the battle of Chæronea the independence of Greece was extinguiſhed; and Philip, unable to find new enemies in Europe, formed new enterprizes, and meditated new conqueſts. He was nominated general of the Greeks againſt the Perſians, and was called upon as well as from inclination as duty to revenge thoſe injuries which Greece had ſuffered from the invaſions of Darius, and of Xerxes. But he was ſtopped in the midſt of his warlike preparations, he was ſtabbed by Pauſanias as he entered the theatre at the celebration of the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra. This murder has given riſe to many reflections upon the cauſes which produced it, and many who conſider the recent repudiation of Olympias, and the reſentment of Alexander, are apt to inveſtigate the cauſes of his death in the boſom of his family. The ridiculous honors which Olympias paid to her huſband's murderer ſtrengthened the ſuſpicion, yet Alexander declared that he invaded the kingdom of Perſia to revenge his father's death upon the Perſian ſatraps and princes, by whoſe immediate intrigues the aſſaſſination had been committed. The character of Philip is that of a ſagacious, artful, prudent, and intriguing monarch, he was brave in the field of battle, eloquent and diſſimulating at home, and he poſſeſſed the wonderful art of changing his conduct according to the diſpoſition and caprice of mankind, without ever altering his purpoſe, or loſing ſight of his ambitious aims. He poſſeſſed much perſeverance, and in the execution of his plans he was always vigorous. The hand of an aſſaſſin prevented him from atchieving the boldeſt and the moſt extenſive of his undertakings, and he might have acquired as many laurels, and conquered as many nations as his ſon Alexander did in the ſucceeding reign, and the kingdom of Perſia might have been added to the Macedonian empire, perhaps with greater moderation, with more glory, and with more laſting advantages. The private character of Philip lies open to cenſure, and raiſes indignation. The admirer of his virtues is diſguſted to find him among the moſt abandoned proſtitutes, and diſgracing himſelf by the moſt unnatural crimes and laſcivious indulgences which can make even the moſt debauched; and the moſt profligate to bluſh. He was murdered in the 47th year of his age, and the 24th of his reign, about 336 years before the Chriſtian era. His reign is become uncommonly intereſting, and his adminiſtration a matter of inſtruction. He is the firſt monarch whoſe life and actions are deſcribed with peculiar accuracy and hiſtorical faithfulneſs. Philip was the father of Alexander the Great and of Cleopatra, by Olympias; he had alſo by Audaca, an Illyrian, Cyna, who married Amyntas the ſon of Perdiccas, Philip's elder brother; by Nicaſipolis, a Theſſalian, Nicæa, who married Caſſander; by Philinna, a Lariſſæan dancer, Aridæus, who reigned ſome time after Alexander's death; by Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, Caranus and Europa, who were both murdered by Olympias; and Ptolemy, the firſt king of Egypt, by Arſinoe, who in the firſt month of her pregnancy was married to Lagus. Demoſth. in Phil. & Olynth.—Juſtin. 7, &c.—Diod. 16. —Plut. in Alex. Dem. & Apoph.—Iſocrat. ad Phil.—Curt. 1, &c.—Æſchines.—Pauſ. Bœotic. &c.——The laſt king of Macedonia, of that name, was ſon of Demetrius. His infancy, at the death of his father, was protected by Antigonus, one of his friends, who aſcended the throne, and reigned for 12 years, with the title of independent monarch. When Antigonus died, Philip recovered his father's throne, though only 15 years of age, and he early diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his boldneſs and his ambitious views. His cruelty, however, to Aratus, ſoon diſplayed his character in its true light, and to the gratification of every vice, and every extravagant propenſity, he had the meanneſs to ſacrifice this faithful and virtuous Athenian. Not ſatisfied with the kingdom of Macedonia, Philip aſpired to become the friend of Annibal, and wiſhed to ſhare with him the ſpoils which the diſtreſſes and continual loſs of the Romans ſeemed ſoon to promiſe. But his expectations were fruſtrated, the Romans diſcovered his intrigues, and though weakened by the valor and artifice of the Carthaginian, yet they were ſoon enabled to meet him in the field of battle. The conſul Lævinus entered without delay his territories of Macedonia, and after he had obtained a victory over him near Apollonia, and reduced his fleet to aſhes, he compelled him to ſue for peace. This peaceful diſpoſition was not permanent, and when the Romans diſcovered that he had aſſiſted their immortal enemy Annibal, with men and money, they appointed T. Q. Flaminius to puniſh his perfidy, and the violation of the treaty. The Roman conſul with his uſual expedition, invaded Macedonia, and in a general engagement, which was fought near Cynocephalæ, the hoſtile army was totally defeated, and the monarch ſaved his life with difficulty by flying from the field of battle. Deſtitute of reſources, without friends either at home or abroad, Philip was obliged to ſubmit to the mercy of the conqueror, and to demand peace by his ambaſſadors. It was granted with difficulty, the terms were humiliating, but the poverty of Philip obliged him to accept the conditions, however diſadvantageous and degrading to his dignity. In the midſt of theſe public calamities, the peace of his family was diſturbed; and Perſes, the eldeſt of his ſons by a concubine, raiſed ſeditions againſt his brother Demetrius, whoſe condeſcenſion and humanity had gained popularity among the Macedonians, and who, from his reſidence at Rome, as an hoſtage, had gained the good graces of the ſenate, and by the modeſty and innocence of his manners, had obtained forgiveneſs from that venerable body for the hoſtilities of his father. Philip liſtened with too much avidity to the falſe accuſation of Perſes; and when he heard it aſſerted that Demetrius wiſhed to rob him of his crown, he no longer heſitated to puniſh with death ſo unworthy and ſo ungrateful a ſon. No ſooner was Demetrius ſacrificed to credulity than Philip became convinced of his cruelty and raſhneſs, and to puniſh the perfidy of Perſes, he attempted to make Antigonus, another ſon, his ſucceſſor on the Macedonian throne. But he was prevented from executing his purpoſe by death, in the 42d year of his reign, 179 years before the Chriſtian æra. The aſſaſſin of Demetrius ſucceeded his father, and with the ſame ambition, with the ſame raſhneſs and oppreſſion renewed the war againſt the Romans till his empire was deſtroyed and Macedonia became a Roman province. Philip has been compared with his great anceſtor of the ſame name, but though they poſſeſſed the ſame virtues, the ſame ambition, and were tainted with the ſame vices, yet the father of Alexander was more ſagacious and more intriguing, and the ſon of Demetrius was more ſuſpicious, more cruel, and more implacable, and according to the pretended prophecy of one of the Sibyls, Macedonia was indebted to one Philip for her riſe and conſequence among nations, and under another Philip ſhe lamented the loſs of her power, her empire, and her dignity. Polyb. 16, &c.—Juſtin. 29, &c.—Plut. in Flam.—Pauſ. 7, c. 8.—Liv. 31, &c.——M. Julius, a Roman emperor, of an obſcure family in Arabia, from whence he was ſirnamed Arabian. From the loweſt rank in the army he gradually roſe to the higheſt offices, and when he was made general of the pretorian guards he aſſaſſinated Gordian to make himſelf emperor. To eſtabliſh himſelf with more certainty on the imperial throne, he left Meſopotamia a prey to the continual invaſions of the Perſians, and hurried to Rome, where his election was univerſally approved by the ſenate and the Roman people. Philip rendered his cauſe popular by his liberality and profuſion, and it added much to his ſplendor and dignity that the Romans during his reign commemorated the foundation of their city, a ſolemnity which was obſerved but once every hundred years, and which was celebrated with more pomp and more magnificence than under the preceding reigns. The people were entertained with games and ſpectacles, the theatre of Pompey was ſucceſſively crowded during three days and three nights, and 2000 gladiators bled in the circus at once, for the amuſement and pleaſure of a gazing populace. His uſurpation, however, was ſhort, Philip was defeated by Decius, who had proclaimed himſelf emperor in Pannonia, and he was aſſaſſinated by his own ſoldiers near Verona, in the 45th year of his age, and the 5th of his reign, A. D. 249. His ſon who bore the ſame name, and who had ſhared with him the imperial dignity, was alſo maſſacred in the arms of his mother. Young Philip was then in the 12th year of his age, and the Romans lamented in him the loſs of riſing talents, of natural humanity, and endearing virtues. Aurel. Victor.—Zozim.——A native of Acarnania, phyſician to Alexander the Great. When the monarch had been ſuddenly taken ill, after bathing in the Cydnus, Philip undertook to remove the complaint, when the reſt of the phyſicians believed that all medical aſſiſtance would be ineffectual. But as he was preparing his medicine, Alexander received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was adviſed to beware of his phyſician Philip, as he had conſpired againſt his life. The monarch was alarmed, and when Philip preſented him the medicine, he gave him Parmenio's letter to peruſe, and began to drink the potion. The ſerenity and compoſure of Philip's countenance, as he read the letter, removed every ſuſpicion from Alexander's breaſt, and he purſued the directions of his phyſician, and in a few days recovered. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3.—Arrian. 2.——A ſon of Alexander the Great, murdered by order of Olympias.——A governor of Sparta.——A ſon of Caſſander.——A man who pretended to be the ſon of Perſes, that he might lay claim to the kingdom of Macedonia. PHILO, a Jewiſh writer of Alexandria, A. D. 40, ſent as ambaſſador from his nation to Caligula. He was unſucceſsful in his embaſſy, of which he wrote an entertaining account; and the emperor, who wiſhed to be worſhipped as a god, expreſſed his diſſatisfaction with the Jews, becauſe they refuſed to place his ſtatues in their temples.

temples. He was ſo happy in his expreſſions and elegant in his variety, that he has been called the Jewiſh Plato, and the book which he wrote on the ſufferings of the Jews in the reign of Caius, met with ſuch unbounded applauſe in the Roman ſenate, where he read it publicly, that he was permitted to conſecrate it in the public libraries. His works were divided into three parts, of which the firſt related to the creation of the world, the ſecond ſpoke of ſacred Hiſtory, and in the third, the author made mention of the laws and cuſtoms of the Jewiſh nation. PHILŎCLES, one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet, during the Peloponneſian war. He recommended to his countrymen to cut off the right hand of ſuch of the enemies as were taken, that they might be rendered unfit for ſervice. His plan was adopted by all the 10 admirals except one, but their expectations were fruſtrated, and, inſtead of being conquerors, they were totally defeated at Ægoſpotamos by Lyſander, and Philocles was put to death, with the reſt of his colleagues. Plut. in Lyſ.——A general of Ptolemy, king of Egypt.——A comic poet.——Another, who wrote tragedies at Athens.

PHILOCRĂTES, an Athenian, famous for his treachery, &c.——A writer who publiſhed an hiſtory of Theſſaly.——A ſervant of C. Gracchus.——A Greek orator.

PHILOCTĒTES, ſon of Pœan and Demonaſſa, was one of the Argonauts according to Flaccus and Hyginus, and the arm-bearer and particular friend of Hercules. He was preſent at the death of Hercules, and becauſe he had erected the burning pile on which the hero was conſumed, he received from him the arrows which had been dipped in the gall of the hydra, after he had bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath not to betray the place where his aſhes were depoſited. He had no ſooner paid the laſt offices to Hercules, than he returned to Melibœa, where his father reigned. From thence he viſited Sparta, where he became one of the numerous ſuitors of Helen, and ſoon after, like the reſt of thoſe princes who had courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and who had bound themſelves to protect her from injury, he was called upon by Menelaus to accompany the Greeks to the Trojan war, and he immediately ſet ſail from Melibœa with ſeven ſhips, and repaired to Aulis, the general rendezvous of the combined fleet. He was here prevented from joining his countrymen, and the offenſive ſmell which aroſe from a wound in his foot, obliged the Greeks, at the inſtigation of Ulyſſes, to remove him from the camp, and he was accordingly carried to the iſland of Lemnos, or as others ſay to Chryſe, where Phimachus, the ſon of Dolophion, was ordered to wait upon him. In this ſolitary retreat he was ſuffered to remain for ſome time, till the Greeks, on the tenth year of the Trojan war, were informed by the oracle that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules, which were then in the poſſeſſion of Philoctetes. Upon this Ulyſſes, accompanied by Diomedes, or according to others by Pyrrhus, was commiſſioned by the reſt of the Grecian army to go to Lemnos, and to prevail upon Philoctetes to come and finiſh the tedious ſiege. Philoctetes recollected the ill-treatment he had received from the Greeks, and particularly from Ulyſſes, and therefore he not only refuſed to go to Troy, but he even perſuaded Pyrrhus to conduct him to Melibœa. As he embarked the manes of Hercules forbad him to proceed, but immediately to repair to the Grecian camp, where he ſhould be cured of his wounds, and put an end to the war. Philoctetes obeyed; and after he had been reſtored to his former health by Æſculapius, or according to ſome by Machaon, or Podalirus, he deſtroyed an immenſe number of the Trojan enemy, among whom was Paris, the ſon of Priam, with the arrows of Hercules. When by his valor Troy had been ruined, he ſet ſail from Aſia, but as he was unwilling to viſit his native country, he came to Italy, where, by the aſſiſtance of his Theſſalian followers, he was enabled to build a town in Calabria, which he called Petilia. Authors diſagree about the cauſes of the wound which Philoctetes received on the foot. The moſt antient mythologiſts ſupport, that it was the bite of the ſerpent which Juno had ſent to torment him, becauſe he had attended Hercules in his laſt moments, and had buried his aſhes. According to another opinion, the princes of the Grecian army obliged him to diſcover where the aſhes of Hercules were depoſited, and as he had made an oath not to mention the place, he only with his foot ſtruck the ground where they lay, and by this means concluded he had not violated his ſolemn engagement. For this, however, he was ſoon after puniſhed, and the fall of one of the poiſoned arrows from his quiver upon the foot which had ſtruck the ground, occaſioned ſo offenſive a wound, that the Greeks were obliged to remove him from their camp. The ſufferings and adventures of Philoctetes are the ſubject of one of the beſt tragedies of Sophocles. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 46.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Dictyſ. Cret. 1, c. 14.—Senec. in Herc.—*Sophocl. PHĬLŎMĒLA, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, and ſiſter to Procne, who had married Tereus king of Thrace. Procne ſeparated from Philomela, to whom ſhe was particularly attached, ſpent her time in great melancholy till ſhe prevailed upon her huſband to go to Athens, and bring her ſiſter to Thrace. Tereus obeyed his wife's injunctions, but he had no ſooner obtained Pandion's permiſſion to conduct Philomela to Thrace, than he became enamoured of her, and reſolved to gratify his paſſion. He diſmiſſed the guards, whom the ſuſpicions of Pandion had appointed to watch his conduct, and he offered violence to Philomela, and afterwards cut off her tongue, that ſhe might not be able to diſcover his barbarity, and the indignities which ſhe had ſuffered. He confined her alſo in a lonely caſtle, and after he had taken every precaution to prevent a diſcovery, he returned to Thrace, and he told Procne that Philomela had died by the way, and that he had paid the laſt offices to her remains. Procne, at this ſad intelligence, put on mourning for the loſs of Philomela; but a year had ſcarcely elapſed before ſhe was ſecretly informed, that her ſiſter was not dead. Philomela, during her captivity, deſcribed on a piece of tapeſtry, her misfortunes and the brutality of Tereus, and privately conveyed it to Procne. She was then going to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus when ſhe received it, ſhe diſguiſed her reſentment, and as during the feſtivals of the god of wine, ſhe was permitted to rove about the country, ſhe haſtened to deliver her ſiſter Philomela from her confinement, and ſhe concerted with her on the beſt meaſures of puniſhing the cruelty of Tereus. She murdered her ſon Itylus, who was in the ſixth year of his age, and ſerved him up as food before her huſband during the feſtival. Tereus, in the midſt of his repaſt, called for Itylus, but Procne immediately informed him, that he was then feaſting on his fleſh, and that inſtant Philomela, by throwing on the table the head of Itylus, convinced the monarch of the cruelty cruelty of the ſcene. He drew his ſword to puniſh Procne and Philomela, but as he was going to ſtab them to the heart, he was changed into a hoopoe, Philomela into a nightingale, Procne into a ſwallow, and Itylus into a pheaſant. This tragical ſcene happened at Daulis in Phocis; but Pauſanias and Strabo, who mention the whole of the ſtory, are ſilent about the tranſformation, and the former obſerves, that Tereus, after this bloody repaſt, fled to Megara, where he deſtroyed himſelf. The inhabitants of the place raiſed a monument to his memory, where they offered yearly ſacrifices, and placed ſmall pebbles inſtead of barley. It was on this monument that the birds called hoopoes were firſt ſeen; hence the fable of his metamorphoſis. Procne and Philomela died through exceſs of grief and melancholy, and as the nightingale's and the ſwallow's voice is peculiarly plaintive and mournful, the poets have embelliſhed the fable by ſuppoſing, that the two unfortunate ſiſters were changed into birds. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Pauſ. 1, c. 42. l. 10, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 45.—Strab. 9.—*Ovid. PHILOPŒMEN, a celebrated general of the Achæan league, born at Megalopolis. His father's name was Grangis. His education was begun and finiſhed, under Caſſander, Ecdemus, and Demophanes, and he early diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field of battle, and appeared fond of agriculture and a country life. He propoſed himſelf Epaminondas for a model, and he was not unſucceſsful in imitating the prudence and the ſimplicity, the diſintereſtedneſs and activity of this famous Theban. When Megalopolis was attacked by the Spartans, Philopœmen, then in the 30th year of his age, gave the moſt deciſive proofs of his valor and intrepidity. He afterwards aſſiſted Antigonus, and was preſent in the famous battle in which the Ætolians were defeated. Raiſed to the rank of chief commander, he ſhewed his ability to diſcharge that important truſt, by killing with his own hand Mechanidas, the tyrant of Sparta; and if he was defeated in a naval battle by Nabis, he ſoon after repaired his loſſes by taking the capital of Laconia, B. C. 188, and by aboliſhing the laws of Lycurgus, which had floriſhed there for ſuch a length of time. Sparta, after its conqueſt, became tributary to the Achæans, and Philopœmen enjoyed the triumph of having reduced to ruins, one of the greateſt and the moſt powerful of the cities of Greece. Some time after the Meſſenians revolted from the Achæan league, and Philopœmen, who headed the Achæans, unfortunately fell from his horſe, and was dragged to the enemy's camp. Dinocrates, the general of the Meſſenians, treated him with great ſeverity; he was thrown into a dungeon, and obliged to drink a doſe of poiſon. When he received the cup from the hand of the executioner, Philopœmen aſked him how his countrymen had behaved in the field of battle; and when he heard that they had obtained the victory, he drank the whole with pleaſure, exclaiming, that this was comfortable news. The death of Philopœmen, which happened about 183 years before the Chriſtian era, in his 70th year, was univerſally lamented, and the Achæans, to revenge his death, immediately marched to Meſſenia, where Dinocrates, to avoid their reſentment, killed himſelf. The reſt of his murderers were dragged to his tomb, where they were ſacrificed; and the people of Megalopolis, to ſhew farther their great ſenſe of his merit, ordered a bull to be yearly offered on his tomb, and hymns to be ſung in his praiſe, and his actions to be celebrated in a panegyrical oration. He had alſo ſtatues raiſed to his memory, which ſome of the Romans attempted to violate, and to deſtroy, to no purpoſe, when Mummius took Corinth. Philopœmen has been juſtly called by his countrymen, the laſt of the Greeks. Plut. in vitâ.—Juſtin. 32, c. 4.—Polyb.——A native of Pergamus, who died B. C. 138.

PHILOSTRĂTUS, a famous ſophiſt, born at Lemnos, or according to ſome at Athens. He came to Rome, where he lived under the patronage of Julia, the wife of the emperor Severus, and he was entruſted by the empreſs with all the papers which contained ſome account, or anecdotes of Apollonius Thyanæus, and he was ordered to review them, and with them to compile an hiſtory. The life of Apollonius is written with elegance, but the improbable accounts, the fabulous ſtories, and exaggerated details which it gives, render it diſguſting. There is, beſides, another treatiſe remaining of his writings, &c. He died A. D. 244. The beſt edition of his writings, is that of Olearius, fol. Lipſ. 1709.——His nephew, who lived in the reign of Heliogabalus, wrote an account of ſophiſts.——A philoſopher in the reign of Nero.——Another in the age of Auguſtus.

PHILŌTAS, a ſon of Parmenio, diſtinguiſhed in the battles of Alexander, and at laſt accuſed of conſpiring againſt his life. PHILŌTIS, a ſervant maid at Rome, who ſaved her countrymen from deſtruction. After the ſiege of Rome by the Gauls, the Fidenates aſſembled an army, and marched againſt the capital, demanding all the wives and daughters in the city, as the conditions of peace. This extraordinary demand aſtoniſhed the ſenators, and when they refuſed to comply, Philotis adviſed them to ſend all their female ſlaves diſguiſed in matron's cloaths, and ſhe offered to march herſelf at the head. Her advice was followed, and when the Fidenates had feaſted late in the evening, and were quite intoxicated, and fallen aſleep, Philotis lighted a torch as a ſignal for her countrymen to attack the enemy. The whole was ſucceſsful, the Fidenates were conquered, and the ſenate, to reward the fidelity of the female ſlaves, permitted them to appear in the dreſs of the Roman matrons. Plut. in Rom.—*Varro. de L. PHILOXĔNUS, an officer of Alexander, who received Cilicia, at the general diviſion of the provinces.——A ſon of Ptolemy, who was given to Pelopidas as an hoſtage.——A dithyrambic poet of Cythera, who enjoyed the favor of Dionyſius, tyrant of Sicily, for ſome time, till he offended him by ſeducing one of his female ſingers. During his confinement, Philoxenus compoſed an allegorical poem, called Cyclops, in which he had delineated the character of the tyrant under the name of Polyphemus, and repreſented his miſtreſs under the name of Galatæa, and himſelf under that of Ulyſſes. The tyrant, who was fond of writing poetry, and of being applauded, removed Philoxenus from his dungeon, but the poet refuſed to purchaſe his liberty, by ſaying things unworthy of himſelf, and applauding the wretched verſes of Dionyſius, and therefore he was ſent to the quarries. When he was aſked his opinion at a feaſt about ſome verſes which Dionyſius had juſt repeated, and which the courtiers had received with the greateſt applauſe, Philoxenus gave no anſwer, but he ordered the guards that ſurrounded the tyrant's table, to take him back to the quarries. Dionyſius was pleaſed with his pleaſantry and with his firmneſs, and immediately forgave him. Philoxenus died at Epheſus, about 380 years before Chriſt. Plut.——A celebrated muſician of Ionia.——A painter of Eretria, who made for Caſſander an excellent repreſentation of the battle of Alexander with Darius. He was pupil to Nicomachus. Plin. 31, c. 10.——A philoſopher, who wiſhed to have the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taſte of his aliments longer, and with more pleaſure. Ariſt. eth. 3.

PHILŸRA, one of the Oceanides, who was met by Saturn in Thrace. The god, to eſcape from the vigilance of Rhea, changed himſelf into a horſe, to enjoy the company of Philyra, by whom he had a ſon, half a man and half a horſe, called Chiron. Philyra was ſo aſhamed of giving birth to ſuch a monſter, that ſhe entreated the gods to change her nature. She was metamorphoſed into the linden tree, called by her name among the Greeks. Hygin. fab. 138.——The wife of Nauplius.

the ſon of Philyra. Ovid. art. am.—Virg. G. 3, v. 550.

PHINEUS, a ſon of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, or according to ſome of Neptune, who became king of Thrace, or as the greater part of the mythologiſts ſupport, of Bithynia. He married Cleopatra the daughter of Boreas, whom ſome call Cleobula, by whom he had Plexippus and Pandion. After the death of Cleopatra, he married Idæa, the daughter of Dardanus. Idæa, jealous of Cleopatra's children, accuſed them of attempts upon their father's life and crown, or, according to ſome, of attempts upon her virtue, and they were immediately condemned by Phineus to be deprived of their eyes. This cruelty was ſoon after puniſhed by the gods, Phineus ſuddenly became blind, and the Harpyies were ſent by Jupiter to keep him under continual alarm, and to ſpoil the meats which were placed on his table. He was ſome time after delivered from theſe dangerous monſters by his brothers-in-law, Zetes and Calais, who purſued them as far as the Strophades. He alſo recovered his ſight by means of the Argonauts, whom he had received with great hoſpitality, and inſtructed in the eaſieſt and ſpeedieſt way by which they could arrive in Colchis. The cauſes of the blindneſs of Phineus are a matter of diſpute among the antients, ſome ſuppoſing that this was inflicted by Boreas, for his cruelty to his grandſon, whilſt others attribute it to the anger of Neptune, becauſe he had directed the ſons of Phryxus how to eſcape from Colchis to Greece. Many, however, think that it proceeded from his having raſhly attempted to develope futurity, while others aſſert that Zetes and Calais put out his eyes on account of his cruelty to their nephews. The ſecond wife of Phineus is called by ſome Dia, Eurytia, Danae, and Idothea. Phineus was killed by Hercules. Arg. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 15.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 19.—Orpheus.—Flacc.—The brother of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia. She was, however, delivered by Perſeus, who married her by the conſent of her parents, for having deſtroyed the ſea monſter. This marriage diſpleaſed Phineus: he interrupted the ceremony, and with a number of attendants, attacked Perſeus and his friends. Perſeus defended himſelf, and turned into ſtone Phineus, and his companions, by ſhowing them the Gorgon's head. Apollod. 2, c. 1 & 4.—*Ovid. PHLEGYÆ, a people of Theſſaly. Some authors place them in Bœotia. They received their name from Phlegyas the ſon of Mars, with whom they plundered and burned the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Few of them eſcaped to Phocis, where they ſettled. Pauſ. 9, c. 36.—Homer. Il. 13.—Strab. 9.

PHLEGYAS, a ſon of Mars, king of the Lapithæ in Theſſaly. He was father of Ixion and Coronis, to whom Apollo offered violence. When the father heard that his his daughter had been so wantonly abused, he marched an army against Delphi, and reduced the temple of the god to ashes. This was highly resented, Apollo killed Phlegyas and placed him in hell, where a huge stone hangs over his head, and keeps him in continual alarms, by its appearance of falling every moment. Paus. 9, c. 36. —Apollod. 3, c. 5.—*Pind. PHOCÆA, now Fochia, a maritime town of Ionia, in Asia Minor, with two harbours, between Cumæ and Smyrna, founded by an Athenian colony. It received its name from Phocus, the leader of the colony, or from (phocæ) sea calves, which are found in great abundance in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants, called Phocæi & Phocæenses, were expert mariners, and founded many cities in different parts of Europe. They left Ionia, when Cyrus attempted to reduce them under his power, and they came after many adventures into Gaul, where they founded Massilia, now called Marseilles. The town of Marseilles is often distinguished by the epithet of Phocaica, and its inhabitants called Phocæenses. Phocæa was declared independent by Pompey, and under the first emperors of Rome it became one of the most flourishing cities of Asia Minor. Liv. 5, c. 34. l. 37, c. 31. l. 38, c. 39.—Mela. 1, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, v. 165. —Strab. 14.—Horat. epod. 16.—*Ovid. PHOCENSES and PHOCĪCI, the inhabitants of Phocis in Greece.

PHOCILIDES, a Greek poet and philosopher of Miletus, about 540 years before the Christian era. The poetical piece now extant called ποιηματα, and attributed to him, is not of his composition, but of another poet who lived in the reign of Adrian.

PHOCION, an Athenian, celebrated for his virtues, private as well as public. He was educated in the school of Plato, and of Xenocrates, and as soon as he appeared among the statesmen of Athens, he distinguished himself by his prudence and moderation, his zeal for the public good, and his military abilities. He often checked the violent and inconsiderate measures of Demosthenes, and when the Athenians seemed eager to make war against Philip, king of Macedonia, Phocion observed that war should never be undertaken without the strongest and most certain expectations of victory and success. When Philip endeavoured to make himself master of Eubœa, Phocion stopped his progress, and soon obliged him to relinquish his enterprize. During the time of his administration he was always inclined to peace, though he never suffered his countrymen to become indolent, and to forget the jealousy and rivalship of their neighbours. He was 45 times appointed governor of Athens, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his talents as a minister and statesman, than that he never solicited that high, though dangerous office. In his rural retreat, or at the head of the Athenian armies, he always appeared barefooted, and without a cloak, whence one of his soldiers had occasion to observe when he saw him dressed more warmly than usual during a severe winter, that since Phocion wore his cloak it was a sign of the most inclement weather. If he was the friend of temperance and discipline, he was not a less brilliant example of true heroism. Philip, as well as his son Alexander, attempted to bribe him, but to no purpose; and Phocion boasted in being one of the poorest of the Athenians, and in deserving the appellation of the Good. It was through him that Greece was saved from an impending war, and he advised Alexander rather to turn his arms against Persia, than to shed the blood of the Greeks, who were either his allies or his subjects. Alexander was so sensible of his merit, and of his integrity, that he sent him 100 talents from the spoils which he had obtained from the Persians, but Phocion was too great to suffer himself to be bribed; and when the conqueror had attempted a second time to oblige him, and to conciliate his favor, by offering him the government and possession of five cities, the Athenian rejected the presents with the same indifference, and with the same independent mind. But not totally to despise the favors of the monarch, he begged Alexander to restore to their liberty four slaves that were confined in the citadel of Sardis. Antipater, who succeeded in the government of Macedonia after the death of Alexander, also attempted to corrupt the virtuous Athenian, but with the same success as his royal predecessor; and when a friend had observed to Phocion, that if he could so refuse the generous offers of his patrons, yet he should consider the good of his children, and accept them for their ſake, Phocion calmly replied, that if his children were like him they could maintain themſelves as well as their father had done, but if they behaved otherwiſe, he declared that he was unwilling to leave them any thing which might either ſupply their extravagances, or encourage their debaucheries. But virtues like theſe could not long ſtand againſt the inſolence and fickleneſs of an Athenian aſſembly. When the Piræus was taken, Phocion was accuſed of treaſon, and therefore, to avoid the public indignation, he fled for ſafety to Polyperchon. Polyperchon ſent him back to Athens, where he was immediately condemned to drink the fatal poiſon. He received the indignities of the people with uncommon compoſure; and when one of his friends lamented his fate, Phocion exclaimed, This is no more than what I expected, this treatment the moſt illuſtrious citizens of Athens have received before me. He took the cup with the greateſt ſerenity of mind, and as he drank the fatal draught, he prayed for the proſperity of Athens, and bade his friends to tell his ſon Phocus not to remember the indignities which his father had received from the Athenians. He died about 318 years before the Chriſtian era. His body was deprived of a fuueral by order of the ungrateful Athenians, and if it was at laſt interred, it was by ſtealth, under a hearth, by the hand of a woman, who placed this inſcription over his bones: Keep inviolate, O ſacred hearth, the precious remains of a good man, till a better day reſtores them to the monuments of their forefathers, when Athens ſhall be delivered of her phrenzy, and ſhall be more wiſe. It has been obſerved of Phocion, that he never appeared elated in proſperity, or dejected in adverſity, he never betrayed puſillanimity by a tear, or joy by a ſmile. His countenance was ſtern and unpleaſant, but he never behaved with ſeverity, his expreſſions were mild, and his rebukes gentle. At the age of 80 he appeared at the head of the Athenian armies like the moſt active officer, and to his prudence and cool valor in every period of life his citizens acknowledged themſelves much indebted. His merits were not buried in oblivion, the Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and honored his memory by raiſing him ſtatues, and putting to a cruel death his guilty accuſers. Plut. & C. Nep. in vit.—Diod. 16.

Phocis, a country of Greece, bounded on the eaſt by Bœotia, and by Locris on the weſt. It originally extended from the bay of Corinth to the ſea of Eubœa, and reached on the north as far as Therm opylæ, but its boundaries were afterwards more contracted. Phocis received its name from Phocus, a ſon of Ornytion, who ſettled there. The inhabitants were called Phocenſes, and from thence the epithet of Phocicus was formed. Parnaſſus was the moſt celebrated of the mountains of Phocis, and Delphi was the greateſt of its towns. Phocis is rendered famous for a war which it maintained againſt ſome of the Grecian republics, and which has received the name of the Phocian war. This celebrated war originated in the following circumſtances:—When Philip, king of Macedonia, had by his intrigues, and well concerted policy, fomented diviſions in Greece, and diſturbed the peace of every republic, the Greeks univerſally became diſcontented in their ſituation, fickle in their reſolutions, and jealous of the proſperity of the neighbouring ſtates. The Amphictyons, who were the ſupreme rulers of Greece, and who at that time were ſubſervient to the views of the Thebans, the inveterate enemies of the Phocians, ſhewed the ſame ſpirit of fickleneſs, and like the reſt of their countrymen, were actuated by the ſame fears, the ſame jealouſy and ambition. As the ſupporters of religion, they accuſed the Phocians of impiety for plowing a ſmall portion of land which belonged to the god of Delphi. They immediately commanded, that the ſacred field ſhould be laid waſte, and that the Phocians, to expiate their crime, ſhould pay a heavy fine to the community. The inability of the Phocians to pay the fine, and that of the Amphictyons to enforce their commands by violence, gave riſe to new events. The people of Phocis were rouſed by the eloquence and the popularity of Philomelus, one of their countrymen, and when this ambitious ringleader had liberally contributed the great riches he poſſeſſed to the good of his countrymen, they reſolved to oppoſe the Amphictyonic coun cil by force of arms. He ſeized the rich temple of Delphi, and employed the treaſures it contained to raiſe a mercenary army. During two years hoſtilities were carried on between the Phocians and their enemies, the Thebans and the people of Locris, but no deciſive battles were fought; and it can only be obſerved, that the Phocian priſoners were always put to an ignominious death, as guilty of the moſt abominable ſacrilege and impiety, a treatment which was liberally retaliated on ſuch of the army of the Amphictyons as became the captives of the enemy. The defeat, however, and death of Philomelus, for a while checked their ſucceſſes; but the deceaſed general was ſoon ſucceeded in the command by his brother called Onomarchus, his equal in boldneſs and ambition, and his

ſuperior in activity and enterprize. Onomarchus rendered his cauſe popular, the Theſſalians joined his army, and the neighbouring ſtates obſerved at leaſt a ſtrict neutrality, if they neither oppoſed nor favored his arms. Philip of Macedonia, who had aſſiſted the Thebans, was obliged to retire from the field with diſhonor, but a more ſucceſsful battle was fought near Magneſia, and the monarch, by crowning the head of his ſoldiers with laurel, and telling them that they fought in the cauſe of Delphi and heaven, obtained a complete victory. Onomarchus was ſlain, and his body expoſed on a gibbet, 6000 ſhared his fate, and their bodies were thrown into the ſea, as unworthy of funeral honors, and 3000 were taken alive. This fatal defeat, however, did not ruin the Phocians, Phayllus, the only ſurviving brother of Philomelus, took the command of their armies, and doubling the pay of his ſoldiers, he encreaſed his forces by the addition of 9000 men from Athens, Lacedæmon, and Achaia. But all this numerous force at laſt proved ineffectual, the treaſures of the temple of Delphi, which had long defrayed the expences of the war, began to fail, diſſenſions aroſe among the ringleaders of Phocis, and when Philip had croſſed the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, the Phocians relying on his generoſity, claimed his protection, and implored him to plead their cauſe before the Amphictyonic council. His feeble interceſſion was not attended with ſucceſs, and the Thebans, the Locrians, and the Theſſalians, who then compoſed the Amphictyonic council, unanimouſly decreed, that the Phocians ſhould be deprived of the privilege of ſending members among the Amphictyons. Their arms and their horſes were to be ſold, for the benefit of Apollo, they were to pay the annual ſum of 60,000 talents, till the temple of Delphi had been reſtored to its antient ſplendor and opulence; their cities were to be diſmantled, and reduced to diſtinct villages, which were to contain no more than ſixty houſes each, at the diſtance of a furlong from one another, and all the privileges and the immunities of which they were ſtripped, were to be conferred on Philip, king of Macedonia, for his eminent ſervices in the proſecution of the Phocian war. The Macedonians were ordered to put theſe cruel commands into execution. The Phocians were unable to make reſiſtance, and ten years after they had undertaken the ſacred war, they ſaw their country laid deſolate, their walls demoliſhed, and their cities in ruins, by the wanton jealouſy of their enemies, and the inflexible cruelty of the Macedonian ſoldiers, B. C. 348. They were not, however, long under this diſgraceful ſentence, their well known valor and courage recommended them to favor, and they gradually regained their influence and conſequence by the protection of the Athenians, and the favors of Philip. Liv. 32, c. 18. —Ovid. 2. Am. 6, v. 15. Met. 5, v. 276.—Demoſth.—Juſtin. 8, &c.—Diod. 16, &c. —*Plut. in Dem. PHŒNĪCE, or PHŒNĪCIA, a country of Aſia, at the eaſt of the Mediterranean, whoſe boundaries have been different in different ages. Some ſuppoſe that the names of Phœnicia, Syria, and Paleſtine, are indiſcriminately uſed for one and the ſame country. Phœnicia, according to Ptolemy, extended on the north as far as the Eleutherus, a ſmall river which falls into the Mediter-

Mediterranean ſea, a little below the iſland of Aradus, and it had Peluſium or the territories of Egypt as its more ſouthern boundary, and Syria on the eaſt. Sidon and Tyre were the moſt capital towns of the country. The inhabitants were naturally induſtrious, the invention of letters is attributed to them, and commerce and navigation were among them in the moſt floriſhing ſtate. They planted colonies in different countries, and their manufactures acquired ſuch a ſuperiority over thoſe of other nations, that among the antients, whatever was elegant, great, or pleaſing, either in apparel or domeſtic utenſils, received the epithet of Sidonian. The Phœnicians were originally governed by kings. They were ſubdued by the Perſians, and afterwards by Alexander, and remained tributary to his ſucceſſors and the Romans. They were called Phœnicians from Phœnix, ſon of Agenor, who was one of their kings, or according to others, from the great number of palm trees (φοινικες) which grow in the neighbourhood. Herodot. 4, c. 42. l. 5, c. 58.—*Homer. PHŒNIX, ſon of Amyntor king of Argos, by Cleobule or Hippodamia, was preceptor to young Achilles. When his father proved faithleſs to his wife, on account of his fondneſs for a concubine, called Clytia, Cleobule, jealous of her huſband, perſuaded her ſon Phœnix to ingratiate himſelf into the favors of his father's miſtreſs. Phœnix eaſily ſucceeded, but when Amyntor diſcovered his intrigues, he drew a curſe upon him, and the ſon ſoon after was deprived of his ſight, by divine vengeance. According to ſome, Amyntor himſelf put out the eyes of his ſon, which ſo cruelly provoked him, that he meditated the death of his father. Reaſon and piety, however, prevailed over paſſion, and Phœnix, not to become a parricide, fled from Argos to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia. Here he was treated with tenderneſs, Peleus carried him to Chiron, who reſtored him to his eye-ſight, and ſoon after he was made preceptor to Achilles, his benefactor's ſon. He was alſo preſented with the government of many cities, and made king of the Dolopes. He accompanied his pupil to the Trojan war, and Achilles was ever grateful for the inſtructions and precepts which he had received from Phœnix. After the death of Achilles, Phœnix with others, was commiſſioned by the Greeks to return into Greece, to bring to the war young Pyrrhus. This commiſſion he performed with ſucceſs, and after the fall of Troy, he returned with Pyrrhus and died in Thrace. He was buried, according to Strabo, near Trachinia, where a ſmall river in the neighbourhood received the name of Phœnix. Strab. 9.—*Homer. PHOLUS, one of the Centaurs, ſon of Silenus and Melia, or, according to others, of Ixion, and the cloud. He kindly entertained Hercules when he was going againſt the boar of Erimanthus, but he refuſed to give him wine, as that which he had belonged to the reſt of the Centaurs. Hercules, upon this, without ceremony, broke the caſk and drank the wine. The ſmell of the liquor drew the Centaurs from the neighbourhood to the houſe of Pholus, but but Hercules ſtopped them when they forcibly entered the habitation of his friend and killed the greateſt part of them. Pholus gave the dead a decent funeral, but he mortally wounded himſelf with one of the arrows which were poiſoned with the venom of the hydra, and which he attempted to extract from the body of one of the Centaurs. Hercules, unable to cure him, buried him when dead, and called the mountain, where his remains were depoſited, by the name of Pholoe. Apollod. 1.—Pauſ. 3.—*Virg. Phŏrōneus, the god of a river of Peloponneſus of the ſame name. He was ſon of the river Inachus, by Meliſſa, and he was the ſecond king of Argos. He married a nymph called Cerdo, or Laodice, by whom he had Apis, from whom Argolis was called Apia, and Niobe, the firſt woman of whom Jupiter became enamoured. Phoroneus taught his ſubjects the utility of laws, and the advantages of a ſocial life, and of friendly intercourſe, whence the inhabitants of Argolis are often called Phoronæi. Pauſanias relates, that Phoroneus, with the Cephiſus, Aſterion, and Inachus, were appointed as umpires in a quarrel between Neptune and Juno, concerning their right of patronizing Argolis. Juno gained the preference, upon which Neptune, in a fit of reſentment, dried up all the four rivers, whoſe deciſion he deemed partial. He afterwards reſtored them to their dignity and conſequence. Phoroneus was the firſt who raiſed a temple to Juno. He received divine honors after death. His temple ſtill exiſted at Argos, under Antoninus the Roman emperor. Pauſ. 2, c. 15, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 143.

Phraātes 1ſt, a king of Parthia, who ſucceeded Arſaces the 3d, called alſo Phriapatius. He made war againſt Antiochus, king king of Syria, and was defeated in three ſucceſſive battles. He left many children behind him, but as they were all too young, and unable to ſucceed to the throne, he appointed his brother Mithridates king, of whoſe abilities, and military prudence he had often been a ſpectator. Juſtin 41, c. 5.——The 2d, ſucceeded his father Mithridates as king of Parthia; and made war againſt the Scythians, whom he called to his aſſiſtance againſt Antiochus, king of Syria, and whom he refuſed to pay, on the pretence that they came too late. He was murdered by ſome Greek mercenaries who had been once his captives, and who had enliſted in his army, B. C. 129. Juſtin. 42, c. 1.—Plut. in Pomp.——The 3d, ſucceeded his father Pacorus on the throne of Parthia, and gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tigranes the ſon of Tigranes king of Armenia Soon after he invaded the kingdom of Armenia, to make his ſon-in-law ſit on the throne of his father. His expedition was attended with ill ſucceſs. He renewed a treaty of alliance which his father had made with the Romans. At his return in Parthia he was aſſaſſinated by his ſons Orodes and Mithridates. Juſtin.—— The 4th, was nominated king of Parthia by his father Orodes, whom he ſoon after murdered, as alſo his own brothers. He made war againſt M. Antony with great ſucceſs, and obliged him to retire with much loſs. Some time after he was dethroned by the Parthian nobility, but he ſoon regained his power, and drove away the uſurper, called Tiridates. The uſurper claimed the protection of Auguſtus the Roman emperor, and Phraates ſent ambaſſadors to Rome to plead his cauſe, and gain the favors of his powerful judge. He was ſucceſsful in his embaſſy, he made a treaty of peace and alliance with the Roman emperor, reſtored the enſigns and ſtandards which the Parthians had taken from Craſſus and Antony, and gave up his four ſons with their wives as hoſtages, till his engagements were performed. Some ſuppoſe that Phraates delivered his children into the hands of Auguſtus to be confined at Rome, that he might reign with greater ſecurity, as he knew his ſubjects would revolt as ſoon as they found any one of his family inclined to countenance their rebellion, though at the ſame time, they ſcorned to ſupport the intereſt of any uſurper who was not of the royal houſe of the Arſacidæ. He was however at laſt murdered by one of his concubines, who placed her ſon called Phraatices on the throne. Val. Max. 7, c. 6.—Juſtin. 42, c. 5.—*Dion. PHRYGES, a river of Aſia Minor, dividing Phrygia from Caria, and falling into the Hermus. Pauſ.

PHRYGIA,

PHRYGIA, a country of Asia Minor, generally divided into Phrygia Major and Minor. Its boundaries are not properly or accurately defined by ancient authors, though it appears that it was situate between Bythynia, Lydia, Cappadocia, and Caria. It received its name from the Bryges, a nation of Thrace, or Macedonia, who came to settle there, and from their name, by corruption, arose the word Phrygia. Cybele was the chief deity of the country, and her festivals were observed with the greatest solemnity. The invention of the pipe of reeds, and of all sorts of needlework, is attributed to the inhabitants, who are represented by some authors as stubborn, but yielding to correction (hence Phryx verberatus melior), as imprudent, effeminate, servile, and voluptuous; and to this Virgil seems to allude Æn. 9, v. 617. The Phrygians, like all other nations, were called Barbarians by the Greeks; their music (Phrygii cantus) was of a grave and solemn nature when opposed to the brisker and more chearful Lydian airs. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 2, &c. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 429, &c.—Cic. 7, ad fam. ep. 16.—Flacc. 27.—Dio. 1, c. 50.—Plin. 8, c. 48.—Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 16.—Pauf. 5, c. 25.—Herodot. 7, c. 73.——A city of Thrace.

PHRYNE, a celebrated prostitute who florished at Athens about 328 years before the Christian era. She was mistress to Praxiteles, who drew her picture. This was one of his best pieces, and it was placed in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. It is said that Apelles painted his Venus Anadyomene after he had seen Phryne on the sea shore naked, and with dishevelled hair. Phryne became so rich by the liberality of her lovers, that she offered to rebuild at her own expence Thebes, which Alexander had destroyed, provided this inscription was placed on the walls: Alexander diruit, sed meretrix Phryne refecit. This was refused. Plin. 34, c. 8.——There was also another of the same name who was accused of impiety. When she saw that she was going to be condemned, she unveiled her bosom, which so influenced her judges, that she was immediately acquitted. Quintil. 2, c. 15.

PHRYNĬCUS, a general of Samos, who endeavoured to betray his country to the Athenians, &c.——A flatterer at Athens.——A tragic poet of Athens, disciple to Thespis. He was the first who introduced a female character on the stage. Strab. 14.——A comic poet.

PHRYNIS, a musician of Mitylene, the first who obtained a musical prize at the Panathenæa at Athens. He added two strings to the lyre, which had always been used with seven by all his predecessors B. C. 438. It is said that he was originally a cook at the house of Hiero, king of Sicily.——A writer in the reign of Commodus, who made a collection in 36 books of phrases, and sentences from the best Greek authors, &c.

PHRYNO, a celebrated general of Athens, who died B. C. 590.

PHRYXUS, a son of Athamas, king of Thebes, by Nephele. After the repudiation of his mother, he was persecuted with the most inveterate fury by his step-mother Ino, because he was to sit on the throne of Athamas, in preference to the children of a second wife. He was apprized of Ino's intentions upon his life, by his mother Nephele, or according to others, by his preceptor; and the better to make his escape, he secured part of his father's treasures, and privately left Bœotia with his sister Helle, to go to their friend and relation Æetes, king of Colchis. They embarked on board a ship, or according to the fabulous account of the poets and mythologists, they mounted on the back of a ram whose fleece was of gold, and proceeded on their journey through the air. The height to which they were carried made Helle giddy, and she fell into the sea. Phryxus gave her a decent burial on the sea shore, and after he had called the place Hellespont from her name, he continued his flight, and arrived safe in the kingdom of Æetes, where he offered the ram on the altars of Mars. The king received him with great tenderness, and gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. She had by him Phrontis, Melias, Argos, Cylindrus, whom some call Cytorus, Catis, Lorus, and Hellen. Some time after he was murdered by his father-in-law, who envied him the possession of the golden fleece; and Chalciope, to prevent her children from sharing their father's fate, sent them privately from Colchis to Bœotia, as nothing was to be dreaded there from the jealousy or resentment of Ino, who was then dead. The fable of the flight of Phryxus to Colchis on a ram, has been explained by some, who observe, that the ship on which he embarked, was either called by that name, or carried on her prow the figure of that animal. The fleece of gold is explained by recollecting that Phryxus carried away immense treasures from Thebes. Phryxus was placed among the constellations of heaven, after death. The ram which carried him to Asia, is said to have been the fruit of Neptune's amour with Theophane, the daughter of Altis. This ram had been given to Athamas by the gods, to reward his piety and religious life, and Nephele procured it for for her children, just as they were going to be sacrificed to the jealousy of Ino. The murder of Phryxus was some time after amply revenged by the Greeks. It gave rise to a celebrated expedition which was atchieved under Jason, and many of the princes of Greece, and which had for its object the recovery of the golden fleece, and the punishment of the king of Colchis for his cruelty to the son of Athamas. Diod. 4.—Herodot. 7, c. 197.—*Apollon. PHYLLEIUS, a mountain, country, and town of Macedonia. Apollon. Arg. 1.

PHYLLIS, a daughter of Sithon, or according to others of Lycurgus, king of Thrace, who hospitably received Demophoon the son of Theseus, who at his return from the Trojan war, had stopped on her coasts. She became enamoured of him, and did not find him insensible to her passion. After some months of mutual tenderness and affection, Demophoon set sail for Athens, where his domestic affairs recalled him. He promised faithfully to return as soon as a month was expired; but either his dislike for Phyllis, or the irreparable situation of his affairs, obliged him to violate his engagement, and the queen, grown desperate on account of his absence, hanged herself, or according to others, threw herself down a precipice into the sea, and perished. Her friends raised a tomb over her body, where there grew up certain trees, whose leaves, at a particular season of the year, suddenly became wet, as if shedding tears, for the death of Phyllis. According to an old tradition, mentioned by Servius, Virgil's commentator, Phyllis was changed by the gods into an almond tree, which is called Phylla by the Greeks. Some days after this metamorphosis, Demophoon revisited Thrace, and when he heard of the fate of Phyllis, he ran and clasped the tree, which, though at that time stripped of its leaves, suddenly shot forth and blossomed as if still sensible of tenderness and love. The absence of Demophoon from the house of Phyllis has given rise to a beautiful epistle of Ovid, supposed to have been written by the Thracian queen about the 4th month after her lover's departure. Ovid. Heroid. 2, de Art. Am. 2, v. 353. Trist. 2.—Hygin. fab. 59.——A country woman introduced in Virgil's eclogues.——The nurse of the emperor Domitian. Suet. in Dom. 17.——A country of Thrace near mount Pangæus. Herodot. 7, c. 113.

PHYLLIUS, a young Bœotian, uncommonly fond of Cygnus, the son of Hyria, a woman of Bœotia. Cygnus slighted his passion, and told him that to obtain a return of affection, he must previously destroy an enormous lion, take alive two large vultures, and sacrifice on Jupiter's altars a wild bull that infested the country. This he easily effected by means of artifice, and by the advice of Hercules he forgot his partiality for the ſon of Hyria. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 372.—Nicand. in Heter. 3.——A Spartan remarkable for the courage with which he fought againſt Pyrrhus, king of Epirus.

PINĀRIUS & POTITIUS, two old men of Arcadia, who came with Evander to Italy. They were instructed by Hercules, who visited the court of Evander, how they were to offer sacrifices to his divinity, in the morning, and in the evening, immediately at sun-set. The morning sacrifice they punctually performed, but on the evening Potitius was obliged to offer the sacrifice alone, as Pinarius neglected to come till after the appointed time. This negligence offended Hercules, and he ordered, that for the future, Pinarius and his descendants should preside over the sacrifices, but that Potitius, with his posterity, should wait upon the priests as servants, when the sacrifices were annually offered to him on mount Aventine. This was religiously observed till the age of Appius Claudius, who persuaded the Potitii by a large bribe, to discontinue their sacred office, and to have the ceremony performed by slaves. For this negligence, as the Latin authors observe, the Potitii were deprived of sight, and the family became a little time after totally extinct. Liv. 1, c. 7.—*Virg. PINDĂRUS, a celebrated lyric poet, of Thebes. He was carefully trained from his earliest years to the study of music and poetry, and he was taught how to compose verses with elegance and simplicity, by Myrtis and Corinna. When he was young, it is said that a swarm of bees settled on his lips, and there left some honey-combs as he reposed on the grass. This was universally explained as a prognostic of his future greatness and celebrity, and indeed he seemed intitled to notice when he had conquered Myrtis in a musical contest. He was not however so successful against Corinna, who obtained five times, while he was competitor, a poetical prize, which, according to some, was rather adjudged to the charms of her person, than to the brilliancy of her genius, or the superiority of her composition. In the public assemblies of Greece, where females were not permitted to contend, Pindar was rewarded with the prize, in preference to every other competitor; and as the conquerors at Olympia were the ſubject of his compoſitions, the poet was courted by ſtateſmen and princes. His hymns and pæans were repeated before the moſt crowded aſſemblies in the temples of Greece; and the prieſteſs of Delphi declared that it was the will of Apollo, that Pindar ſhould receive the half of all the firſt fruit offerings that were annually heaped on his altars. This was not the only public honor which he received; after his death, he was honored with every mark of reſpect, even to adoration. His ſtatue was erected at Thebes in the public place where the games were exhibited, and ſix centuries after it was viewed with pleaſure and admiration, by the geographer Pauſanias. The honors which had been paid to him while alive, were alſo ſhared by his poſterity; and at the celebration of one of the feſtivals of the Greeks, a portion of the victim which had been offered in ſacrifice, was reſerved for the deſcendants of the poet. Even the moſt inveterate enemies of the Thebans, ſhewed regard for his memory, and the Spartans ſpared the houſe in which the prince of Lyrics had inhabited when they deſtroyed the houſes and the walls of Thebes. The ſame reſpect was alſo paid him by Alexander the Great, when Thebes was reduced to aſhes. It is ſaid that Pindar died at the advanced age of 86, B. C. 435. The greateſt part of his works have periſhed. He had written ſome hymns to the gods, poems in honor of Apollo, dithyrambics to Bacchus, and odes on ſeveral victories obtained at the four greateſt feſtivals of the Greeks, the Olympic, Iſthmian, Pythian, and Nemean games. Of all theſe, the odes are the only compoſitions extant, admired for ſublimity of ſentiments, grandeur of expreſſion, energy and magnificence of ſtile, boldneſs of metaphors, harmony of numbers, and elegance of diction. In theſe odes, which were repeated with the aid of muſical inſtruments, and accompanied by the various inflections of the voice, with ſuitable attitudes, and proper motions of body, the poet has not merely celebrated the place where the victory was won, but has introduced beautiful epiſodes, and by unfolding the greatneſs of his heroes, the dignity of their characters, and the glory of the ſeveral republics where they floriſhed, he has rendered the whole truly beautiful, and in the higheſt degree intereſting. Horace has not heſitated to call Pindar inimitable, and this panegyric will not perhaps appear too offenſive, when we recollect that ſucceeding critics have agreed in extolling his beauties, his excellence, the fire, animation, and enthuſiaſm of his genius. He has been cenſured for his affectation in compoſing an ode, from which the letter S was excluded. The beſt editions of Pindar are thoſe of Heyne, 4to. PIŎNIA, a town of Myſia, near the Caycus.

PIRÆUS, or PIRÆEUS, a celebrated harbour at Athens, at the mouth of the Cephiſus, about three miles diſtant from the city. It was joined to the town by two walls, in circumference ſeven miles and an half, and ſixty feet high, which Themiſtocles wiſhed to raiſe in a double proportion. One of theſe was built by Pericles, and the other by Themiſtocles. The towers which were raiſed on the walls to ſerve as a defence, were turned into dwelling-houſes, as the population of Athens gradually increaſed. It was the moſt capacious of all the harbours of the Athenians, and was naturally divided into three large baſons called Cantharos, Aphrodiſium, and Zea, improved by the labors of Themiſtocles, and made ſufficiently commodious for the reception of a fleet of 400 ſhips in the greateſt ſecurity. The walls which joined joined it to Athens with all its fortifications, were totally demoliſhed when Lyſander put an end to the Peloponneſian war by the reduction of Attica. Pauſ. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 9, —C. Nep. in Them.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Juſtin. 5, c. 8.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 446.

PIRĒNE, a daughter of Danaus.——A daughter of Œbalus, or according to others, of the Achelous. She had by Neptune two ſons called Leches and Cenchrius, who gave their name to two of the harbours of Corinth. Pirene was ſo diſconſolate at the death of her ſon Cenchrius, who had been killed by Diana, that ſhe pined away, and was diſſolved by her continual weeping into a fountain of the ſame name, which was ſtill ſeen at Corinth in the age of Pauſanias. The fountain Pirene was ſacred to the Muſes, and according to ſome, the horſe Pegaſus was then drinking ſome of its waters, when Bellerophon took it to go and conquer the Chimæra. Pauſ. 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

PIRĬTHOUS, a ſon of Ixion and the cloud, or according to others, of Dia, the daughter of Deioneus. Some make him ſon of Dia, by Jupiter, who aſſumed the ſhape of a horſe whenever he paid his addreſſes to his miſtreſs. He was king of the Lapithæ, and as an ambitious prince he wiſhed to become acquainted with Theſeus, king of Athens, of whoſe fame and exploits he had heard ſo many reports. To ſee him, and at the ſame time to be a witneſs of his valor, he reſolved to invade his territories with an army. Theſeus immediately met him on the borders of Attica, but at the ſight of one another the two enemies did not begin the engagment, but ſtruck with the appearance of each other, they ſtepped between the hoſtile armies. Their meeting was like that of the moſt cordial friends, and Pirithous, by giving Theſeus his hand as a pledge of his ſincerity, promiſed to repair all the damages which his hoſtilities in Attica might have occaſioned. From that time, therefore, the two monarchs became the moſt intimate and the moſt attached of friends, ſo much, that their friendſhip, like that of Oreſtes and Pylades, is become proverbial. Pirithous ſome time after married Hippodamia, and invited not only the heroes of his age but alſo the gods themſelves, and his neighbours the Centaurs, to celebrate his nuptials. Mars was the only one of the gods who was not invited, and to puniſh this neglect, the god of war was determined to raiſe a quarrel among the gueſts, and to diſturb the feſtivity of the entertainment. Eurythion, captivated with the beauty of Hippodamia, and intoxicated with wine, attempted to offer violence to the bride, but he was prevented by Theſeus and immediately killed. This irritated the reſt of the Centaurs, the conteſt became general, but the valor of Theſeus, Pirithous, Hercules, and the reſt of the Lapithæ, triumphed over their enemies. Many of the Centaurs were ſlain, and the reſt ſaved their lives by flight. [Vid. Lapithus.] The death of Hippodamia left Pirithous very diſconſolate, and he reſolved, with his friend Theſeus, who had likewiſe loſt his wife, never to marry again, except to a goddeſs, or one of the daughters of the gods. This determination occaſioned the rape of Helen by the two friends, the lot was drawn, and it fell to the ſhare of Theſeus to have the beautiful prize. Pirithous upon this undertook with his friend to carry away Proſerpine and to marry her. They deſcended into the infernal regions, but Pluto, who was apprized of their machinations to diſturb his conjugal peace, ſtopped the two friends, and confined them there. Pirithous was tied to his father's wheel, or according to Hyginus, he was delivered to the Furies to be continually tormented. His puniſhment, however, was ſhort, and when Hercules viſited the kingdom of Pluto, he obtained from Proſerpine the pardon of Pirithous, and brought him back to his kingdom ſafe and unhurt. Some ſuppoſe that he was torn to pieces by the dog Cerberus. [Vid. Theſeus.] Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 4 & 5.—Heſiod. in Scut. Her.—*Homer. PISA, a town of Elis on the Alpheus at the weſt of the Peloponneſus, founded by Piſus the ſon of Perieres, and grandſon of Æolus. Its inhabitants accompanied Neſtor to the Trojan war, and they enjoyed long the privilege of preſiding at the Olympic games which were celebrated near their city. This honorable appointment was envied by the people of Elis, who made war againſt the Piſeans, and after many bloody battles took their city, and totally demoliſhed it. It was at Piſa that Œnomaus murdered the ſuitors of his daughter, and that he himſelf was conquered by Pelops. The inhabitants were called Piſæi. Some have doubted the exiſtence of ſuch a place as Piſa, but this doubt originates from Piſa's having been deſtroyed in ſo remote an age. The horſes of Piſa were famous. The year on which the Olympic games were celebrated, was often called Piſæus annus, and the victory which was obtained there was called Piſææ ramus olivæ. Vid. Olympia. Strab. 8.—Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 386. l. 4, el. 10, v. 95.—Mela. 2.—Virg. G. 3, v. 180.—Stat. Theb. 7, v. 416.—Pauſ. 6, c. 22.

PISÆ, a town of Etruria, built by a colony from Piſa in the Peloponneſus. The inhabitants were called Piſani. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus affirms that it exiſted before the Trojan war, but others ſupport that it was built by a colony of Piſeans who were ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Etruria at their return from the Trojan war. Piſæ was once a very powerful and floriſhing city, which conquered the Baleares, together with Sardinia and Corſica. The ſea on the neighbouring coaſt was called the bay of Piſæ. Virg. Heroid. 1.——A ſon of Antimachus, killed by Agamemnon during the Trojan war.——An admiral of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponneſian war. He aboliſhed the democracy at Athens, and eſtabliſhed the ariſtocratical government of the four hundred tyrants. He was killed in a naval battle by Conon the Athenian general near Cnidus, in which the Spartans loſt 50 gallies, B. C. 394. Diod.——A poet of Rhodes who compoſed a poem called Heraclea, in which he gave an account of all the labors and all the exploits of Hercules. She became enamoured of Achilles when he invaded her father's kingdom, and ſhe promiſed to deliver the city into his hands if he would marry her. Achilles agreed to the propoſal, but when he became maſter of Methymna, he ordered Piſidice to be ſtoned to death for her perfidy. Parthen. erot. 21.

PISIS, a native of Theſpis, who gained uncommon influence among the Thebans, and behaved with great courage in the defence of their liberties. He was taken priſoner by Demetrius, who made him governor of Theſpiæ.

PISISTRĂTĬDÆ, the deſcendants of Piſiſtratus, tyrant of Athens. Vid. Piſiſtratus.

PISISTRĂTĬDES, a man ſent as ambaſſador to the ſatraps of the king of Perſia by the Spartans.

PISISTRĂTUS, an Athenian, ſon of Hippocrates, who early diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valor in the field, and by his addreſs and eloquence at home. After he had rendered himſelf the favorite of the populace by his liberality and by the intrepidity with which he had fought their battles, particularly near Salamis, he reſolved to make himſelf maſter of his country. Every thing ſeemed favorable to his ambitious views; but Solon alone, who was then at the head of affairs, and who had lately inſtituted his celebrated laws, oppoſed him and diſcovered his duplicity and artful behaviour before the public aſſembly. Piſiſtratus was not diſheartened by the meaſures of his relation Solon, but he had recourſe to artifice. In returning from his country houſe, he cut himſelf in various places, and after he had expoſed his mangled body to the eyes of the populace, deplored his misfortunes, and accuſed his enemies of attempts upon his life, becauſe he was the friend of the people, the guardian of the poor, and the reliever of the oppreſſed, he claimed a choſen body of 50 men from the populace to defend his perſon in future from the malevolence and the cruelty of his enemies. The unſuſpecting people unanimouſly granted his requeſt, though Solon oppoſed it with all his influence; and Piſiſtratus had no ſooner received an armed band on whoſe fidelity and attachment he could rely, than he ſeized the citadel of Athens, and made himſelf abſolute. The people too late perceived their credulity; yet, though the tyrant was popular, two of the citizens, Megacles and Lycurgus, conſpired together againſt him, and by their means he was forcibly ejected from the city. His houſe and all his effects were expoſed to ſale, but there was found in Athens only one man who would buy them. The private diſſentions of the friends of liberty proved favorable to the expelled tyrant, and Megacles, who was jealous of Lycurgus, ſecretly promiſed to reſtore Piſiſtratus to all his rights and privileges in Athens, if he would marry his daughter. Piſiſtratus conſented, and by the aſſiſtance of his father-in-law, he was ſoon enabled to expel Lycurgus, and to re-eſtabliſh himſelf. By means of a woman called Phya, whoſe ſhape was tall, whoſe features were noble and commanding, he impoſed upon the people, and created himſelf adherents even among his enemies. Phya was conducted through the ſtreets of the city, and ſhowing herſelf ſubſervient to the artifice of Piſiſtratus, ſhe was announced as Minerva, the goddeſs of wiſdom, and the patroneſs of Athens, who was come down from heaven to reeſtabliſh her favorite Piſiſtratus, in a power which was ſanctioned by the will of heaven, and favored by the affection of the people. In the midſt of his triumph, however, Piſiſtratus found himſelf unſupported, and ſometime after, when he repudiated the daughter of Megacles, he found that not only the citizens, but even his very troops were alienated from him by the influence, the intrigues, and the bribery of his father-in-law. He fled from Athens where he could no longer maintain his power, and retired to Eubœa. Eleven years after he was drawn from his obſcure retreat, by means of his ſon Hippias, and he was a third time received by the people of Athens as their maſter and ſovereign. Upon this he ſacrificed to his reſentment the friends of Megacles, but he did not loſe ſight of the public good; and while he ſought the aggrandizement of his family, he did not neglect the dignity and the honor of the Athenian name. He died about 527 years, before the Chriſtian era, after he had enjoyed the ſovereign power at Athens for 33 years, including the years of his baniſhment, and he was ſucceeded by his ſon Hipparchus. Piſiſtratus claims our admiration for his juſtice, his liberality, and his moderation. If he was dreaded and deteſted as a tyrant, the Athenians loved and reſpected his private virtues and his patriotiſm as a fellow citizen, and the opprobrium which generally falls on his head may be attributed not to the ſeverity of his adminiſtration, but to the republican principles of the Athenians, who hated and exclaimed againſt the moderation and equity of the mildeſt ſovereign, while they flattered the pride and gratified the guilty deſires of the moſt tyrannical of their fellow ſubjects. Piſiſtratus often refuſed to puniſh the inſolence of his enemies, and when he had one day been virulently accuſed of murder, rather than inflict immediate puniſhment upon the man who had criminated him, he went to the areopagus, and there convinced the Athenians that the accuſations of his enemies were groundleſs, and that his life was irreproachable. It is to his labors that we are indebted for the preſervation of the poems of Homer, and he was the firſt, according to Cicero, who introduced them at Athens, in the order in which they now ſtand. He alſo eſtabliſhed a public library at Athens, and the valuable books which he had diligently collected were carried into Perſia when Xerxes made himſelf maſter of the capital of Attica. Hipparchus and Hippias the ſons of Piſiſtratus, who have received the name of Piſiſtratidæ, rendered themſelves as illuſtrious as their father, but the flames of liberty were too powerful to be extinguiſhed. The Piſiſtratidæ governed with great moderation, yet the name of tyrant or ſovereign was inſupportable to the Athenians. Two of the moſt reſpectable of the citizens called Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, conſpired againſt them, and Hipparchus was diſpatched in a public aſſembly. This murder was not however attended with any advantages, and though the two leaders of the conſpiracy, who have been celebrated through every age for their patriotiſm, were ſupported by the people, yet Hippias quelled the tumult by his uncommon firmneſs and prudence, and for a while preſerved that peace in Athens, which his father had often been unable to command. This was not long to continue. Hippias was at laſt expelled by the united efforts of the Athenians and of their allies of Peloponneſus, and he left Attica, when he found himſelf unable to maintain his power and independence. The reſt of the family of Piſiſtratus followed him in his baniſhment, and after they had refuſed to accept the liberal offers of the princes of Theſſaly, and the king of Macedonia, who wiſhed them to ſettle in their reſpective territories, the Piſiſtratidæ retired to Sigæum, which their father had in the ſummit of his power conquered and bequeathed to his poſterity. After the baniſhment of the Piſiſtratidæ, the Athenians became more than commonly jealous of their liberty, and often ſacrificed the moſt powerful of their citizens, apprehenſive of the influence which popularity, and a well directed liberality might gain among a fickle and unſettled populace. The Piſiſtratidæ Piso, a celebrated family at Rome, which was a branch of the Calpurnians, deſcended from Calpus the ſon of Numa. Before the death of Auguſtus, 11 of this family had obtained the conſulſhip, and many had been honored with triumphs, on account of their victories, in the different provinces of the Roman empire. Of this family, the moſt famous were——Lucius Calpurnius, who was tribune of the people, about 149 years before Chriſt, and afterwards conſul. His frugality procured him the ſirname of Frugi, and he gained the greateſt honors as an orator, a lawyer, a ſtateſman, and an hiſtorian. He made a ſucceſsful campaign in Sicily, and rewarded his ſon, who had behaved with great valor during the war, with a crown of gold, which weighed twenty pounds. He compoſed ſome annals and harangues, which were loſt in the age of Cicero. His ſtile was obſcure and inelegant.——Caius, a Roman conſul, A. U. C. 685. who ſupported the conſular dignity againſt the tumults of the tribunes, and the clamors of the people. He made a law to reſtrain the cabals which generally prevailed at the election of the chief magiſtrates. ——Cneius, another conſul under Auguſtus. He was one of the favorites of Tiberius, by whom he was appointed governor of Syria, where he rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty. He was accuſed of having poiſoned Germanicus, and when he ſaw that he was ſhunned and deſpiſed by his friends, he deſtroyed himſelf, A. D. 20.——Lucius a governor of Spain, who was aſſaſſinated by a peaſant, as he was travelling through the country. The murderer was ſeized and tortured, but he refuſed to confeſs the cauſes of the murder. ——Lucius, a private man, accuſed of having uttered ſeditious words againſt the emperor Tiberius. He was condemned, but a natural death ſaved him from the hands of the executioner——Lucius, a governor of Rome for twenty years, an office which he diſcharged with the greateſt juſtice and credit. He was greatly honored by the friendſhip of Auguſtus, as well as of his preceptor, a diſtinction he deſerved, both as a faithful citizen and a man of learning. Some, however ſay, that Tiberius made him governor of Rome, becauſe he had continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, according to Pliny. Horace dedicated his poem de arte Poeticâ, to his two ſons, whoſe partiality for literature had diſtinguiſhed them among the reſt of the Romans, and who were fond of cultivating poetry in their leiſure hours.——Cneius, a factious and turbulent youth, who conſpired againſt his country with Catiline. He was among the friends of Julius Cæſar. ——Caius, a Roman who was at the head of a celebrated conſpiracy againſt the emperor Nero. He had rendered himſelf a favorite of the people by his private, as well as public virtues, by the generoſity of his behaviour, his fondneſs of pleaſure with the voluptuous, and his auſterity with the grave and the reſerved. He had been marked by ſome as a proper perſon to ſucceed the emperor; but the diſcovery of the plot by a freedman, who was among the conſpirators, ſoon cut him off, with all his partizans. He refuſed to court the affections of the people, and of the army, when the whole had been made public, and inſtead of taking proper meaſures for his preſervation, either by proclaiming himſelf emperor, as his friends adviſed, or by ſeeking a retreat in the diſtant provinces of the empire, he retired to his own houſe, where he opened the veins of both his arms, and bled to death.——Lucius, a ſenator who followed the emperor Valerian into Perſia. He proclaimed himſelf emperor after the death of Valerian, but he was defeated and put to death a few weeks after, A. D. 261, by Valens, &c.——Lucinianus, a ſenator adopted by the emperor Galba. He was put to death by Otho's orders.——A ſon-in-law of Cicero. ——A patrician, whoſe daughter married Julius Cæſar. *Horat.—Tacit. Ann. & Hiſt.—Val. PITHECŪSA, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Etruria, antiently called Ænaria, and Enarina, with a town of the ſame name, on the top of a mountain. The frequent earthquakes to which it was ſubject, obliged the inhabitants to leave it. There was a vulcano in the middle of the iſland, which has given occaſion to the antients to ſay, that the giant Typhon was buried there. Some ſuppoſe that it received its name from πιθηκοι monkeys, into which the inhabitants were changed by Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 90.—Plin. 3, c. 6.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Strab. 1.

PITHEUS. Vid. Pittheus.

PITHO, called alſo Suada, the goddeſs of perſuaſion among the Greeks and Romans, ſuppoſed to be the daughter of Mercury and Venus. She was repreſented with a diadem on her head, to intimate her influence over the hearts of men. One of her arms appears raiſed as in the attitude of an orator, haranguing in a public aſſembly, and with the other ſhe holds a thunderbolt and fetters, made with flowers, to ſignify the powers of reaſoning, and the attractions of eloquence. A caduceus, as a ſymbol of perſuaſion, appears at her feet, with the writings of Demoſthenes and Cicero, the two moſt celebrated among the antients, who underſtood how to command the attention of their audience, and to rouſe and animate their various paſſions ——A Roman courtezan. She received this name on account of the allurements which her charms poſſeſſed, and of her winning expreſſions.

PITHYS, a nymph beloved by Pan. Boreas was alſo fond of her, but ſhe ſlighted his addreſſes, upon which he daſhed her againſt a rock, and ſhe was changed into a pine tree.

PITTĂCUS, a native of Mitylene in Leſbos, was one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. His father's name was Hyrradius. With the aſſiſtance of the ſons of Alcæus, he delivered his country from the oppreſſion of the tyrant Melanchrus, and in the war which the Athenians waged againſt Leſbos he appeared at the head of his countrymen, and challenged to ſingle combat Phrynon the enemy's general. As the event of the war ſeemed to depend upon this combat, Pittacus had recourſe to artifice, and when he engaged, he entangled his adverſary in a net, which he had concealed under his ſhield and eaſily diſpatched him. He was amply rewarded for this victory, and his countrymen, ſenſible of his merit, unanimouſly appointed him governor of their city with unlimited authority. In this capacity Pittacus behaved with great moderation and prudence, and after he had governed his fellow citizens with the ſtricteſt juſtice, and after he had eſtabliſhed and enforced the moſt ſalutary laws, he voluntarily reſigned the ſovereign power after he had enjoyed it for 10 years, obſerving that the virtues and innocence of private life were incompatible with the power and influence of a ſovereign. His diſintereſtedneſs gained him many admirers, and when the Mityleneans wiſhed to reward his public ſervices by preſenting him with an immenſe tract of territory, he refuſed to accept more land than what ſhould be contained within the diſtance to which he could throw a javelin. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 570 years before Chriſt, after he had ſpent the laſt 10 years of his life in literary eaſe, and peaceful retirement. One of his favorite maxims was that man ought to provide againſt misfortunes, to avoid them; but that if they ever happened he ought to ſupport them with patience and and reſignation. In proſperity friends were to be acquired, and in the hour of adverſity their faithfulneſs was to be tried. He alſo obſerved that in our actions it was imprudent to make others acquainted with our deſigns, for if we failed we had expoſed ourſelves to cenſure and to ridicule. Many of his maxims were inſcribed on the walls of Apollo's temple at Delphi, to ſhew to the world how great an opinion the Mityleneans entertained of his abilities as a philoſopher, a moraliſt, and a man. By one of his laws, every fault committed by a man when intoxicated, deſerved double puniſhment. Diog.—Ariſtot. Polit.—Plut. in ſymp.—Pauſ. 10, c. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 2, &c.—*Val. PITTHEA, a town near Trœzene. Hence the epithet of Pittheus in Ovid. Met. 15, v. 296.

PITTHĒUS, a king of Trœzene in Argolis, ſon of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was univerſally admired for his learning, wiſdom, and application; he publicly taught in a ſchool at Trœzene, and even compoſed a book, which was ſeen by Pauſanias the geographer. He gave his daughter Æthra in marriage to Ægeus, king of Athens, and he himſelf took particular care of the youth and education of his grandſon Theſeus. He was buried at Trœzene, which he had founded, and on his tomb was ſeen, for many ages, three ſeats of white marble, on which he ſat, with two other judges, whenever he gave laws to his ſubjects, or ſettled their diſputes. Pauſ. 1 & 2.—Plut. in Theſ.—Strab. 8.

PITUANIUS, a mathematician in the age of Tiberius, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2.

PITYUS (untis), now Pitchinda, a town of Colchis. Plin. 6, c. 5.

PITYŪSA, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Argolis. Plin. 4, c. 12.——A name of Chios.——Two ſmall iſlands in the Mediterranean, near the coaſt of Spain, of which the larger was called Ebuſus, and the ſmaller Ophiuſa. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

PIUS, a ſirname given to the emperor Antoninus, on account of his piety and virtue.——A ſirname given to a ſon of Metellus, becauſe he intereſted himſelf ſo warmly to have his father recalled from baniſhment.

PLACENTIA, now called Placenza, an ancient town and colony of Italy, at the confluence of the Trebia and Po. Liv. 21, c. 25 & 56. l. 37, c. 10.——Another, near Luſitania, in Spain.

PLACIDEIANUS, a gladiator in Horace's age, 2 Sat. 7.

PLACIDIA, a daughter of Theodoſius the Great, ſiſter to Honorius and Arcadius. She married Adolphus, king of the Goths, and afterwards Conſtantius, by whom ſhe had Valentinian the 3d. She died A. D. 449.

PLACIDIUS JULIUS, a tribune of a cohort, who impriſoned the emperor Vitellius, &c. Tacit. H. 3, c. 85.

PLANASIA, a ſmall iſland of the Tyrrhene ſea.——Another, on the coaſt of Gaul, where Tiberius ordered Agrippa, the grandſon of Auguſtus, to be put to death. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.——A town on the Rhone.

PLANCĪNA, a woman celebrated for her intrigues and her crimes, who married Piſo, and was accuſed with him of having murdered Germanicus, in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted either by means of the empreſs Livia, or on account of the partiality of the emperor for her perſon. She had long ſupported the ſpirits of her huſband, during his confinement, but, when ſhe ſaw herſelf freed from the accuſation, ſhe totally abandoned him to his fate. Subſervient in every thing to the will of Livia, ſhe, at her inſtigation, became guilty of the greateſt crimes, to injure the character of Agrippina. After the death of Agrippina, Plancina was accuſed of the moſt atrocious villainies, and, as ſhe knew that ſhe could not elude juſtice, ſhe put herſelf to death, A. D. 33. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 26, &c.

L. PLANCUS MUNATIUS, a Roman, who rendered himſelf ridiculous by his follies and his extravagance. He had been conſul, and had preſided over a province in the capacity of governor, but he forgot all his dignity, and became one of the moſt ſervile flatterers of Cleopatra and Antony. At the court of the Egyptian queen in Alexandria, he appeared in the character of the meaneſt ſtage dancer, and, in comedy, he perſonated Glaucus, and painted his body of a green color, dancing on a public ſtage quite naked, only with a crown of green reeds on his head, while he had tied behind his back, the tail of a large ſea fiſh. This expoſed him to the public deriſion, and, when Antony had joined the reſt of his friends in cenſuring him for his unbecoming behaviour, he deſerted to Octavius, who received him with great marks of friendſhip and attention. It was he who proposed, in the Roman senate, that the title of Augustus should be conferred on his friend Octavius, as expressive of the dignity and the reverence which the greatness of his exploits seemed to claim. Horace has dedicated 1 od. 7 to him; and he certainly deserved the honor, from the elegance of his letters, which are still extant, written to Cicero. He founded a town in Gaul, which he called Lugdunum. Plut. in Anton.——A patrician, proscribed by the second triumvirate. His servants wished to save him from death, but he refused it, rather than to expose their persons to danger.——Plangon, a courtezan of Miletus, in Ionia.

PLATÆA, a daughter of Asopus, king of Bœotia. Pauf., 9, c. 1, &c.——An island on the coast of Africa, in the Mediterranean. It belonged to the Cyreneans. Herodot. 4, c. 157.

PLATÆA, and Æ, (arum,) a town of Bœotia, near mount Cithæron, on the confines of Megaris and Attica, celebrated for a battle fought there, between Mardonius the commander of Xerxes king of Persia, and Pausanias the Lacedæmonian, and the Athenians. The Persian army consisted of 300,000 men, 3000 of which scarce escaped with their lives by flight. The Grecian army, which was greatly inferior, lost but few men, and among these 91 Spartans, 52 Athenians, and 16 Tegeans, were the only soldiers found in the number of the slain. The plunder which the Greeks obtained in the Persian camp was immense. Pausanias received the tenth of all the spoils, on account of his uncommon valor during the engagement, and the rest were rewarded each according to their respective merit. This battle was fought on the 22d of September, the same day as the battle of Mycale, 479 B. C. and by it Greece was totally delivered for ever from the continual alarms to which she was exposed on account of the Persian invasions, and from that time none of the princes of Persia dared to appear with a hostile force beyond the Hellespont. The Platæans were naturally attached to the interest of the Athenians, and they furnished them with a thousand soldiers when Greece was attacked by Datis, the general of Darius. Platæa was taken by the Thebans, after a famous siege, in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and destroyed by the Spartans, B. C. 427. Alexander rebuilt it, and paid great encomiums to the inhabitants, on account of their ancestors, who had so bravely fought against the Persians at the battle of Marathon, and under Pausanias. Herodot. 8, c. 50.—Pauf. 9, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex. &c.—*C. PLATANIUS, a river of Bœotia. Pauf. 9, c. 24.

PLATO, a celebrated philosopher of Athens, son of Ariston and Perictonia. His original name was Aristocles, and he received that of Plato from the largeness of his shoulders. As one of the descendants of Codrus, and as the offspring of a noble, illustrious, and opulent, family, Plato was educated with care, his body was formed and invigorated with gymnastic exercises, and his mind was cultivated and enlightened by the study of poetry and of geometry, from which he derived that acuteness of judgement, and warmth of imagination, which have stamped his character as the most subtle and flowery writer of antiquity. He first began his literary career by writing poems and tragedies; but he was soon disgusted with his own productions, when, at the age of 20, he was introduced into the presence of Socrates, and when he was enabled to compare and examine, with critical accuracy, the merit of his compositions with those of his poetical predecessors. He, therefore, committed to the flames these productions of his early years, which could not command the attention or gain the applause of a maturer age. During eight years he continued to be one of the pupils of Socrates; and, if he was prevented by a momentary indisposition from attending the philosopher's last moments, yet he collected, from the conversation of those that were present, and from his own accurate observations, the minutest and most circumstantial accounts, which can exhibit in its truest colors, the concern and sensibility of the pupil, and the firmness, virtues, and moral sentiments, of the dying philosopher. After the death of Socrates, Plato retired from Athens, and, to acquire that information which the accurate observer can derive in foreign countries, he began to travel over Greece. He visited Megara, Thebes, and Elis, where he met with the kindest reception from his fellow disciples, whom the violent death of their master had likewise removed from Attica. He afterwards visited Magna Græcia, attracted by the fame of the Pythagorean philosophy, and by the learning, abilities, and reputation, of its professors. He afterwards passed into Sicily, and examined the eruptions and fires of the volcano of that island. He also visited Egypt, where then the mathematician Theodorus flourished, and where he knew that the tenets of the Pythagorean philosophy and metempsychosis had been fostered and cherished. When he had finished his travels, Plato retired to the groves of Academus, in the neighbourhood of Athens, where his lectures were soon attended attended by a crowd of learned, noble, and illuſtrious, pupils; and the philoſopher, by refuſing to have a ſhare in the adminiſtration of affairs, rendered his name more famous, and his ſchool more frequented. During forty years he preſided at the head of the academy, and there he devoted his time to the inſtruction of his pupils, and compoſed thoſe dialogues which have been the admiration of every age and country. His ſtudies, however, were interrupted for a while, whilſt he obeyed the preſſing calls and invitations of Dionyſius, and whilſt he perſuaded the tyrant to become a man, the father of his people, and the friend of liberty. [Vid. Dionyſius 2d.] In his dreſs the philoſopher was not oſtentatious, his manners were elegant, but modeſt, ſimple, without affectation, and the great honors which his learning deſerved were not paid to his appearance. When he came to the Olympian games, Plato reſided, during the celebration, in a family who were totally ſtrangers to him. He eat and drank with them, he partook of their innocent pleaſures and amuſements; but, though he told them his name was Plato, yet he never ſpoke of the employment he purſued at Athens, and never introduced the name of that philoſopher whoſe doctrines he followed, and whoſe death and virtues were favorite topics of converſation in every part of Greece. When he returned home, he was attended by the family which had ſo kindly entertained him; and, as being a native of Athens, he was deſired to ſhew them the great philoſopher whoſe name he bore: their ſurpriſe was great when he told them that he himſelf was the Plato whom they wiſhed to behold. In his diet he was moderate, and, indeed, to ſobriety and temperance in the uſe of food, and to the want of thoſe pleaſures which enfeeble the body and enervate the mind, ſome have attributed his preſervation during the tremendous peſtilence which raged at Athens with ſo much fury at the beginning of the Peloponneſian war. Plato was never ſubject to any long or lingering indiſpoſition, and, though change of climate had enfeebled a conſtitution naturally ſtrong and healthy, the philoſopher lived to an advanced age, and was often heard to ſay, when his phyſicians adviſed him to leave his reſidence at Athens, where the air was impregnated by the peſtilence, that he would not advance one ſingle ſtep to gain the top of mount Athos, were he aſſured to attain the great longevity which the inhabitants of that mountain were ſaid to enjoy above the reſt of mankind. Plato died on his birth day, in the 81ſt year of his age, about 348 years before the Chriſtian era. His laſt moments were eaſy and without pain, and, according to ſome, he expired in the midſt of an entertainment, or, according to Cicero, as he was writing. The works of Plato are numerous; they are all written in the form of dialogue, except 12 letters. He ſpeaks always by the mouth of others, and the philoſopher has no where made mention of himſelf except once in his dialogue entitled Phædon, and, another time, in his apology for Socrates. His writings were ſo celebrated, and his opinion ſo reſpected, that he was called divine; and, for the elegance, melody, and ſweetneſs, of his expreſſions, he was diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Athenian bee. Cicero had ſuch an eſteem for him, that, in the warmth of panegyric, he exclaimed errare, mehercule malo cum Platone, quàm cum iſtis vera ſentire; and Quintilian ſaid, that, when he read Plato, he ſeemed to hear not a man, but a divinity, ſpeaking. His ſtile, however, though admired, and commended by the beſt and moſt refined of critics among the ancients, has not eſcaped the cenſure of ſome of the moderns, and the philoſopher has been blamed, who ſupports that fire is a pyramid tied to the earth by numbers, that the world is a figure conſiſting of 12 pentagons, and who, to prove the metempſychoſis and the immortality of the ſoul, aſſerts, that the dead are born from the living, and the living from the dead. The ſpeculative mind of Plato was employed in examining things divine and human, and he attempted to fix and aſcertain, not only the practical doctrine of morals and politics, but the more ſubtle and abſtruſe theory of myſtical theogony. His philoſophy was univerſally received and adopted, and it has not only governed the opinions of the ſpeculative part of mankind, but it continues ſtill to influence the reaſoning, and to divide the ſentiments, of the moderns. In his ſyſtem of philoſophy, he followed the phyſics of Heraclitus, the metaphyſical opinions of Pythagoras, and the morals of Socrates. He maintained the exiſtence of two beings, one ſelf-exiſtent, and the other formed by the hand of a pre-exiſtent creature, god and man. The world was created by that ſelf-exiſtent cauſe, from the rude indigeſted maſs of matter which had exiſted from all eternity, and which had even been animated by an irregular principle of motion. The origin of evil could not be traced under the government of a deity, without admitting a ſtubborn intractability and wildneſs congenial to matter, and from theſe, conſequently, could be demonſtrated the deviations from the laws of nature, and from thence the extravagant paſſions and appetites of men. From materials like theſe were formed formed the four elements, and the beautiful ſtructure of the heavens and the earth, and into the active, but irrational, principle of matter, the divinity infuſed a rational ſoul. The ſouls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational ſoul of the world, which had previouſly given exiſtence to the inviſible gods and demons. The philoſopher, therefore, ſupported the doctrine of ideal forms, and the pre-exiſtence of the human mind, which he conſidered as emanations of the Deity, which can never remain ſatisfied with objects or things unworthy of their divine original. Men could perceive, with their corporeal ſenſes, the types of immutable things, and the fluctuating objects of the material world; but the ſudden changes to which theſe are continually obnoxious, create innumerable diſorders, and hence ariſes deception, and, in ſhort, all the errors and miſeries of human life. Yet, in whatever ſituation man may be, he is ſtill an object of divine concern, and, to recommend himſelf to the favor of the pre-exiſtent cauſe, he muſt comply with the purpoſes of his creation, and, by proper care and diligence, he can recover thoſe immaculate powers with which he was naturally endowed. All ſcience the philoſopher made to conſiſt in reminiſcence, and in recalling the nature, forms, and proportions, of thoſe perfect and immutable eſſences, with which the human mind had been converſant. From obſervations like theſe, the ſummit of felicity might be attained by removing from the material, and approaching nearer to the intellectual, world, by curbing and governing the paſſions, which were ever agitated and inflamed by real or imaginary objects. The paſſions were divided into two claſſes; the firſt conſiſted of the iraſcible paſſions, which originated in pride or reſentment, and were ſeated in the breaſt: the other, founded on the love of pleaſure, was the concupiſcible part of the ſoul, ſeated in the belly, and inferior parts of the body. Theſe different orders induced the philoſoper to compare the ſoul to a ſmall republic, of which the reaſoning and judging powers were ſtationed in the head, as in a firm citadel, and of which the ſenſes were its guards and ſervants. By the iraſcible part of the ſoul men aſſerted their dignity, repelled injuries, and ſcorned dangers; and the concupiſcible part provided the ſupport and the neceſſities of the body, and, when governed with propriety, it gave riſe to temperance. Juſtice was produced by the regular dominion of reaſon, and by the ſubmiſſion of the paſſions; and prudence aroſe from the ſtrength, acuteneſs, and perfection, of the ſoul, without which all other virtues could not exiſt. But, amidſt all this, wiſdom was not eaſily attained; at their creation all minds were not endowed with the ſame excellence, the bodies which they animated on earth were not always in harmony with the divine emanation; ſome might be too weak, others too ſtrong, and on the firſt years of a man's life depended his future conſequence; as an effeminate and licentious education ſeemed calculated to deſtroy the purpoſes of the divinity, while the contrary produced different effects, and tended to cultivate and improve the reaſoning and judging faculty, and to produce wiſdom and virtue. Plato was the firſt who ſupported the immortality of the ſoul upon arguments ſolid and permanent, deduced from truth and experience. He did not imagine that the diſeaſes, and the death of the body, could injure the principle of life and deſtroy the ſoul, which, of itſelf, was of divine origin, and of an uncorrupted and immutable eſſence, which, though inherent for a while in matter, could not loſe that power which was the emanation of God. From doctrines like theſe, the great founder of Platoniſm concluded, that there might exiſt in the world a community of men, whoſe paſſions could be governed with moderation, and who, from knowing the evils and miſeries which ariſe from ill conduct, might aſpire to excellence, and attain that perfection which can be derived from the proper exerciſe of the rational and moral powers. To illuſtrate this more fully, the philoſopher wrote a book, well known by the name of the republic of Plato, in which he explains with acuteneſs, judgment, and elegance, the riſe and revolution of civil ſociety; and ſo reſpected was his opinion as a legiſlator, that his ſcholars were employed in regulating the republics of Arcadia, Elis, and Cnidus, at the deſire of thoſe ſtates, and Xenocrates gave political rules for good and impartial government to the conqueror of the eaſt. The beſt editions of Plato are thoſe of Francof. fol. 1602; and Bipont. 12 vols. 8vo. 1788. Plato Dial. &c.—Cic. de offic. 1, &c.—Plut. in Sol. &c.——Seneca. ep.—Quintil. 10, c. 1, &c.—*Ælian. PLAVIS, a river of Venetia, in Italy.

PLAUTIA LEX, was enacted by M. Plautius, the tribune, A. U. C. 664. It required every tribe annually to chuſe fifteen perſons of their body, to ſerve as judges, making the honor common to all the three orders, according to the majority of votes in every tribe.——Another, called alſo Plotia, A. U. C. 675. It puniſhed with the interdictio ignis & aquæ, all perſons who were found guilty of attempts upon the ſtate, or the ſenators or magiſtrates, or ſuch as appeared in public armed with an evil deſign, or ſuch as forcibly expelled any perſon from his legal poſſeſſions.

PLAUTIUS, a Roman, who became ſo diſconſolate at the death of his wife, that he threw himſelf upon her burning pile. Val. Max. 4, c. 6.——Caius, a conſul ſent againſt the Privernates, &c.——Aulus, a governor of Britain, who obtained an ovation for the conqueſts he had obtained there over the Barbarians.——One of Otho's friends. He diſſuaded him from killing himſelf.——Lateranus, an adulterer of Meſſalina, who conſpired againſt Nero, and was capitally condemned.——Aulus, a general who defeated the Umbrians and the Etrurians.——Caius, another general, defeated in Luſitania.——A man put to death by order of Caracalla.——M. Sylvanus, a tribune, who made a law to prevent ſeditions in the public aſſemblies.——Rubellius, a man accuſed before Nero, and ſent to Aſia, where he was aſſaſſinated.

PLAUTIĀNUS, FULVIUS, an African of mean birth, who was baniſhed for his ſeditious behaviour in the years of his obſcurity. In his baniſhment, Plautianus formed an acquaintance with Severus, who, ſome years after, aſcended the imperial throne. This was the beginning of his proſperity; Severus paid the greateſt attention to him, and, if we believe ſome authors, their familiarity and intercourſe was carried beyond the bounds of modeſty and propriety. Plautianus ſhared the favors of Severus in obſcurity as well as on the throne. He was inveſted with as much power as his patron at Rome, and in the provinces, and, indeed, he wanted but the name of emperor to be his equal. His table was ſerved with more delicate meats than that of the emperor; when he walked in the public ſtreets he received the moſt diſtinguiſhing honors, and a number of criers ordered the moſt noble citizens, as well as the meaneſt beggars, to make way for the favorite of the emperor, and not to fix their eyes upon him. He was concerned in all the rapine and deſtruction which was committed through the empire, and he enriched himſelf with the poſſeſſions of thoſe who had been ſacrificed to the emperor's cruelty or avarice. To complete his triumph, and to make himſelf ſtill greater, Plautianus married his favorite daughter Plautilla to Caracalla, the ſon of the emperor; and ſo eager was the emperor to indulge his inclinations in this, and in every other reſpect, that he declared he loved Plautianus ſo much, that he would even wiſh to die before him. The marriage of Caracalla with Plautilla was attended with ſerious conſequences. The ſon of Severus had complied with great reluctance, and, though Plautilla was amiable in her manners, commanding in aſpect, and of a beautiful countenance, yet the young prince often threatened to puniſh her haughty and imperious behaviour as ſoon as he ſucceeded to the throne. Plautilla reported the whole to her father, and to ſave his daughter from the vengeance of Caracalla, Plautianus conſpired againſt the emperor and his ſon. The conſpiracy was diſcovered, and Severus forgot his attachment to Plautianus, and the favors he had heaped upon him, when he heard of his perfidy. The wicked miniſter was immediately put to death, and Plautilla baniſhed to the iſland of Lipari, with her brother Plautius, where, ſeven years after, ſhe was put to death by order of Caracalla, A. D. 211. Plautilla had two children, a ſon, who died in his childhood, and a daughter, whom Caracalla murdered in the arms of her mother. Dion. Caſſ.

PLAUTILLA, a daughter of Plautianus, the favorite miniſter of Severus. Vid. Plautianus.——The mother of the emperor Nerva, deſcended of a noble family.

M. ACCIUS PLAUTUS, a comic poet, born at Sarſina, in Umbria. Fortune proved unkind to him, and, from competence, he was reduced to the meaneſt poverty, by engaging in a commercial line. To maintain himſelf, he entered into the family of a baker as a common ſervant, and, while he was employed in grinding corn, he ſometimes dedicated a few moments to the comic muſe. Some, however, confute this account as falſe, and ſupport that Plautus was never obliged to the laborious employments of a bakehouſe for his maintenance. He wrote 25 comedies, of which only 19 are extant. He died about 184 years before the Chriſtian era; and Varro, his learned countryman, wrote this ſtanza, which deſerved to be engraved on his tomb:

Poſtquam morte captus eſt Plautus,
Comœdia luget, ſcena eſt deſerta;
Deinde riſus, ludus, jocuſque, & numeri
Innumeri ſimul omnes collacrymârunt.

The plays of Plautus were univerſally eſteemed at Rome, and the purity, the energy, and the elegance, of his language, were, by other writers, conſidered as objects of imitation; and Varro, whoſe judgment is great, and generally deciſive, declares, that, that, if the Muſes were willing to ſpeak Latin, they would ſpeak in the language of Plautus. In the Auguſtan age, however, when the Roman language became more pure and refined, the comedies of Plautus did not appear free from inaccuracy. The poet, when compared to the more elegant expreſſions of a Terence, was cenſured for his negligence in verſification, his low wit, execrable puns, and diſguſting obſcenities. Yet, however cenſured as to language or ſentiments, Plautus continued to be a favorite on the ſtage. If his expreſſions were not choice or delicate, it was univerſally admitted that he was more happy than other comic writers in his pictures, the incidents of his plays were more varied, the acts more intereſting, the characters more truly diſplayed, and the cataſtrophe more natural. In the reign of the emperor Diocletian, his comedies were ſtill acted on the public theatres, and no greater compliment can be paid to his abilities as a comic writer, and no greater cenſure can be paſſed upon his ſucceſſors in dramatic compoſition, than to obſerve, that for 500 years, with all the diſadvantage of obſolete language and diction, in ſpite of the change of manners, and the revolutions of government, he commanded, and received, that applauſe which no other writer dared to diſpute with him. Plēĭădes, or Vergĭliæ, a name given to ſeven of the daughters of Atlas by Pleione or Æthra, one of the Oceanides. They were placed in the heavens after death, where they formed a conſtellation called Pleiades, near the back of the bull in the Zodiac. Their names were Alcyone, Merope, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Sterope, and Celeno. They all, except Merope, who married Siſyphus, king of Corinth, had ſome of the immortal gods for their ſuitors. On that account, therefore, Merope's ſtar is dim and obſcure among the reſt of her ſiſters, becauſe ſhe married a mortal. The name of the Pleiades is derived from the Greek work πλεειν, to ſail, becauſe that conſtellation ſhows the time moſt favorable to navigators, which is in the ſpring. The name of Vergiliæ they derive from ver, the ſpring. They are ſometimes called Atlantides, from their father, or Heſperides, from the gardens of that name, which belonged to Atlas. Hygin, fab. 192. P. A. 2, c. 21.—*Ovid. C. Plinius Secundus, ſirnamed the Elder, was born at Verona, of a noble family. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field, and, after he had been made one of the augurs at Rome, he was appointed governor of Spain. In his public character he did not neglect the pleaſures of literature, the day was employed in the adminiſtration of the affairs of his province, and the night was dedicated to ſtudy. Every moment

ment of time was precious to him; at his meals one of his ſervants read to him books valuable for their information, and from them he immediately made copious extracts in a memorandum book. Even while he dreſſed himſelf after bathing, his attention was called away from ſurrounding objects, and he was either employed in liſtening to another, or in dictating himſelf. To a mind ſo earneſtly devoted to learning, nothing appeared too laborious, no undertaking too troubleſome. He deemed every moment loſt which was not dedicated to ſtudy, and, from theſe reaſons, he never appeared at Rome but in a chariot, and, wherever he went, he was always accompanied by his amanuenſis. He even cenſured his nephew, Pliny the Younger, becauſe he had indulged himſelf with a walk, and ſternly obſerved, that he might have employed thoſe moments to better advantage. But, if his literary purſuits made him forget the public affairs, his prudence, his abilities, and the purity and innocence of his character, made him known and reſpected. He was courted and admired by the emperors Titus and Veſpaſian, and he received from them all the favors which a virtuous prince could offer, and an honeſt ſubject receive. As he was at Miſenum, where he commanded the fleet, which was then ſtationed there, Pliny was ſurpriſed at the ſudden appearance of a cloud of duſt and aſhes. He was then ignorant of the cauſe which produced it, and he immediately ſet ſail in a ſmall veſſel for Mount Veſuvius, which he at laſt diſcovered to have made a dreadful eruption. The ſight of a number of boats that fled from the coaſt to avoid the danger, might have deterred another, but the curioſity of Pliny excited him to advance with more boldneſs, and, though his veſſel was often covered with ſtones and aſhes, that were continually thrown up by the mountain, yet he landed on the coaſt. The place was deſerted by the inhabitants, but Pliny remained there during the night, the better to obſerve the mountain, which, during the obſcurity, appeared to be one continual blaze. He was ſoon diſturbed by a dreadful earthquake, and the contrary wind on the morrow prevented him from returning to Miſenum. The eruptions of the volcano encreaſed, and, at laſt, the fire approached the place where the philoſopher made his obſervations. Pliny endeavoured to fly before it, but though he was ſupported by two of his ſervants, he was unable to eſcape. He ſoon fell down, ſuffocated by the thick vapors that ſurrounded him, and the inſupportable ſtench of ſulphureous matter. His body was found three days after, and decently buried by his nephew, who was then at Miſenum with the fleet. This memorable event happened in the 79th year of the Chriſtian era, and the philoſopher who periſhed by the eruptions of the volcano, has been called by ſome the martyr of nature. He was then in the 56th year of his age. Of the works which he compoſed none are extant but his natural hiſtory in 37 books. It is a work, as Pliny the Younger ſays, full of erudition, and as varied as nature itſelf. It treats of the ſtars, the heavens, wind, rain, hail, minerals, trees, flowers, and plants, beſides an account of all living animals, birds, fiſhes, and beaſts; a geographical deſcription of every place on the globe, and an hiſtory of every art and ſcience, of commerce and navigation, with their riſe, progreſs, and ſeveral improvements. He is happy in his deſcriptions as a naturaliſt, he writes with force and energy, and though many of his ideas and conjectures are ſometimes ill-founded, yet he poſſeſſes that fecundity of imagination, and vivacity of expreſſion, which are requiſite to treat a ſubject with propriety, and to render an hiſtory of nature pleaſing, intereſting, and above all, inſtructive. His ſtile poſſeſſes not the graces of the Auguſtan age, it has neither its purity, and elegance, nor its ſimplicity, but is rather cramped, obſcure, and ſometimes unintelligible. Yet for all this it has ever been admired and eſteemed, and it may be called a compilation of every thing which had been written before his age on the various ſubjects which he treats, and a judicious collection from the moſt excellent treatiſes which had been compoſed on the various productions of nature. Pliny was not aſhamed to mention the authors which he quoted, he ſpeaks of them with admiration, and while he pays the greateſt compliment to their abilities, his encomiums ſhow, in the ſtrongeſt light, the goodneſs, the ſenſibility, and the ingenuouſneſs of his own mind. He had written 160 volumes of remarks and annotations on the various authors which he had read, and ſo great was the opinion in his contemporaries, of his erudition and abilities, that a man called Lartius Lutinius offered to buy his notes and obſervations for the enormous ſum of about 3242l. Engliſh money. The philoſopher, who was himſelf rich and independent, rejected the offer, and his compilations, after his death, came into the hands of his nephew Pliny. The beſt editions of Pliny are that of Harduin, 3 vols. fol. Paris 1723, that of Frantzius, 10 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1778, that of Brotier, 6 vols. 12mo, Paris 1779, and the Variorum 8vo. in 8 vols. Lipſ. 1778 to 1789. Tacit. an. 1, c. 69. l. 13, c. 20. l. 15, c. 53.— Plin. ep. &c.——C. Cæcilius Secundus, ſirnamed the younger, was ſon of L. Cæcilius by the ſiſter of Pliny the elder. He was adopted by his his uncle, whose name he assumed, and whose estates and effects he inherited. He received the greatest part of his education under Quintilian, and at the age of 19 he appeared at the bar, where he distinguished himself so much by his eloquence, that he, with Tacitus, were reckoned the two greatest orators of their age. He did not make his profession an object of gain like the rest of the Roman orators, but he refused fees from the rich as well as from the poorest of his clients, and declared that he cheerfully employed himself for the protection of innocence, the relief of the indigent, and the detection of vice. He published many of his harangues and orations, which have been lost. When Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Pliny was created consul by the emperor. This honor the consul acknowledged in a celebrated panegyric which, at the request of the Roman senate, and in the name of the whole empire, he pronounced on Trajan. Some time after he presided over Pontus and Bithynia, in the office, and with the power, of pro-consul, and by his humanity and philanthropy the subject was freed from the burden of partial taxes, and the persecution which had been begun against the christians of his province was stopped when Pliny solemnly declared to the emperor that the followers of Christ were a meek and inoffensive sect of men, that their morals were pure and innocent, that they were free from all crimes, and that they voluntarily bound themselves by the most solemn oaths to abstain from vice, and to relinquish every sinful pursuit. If he rendered himself popular in his province, he was not less respected at Rome. He was there the friend of the poor, the patron of learning, great without arrogance, affable in his behaviour, and an example of good breeding, sobriety, temperance, and modesty. As a father and a husband his character was amiable; as a subject he was faithful to his prince; and as a magistrate, he was candid, open, and compassionate. His native country shared among the rest, his unbounded benevolence; and Comum, a small town of Insubria which gave him birth, boasted of his liberality in the valuable and choice library of books which he collected there. He also contributed towards the expences which attended the education of his countrymen, and liberally spent part of his estate for the advancement of literature, and for the instruction of those whom poverty otherwise deprived of the advantages of a public education. He made his preceptor Quintilian, and the poet Martial, objects of his benevolence, and when the daughter of the former was married, Pliny wrote to the father with the greatest civility; and while he observed that he was rich in the possession of learning, though poor in the goods of fortune, he begged of him to accept, as a dowry for his beloved daughter, 50,000 sesterces, about 300 l. I would not, continued he, be so moderate, were I not assured from your modesty, and disinterestedness, that the smallness of the present will render it acceptable. He died in the 52d year of his age, A. D. 113. He had written an history of his own times, which is lost. It is said, that Tacitus did not begin his history till he had found it impossible to persuade Pliny to undertake that laborious task, and indeed what could not have been expected from the panegyrist of Trajan, if Tacitus acknowledged himself inferior to him in delineating the character of the times. Some suppose, but falsely, that Pliny wrote the lives of illustrious men, universally ascribed to Cornelius Nepos. He also wrote poetry, but his verses have all perished, and nothing of his learned works remains, but his panegyric on the emperor Trajan, and 10 books of letters, which he himself collected and prepared for the public, from a numerous and respectable correspondence. These letters contain many curious and interesting facts, they abound with many anecdotes of the generosity and the humane sentiments of the writer. They are written with elegance and great purity, and the reader every where discovers that affability, that condescension and philanthropy which so egregiously marked the advocate of the christians. These letters are esteemed by some, equal to the voluminous epistles of Cicero. In his panegyric, Pliny's style is florid and brilliant, he has used, to the greatest advantage, the liberties of the panegyrist, and the eloquence of the courtier. His ideas are new and refined, but his diction is distinguished by that affectation and pomposity which marked the reign of Trajan. The best editions of Pliny, are those of Gesner, 8vo. Lipsi. 1770, and of Lallemand, 12mo. Paris apud Barbou, and of the panegyric separate, that of Schwartz, 4to. 1746, and of the epistles, the Variorum L. The father died very young, and the two children were left in the houſe of their grandfather, who took care of them and inſtructed them. PLOTĪNA POMPEIA, a Roman lady who married Trajan while he was yet a private man. She entered Rome in the proceſſion with her huſband when he was ſaluted emperor, and diſtinguiſhed herſelf by the affability of her behaviour, her humanity, and liberal offices to the poor and friendleſs. She accompanied Trajan in the eaſt, and at his death ſhe brought back his aſhes to Rome, and ſtill enjoyed all the honors and titles of a Roman empreſs under Adrian, who, by her means, had ſucceeded to the vacant throne. At her death, A. D. 122, ſhe was ranked among the gods, and received divine honors, which according to the ſuperſtition of the times, ſhe ſeemed to deſerve, from her regard for the good and the proſperity of the Roman empire, and for her private virtues. Dion.

PLOTINOPŎLIS, a town of Thrace built by the emperor Trajan, and called after Plotina, the founder's wife.——Another in Dacia.

PLOTĪNUS, a Platonic philoſopher of Lycopolis in Egypt. He was for eleven years a pupil of Ammonius the philoſopher, and after he had profited by all the inſtructions of his learned preceptor, he determined to improve his knowledge and to viſit the territories of India and Perſia to receive information. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition into the eaſt, but the day which proved fatal to the emperor, nearly terminated the life of the philoſopher. He ſaved himſelf by flight, and the following year he retired to Rome, where he publicly taught philoſophy. His ſchool was frequented by people of every ſex, age, and quality; by ſenators, as well as by plebeians, and ſo great was the opinion of the public of his honeſty and candor, that many, on their death-bed, left all their poſſeſſions to his care, and entruſted their children to him, as to a ſuperior being. He was the favorite of all the Romans; and while he charmed the populace by the force of his eloquence, and the ſenate by his doctrines, the emperor Gallienus courted him, and admired the extent of his learning. It is even ſaid, that the emperor and the empreſs Salonina intended to re-build a decayed city of Campania, and to appoint the philoſopher over it, that there he might experimentally know, while he preſided over a colony of philoſophers, the validity and the uſe of the ideal laws of the republic of Plato. This plan was not executed, through the envy and the malice of the enemies of Plotinus. The philoſopher, at laſt, become helpleſs and infirm, returned to Campania, where the liberality of his friends for awhile maintained him. He died A. D. 270, in the 66th year of his age, and as he expired, he declared that he made his laſt and moſt violent efforts to give up what there was moſt divine in him and in the reſt of the univerſe. Amidſt the great qualities of the philoſopher, we diſcover ſome ridiculous ſingularities. Plotinus never permitted his picture to be taken, and he obſerved, that to ſee a painting of himſelf in the following age, was beneath the notice of an enlightened mind. Theſe reaſons alſo induced him to conceal the day, the hour, and the place of his birth. He never made uſe of medicines, and though his body was often debilitated by abſtinence or too much ſtudy, he deſpiſed to have recourſe to a phyſician, and thought that it would degrade the gravity of a philoſopher. His writings have been collected by his pupil Porphyry. They conſiſt of 54 different treatiſes divided into ſix equal parts, written with great ſpirit and vivacity; but the reaſonings are abſtruſe, and the ſubjects metaphyſical. The beſt edition is that of Picinus, fol. Baſil, 1580.

who made him his heir. He was ſelected by Auguſtus, with Varius, to review the Æneid of Virgil. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 40. ——Lucius, a poet in the age of the great Marius, whoſe exploits he celebrated in his verſes.

PLUTARCHUS, a native of Chæronea, deſcended of a reſpectable family. His father, whoſe name is unknown, was diſtinguiſhed for his learning and virtues, and his grandfather, called Lamprias, was alſo as conſpicuous for his eloquence and the fecundity of his genius. Under Ammonius, a reputable teacher at Delphi, Plutarch was made acquainted with philoſophy and mathematics, and ſo well eſtabliſhed was his character, that he was appointed by his countrymen, while yet very young, to go to the Roman pro-conſul, in their name, upon an affair of the moſt important nature. This commiſſion he executed with honor to himſelf, and with ſucceſs for his country. He afterwards travelled in queſt of knowledge; and after he had viſited, like a philoſopher and an hiſtorian, the territories of Egypt and Greece, he retired to Rome, where he opened a ſchool. His reputation made his ſchool frequented. The emperor Trajan admired his abilities, and honored him with the office of conſul, and appointed him governor of Illyricum. After the death of his imperial benefactor, Plutarch removed from Rome to Chæronea, where he lived in the greateſt tranquillity, reſpected by his fellow-citizens and raiſed to all the honors which his native town could beſtow. In this peaceful and ſolitary retreat, Plutarch cloſely applied himſelf to ſtudy, and wrote the greateſt part of his works, and particularly his lives. He died in an advanced old age at Chæronea, about the 140th year of the chriſtian era. Plutarch had five children by his wife, called Timoxena, four ſons and one daughter. Two of the ſons and the daughter died when young, and thoſe that ſurvived were called Plutarch and Lamprias, and the latter did honor to his father's memory, by giving to the world an accurate catalogue of his writings. In his private and public character, the hiſtorian of Chæronea was the friend of diſcipline. He boldly aſſerted the natural right of mankind, liberty; but he recommended obedience and ſubmiſſive deference to magiſtrates, as neceſſary to preſerve the peace of ſociety. He ſupported, that the moſt violent and dangerous public factions aroſe too often from private diſputes and from miſunderſtanding. To render himſelf more intelligent, he always carried a common place-book with him, and he preſerved with the greateſt care whatever judicious obſervations fell in the courſe of converſation. The moſt eſteemed of his works are his lives of illuſtrious men, of whom he examines and delineates the different characters with wonderful ſkill and impartiality. He neither miſrepreſents the virtues, nor hides the foibles of his heroes. He writes with preciſion and with fidelity, and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many deſcriptions he is inferior to no hiſtorian. In ſome of his narrations, however, he is often too circumſtantial, his remarks are often injudicious; and when he compares the heroes of Greece with thoſe of Rome, the candid reader can eaſily remember which ſide of the Adriatic gave the hiſtorian birth. Some have accuſed him of not knowing the genealogy of his heroes, and have cenſured him for his ſuperſtition; yet for all this, he is the moſt entertaining, the moſt inſtructive, and intereſting of all the writers of ancient hiſtory; and were a man of true taſte and judgement aſked what book he wiſhed to ſave from deſtruction, of all the profane compoſitions of antiquity, he would perhaps without heſitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. In his moral treatiſes, Plutarch appears in a different character, and his miſguided philoſophy, and erroneous doctrines, render ſome of theſe inferior compoſitions puerile and diſguſting. They however contain many uſeful leſſons, and curious facts, and though they are compoſed without connection, compiled without judgement, and often abound with improbable ſtories, and falſe reaſonings, yet they contain much information, and many uſeful reflections. The beſt editions of Plutarch are that of Francfort, 2 vols. fol. 1599; that of Stephens, 6 vols. 8vo. 1572; the Lives by Reiſke, 12 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1775; and the Moralia, &c. by Wyttenbach. Plut.——A native of Eretria, during the Peloponneſian war. He was defeated by the Macedonians. Plut. in Phoc.

PLUTIA, a town of Sicily. Cic. in Verr.

PLUTO, ſon of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as ſuch he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis, Hades, or Ades, Clytopolon, Agelaſtus, Orcus, &c. As the place of his reſidence was obſcure and gloomy, all the goddeſſes refuſed to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his ſolicitations. As he once viſited the iſland of Sielly, after a violent earthquake, he ſaw Proſerpine, the daughter of Ceres, gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot drawn by four horſes. To make his retreat more unknown, he opened himſelf a paſſage through the earth, by ſtriking it with his trident in the lake of Cyane in Sicily, or, according to others, on the borders of the Cephiſus in Attica. Proſerpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain, and ſhe became the wife of her raviſher, and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally repreſented as holding a trident with two teeth, he has alſo keys in his hand, to intimate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hard-hearted and inexorable god, with a grim and diſmal countenance, and for that reaſon no temples were raiſed to his honor as to the reſt of the ſuperior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only ſacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not ſprinkled on the altars, or received in veſſels, as at other ſacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracuſans yearly ſacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had diſappeared with Proſerpine. Among plants, the cypreſs, the narciſſus, and the maiden-hair, were ſacred to him, as alſo every thing which was deemed inauſpicious, particularly the number two. According to ſome of the ancients, Pluto ſat on a throne of ſulphur, from which iſſued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon, and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the harpies hovered around him, Proſerpine ſat on his left hand, and near to the goddeſs ſtood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with ſnakes. The Parcæ occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the ſymbols of their office, the diſtaff, the ſpindle, and the ſciſſars. Pluto is called by ſome the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet, which rendered the bearer inviſible, and gave it to Pluto. Perſeus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. *Heſiod. PLUTUS, ſon of Jaſion or Jaſius, by Ceres, the goddeſs of corn, has been confounded by many of the mythologiſts with Pluto, though plainly diſtinguiſhed from him as being the god of riches. He was brought up by the goddeſs of peace, and on that account, Pax was repreſented at Athens, as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks ſpoke of him as of a fickle divinity. They repreſented him as blind, becauſe he diſtributed riches indiſcriminately; he was lame, becauſe he came ſlow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity, than he approached mankind. Lucian in Tim.—Pauſ. 9, c. 16 & 26.—*Hygin. PLUVIUS, a ſirname of Jupiter as god of rain. He was invoked by that name among the Romans, whenever the earth was parched up by continual heat, and was in want of refreſhening ſhowers. He had an altar in the temple on the capitol. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 26.

PLYNTERIA, a feſtival among the Greeks, in honor of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter of Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word ſeems to be derived from πλυνω, lavare, becauſe, during the ſolemnity, they undreſſed the ſtatue of the goddeſs, and waſhed it. The day on which it was obſerved, was univerſally looked upon as unfortunate and inauſpicious, and on that account, no perſon was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purpoſely ſurrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day, was deemed very unfortunate; but however, the ſucceſs that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwiſe. It was cuſtomary at this feſtival to bear in proceſſion a cluſter of figs, which intimated the progreſs of civilization among the firſt inhabitants of the earth, as figs ſerved them for food after they had found a diſlike for acorns. Pollux.

PNIGEUS, a village of Egypt, near Phœnicia. Strab. 16.

PNYX, a place of Athens, ſet apart by Solon for holding aſſemblies. C. Nep. Att. 3.

POBLICIUS, a lieutenant of Pompey in Spain.

PODALIRIUS, a ſon of Æſculapius and Epione. He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himſelf under him ſuch a maſter of medicine, that during during the Trojan war, the Greeks invited him to their camp, to ſtop a peſtilence which had baffled the ſkill of all their phyſicians. Some however ſuppoſe, that he went to the Trojan war not in the capacity of a phyſician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior, attended by his brother Machaon, in 30 ſhips, with ſoldiers from Œchalia, Ithome, and Trica. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Caria, where he cured of the falling ſickneſs a daughter of the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Syrna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honors. Dictys. Cret.—Q. Smyrn. 6 & 9.—Ovid de Art. Am. 2. Triſt. el. 6.—Pauſ. 3.——A Rutulian engaged in the wars of Æneas and Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 304.

PODARCE, a daughter of Danaus.

PODARCES, a ſon of Iphiclus of Theſſaly, who went to the Trojan war.——The firſt name of Priam. When Troy was taken by Hercules, he was redeemed from ſlavery by his ſiſter Heſione, and from thence received the name of Priam. Vid. Priamus.

PODARES, a general of Mantinea, in the age of Epaminondas. Pauſ. 8, c. 9.

PODARGE, one of the Harpies, mother of two of the horſes of Achilles, by the Zephyrs. The word intimates the ſwiftneſs of her feet.

PODARGUS, a charioteer of Hector. Homer.

PŒAS, ſon of Thaumacus, was among the Argonauts.——The father of Philoctetes. The ſon is often called Pœantia proles, on account of his father. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 45.

PŒCĬLE, a celebrated portico at Athens, which received its name from the variety (ποικιλος) of paintings which it contained. It was there that Zeno kept his ſchool, and the ſtoics alſo received their leſſons there, whence their name (à στοα, a porch). The Pœcile was adorned with pictures of gods and benefactors, and among many others was that of the ſiege and ſacking of Troy, the battle of Theſeus againſt the Amazons, the fight between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians at Œnoe in Argolis, and of Atticus the great friend of Athens. The only reward which Miltiades obtained after the battle of Marathon, was to have his picture drawn more conſpicuous than that of the reſt of the officers that fought with him, in the repreſentation which was made of the engagement, which was hung up in the Pœcile, in commemoration of that celebrated victory. C. Nep. in Milt. & in Attic. 3.—Pauſ. 1.—Plin. 35.

PŒNI, a name given to the Carthaginians. It ſeems to be a corruption of the word Phœni or Phœnices, as the Carthaginians were of Phœnician origin. Serv. ad Virg. 1, v. 302.

PŒON. Vid. Pæon.

PŒONIA, a part of Macedonia. Vid. Pæonia.

PŒUS, a part of mount Pindus.

POGON, a harbour of the Trœzenians on the coaſt of the Peloponneſus. It received this name on account of its appearing to come forward before the town of Trœzene, as the beard, (πωγων,) does from the chin. Strab. 8.—Mela. 2.

POLA, a city of Iſtria, founded by the Colchians, and afterwards made a Roman colony, and called Pietas Julia. Plin. 3, c. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Strab. 1 & 5.

POLEMARCHUS. Vid. Archon.——The aſſaſſin of Polydorus.

POLEMOCRATIA, a queen of Thrace, who fled to Brutus after the murder of Cæſar. She retired from her kingdom becauſe her ſubjects had lately murdered her huſband.

PŎLĔMON, a youth of Athens, ſon of Philoſtratus. He was much given to debauchery and extravagance, and ſpent the greateſt part of his life in riot and drunkenneſs. He once, when intoxicated, entered the ſchool of Xenocrates, while the philoſopher was giving his pupils a lecture upon the effects of intemperance, and he was ſo ſtruck with the eloquence of the academician, and the force of his arguments, that from that moment he renounced the diſſipated life he had led, and applied himſelf totally to the ſtudy of philoſophy. He was then in the 30th year of his age, and from that time he never drank any other liquor but water; and after the death of Xenocrates he ſucceeded in the ſchool where his reformation had been effected. He died about 270 years before Chriſt, in an extreme old age. Diog. in vitâ.—Horat. 2, ſat. 3, v. 254.——A ſon of Zeno the rhetorician, made king of Pontus by Antony. He attended his patron in his expedition againſt Parthia. After the battle of Actium he was received into favor by Auguſtus, though he had fought in the cauſe of Antony. He was killed ſome time after by the barbarians near the Palus Mæotis, againſt whom he had made war. Strab.—Dion.——His ſon of the ſame name was confirmed on his father's throne by the Roman emperors, and the province of Cilicia was alſo added to his kingdom by Claudius.——An officer in the army of Alexander, intimate with Philotas, &c. Curt. 7, c. 1, &c.——A rhetorician at Rome, who wrote a poem on weights and measures, ſtill extant. He was maſter to Perſius the celebrated ſatyriſt, and died in the age of Nero.——A ſophiſt of Laodicea in Aſia Minor, in the reign of Adrian. He was often ſent to the emperor with an embaſſy by his countrymen, which he executed with great ſucceſs. He was greatly favored by Adrian, from whom he exacted much money. In the 56th year of his age he buried himſelf alive, as he labored with the gout. He wrote declamations in Greek.

Polias, a ſirname of Minerva, as protectreſs of cities.

Polichna, a town of Troas on Ida. Herodot. 6, c. 28.——Another of Crete. Thucyd. 2, c. 85.

Polieia, a feſtival at Thebes in honor of Apollo, who was repreſented there with grey hair, (πολιῷ), contrary to the practice of all other places. The victim was a bull, but when it happened once that no bull could be found, an ox was taken from the cart and ſacrificed. From that time the ſacrifice of laboring oxen was deemed lawful, though before it was looked upon as a capital crime.

Polisma, a town of Troas, on the Simois. Strab. 13.

Polistrătus, an Epicurean philoſopher, born the ſame day as Hippoclides, with whom he always lived in the greateſt intimacy. They both died at the ſame hour. Diog.—Val. Max. 1.

Polītes, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Pyrrhus in his father's preſence. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 526, &c. His ſon, who bore the ſame name, followed Æneas into Italy, and was one of the friends of young Aſcanius. Id. 5, v. 564.

Politorium, a city of the Latins deſtroyed by the Romans, before Chriſt 639. Liv. 1, c. 33.

Pollinea, a proſtitute, &c. Juv. 2, v. 68.

Polla Argentaria, the wife of the poet Lucan. She aſſiſted her huſband in correcting the three firſt books of his Pharſalia. Stat. Sylv. 1 & 2.

Pollentia, now Polenza, a town of Liguria in Italy, famous for wool. There was a celebrated battle fought there between the Romans and Alaric, king of the Huns, about the 403d year of the Chriſtian era; in which the former, according to ſome, obtained the victory. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Plin. 8, c. 48.—Suet. Tib. 37.—Sil. 8, v. 598.—Cic. 11, Fam. 13.——A town of Majorca. Plin. & Mela.——Of Picenum. Liv. 39, c. 44. l. 41, c. 27.

Pollio, C. Aſinius, a Roman conſul, under the reign of Auguſtus, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf as much by his eloquence and writings as by his exploits in the field. He defeated the Dalmatians, and favored the cauſe of Antony againſt Auguſtus. He patronized, with great liberality, the poets Virgil and Horace, who have immortalized him in their writings. He was the firſt who raiſed a public library at Rome, and indeed his example was afterwards followed by many of the emperors. In his library were placed the ſtatues of all the learned men of every age, and Varro was the only perſon who was honored there during his lifetime. He was with J. Cæſar when he croſſed the Rubicon. He was greatly eſteemed by Auguſtus when he had become one of his adherents, after the ruin of Antony. Pollio wrote ſome tragedies, orations, and an hiſtory, which was divided into 17 books. All theſe compoſitions are loſt, and nothing remains of his writings except a few letters to Cicero. He died in the 80th year of his age, A. D. 4. He is the perſon in whoſe honor Virgil has inſcribed his fourth eclogue, Pollio, as a reconciliation was effected between Auguſtus and Antony during his conſulſhip. The poet, it is ſuppoſed by ſome, makes mention of a ſon of the conſul born about this time, and is laviſh in his excurſions into futurity, and his predictions of approaching proſperity. Paterc. 2, c. 86.—Horat. 2, od. 1. Sat. 10, l. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 3 & 4.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Quint. 10.——Annius, a man accuſed of ſedition before Tiberius, and acquitted. He afterwards conſpired againſt Nero, &c. Tacit. 6, c. 9. l. 15, c. 56.——Vedius, one of the friends of Auguſtus, who uſed to feed his fiſhes with human fleſh. This cruelty was diſcovered when one of his ſervants broke a glaſs in the preſence of Auguſtus, who had been invited to a feaſt. The maſter ordered the ſervant to be ſeized; but he threw himſelf at the feet of the emperor, and begged him to interfere, and not to ſuffer him to be devoured by fiſhes. Upon this the cauſes of his apprehenſion were examined, and Auguſtus, aſtoniſhed at the barbarity of his favorite, cauſed the ſervant to be diſmiſſed, all the fiſh-ponds to be filled up, and the cryſtal glaſſes of Pollio to be broken to pieces.——A man who poiſoned Britannicus, at the inſtigation of Nero.——An hiſtorian in the age of Conſtantine the Great.

Pollius Felix, a friend of the poet Statius, to whom he dedicated his ſecond Sylva.

Pollupex, now Final, a town of Genoa.

Pollutia, a daughter of L. Vetus, put to death after her huſband Rubellius Plautus, by order of Nero, &c. Tacit. 16. Ann. c. 10 & 11.

Pollux, a ſon of Jupiter, by Leda the wife of Tyndarus. He was brother to Caſtor. [Vid. Caſtor.]——A Greek writer, who floriſhed A. D. 186, in the reign of Commodus, and died in the 58th year of his age. He was born at Naucratis, and taught rhetoric at Athens, and wrote an uſeful work called Onomaſticon, of which the beſt edition is that of Hemſterhuſius, 2 vols. fol. Amſt. 1706.

Poltis, a king of Thrace, in the time of the Trojan war.

Polus, a celebrated Grecian actor.——A ſophiſt of Agrigentum.

Polusca, a town of Latium, formerly the capital of the Volſci. The inhabitants were called Polluſtini. Liv. 2, c. 39.

Polyænus, a native of Macedonia, who wrote eight books in Greek of ſtratagems, which he dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus, while they were making war againſt the Parthians. He wrote alſo other books which have been loſt, among which was an hiſtory, with a deſcription of the city of Thebes. The beſt editions of his ſtratagems are thoſe of Maſvicius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1690, and of Murſinna, 12mo. Berlin, 1756.——A friend of Philopœmen.——An orator in the age of Julius Cæſar. He wrote in three books an account of Antony's expedition in Parthia, and likewiſe publiſhed orations.——A mathematician, who afterwards followed the tenets of Epicurus, and diſregarded geometry as a falſe and uſeleſs ſtudy. Cic. in Acad. quæſt. 4.

Polyarchus, the brother of a queen of Cyrene, &c. Polyæn. 8.

Polybidas, a general after the death of Ageſipolis the Lacedæmonian. He reduced Olynthus.

Polybius, or Polȳbus, a king of Corinth, who married Peribœa, whom ſome have called Merope. He was ſon of Mercury by Chthonophyle, the daughter of Sicyon, king of Sicyon. He permitted his wife, who had no children, to adopt and educate as her own ſon, Œdipus, who had been found by his ſhepherds expoſed in the woods. He had a daughter called Lyſianaſſa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus, ſon of Bias king of Argos. As he had no male child, he left his kingdom to Adraſtus, who had been baniſhed from his throne, and who had fled to Corinth for protection. Hygin. fab. 66.—Pauſ. 2, c. 6. Apollod. 3, c. 5.

Polybius, a native of Megalopolis in Peloponneſus, ſon of Lycortas. He was early initiated in the duties, and made acquainted with the qualifications of a ſtateſman, by his father, who was a ſtrong ſupporter of the Achæan league, and under him Philopœmen was taught the art of war. In Macedonia he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valor againſt the Romans, and when Perſeus had been conquered, he was carried to the capital of Italy as a priſoner of war. But he was not long buried in the obſcurity of a dungeon. Scipio and Fabius were acquainted with his uncommon abilities as a warrior and as a man of learning, and they made him their friend by kindneſs and attention. Polybius was not inſenſible to their merit; he accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and was preſent at the taking of Carthage and Numantia. In the midſt of his proſperity, however, he felt the diſtreſſes of his country, which had been reduced into a Roman province, and, like a true patriot, he relieved its wants, and eaſed its ſervitude by making uſe of the influence which he had acquired by his acquaintance with the moſt powerful Romans. After the death of his friend and benefactor Scipio, he retired from Rome, and paſſed the reſt of his days at Megalopolis, where he enjoyed the comforts and honors which every good man can receive from the gratitude of his citizens, and from the ſelf-ſatisfaction which attends a humane and benevolent heart. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 124 years before Chriſt, of a wound which he had received by a fall from his horſe. He wrote an univerſal hiſtory in Greek, divided into 40 books, which began with the wars of Rome with the Carthaginians, and finiſhed with the conqueſt of Macedonia by Paulus. The greateſt part of this valuable hiſtory is loſt; the five firſt books are extant, and of the twelve following the fragments are numerous. The hiſtory of Polybius is admired for its authenticity, and he is, perhaps, the only hiſtorian among the Greeks, who was experimentally and profeſſedly acquainted with the military operations, and the political meaſures of which he makes mention. He has been recommended in every age and country as the beſt maſter in the art of war, and nothing can more effectually prove the eſteem in which he was held among the Romans, than to mention that Brutus, the murderer of Cæſar, peruſed his hiſtory with the greateſt attention, epitomized it, and often retired from the field where he had drawn his ſword againſt Octavius and Antony, to read the inſtructive pages which deſcribed the great actions of his anceſtors. Polybius, however great and entertaining, is ſometimes cenſured for his unneceſſary digreſſions, for his uncouth and ill-digeſted narrations, for his negligence, and the inaccurate arrangement of his words. But every where there is inſtruction to be found, information to be collected, and curious facts to be obtained, and it reflects not much honor upon Livy for calling the hiſtorian, from whom he has copied whole books almoſt word for word, without gratitude or acknowledgement, haudquaquam ſpernendus auctor. Dionyſius alſo of Halicarnaſſus, is one of his moſt violent accuſers; but the hiſtorian has rather expoſed his ignorance of true criticiſm, than diſcovered inaccuracy or inelegance. The beſt editions of Polybius are thoſe of Gronovius, 3 vols. 8vo. Amſt. 1670, of Erneſti, 3 vols. 8vo. 1764, and of Schweighæuſer, 7 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1785. Plut. in Phil. in præc.—Liv. 30, c. 45.—Pauſ. 8, c. 30.—A freed man of Auguſtus. Suet.——A phyſician, diſciple and ſucceſſor of Hippocrates.——A ſoothſayer of Corinth, who foretold to his ſons the fate that attended them in the Trojan war.

Polybœa, a daughter of Amyclas and Diomede, ſiſter to Hyacinthus. Pauſ. 3, c. 19.

Polybœtes. Vid. Polypœtes.

Polybŏtes, one of the giants who made war againſt Jupiter. He was killed by Neptune, who cruſhed him under a part of the iſland of Cos, as he was walking acroſs the Ægean. Pauſ. 1, c. 2.—Hygin. in præ. fab.

Polybus, a king of Egypt in the time of the Trojan war.——One of Penelope's ſuitors. Ovid. Heroid. 1.——A king of Sicyon.——A king of Corinth. Vid. Polybius.

Polycăon, a ſon of Lelex. He received divine honors after death with his wife Meſſene, at Lacedæmon, where he had reigned. Pauſ. 4, c. 1, &c.——A ſon of Butes, who married a daughter of Hyllus.

Polycarpus, a famous Greek writer, born at Smyrna, and educated at the expence of a rich but pious lady. Some ſuppoſe that he was St. John's diſciple. He became biſhop of Smyrna, and went to Rome to ſettle the feſtival of Eaſter, but to no purpoſe. He was condemned to be burnt at Smyrna, A. D. 167. His epiſtle to the Philippians is ſimple and modeſt, yet replete with uſeful precepts and rules for the conduct of life. The beſt edition of Polycarp's epiſtle, is that of Oxon, 8vo. 1708, being annexed to the works of Ignatius.

Polycaste, the youngeſt of the daughters of Neſtor. According to ſome authors ſhe married Telemachus, when he viſited her father's court in queſt of Ulyſſes.

Polychăres, a rich Meſſenian, ſaid to have been the cauſe of the war which was kindled between the Spartans and his countrymen, which was called the firſt Meſſenian war.

Polyclēa, the mother of Theſſalus, &c.

Polўcles, an Athenian in the time of Demetrius, &c. Polyæn. 5.——A famous athlete, often crowned at the four ſolemn games of the Greeks. He had a ſtatue in Jupiter's grove at Olympia. Pauſ. 6, c. 1.

Polyclētus, a celebrated ſtatuary of Sicyon, about 232 years before Chriſt. He was univerſally reckoned the moſt ſkilful artiſt of his profeſſion among the ancients, and the ſecond rank was given to Phidias. One of his pieces, in which he had repreſented a body-guard of the king of Perſia, was ſo happily executed, and ſo nice and exact in all its proportions, that it was looked upon as a moſt perfect model, and accordingly called the Rule. He was acquainted with architecture. Pauſ. 2 & 6.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.——Another who lived about 30 years after.——A favorite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba.

Polyclītus, an hiſtorian of Lariſſa. Athen. 12.—Ælian. 16, c. 41.

Polycrătes, a tyrant of Samos, well known for the continual flow of good fortune which attended him. He became very powerful, and made himſelf maſter, not only of the neighbouring iſlands, but alſo of ſome cities on the coaſt of Aſia. He had a fleet of a hundred ſhips of war, and was ſo univerſally reſpected, that Amaſis, the king of Egypt, made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, terrified by his continued proſperity, adviſed him to chequer his enjoyments, by relinquiſhing ſome of his moſt favorite objects. Polycrates complied, and threw into the ſea a beautiful ſeal, the moſt valuable of his jewels. The voluntary loſs of ſo precious a ſeal afflicted him for ſome time, but a few days after, he received as a preſent a large fiſh, in whoſe belly the jewel was found. Amaſis no ſooner heard this, than he rejected all alliance with the tyrant of Samos, and obſerved, that ſooner or later his good fortune would vaniſh. Some time after Polycrates viſited Magneſia on the Mæander, where he had been invited by Oroetes, the governor. He was ſhamefully put to death, 522 years before Chriſt, merely becauſe the governor wiſhed to terminate the proſperity of Polycrates. The daughter of Polycrates had diſſuaded her father from going to the houſe of Oroetes, on account of the bad dreams which ſhe had had, but her advice was diſregarded. Pauſ. 8, c. 14.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 3, c. 39, &c.——A ſophiſt of Athens, who, to engage the public attention, wrote a panegyric on Buſiris and Clytemneſtra. Quintil. 2, c. 17.——An ancient ſtatuary.

POLYCRĒTA, or POLYCRĪTA, a young woman of Naxos, who became the wife of Diognetus, the general of the Erythreans, &c. Polyæn. 8.——Another woman of Naxos, who died through exceſs of joy. Plut. de clar. Mul.

POLYCRĬTUS, a man who wrote the life of Dionyſius, the tyrant of Sicily. Diog.

POLYCTOR, the huſband of Stygna, one of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——The father of Piſander, one of Penelope's ſuitors. ——An athlete of Elis. It is ſaid that he obtained a victory at Olympia by bribing his adverſary, who was ſuperior to him in ſtrength and courage. Pauſ. 5, c. 21.

POLYDÆMON, an Aſſyrian prince killed by Perſeus. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

POLYDĂMAS, a Trojan, ſon of Antenor by Theano, the ſiſter of Hecuba. He married Lycaſte, a natural daughter of Priam. He is accuſed by ſome of having betrayed his country to the Greeks. Dares. Phry.—— A ſon of Panthous, born the ſame night as Hector. He was inferior to none of the Trojans, except Hector, who fought againſt the Greeks. He was at laſt killed by Ajax, after he had ſlaughtered a great number of the enemy. Dictyſ. Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 12, &c.——A celebrated athlete, who imitated Hercules in whatever he did. He killed a lion with his fiſt, and it is ſaid that he could ſtop a chariot with his hand in its moſt rapid courſe. He was one day with ſome of his friends in a cave, when on a ſudden, a large piece of rock came tumbling down, and while all fled away, he attempted to receive the falling fragment in his arms. His prodigious ſtrength, however, was inſufficient, and he was inſtantly cruſhed to pieces under the rock. Pauſ. 6, c. 5.——One of Alexander's officers, intimate with Parmenio. Curt. 4, c. 15.

POLYDAMNA, the wife of Thonis, king of Egypt. It is ſaid that ſhe gave Helen a certain powder, which had the wonderful power of driving away care and melancholy. Homer. Od. 4, v. 228.

POLYDECTES, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was ſon of Eunomus. Pauſ. 3, c. 7.——A ſon of Magnes, king of the iſland of Seriphos. He received with great kindneſs Danae and her ſon Perſeus, who had been expoſed on the ſea by Acriſius. [Vid. Perſeus.] He took particular care of the education of Perſeus; but when he became enamoured of Danae, he removed him from his kingdom, apprehenſive of his reſentment. Some time after he paid his addreſſes to Danae, and when ſhe rejected him, he prepared to offer her violence. Danae fled to the altar of Minerva for protection, and Dictys, the brother of Polydectes, who had himſelf ſaved her from the ſea-waters, oppoſed her raviſher, and armed himſelf in her defence. At this critical moment, Perſeus arrived, and with Meduſa's head he turned into ſtones Polydectes, with the aſſociates of his guilt. The crown of Seriphos was given to Dictys, who had ſhewn himſelf ſo active in the cauſe of innocence. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 242.—Hygin. fab. 63, &c.——A ſculptor of Greece. Plin.

POLYDEUCĒA, a fountain of Laconia, near Therapne. Strab. 9.

POLYDŌRA, a daughter of Peleus king of Theſſaly, by Antigone, the daughter of Eurytion. She married the river Sperchius, by whom ſhe had Mneſtheus. Apollod. ——One of the Oceanides. Heſiod.—— A daughter of Meleager king of Calydon, who married Proteſilaus. She killed herſelf when ſhe heard that her huſband was dead. The wife of Proteſilaus is more commonly called Laodamia. [Vid. Proteſilaus.] Pauſ. 4, c. 2.——A daughter of Perieres.——An iſland of the Propontis near Cyzicus.

POLYDŌRUS, a ſon of Alcamenes, king of Sparta. He put an end to the war which had been carried on during 20 years, between Meſſenia and his ſubjects, and during his reign, the Lacedæmonians planted two colonies, one at Crotona, and the other at Locri. He was univerſally reſpected. He was aſſaſſinated by a nobleman, called Polemarchus. His ſon Eurycrates ſucceeded him 724 years before Chriſt. Pauſ. 3.—Herodot. 7, c. 204.——A celebrated carver of Rhodes, who with one ſtone made the famous ſtatue of Laocoon and his children. Plin. 34, c. 8.——A ſon of Hippomedon, who went with the Epigoni to the ſecond Theban war. Pauſ. 2.——A ſon of Cadmus and Hermione, who married Nycteis, by whom he had Labdacus, the father of Laius.

Laius. He had ſucceeded to the throne of Thebes, when his father had gone to Illyricum. Apollod. 3.——A brother of Jaſon of Pheræ, who killed his brother, and ſeized upon his poſſeſſions. Diod. 15.——A ſon of Priam killed by Achilles.——Another ſon of Priam by Hecuba, or according to others by Laothoe, the daughter of Altes, king of Pedaſus. As he was young and inexperienced when Troy was beſieged by the Greeks, his father removed him to the court of Polymneſtor, king of Thrace, and alſo entruſted to the care of the monarch a large ſum of money, and the greateſt part of his treaſures, till his country was freed from foreign invaſion. No ſooner was the death of Priam known in Thrace, than Polymneſtor made himſelf maſter of the riches which were in his poſſeſſion, and to enſure them the better, he aſſaſſinated young Polydorus, and threw his body into the ſea, where it was found by Hecuba. [Vid. Hecuba.] According to Virgil, the body of Polydorus was buried near the ſhore by his aſſaſſin, and there grew on his grave a myrtle, whoſe boughs dropped blood, when Æneas, going to Italy, attempted to tear them from the tree. Polygius, a ſirname of Mercury. Pauſ.

Polygnōtus, a celebrated painter of Thaſos, about 422 years before the Chriſtian era. His father's name was Aglaophon. He adorned one of the public porticos of Athens with his paintings, in which he had repreſented the moſt ſtriking events of the Trojan war. He particularly excelled in giving grace, livelineſs, and expreſſion to his pieces. The Athenians were ſo pleaſed with him, that they offered to reward his labors with whatever he pleaſed to accept. He declined this generous offer, and the Amphictyonic council, which was compoſed of the repreſentatives of the principal cities of Greece, ordered that Polygnotus ſhould be maintained at the public expence wherever he went. Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plin. 33 & 34.—Plut. in Cim.—Pauſ. 10, c. 25, &c.—A ſtatuary.—Plin. 34.

Polygŏnus and Telegonus, ſons of Proteus and Coronis, were killed by Hercules. Apollod.

Polyhymnia and Polymnia, one of the Muſes, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemoſyne. She preſided over ſinging and rhetoric, and was deemed the inventreſs of harmony. She was repreſented veiled in white, holding a ſceptre in her left hand, and with her right raiſed up, as if ready to harangue. She had a crown of jewels on her head. Heſiod. Theog.—Plut. in Symp.—Horat. 1, od. 1.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 9.

Polyidius, a phyſician who brought back to life Glaucus, the ſon of Minos, by applying to his body a certain herb, with which he had ſeen a ſerpent reſtore life to another which was dead. [Vid. Glaucus.] Apollod. 3, c. 3.—A ſon of Hercules by one of the daughters of Theſtius. Apollod.—A Corinthian ſoothſayer, called alſo Polybius.—A dithyrambic poet, painter, and muſician.

Polylāus, a ſon of Hercules and Eurybia.

Polymĕnes, an officer appointed to take care of Egypt after it had been conquered by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 8.

Polymēde, a daughter of Autolycus, who married Æſon, by whom ſhe had Jaſon. She ſurvived her huſband only a few days. Apollod. 1, c. 13.

Polymedon, one of Priam's illegitimate children.

Polymēla, one of Diana's companions. She was daughter of Phylas, and had a ſon by Mercury. Homer. Il. 16.——A daughter of Æolus ſeduced by Ulyſſes.—A daughter of Actor. She was the firſt wife of Peleus the father of Achilles.

Polymnestes, a Greek poet of Colophon. Pauſ. 1, c. 14.—A native of Thera, father of Battus or Ariſtoles, by Phronima, the daughter of Etearchus, king of Oaxus. Herodot 4, c. 150.

Polymnestor, a king of the Thracian Cherſoneſus, who married Ilione the eldeſt of Priam's daughters. When the Greeks beſieged Troy, Priam ſent the greateſt part of his treaſures, together with Polydorus the youngeſt of his ſons, to Thrace, where they were entruſted to the care of Polymneſtor. The Thracian monarch paid every attention to his brother-in-law; but when he was informed that Priam was dead, he murdered him to become maſter of the riches which were in his poſſeſſion. At that time, the Greeks were returning victorious from Troy, followed by all their captives, among whom was Hecuba, the mother of Polydorus. The fleet ſtopped on the coaſts of Thrace, where one of the female captives diſcovered on the ſhore the body of Polydorus, whom Polymneſtor had thrown into the ſea. The dreadful intelligence was immediately communicated to the mother, and Hecuba, who recollected the frightful dreams which ſhe had had the preceding night, did not doubt but Polymneſtor was the cruel aſſaſſin. She reſolved to revenge her ſon's death, and immediately ſhe called out Polymneſtor, with wishing to impart to him a matter of the most important nature. The tyrant was drawn into the snare, and was no sooner introduced into the apartments of the Trojan princess, than the female captives rushed upon him, and put out his eyes with their pins, while Hecuba murdered his two children, who had accompanied him. According to Euripides, the Greeks condemned Polymnestor to be banished into a distant island for his perfidy. Hyginus, however, relates the whole differently, and observes, that when Polydorus was sent to Thrace, Ilione his sister took him instead of her son Deiphilus, who was of the same age, apprehensive of her husband's cruelty. The monarch was unacquainted with the imposition, he looked upon Polydorus as his own son, and treated Deiphilus as the brother of Ilione. After the destruction of Troy, the conquerors, who wished the house and family of Priam to be totally extirpated, offered Electra, the daughter of Agamemnon, to Polymnestor, if he would destroy Ilione and Polydorus. The monarch accepted the offer, and immediately dispatched his own son Deiphilus, whom he had been taught to regard as Polydorus. Polydorus, who passed as the son of Polymnestor, consulted the oracle after the murder of Deiphilus, and when he was informed that his father was dead, his mother a captive in the hands of the Greeks, and his country in ruins, he communicated the answer of the god to Ilione, whom he had always regarded as his mother. Ilione told him the measures she had pursued to save his life, and upon this he avenged the perfidy of Polymnestor, by putting out his eyes. Eurip. in Hecub.—Hygin. fab. 109. —Virg. Æn. 3, v. 45, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, 430, &c.——A king of Arcadia, succeeded on the throne by Ecmis. Pausan. 8. ——A young Milesian, who took a hare in running, and afterwards obtained a prize at the Olympic games.

POLYNĪCES, a son of Œdipus, king of Thebes, by Jocasta. He inherited his father's throne with his brother Eteocles, and it was mutually agreed between the two brothers, that they should reign each a year alternately. Eteocles first ascended the throne by right of seniority; but when the year was expired, he refused to resign the crown to his brother. Polynices, upon this, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, the daughter of Adrastus, the king of the country, and levied a large army, at the head of which he marched against Thebes. The command of this army was divided among seven celebrated chiefs, who were to attack the seven gates of the city of Thebes. The battle was decided by a single combat between the two brothers, who both killed one another. [Vid. Eteocles.] Æschyl. sept. ante Theb.—*Eurip. POLYNOE, one of the Nereides. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

POLYPĒMON, a famous thief, called also Procrustes, who plundered all the travellers about the Cephisus, and near Eleusis in Attica. He was killed by Theseus. Ovid calls him father of Procrustes, and Apollodorus of Sinis. Vid. Procrustes. Pausan. 1, c. 38.—Ovid. in Ib. 409.—Diod. 4.—Plut. in Thes.

POLYPERCHON, or POLYSPERCHON, one of the officers of Alexander. Antipater, at his death, appointed him governor of the kingdom of Macedonia, in preference to his own son Cassander. Polyperchon, though old, and a man of experience, shewed great ignorance in the administration of the government. He became cruel not only to the Greeks, or such as opposed his ambitious views, but even to the helpless and innocent children and friends of Alexander, to whom he was indebted for his rise and military reputation. He was killed in a battle 309 B. C. Curt.—Diod. 17, &c.—Justin. 13.

POLYPHĒMUS, a celebrated Cyclops, king of all the Cyclops in Sicily, and son of Neptune and Thoosa, the daughter of Phorcys. He is represented as a monster of strength, of a tall stature, and one eye in the middle of the forehead. He fed upon human flesh, and kept his flocks on the coasts of Sicily, when Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, was driven there. The Grecian prince, with twelve of his companions, visited the coast, and were seized by the Cyclops, who confined them in his cave, and daily devoured two of them. Ulysses would have shared the fate of his companions, had he not intoxicated the Cyclops, and put out his eye with a firebrand while he was asleep. Polyphemus was awaked by the sudden pain, he stopped the entrance of his cave, but Ulysses made his escape by creeping between the legs of the rams of the Cyclops, as they were led out to feed on the mountains. Polyphemus became enamoured of Galatæa, but his addresses were disregarded, and the nymph shunned his presence. The Cyclops was more earnest, and when he saw Galatæa surrender herself to the pleasures of Acis, he crushed his rival with a piece of a broken rock. Theocrit. 1.—*Ovid. POLYPHONTES, one of the Heraclidæ, who who killed Cresphontes, king of Messenia, and usurped his crown. Hygin. fab. 137. ——One of the Theban generals, under Eteocles. Æschyl. Sept. ante Theb.

Polypœtes, a son of Pirithous and Hippodamia. Homer. Il. 2.—Paus. 10, v. 26.——A son of Apollo by Pythia.——One of the Trojans whom Æneas saw when he visited the infernal regions. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 484.

Polysperchon. Vid. Polyperchon.

Polystratus, a Macedonian soldier, who found Darius after he had been stabbed by Bessus, who gave him water to drink, and carried the last injunctions of the dying monarch to Alexander. Curt. 5, c. 13.——An epicurean philosopher who flourished B. C. 238.

Polytecnus, an artist of Colophon, who married Ædon, the daughter of Pandastrus.

Polytion, a friend of Alcibiades, with whom he prophaned the mysteries of Ceres. Paus. 1, c. 2.

Polytimētus, a river of Sogdiana. Curt. 6, c. 4.

Polyphron, a prince killed by his nephew Alexander, the tyrant of Pheræ.

Polytropus, a man sent by the Lacedæmonians with an army against the Arcadians. He was killed at Orchomenus. Diod. 15.

Polyxena, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. Achilles became enamoured of her, and solicited her hand, and their marriage would have been consummated, had not Hector her brother opposed it. Polyxena, according to some authors, accompanied her father when he went to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his son Hector. Some time after the Grecian hero came into the temple of Apollo to obtain a sight of the Trojan princess, but he was murdered there by Paris; and Polyxena, who had returned his affection, was so afflicted at his death, that she went and sacrificed herself on his tomb. Some however suppose, that that sacrifice was not voluntary, but that the manes of Achilles appeared to the Greeks as they were going to embark, and demanded of them the sacrifice of Polyxena. The princess, who was in the number of the captives, was upon this dragged to her lover's tomb, and there immolated by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 5, &c.—Dictys. Cret. 3, & 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 321.—Catul. ep 65.—Hygin. fab. 90.

Polyxenidas, a Syrian general, who flourished B. C. 192.

Polyxenus, one of the Greek princes during the Trojan war. His father's name was Agasthenes. Homer. Il. 2.—Paus. 5, c. 3.——A son of Medea by Jason.——A young Athenian who became blind, &c. Plut. in Par.——A general of Dionysius, from whom he revolted.

Polyxo, a priestess of Apollo's temple in Lemnos. She was also nurse to queen Hypsipyle. It was by her advice that the Lemnian women murdered all their husbands. Apollon. 1.—Flacc. 2.—Hygin. fab. 15.——One of the Atlantides.——A native of Argos, who married Tlepolemus, son of Hercules. She followed him to Rhodes, after the murder of his uncle Licymnius, and when he departed for the Trojan war with the rest of the Greek princes, she became the sole mistress of the kingdom. After the Trojan war, Helen fled from Peloponnesus to Rhodes, where Polyxo reigned. Polyxo detained her, and to punish her as being the cause of a war in which Tlepolemus had perished, she ordered her to be hanged on a tree by her female servants, disguised in the habit of Furies. [Vid. Helena.] Paus. 5, c. 19.——The wife of Nycteus.——One of the wives of Danaus.

Polyzelus, a Greek poet of Rhodes. He had written a poem on the origin and birth of Bacchus, Venus, the Muses, &c. Some of his verses are quoted by Athenæus. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 14.——An Athenian archon.

Pomaxæthres, a Parthian soldier, who killed Crassus according to some. Plut.

Pometia, Pometii, and Pometi Suessa, a town of Italy, totally destroyed by the Romans, because it had revolted. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775.

Pometīna, one of the tribes of the people at Rome.

Pomōna, a nymph at Rome who was supposed to preside over gardens, and to be the goddess of all sorts of fruit-trees. She had a temple at Rome, and a regular priest called Flamen Pomonalis, who offered sacrifices to her divinity, for the preservation of fruit. She was generally represented sitting on a basket full of flowers and fruit, and holding a bough in one hand, and apples in the other. Pomona was particularly delighted with the cultivation of the earth, she disdained the toils of the field and the fatigues of hunting. Many of the gods of the country endeavoured to gain her affection, but she received their addresses with coldness. Vertumnus was the only one, who, by assuming different shapes and introducing himself into her company under the form of an old woman, prevailed upon her to break her vow of celibacy and to marry him. This deity was well known among the Greeks. Ovid. Met. v. 628, &c.

Pompeia, a daughter of Sextus Pompeius

pey, by Scribonia. She was promiſed to Marcellus, as a means of procuring a reconciliation between her father and the triumvirs, but ſhe married Scribonius Libo.——A daughter of Pompey the Great, Julius Cæſar's third wife. She was accuſed of incontinence, becauſe Clodius had introduced himſelf in women's cloaths into the room where ſhe was celebrating the myſteries of Cybele. Cæſar repudiated her upon this accuſation. Plut.——The wife of Annæus Seneca, was the daughter of Pompeius Paullinus.—There was a portico at Rome, called Pompeia, much frequented by all orders of people. Ovid. art. am. v. 67. —Mart. 11, ep. 48.

POMPEIA LEX, by Pompey the Great, de ambitu, A. U. C. 701. It ordained that whatever perſon had been convicted of the crime of ambitus, ſhould be pardoned, provided he could impeach two others of the ſame crime, and occaſion the condemnation of one of them.——Another by the ſame, A. U. C. 701, which forbad the uſe of laudatores in trials, or perſons who gave a good character of the priſoner then impeached.——Another by the ſame, A.U.C. 683. It reſtored to the tribunes their original power and authority, of which they had been deprived by the Cornelian law.——Another by the ſame A. U. C. 701. It ſhortened the forms of trials, and enacted that the three firſt days of a trial ſhould be employed in examining witneſſes, and it allowed only one day to the parties to make their accuſation and defence. The plaintiff was confined to two hours, and the defendant to three. This law had for its object the riots, which happened from the quarrels of Clodius and Milo.——Another by the ſame, A. U. C. 698. It required, that the judges ſhould be the richeſt of every century, contrary to the uſual form. It was however requiſite that they ſhould be ſuch as the Aurelian law preſcribed.——Another of the ſame, A. U. C. 701. Pompey was by this empowered to continue in the government of Spain five years longer.

POMPEIĀNUS JUPITER, a large ſtatue of Jupiter, near Pompey's theatre, whence it received its name. Plin. 34, c. 7.

POMPEIĀNUS, a Roman knight of Antioch, raiſed to offices of the greateſt truſt, under the emperor Aurelius, whoſe daughter Lucilla he married. He lived in great popularity at Rome, and retired from the court when Commodus ſucceeded to the imperial crown. He ought, according to Julian's opinion, to have been choſen and adopted as ſucceſſor by M. Aurelius.——A general of Maxentius, killed by Conſtantine.——A Roman put to death by Caracalla.

POMPEII or POMPEIUM, a town of Campania, built, as ſome ſuppoſe, by Hercules. It was partly demoliſhed by an earthquake, A. D. 63, and afterwards rebuilt. Sixteen years after it was ſwallowed up by another earthquake, which accompanied one of the eruptions of mount Veſuvius. Herculaneum, in its neighbourhood, ſhared the ſame fate. The people of the town were then aſſembled in a theatre, where public ſpectacles were exhibited. Vid. Herculaneum. Liv. 9, c. 38.—Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Dionyſ. 1.—Seneca Quæſt. 4.

POMPEIOPŎLIS, a town of Cilicia, formerly called Soli. Mela. 1, c. 13.——Another in Paphlagonia, originally called Eupatoria, which name was exchanged when Pompey conquered Mithridates.

Q. POMPEIUS, a conſul who carried on war againſt the Numantines, and made a ſhameful treaty. He is the firſt of that noble family, of whom mention is made. Flor. 2, c. 18.——Cneus, a Roman general, who made war againſt the Marſi, and triumphed over the Piceni. He declared himſelf againſt Cinna and Marius, and ſupported the intereſt of the republic. He was ſirnamed Strabo, becauſe he ſquinted. While he was marching againſt Marius, a plague broke out in his army, and raged with ſuch violence, that it carried away 11,000 men in a few days. He was killed by a flaſh of lightening, and as he had behaved with cruelty while in power, the people dragged his body through the ſtreets of Rome with an iron hook, and threw it into the Tiber. Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Pomp.——Rufus, a Roman conſul with Sylla. He was ſent to finiſh the Marſian war, but the army mutinied at the inſtigation of Pompeius Strabo, whom he was to ſucceed in command, and he was aſſaſſinated by ſome of the ſoldiers. Appian. Civ. 1.——A general who ſucceeded Metellus in Spain, and was the occaſion of a war with Numantia.——Another general taken priſoner by Mithridates.——Sextus, a governor of Spain, who cured himſelf of the gout by placing himſelf in corn above the knee. Plin. 22, c. 25.——Rufus a grandſon of Sylla.——A tribune of the ſoldiers in Nero's reign, deprived of his office when Piſo's conſpiracy was diſcovered. Tacit.——A conſul praiſed for his learning and abilities. Ovid. ex pont. 4, ep. 1.——A ſon of Theophanes of Mitylene, famous for his intimacy with Pompey the Great, and for his writings. Tacit. Ann. 6.——A tribune of a pretorian cohort under Galba.——A Roman knight put to death by the emperor Claudius for his adultery with Meſſalina. Tacit. 11, Ann.——Cneus, ſirnamed named Magnus, from the greatneſs of his exploits, was ſon of Pompeius Strabo, and Lucilia. He early diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field of battle, and fought with ſucceſs and bravery under his father, whoſe courage and military prudence he imitated. He began his career with great popularity, the beauty and elegance of his perſon gained him admirers, and by pleading at the bar, he diſplayed his eloquence, and received the moſt unbounded applauſe. In the diſturbances which agitated Rome, by the ambition and avarice of Marius and Sylla, Pompey followed the intereſt of the latter, and by levying three legions for his ſervice he gained his friendſhip and his protection. In the 26th year of his age, he conquered Sicily, which was in the power of Marius and his adherents, and in 40 days he regained all the territories of Africa, which had forſaken the intereſt of Sylla. This rapid ſucceſs aſtoniſhed the Romans, and Sylla, who admired and dreaded the riſing power of Pompey, recalled him to Rome. Pompey immediately obeyed, and the dictator, by ſaluting him with the appellation of the Great, ſhewed to the world what expectations he formed from the maturer age of his victorious lieutenant. This ſounding title was not ſufficient to gratify the ambition of Pompey, he demanded a triumph, and when Sylla refuſed to grant it, he emphatically exclaimed, that the ſun ſhone with more ardor at his riſing than at his ſetting. His aſſurance gained what petitions and entreaties could not obtain, and he was the firſt Roman knight who, without an office under the appointment of the ſenate, marched in triumphal proceſſion through the ſtreets of Rome. He now appeared not as a dependant, but as a rival of the dictator, and his oppoſition to his meaſures totally excluded him from his will. After the death of Sylla, Pompey ſupported himſelf againſt the remains of the Marian faction, which were headed by Lepidus. He defeated them, put an end to the war which the revolt of Sertorius in Spain had occaſioned, and obtained a ſecond triumph, though ſtill a private citizen, about 73 years before the Chriſtian era. He was ſoon after made conſul, and in that office he reſtored the tribunitial power to its original dignity, and in forty days removed the pirates from the Mediterranean, where they had reigned for many years, and by their continual plunder and audacity, almoſt deſtroyed the whole naval power of Rome. While he proſecuted the piratical war, and extirpated theſe maritime robbers in their obſcure retreats in Cilicia, Pompey was called to greater undertakings, and by the influence of his friends at Rome, and of the tribune Manilius, he was empowered to finiſh the war againſt two of the moſt powerful monarchs of Aſia, Mithridates, king of Pontus, and Tigranes, king of Armenia. In this expedition Pompey ſhewed himſelf no ways inferior to Lucullus, who was then at the head of the Roman armies, and who reſigned with reluctance an office which would have made him the conqueror of Mithridates, and the maſter of all Aſia. His operations againſt the king of Pontus were bold and vigorous, and in a general engagement, the Romans ſo totally defeated the enemy, that the Aſiatic monarch eſcaped with difficulty from the field of battle. [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] Pompey did not loſe ſight of the advantages diſpatch would enſure; he entered Armenia, received the ſubmiſſion of king Tigranes, and after he had conquered the Albanians and Iberians, viſited countries which were ſcarce known to the Romans, and, like a maſter of the world, diſpoſed of kingdoms and provinces, and received homage from 12 crowned heads at once, he entered Syria, and puſhed his conqueſts as far as the Red Sea. Part of Arabia was ſubdued, Judæa became a Roman province, and when he had now nothing to fear from Mithridates, who had voluntarily deſtroyed himſelf, Pompey returned to Italy with all the pomp and majeſty of an eaſtern conqueror. The Romans dreaded his approach, they knew his power, and his influence among his troops, and they feared the return of another tyrannical Sylla. Pompey, however, baniſhed their fears, he diſbanded his army, and the conqueror of Aſia entered Rome like a private citizen. This modeſt and prudent behaviour gained him more friends and adherents than the moſt unbounded power aided with profuſion and liberality. He was honored with a triumph, and the Romans, for three ſucceſſive days, gazed with aſtoniſhment on the riches and the ſpoils which their conqueſts had acquired in the eaſt, and expreſſed their raptures at the ſight of the different nations, habits, and treaſures which preceded the conqueror's chariot. But it was not this alone which gratified the ambition, and flattered the pride of the Romans; the advantages of their conqueſts were more laſting than an empty ſhow, and when 20,000 talents were brought into the public treaſury, and when the revenues of the republic were raiſed from 50 to 85 millions of drachmæ, Pompey became more powerful, more flattered, and more envied. To ſtrengthen himſelf, and to triumph over his enemies, Pompey ſoon after united his intereſt with that of Cæſar and Craſſus, and formed the firſt triumvi-nate, by ſolemnly ſwearing, that their attachment ſhould be mutual, their cauſe common, and their union permanent. The agreement was completed by the marriage of Pompey with Julia, the daughter of Cæſar, and the provinces of the republic were arbitrarily divided among the triumvirs. Pompey was allotted Africa and the two Spains, while Craſſus repaired to Syria, to add Parthia to the empire of Rome, and Cæſar remained ſatisfied with the reſt, and the continuation of his power as governor of Gaul for five additional years. But this powerful confederacy was ſoon broken, the ſudden death of Julia, and the total defeat of Craſſus in Syria, ſhattered the political bands which held the jarring intereſt of Cæſar and Pompey united. Pompey dreaded his father-in-law, and yet he affected to deſpiſe him; and by ſuffering anarchy to prevail in Rome, he convinced his fellow-citizens of the neceſſity of inveſting him with dictatorial power. But while the conqueror of Mithridates was as a ſovereign at Rome, the adherents of Cæſar were not ſilent. They demanded that either the conſulſhip ſhould be given to him, or that he ſhould be continued in the government of Gaul. This juſt demand would perhaps have been granted, but Cato oppoſed it, and when Pompey ſent for the two legions which he had lent to Cæſar, the breach became more wide, and a civil war inevitable. Cæſar was privately preparing to meet his enemies, while Pompey remained indolent, and gratified his pride in ſeeing all Italy celebrate his recovery from an indiſpoſition by univerſal rejoicings. But he was ſoon rouſed from his inactivity, and it was now time to find his friends, if any thing could be obtained from the caprice and the fickleneſs of a people which he had once delighted and amuſed, by the exhibition of games and ſpectacles in a theatre which could contain 20,000 ſpectators. Cæſar was now near Rome, he had croſſed the Rubicon, which was a declaration of hoſtilities, and Pompey, who had once boaſted that he could raiſe legions to his aſſiſtance by ſtamping on the ground with his foot, fled from the city with precipitation, and retired to Brunduſium with the conſuls, and part of the ſenators. His cauſe indeed was popular, he had been inveſted with diſcretionary power, the ſenate had entreated him to protect the republic againſt the uſurpation and tyranny of Cæſar; and Cato, by embracing his cauſe, and appearing in his camp, ſeemed to indicate, that he was the friend of the republic, and the aſſertor of Roman liberty and independence. But Cæſar was now maſter of Rome, and in ſixty days all Italy acknowledged his power, and the conqueror haſtened to Spain, there to defeat the intereſt of Pompey, and to alienate the hearts of his ſoldiers. He was too ſucceſsful; and when he had gained to his cauſe the weſtern parts of the Roman empire, Cæſar croſſed Italy and arrived in Greece, where Pompey had retired, ſupported by all the power of the eaſt, the wiſhes of the republican Romans, and by a numerous and well-diſciplined army. Though ſuperior in numbers, he refuſed to give the enemy battle, while Cæſar continually haraſſed him, and even attacked his camp. Pompey repelled him with great ſucceſs, and he might have decided the war if he had continued to purſue the enemy, while their confuſion was great, and their eſcape almoſt inevitable. Want of proviſions obliged Cæſar to advance towards Theſſaly; Pompey purſued him, and in the plains of Pharſalia the two armies engaged. The whole was conducted againſt the advice and approbation of Pompey, and by ſuffering his troops to wait for the approach of the enemy, he deprived his ſoldiers of that advantage which the army of Cæſar obtained by running to the charge with ſpirit, vigor, and animation. The cavalry of Pompey ſoon gave way, and the general retired to his camp, overwhelmed with grief and ſhame. But here there was no ſafety, the conqueror puſhed on every ſide, and Pompey diſguiſed himſelf, and fled to the ſea coaſt, whence he paſſed to Egypt, where he hoped to find a ſafe aſylum, till better and more favorable moments returned, in the court of Ptolemy, a prince whom he had once protected and enſured on his throne. When Ptolemy was told that Pompey claimed his protection, he conſulted his miniſters, and had the baſeneſs to betray, and to deceive him. A boat was ſent to fetch him on ſhore, and the Roman general left his galley, after an affectionate and tender parting with his wife Cornelia. The Egyptian ſailors ſat in ſullen ſilence in the boat, and when Pompey diſembarked, Achillas and Septimius aſſaſſinated him. His wife, who had followed him with her eyes to the ſhore, was a ſpectator of the bloody ſcene, and ſhe haſtened away from the bay of Alexandria, not to ſhare his miſerable fate. He died B. C. 48, in the 58th, or 59th year of his age, the day after his birth day. His head was cut off, and ſent to Cæſar, who turned away from it with horror, and ſhed a flood of tears. The body was left for ſome time naked on the ſea ſhore, till the humanity of Philip, one of his freed men, and an old ſoldier, who had often followed his ſtandard to victory, raiſed a burning pile, and depoſited his aſhes under a mound mound of earth. Cæſar erected a monument on his remains, and the emperor Adrian, two centuries after, when he viſited Egypt, ordered it to be repaired at his own expence, and paid particular honor to the memory of a great and good man. The character of Pompey, is that of an intriguing and artful general, and the oris probi, and animo inverecundo of Salluſt, ſhort and laconic as it may appear, is the beſt and moſt deſcriptive picture of his character. He wiſhed it to appear that he obtained all his honors and dignity from merit alone, and as the free and unprejudiced favors of the Romans, while he ſecretly claimed them by faction and intrigue; and he who wiſhed to appear the patron, and an example of true diſcipline and ancient ſimplicity, was not aſhamed publicly to bribe the populace to gain an election, or to ſupport his favorites. Yet amidſt all this diſſimulation, which was perhaps but congenial with the age, we perceive many other ſtriking features; Pompey was kind and clement to the conquered, and generous to his captives, and he buried at his own expence Mithridates, with all the pomp and the ſolemnity which the greatneſs of his power, and the extent of his dominions ſeemed to claim. He was an enemy to flattery, and when his character was impeached by the malevolence of party, he condeſcended, though conſul, to appear before the cenſorial tribunal, and to ſhew that his actions and meaſures were not ſubverſive of the peace and the independence of the people. In his private character he was as remarkable, he lived with great temperance and moderation, and his houſe was ſmall, and not oſtentatiouſly furniſhed. He deſtroyed with great prudence the papers which were found in the camp of Sertorius, leſt miſchievous curioſity ſhould find cauſes to accuſe the innocent, and to meditate their deſtruction. With great diſintereſtedneſs he refuſed the preſents which princes and monarchs offered to him, and he ordered them to be added to the public revenue. He might have ſeen a better fate, and terminated his days with more glory if he had not acted with ſuch imprudence when the flames of civil war were firſt kindled; and he reflected with remorſe after the battle of Pharſalia upon his want of uſual ſagacity and military prudence, in fighting at ſuch a diſtance from the ſea, and in leaving the fortified places of Dyrrachium to meet in the open plain an enemy without proviſions, without friends, and without reſources. The misfortunes which attended him after the conqueſt of Mithridates, are attributed by Chriſtian writers to his impiety in prophaning the temple of the Jews, and in entering with the inſolence of a conquerer the Holy of Holies, where even the ſacred perſon of the high prieſt of the nation was not admitted but upon the moſt ſolemn occaſions. His duplicity of behaviour in regard to Cicero is deſervedly cenſured, and he ſhould not have violently ſacrificed to party and ſedition a Roman, whom he had ever found his firmeſt friend and adherent. In his meeting with Lucullus he cannot but be taxed with pride, and he might have paid more deference and more honor to a general, who was as able and more entitled than himſelf to finiſh the Mithridatic war. Pompey married four different times. His firſt matrimonial connection was with Antiſtia, the daughter of the pretor Antiſtius, whom he divorced with great reluctance to marry Æmylia, the daughter-in-law of Sylla. Æmylia died in child-bed; and Pompey's marriage with Julia, the daughter of Cæſar, was a ſtep more of policy than affection. Yet Julia loved Pompey with great tenderneſs, and her death in child-bed was the ſignal of war between her huſband and her father. He afterwards married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, a woman commended for her virtues, beauty, and accompliſhments. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 29.—Dio. Caſſ.—Lucan.—Appian.—Cæſ. bell. Civ.—Cic. Orat. 68, ad Attic. &c.—Eutrop.——The two ſons of Pompey the Great, called Cneius and Sextus, were maſters of a powerful army, when the death of their father was known. They prepared to oppoſe the conqueror, but Cæſar purſued them with his uſual vigor and ſucceſs, and at the battle of Munda they were defeated, and Cneius was left among the ſlain. Sextus fled to Sicily, where he for ſome time ſupported himſelf; but the murder of Cæſar gave riſe to new events, and if Pompey had been as prudent and as ſagacious as his father, he might have become perhaps as great and as formidable. He treated with the triumvirs as an equal, and when Auguſtus and Antony had the imprudence to truſt themſelves without arms and without attendants in his ſhip, Pompey, by following the advice of his friend Menas, who wiſhed him to cut off the illuſtrious perſons who were maſters of the world, and now in his power, might have made himſelf as abſolute as Cæſar; but he refuſed, and obſerved it was unbecoming the ſon of Pompey to act with ſuch duplicity. This friendly meeting of Pompey with two of the triumvirs was not productive of advantages to him, he wiſhed to have no ſuperior, and hoſtilities began. Pompey was at the head of 350 ſhips, and appeared ſo formidable to his enemies, and ſe ſo confident of ſucceſs in himſelf, that he called himſelf the ſon of Neptune, and the lord of the ſea. He was however ſoon defeated in a naval engagement by Octavius and Lepidus, and of all his numerous fleet only 17 ſail accompanied his flight to Aſia. Here for a moment he raiſed ſeditions, but Antony ordered him to be ſeized, and put to death about 35 years before the Chriſtian era. Plut. in Anton. &c.—Paterc. 2, c. 55, &c.—Flor. 4, c. 2, &c.——Trogus. Vid. Trogus.——Sextus Feſtus, a Latin grammarian, of whoſe treatiſe de verborum ſignificatione, the beſt edition is in 4to. C. Pomptinus, a Roman officer who conquered the Allobroges after the defeat of Catiline.

Pompus, a king of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 5.

Pons Ælius was built by the emperor Adrian at Rome. It was the ſecond bridge of Rome in following the current of the Tyber. It is ſtill to be ſeen, the largeſt and moſt beautiful in Rome.——Æmylius, an ancient bridge at Rome, originally called Sublicius, becauſe built with wood (ſublicæ.) It was raiſed by Ancus Martius, and dedicated with great pomp and ſolemnity by the Roman prieſts. It was rebuilt with ſtones by Æmylius Lepidus, whoſe name it aſſumed. It was much injured by the overflowing of the river, and the emperor Antoninus, who repaired it, made it all with white marble. It was the laſt of all the bridges of Rome, in following the courſe of the river, and ſome veſtiges of it may ſtill be ſeen.——Anienſis was built acroſs the river Anio about three miles from Rome. It was rebuilt by the eunuch Narſes, and called after him, when deſtroyed by the Goths.——Ceſtus was built in the reign of Tiberius by a Roman called Ceſtius Gallus, from whom it received its name, and carried back from an iſland of the Tiber to which the Fabricius conducted.——Aurelianus was built with marble by the emperor Antoninus.——Armonienſis was built by Auguſtus, to join the Flaminian to the Æmylian road.——Bajanus was built at Baiæ in the ſea by Caligula. It was ſupported by boats, and measured about six miles in length.——Janicularis received its name from its vicinity to mount Janiculum. It is still standing.——Milvius was about one mile from Rome. It was built by the censor Ælius Scaurus. It was near it that Constantine defeated Maxentius.——Fabricius was built by Fabricius, and carried to an island of the Tiber.——Gardius was built by Agrippa.——Palatinus near mount Palatine, was also called Senatorius, because the senators walked over it in procession when they went to consult the Sibylline books. It was begun by M. Fulvius, and finished in the censorship of L. Mummius, and some remains of it are still visible.——Trajani was built by Trajan across the Danube, celebrated for its bigness and magnificence. The emperor built it to assist more expeditiously the provinces against the barbarians, but his successor destroyed it, as he supposed that it would be rather an inducement for the barbarians to invade the empire. It was raised on 20 piers of hewn stones, 150 feet from the foundation, 60 feet broad, and 170 feet distant one from the other, extending in length above a mile. Some of the pillars are still standing.——Another was built by Trajan over the Tagus, part of which still remains. Of temporary bridges, that of Cæsar over the Rhine was the most famous.——The largest single arched bridge known is over the river Elaver in France, called Pons Veteris Brivatis. The pillars stand on two rocks, at the distance of 195 feet. The arch is 84 feet high above the water.——Suffragiorum was built in the Campus Martius, and received its name, because the populace were obliged to pass over it whenever they delivered their suffrages at the elections of magistrates and officers of the state.——Tirensis, a bridge of Latium between Arpinum and Minturnæ.——Triumphalis was on the way to the capitol, and passed over by those who triumphed.——Narniensis joined two mountains near Narnia, built by Augustus, of stupendous height, 60 miles from Rome; one arch of it remains, about 100 feet high.

PONTIA, a Roman matron who committed adultery with Sagitta, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13.——A mother famous for her cruelty. Martial. 1, ep 34.——A surname of Venus at Hermione. Paus. 2, c. 34.——A woman condemned by Nero as guilty of a conspiracy. She killed herself by opening her veins. She was daughter of Petronius, and wife of Bolanus. Juv. 6, v. 637.——An island. Vid. Œnotrides.

PONTĬCUM MARE, the sea of Pontus, generally called the Euxine.

PONTĬCUS, a poet of Rome, contemporary with Propertius, by whom he is compared to Homer. He wrote an account of the Theban war in heroic verse. Propert. 1, el. 7.——A man in Juvenal's age, fond of boasting of the antiquity and great actions of his family, yet without possessing himself one single virtue.

PONTĪNA, or POMPTINA LACUS, a lake in the country of the Volsci, through which the great Appian road passed. Travellers were sometimes conveyed in a boat, drawn by a mule, in the canal that ran along the road from Forum Appii to Tarracina. This lake is now become so dangerous, from the exhalations of its stagnant water, that travellers avoid passing near it. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 9.—Lucan. 3, v. 85.

PONTĪNUS, a friend of Cicero.——A tribune of the people, who refused to rise up when Cæsar passed in triumphal procession. He was one of Cæsar's murderers, and was killed at the battle of Mutina. Sueton. in Cæsar. 78.—Cic. 10, ad fam.——A mountain of Argolis, with a river of the same name. Paus. 2, c. 73.

PONTIUS AUFIDIANUS, a Roman citizen, who upon hearing that violence had been offered to his daughter, punished her and her ravisher with death. Val. Max. 6, c. 1.——Heremnius, a general of the Samnites, who surrounded the Roman army under the consuls T. Veturius and P. Posthumius. As there was no possibility of escaping for the Romans, Pontius consulted his father what he could do with an army that were prisoners in his hands. The old man advised him either to let them go untouched, or put them all to the sword. Pontius rejected his father's advice, and spared the lives of the enemy, after he had obliged them to pass under the yoke with the greatest ignominy. He was afterwards conquered, and obliged in his turn to pass under the yoke. Fabius Maximus defeated him, when he appeared again at the head of another army, and he was afterwards shamefully put to death by the Romans, after he had adorned the triumph of the conqueror. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.——Cominius, a Roman who gave information to his countrymen who were besieged in the capitol that Camillus had obtained a victory over the Gauls. Plut.——A Roman slave who told Sylla in a prophetic strain, that he brought him success from Bellona.——One of the favorites of Albucilla. He was degraded from the rank of a senator. Tacit.—— Titus, a Roman centurion, whom Cicero de Senect. mentions as possessed of uncommon strength.

PONTUS, a kingdom of Asia Minor, bounded on the east by Colchis, west by the Halys, north by the Euxine sea, and south ſouth by part of Armenia. It was divided into three parts according to Ptolemy. Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Polemoniacus & Pontus Cappadocius. It was governed by kings, the firſt of whom was Artabazes, either one of the ſeven Perſian noblemen who murdered the uſurper Smerdis, or one of their deſcendants. The kingdom of Pontus was in its moſt floriſhing ſtate under Mithridates the Great. When J. Cæſar had conquered it, it became a Roman province, though it was often governed by monarchs who were tributary to the power of Rome. Under the emperors a regular governor was always appointed over it. Pontus produced caſtors, whoſe teſticles were highly valued among the ancients for their ſalutary qualities in medicinal proceſſes. Virg. G. 1, v. 58.—Mela. 1, c. 1 & 19.—Strab. 12.—Cic. pro Leg.—Man.—Appian.—Ptol. 5, c. 6.——A part of Myſia in Europe on the borders of the Euxine ſea, where Ovid was baniſhed, and from whence he wrote his four books of epiſtles de Ponto, and his ſix books de Triſtibus. Ovid. de Pont.——An ancient deity, father of Phorcys, Thaumas, Nereus, Eurybia, and Ceto, by Terra. He is the ſame as Oceanus. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Pontus Euxīnus, a celebrated ſea, ſituate at the weſt of Colchis between Aſia and Europe, at the north of Aſia Minor. It is called the Black Sea by the moderns. Vid. Euxinus.

M. Popilius, a conſul who was informed, as he was offering a ſacrifice, that a ſedition was raiſed in the city againſt the ſenate. Upon this he immediately went to the populace in his ſacerdotal robes, and quieted the multitude with a ſpeech. He lived about the year of Rome 404. Liv. 9, c. 21.—Val. Max. 7, c. 8.——Caius, a conſul, who, when beſieged by the Gauls, abandoned his baggage to ſave his army. Cic. ad Heren. 1, c. 15.——Lænas, a Roman ambaſſador to Antiochus, king of Syria. He was commiſſioned to order the monarch to abſtain from hoſtilities againſt Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who was an ally of Rome. Antiochus wiſhed to evade him by his anſwers, but Popilius, with a ſtick which he had in his hand, made a circle round him on the ſand, and bade him, in the name of the Roman ſenate and people, not to go beyond it before he ſpoke deciſively. This boldneſs intimidated Antiochus; he withdrew his garriſons from Egypt, and no longer meditated a war againſt Ptolemy. Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 45, c. 12.—Paterc 1, c. 10.——A tribune of the people who murdered Cicero, to whoſe eloquence he was indebted for his life when he was accuſed of parricide. Plut.——A pretor who baniſhed the friends of Tiberius Gracchus from Italy.——A Roman conſul who made war againſt the people of Numantia, on pretence that the peace had not been firmly eſtabliſhed. He was defeated by them.——A ſenator who alarmed the conſpirators againſt Cæſar, by telling them that the whole plot was diſcovered.——A Roman emperor. Vid. Nepotianus.

Poplicŏla, one of the firſt conſuls. Vid. Publicola.

Poppæa Sabīna, a celebrated Roman matron, daughter of Titus Ollius. She married a Roman knight called Rufus Criſpinus, by whom ſhe had a ſon. Her perſonal charms, and the elegance of her figure, captivated Otho, who was then one of Nero's favorites. He carried her away and married her; but Nero, who had ſeen her, and had often heard her accompliſhments extolled, ſoon deprived him of her company, and ſent him out of Italy, on pretence of preſiding over one of the Roman provinces. After he had taken this ſtep, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, on pretence of barrenneſs, and married Poppæa. The cruelty and avarice of the emperor did not long permit Poppæa to ſhare the imperial dignity, and though ſhe had already made him father of a ſon, he began to deſpiſe her, and even to uſe her with barbarity. She died of a blow which ſhe received from his foot when many months advanced in her pregnancy, about the 65th year of the Chriſtian era. Her funeral was performed with great pomp and ſolemnity, and ſtatues raiſed to her memory. It is ſaid that ſhe was ſo anxious to preſerve her beauty and the elegance of her perſon, that 500 aſſes were kept on purpoſe to afford her milk in which ſhe uſed daily to bathe. Even in her baniſhment ſhe was attended by 50 of theſe animals for the ſame purpoſe, and from their milk ſhe invented a kind of ointment, or pomatum, to preſerve beauty, called poppæanum from her. Plin. 11, c. 41.—Dio. 62.—Juv. 6.—Sueton. in Ner. & Oth.—Tacit. 13 & 14.——A beautiful woman at the court of Nero. She was mother to the preceding. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 1, &c.

Poppæus Sabīnus, a Roman of obſcure origin, who was made governor of ſome of the Roman provinces. He deſtroyed himſelf, &c. Tacit. 6, Ann. 39.——Sylvanus, a man of conſular dignity, who brought to Veſpaſian a body of 600 Dalmatians.——A friend of Otho.

Populonia, or Populanium, a town of Etruria, near Piſæ, deſtroyed in the civil wars of Sylla. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 172.—Mela. 2, c. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Porata, a river of Dacia, now Pruth, falling into the Danube a little below Axiopoli.

PORCIA, a ſiſter of Cato of Utica, greatly commended by Cicero.——A daughter of Cato of Utica, who married Bibulus, and after his death, Brutus. She was remarkable for her prudence, philoſophy, courage, and conjugal tenderneſs. She gave herſelf a heavy wound in the thigh, to ſee with what fortitude ſhe could bear pain; and when her huſband aſked her the reaſon of it, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe wiſhed to try whether ſhe had courage enough to ſhare not only his bed, but to partake of his moſt hidden ſecrets. Brutus was aſtoniſhed at her conſtancy, and no longer detained from her knowledge the conſpiracy which he and many other illuſtrious Romans had formed againſt J. Cæſar. Porcia wiſhed them ſucceſs, and though ſhe betrayed fear, and fell into a ſwoon the day that her huſband was gone to aſſaſſinate the dictator, yet ſhe was faithful to her promiſe, and dropped nothing which might affect the ſituation of the conſpirators. When Brutus was dead, ſhe refuſed to ſurvive him, and attempted to end her life as a daughter of Cato. Her friends attempted to terrify her; but when ſhe ſaw that every weapon was removed from her reach, ſhe ſwallowed burning coals and died, about 42 years before the Chriſtian era. Valerius Maximus ſays, that ſhe was acquainted with her huſband's conſpiracy againſt Cæſar when ſhe gave herſelf the wound. Val. Max. 3, c. 2. l. 4, c. 6.—Plut. in Brut. &c.

PORCIA LEX, de civitate, by M. Porcius the tribune, A. U. C. 453. It ordained that no magiſtrate ſhould puniſh with death, or ſcourge with rods, a Roman citizen when condemned, but only permit him to go into exile. Salluſt. in Cat.—Liv. 10.—Cic. pro Rab.

PORCINA, a ſirname of the orator M. Æ. Lepidus, who lived a little before Cicero's age, and was diſtinguiſhed for his abilities. Cic. ad Her. 4, c. 5.

M. PORCIUS LATRO, a celebrated orator who killed himſelf when laboring under a quartan ague, A. U. C. 750.——Licinius, a Latin poet during the time of the third Punic war.——A Roman ſenator who joined the conſpiracy of Catiline.——A ſon of Cato of Utica, given much to drinking.

POREDORAX, one of the 40 Gauls whom Mithridates ordered to be put to death, and to remain unburied for conſpiring againſt him. His miſtreſs at Pergamus buried him againſt the orders of the monarch. Plut. de virt. mul.

PORĪNA, a river of Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 8, c. 15.

POROSELĒNE, an iſland near Leſbos. Strab. 13.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

PORPHYRION, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, one of the giants who made war againſt Jupiter. He was ſo formidable, that Jupiter, to conquer him, inſpired him with love for Juno, and while the giant endeavoured to obtain his wiſhes, he, with the aſſiſtance of Hercules, overpowered him. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Mart. 13, ep. 78.—Apollod. 1, c. 6.

PORPHŸRIS, a name of the iſland Cythera.

PORPHYRIUS, a Platonic philoſopher of Tyre. He ſtudied eloquence at Athens under Longinus, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he perfected himſelf under Plotinus. Porphyry was a man of univerſal information, and, according to the teſtimony of the ancients, he excelled his contemporaries in the knowledge of hiſtory, mathematics, muſic, and philoſophy. He expreſſed his ſentiments with elegance and with dignity, and while other philoſophers ſtudied obſcurity in their language, his ſtyle was remarkable for its ſimplicity and grace. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of magic, which he called a theurgic or divine operation. The books that he wrote were numerous, and ſome of his ſmaller treatiſes are ſtill extant. His moſt celebrated work, which is now loſt, was againſt the religion of Chriſt, and in this theological conteſt he appeared ſo formidable, that moſt of the fathers of the church have been employed in confuting his arguments, and developing the falſehood of his aſſertions. He has been univerſally called the greateſt enemy which the Chriſtian religion had, and indeed his doctrines were ſo pernicious, that a copy of his book was publicly burnt by order of Theodoſius, A. D. 388. Porphyry reſided for ſome time in Sicily, and died at the advanced age of 71, A. D. 304. The beſt edition of his life of Pythagoras is that of Kuſter, 4to. Amſt. 1707, that of his treatiſe De Abſtinentia, is De Rhoer. Traj. ad Rhen. 8vo. 1767, and that De Antro Nympharum, is 8vo. Traj. ad Rhen. 1765.——A Latin poet in the reign of Conſtantine the Great.

PORRIMA, one of the attendants of Carmente when ſhe came from Areadia. Ovid. 1. Faſt. v. 633.

PORSENNA or PORSĔNA, a king of Etruria, who declared war againſt the Romans, becauſe they refuſed to reſtore Tarquin to his throne and to his royal privileges. He was at firſt ſucceſsful, the Romans were defeated, and Porſenna would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Cocles ſtood at the head of a bridge, and ſupported the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the oppoſite ſhore. This act of bravery aſtoniſhed Porſenna; but when he had ſeen Mutius Scævola enter his camp with an intention to murder him, and when he had ſeen him burn his hand without emotion, to convince him of his fortitude and intrepidity, he no longer dared to make head againſt a people ſo brave and ſo generous. He made a peace with the Romans, and never after ſupported the claims of Tarquin. The generoſity of Porſenna's behaviour to the captives was admired by the Romans, and to reward his humanity they raiſed a brazen ſtatue to his honor. Liv. 2, c. 9, &c.—Plut. in Public. —Flor. 1, c. 10.—Horat. ep. 16.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 646.

Porta Capēna, a gate at Rome, which leads to the Appian road. Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 192.——Aurelia, a gate at Rome, which received its name from Aurelius, a conſul who made a road which led to Piſa, all along the coaſt of Etruria. ——Aſinaria led to mount Cœlius. It received its name from the family of the Aſinii.——Carmentalis was at the foot of the capitol, built by Romulus. It was afterwards called Scelerata, becauſe the 300 Fabii marched through when they went to fight an enemy, and were killed near the river Cremera.——Janualis was near the temple of Janus.——Eſquilina was alſo called Metia, Taurica, or Libitinenſis, and all criminals who were going to be executed generally paſſed through, as alſo dead bodies which were carried to be burnt on mount Eſquilinus.——Flaminia, called alſo Flumentana, was ſituate between the Capitol and mount Quirinalis, and thro' it the Flaminian road paſſed.——Fontinalis led to the Campus Martius. It received its name from the great number of fountains that were near it.——Navalis was ſituate near the place where the ſhips came from Oſtia.——Viminalis was near mount Viminalis.——Trigemina, called alſo Oſtienſis, led to the town of Oſtia.——Catularia was near the Carmentalis Porta, at the foot of mount Viminalis.——Collatina received its name from its leading to Collatia.——Collina, called alſo Quirinalis Agonenſis, and Salaria, was near Quirinalis Mons. Annibal rode up to this gate and threw a ſpear into the city. It is to be obſerved, that at the death of Romulus there were only 3 or 4 gates at Rome, but the number was encreaſed, and in the time of Pliny there were 37, when the circumference of the walls was 13 miles and 200 paces.

Portumnus, a ſea deity. Vid. Melicerta.

Porus, the god of plenty at Rome. He was ſon of Metis or Prudence. Plato. ——A king of India when Alexander invaded Aſia. The conqueror of Darius ordered him to come and pay homage to him, as a dependant prince. Porus ſcorned his commands, and declared he would go and meet him on the frontiers of his kingdom ſword in hand, and immediately he marched a large army to the banks of the Hydaſpes. The ſtream of the river was rapid; but Alexander croſſed it in the obſcurity of the night, and defeated one of the ſons of the Indian monarch. Porus himſelf renewed the battle; but the valor of the Macedonians prevailed, and the Indian prince retired covered with wounds, on the back of one of his elephants. Alexander ſent one of the kings of India to demand him to ſurrender, but Porus killed the meſſenger, exclaiming, is not this the voice of the wretch who has abandoned his country? and when he at laſt was prevailed upon to come before the conqueror, he approached him as an equal. Alexander demanded of him how he wiſhed to be treated; like a king, replied the Indian monarch. This magnanimous anſwer ſo pleaſed the Macedonian conqueror, that he not only reſtored him his dominions, but he encreaſed his kingdom by the conqueſt of new provinces; and Porus, in acknowledgment of ſuch generoſity and benevolence, became one of the moſt faithful and attached friends of Alexander, and never violated the aſſurances of peace which he had given him. Porus is repreſented as a man of uncommon ſtature, great ſtrength, and proportionable dignity. Plut. in Alex.—Philoſtr. 2, c. 10. —Curt. 8, c. 8, &c.—*Claud. Conſ. Potniæ, a town of Bœotia, where Bacchus had a temple. The Potnians, having once once murdered the prieſt of the god, were ordered by the oracle, to appeaſe his reſentment, yearly to offer on his altars a young man. This unnatural ſacrifice was continued for ſome years, till Bacchus himſelf ſubſtituted a goat, from which circumſtance he received the appellation of Ægobolus and Ægophagus. There was here a fountain whoſe waters made horſes run mad as ſoon as they were touched. There were alſo here certain goddeſſes called Potniades, on whoſe altars, in a grove ſacred to Ceres and Proſerpine, victims were ſacrificed. It was alſo uſual at a certain ſeaſon of the year, to conduct into the grove, young pigs, which were found the following year in the groves of Dodona. The mares of Potnia deſtroyed their maſter Glaucus, ſon of Siſyphus. Vid. Glaucus. Pauſ. 9, c. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 267.—Ælian. V. H. 15, c. 25.——A town of Magneſia.

PRÆSTI, a nation of India. Curt. 9, c. 8.

PRÆTOR, one of the chief magiſtrates at Rome. The office of Prætor was firſt inſtituted A. U. C. 388, by the ſenators, who wiſhed by ſome new honor to compenſate for the loſs of the conſulſhip, of which the plebeians had claimed a ſhare. The Prætor received his name a præeundo. Only one was originally elected, and another A. U. C. 501. One of them was totally employed in adminiſtering juſtice among the citizens, whence he was called Prætor urbanus, and the other appointed judges in all cauſes which related to foreigners. In the year of Rome 520, two more prætors were created to aſſiſt the conſul in the government of the provinces of Sicily and Sardinia, which had been lately conquered, and two more when Spain was reduced into the form of a Roman province, A. U. C. 551. Sylla the dictator added two more, and Julius Cæſar encreaſed the number to 10, and afterwards to 16, and the ſecond triumvirate to 64. After this their numbers fluctuated, being ſometimes 18, 16, or 12, till, in the decline of the empire, their dignity decreaſed, and their numbers were reduced to three. In his public capacity the Prætor adminiſtered juſtice, protected the rights of widows and orphans, preſided at the celebration of public feſtivals, and in the abſence of the conſul aſſembled or prorogued the ſenate as he pleaſed. He alſo exhibited ſhows to the people, and in the feſtivals of the Bona Dea, where no males were permitted to appear, his wife preſided over the reſt of the Roman matrons. Feaſts were announced and proclaimed by him, and he had the power to make and repeal laws, if it met with the approbation of the ſenate and people. The quæſtors were ſubject to him, and in the abſence of the conſuls, he appeared at the head of the armies, and in the city he kept a regiſter of all the freedmen of Rome, with the reaſons for which they had received their freedom. In the provinces the Prætors appeared with great pomp, ſix lictors with the faſces walked before them, and when the empire was encreaſed by conqueſt, they divided like the conſuls their government, and provinces were given them by lot. When the year of their prætorſhip was elapſed, they were called proprætors, if they ſtill continued at the head of their province. At Rome, the Prætors appeared alſo with much pomp, two lictors preceded them, they wore the prætexta, or the white robe with purple borders, they ſat in curule chairs, and their tribunal was diſtinguiſhed by a ſword and a ſpear, while they adminiſtered juſtice. The tribunal was called prætorium. When they rode they appeared on white horſes at Rome, as a mark of diſtinction. The Prætor who appointed judges to try foreign cauſes, was called prætor peregrinus. The Prætors Cereales, appointed by Julius Cæſar, were employed in providing corn and proviſions for the city. They were on that account often called frumentarii.

PRÆTORIA, a town of Dacia, now Cronſtadt.——Another, now Aouſt, in Piedmont.

PRÆTORIUS, a name ironically applied to Aſ. Sempronius Rufus, becauſe he was diſappointed in his ſolicitations for the prætorſhip, as being too diſſolute and luxurious in his manners. He was the firſt who had a ſtork brought to his table. Horat. 2, Sat. 2, v. 50.

Praxis, a ſirname of Venus at Megara. Pauſ. 1, c. 43.

Praxitĕles, a famous ſculptor of Magna Græcia, who floriſhed about 324 years before the Chriſtian era. He chiefly worked on Parian marble, on account of its beautiful whiteneſs. He carried his art to the greateſt perfection, and was ſo happy in copying nature, that his ſtatues ſeemed to be animated. The moſt famous of his pieces was a Cupid which he gave to Phryne. This celebrated courtezan, who wiſhed to have the beſt of all the ſtatues of Praxiteles, and who could not depend upon her own judgment in the choice, alarmed the ſculptor, by telling him his houſe was on fire. Praxiteles upon this, ſhewed his eagerneſs to ſave his Cupid from the flames, above all his other pieces; but Phryne reſtrained his fears, and by diſcovering her artifice, obtained the favorite ſtatue. The ſculptor employed his chiſel in making a ſtatue of this beautiful courtezan, which was dedicated in the temple of Delphi, and placed between the ſtatues of Archidamus, king of Sparta, and Philip, king of Macedon. He alſo made a ſtatue of Venus, at the requeſt of the people of Cos, and gave them their choice of the goddeſs, either naked or veiled. The former was ſuperior to the other in beauty and perfection, but the inhabitants of Cos preferred the latter. The Cnidians, who did not wiſh to patronize modeſty and decorum with the ſame eagerneſs as the people of Cos, bought the naked Venus, and it was ſo univerſally eſteemed, that Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, offered the Cnidians to pay an enormous debt, under which they labored, if they would give him their favorite ſtatue. This offer was not accepted. The famous Cupid was bought of the Theſpians by Caius Cæſar, and carried to Rome, but Claudius reſtored it to them, and Nero afterwards obtained poſſeſſion of it. Pauſ. 1, c. 40. l. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 34 & 36.

Praxithea, a daughter of Phraſimus and Diogenea. She married Erechtheus, king of Athens, by whom ſhe had Cecrops, Pandarus, and Metion, and four daughters, Procris, Creuſa, Chthonia, and Orithyia. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—A daughter of Theſtius, mother of ſome children by Hercules. Id. 2, c. 7.—A daughter of Erechtheus ſacrificed by order of the oracle.

Prelius, a lake in Tuſcany, now Caſtiglione. Cic. Mil. 27.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Preugĕnes, a ſon of Agenor. Pauſ. 3, c. 2.

Prexaspes, a Perſian who put Smerdis to death, by order of king Cambyſes. Herodot. 3, c. 30.

Priămĭdes, a patronymic applied to Paris as being ſon of Priam. It is alſo given to Hector, Deiphobus, and all the other children of the Trojan monarch. Ovid. Heroid.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 295.

Priămus, the laſt king of Troy, was ſon of Laomedon, by Strymo, called Placia by ſome. When Hercules took the city of Troy, [Vid. Laomedon.] Priam was in the number of his priſoners, but his ſiſter Heſione redeemed him from captivity, and he exchanged his original name of Podarcus for that of Priam, which ſignifies bought or ranſomed. [Vid. Podarces.] He was alſo placed on his father's throne by Hercules, and he employed himſelf with well directed diligence in repairing, fortifying, and embelliſhing the city of Troy. He had married, by his father's orders, Ariſba, whom now he divorced for Hecuba, the daughter of Dimas, or Ciſſeus, a neighbouring bouring prince. He had by Hecuba 17 children, according to Cicero, or according to Homer, 19; the moſt celebrated of whom are Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponous, Troilus, Creuſa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Caſſandra. Beſides theſe he had many others by concubines. Their names, according to Apollodorus, are Melampus, Gorgythion, Philæmon, Glaucus, Agathon, Evagoras, Hippothous, Cherſidamas, Hippodamas, Meſtor, Atas, Dorcylus, Dryops, Lycaon, Aſtygonus, Bias, Evander, Chromius, Teleſtas, Melius, Cebrion, Laodocus, Idomeneus, Archemachus, Echephron, Hyperion, Aſcanius, Arnetus, Demoeoon, Dejoptes, Echemon, Clovius, Ægioneus, Hypirychus, Lyſithous, Polymedon, Meduſa, Lyſimache, Medeſicaſte, and Ariſtodeme. After he had reigned for ſome time in the greateſt proſperity, Priam expreſſed a deſire to recover his ſiſter Heſione, whom Hercules had carried into Greece, and married to Telamon his friend. To carry this plan into execution, Priam manned a fleet, of which he gave the command to his ſon Paris, with orders to bring back Heſione. Paris, to whom the goddeſs of beauty had promiſed the faireſt woman in the world, [Vid. Paris] neglected in ſome meaſure his father's injunctions, and as if to make repriſals upon the Greeks, he carried away Helen, the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, during the abſence of her huſband. Priam beheld this with ſatisfaction, and he countenanced his ſon by receiving in his palace the wife of the king of Sparta. This rape kindled the flames of war; all the ſuitors of Helen, at the requeſt of Menelaus, [Vid. Menelaus] aſſembled to revenge the violence offered to his bed, and a fleet, according to ſome, of 140 ſhips, under the command of the 69 chiefs that furniſhed them, ſet ſail for Troy. Priam might have averted the impending blow by the reſtoration of Helen; but this he refuſed to do, when the ambaſſadors of the Greeks came to him, and he immediately raiſed an army to defend himſelf. Troy was ſoon beſieged, frequent ſkirmiſhes took place, in which the ſucceſs was various, and the advantages on both ſides inconſiderable. The ſiege was continued for ten ſucceſſive years, and Priam had the misfortune to ſee the greateſt part of his children maſſacred by the enemy. Hector, the eldeſt of theſe, was the only one upon whom now the Trojans looked for protection and ſupport; but he ſoon fell a ſacrifice to his own courage, and was killed by Achilles. Priam ſeverely felt his loſs, and as he loved him with the greateſt tenderneſs, he wiſhed to ranſom his body which was in the enemy's camp. The gods, according to Homer, intereſted themſelves in favor of old Priam. Achilles was prevailed upon by his mother, the goddeſs Thetis, to reſtore Hector to Priam, and the king of Troy paſſed through the Grecian camp conducted by Mercury the meſſenger of the gods, who with his rod had made him inviſible. The meeting of Priam and Achilles was ſolemn and affecting, the conqueror paid to the Trojan monarch that attention and reverence which was due to his dignity, his years, and his misfortunes, and Priam in a ſuppliant manner addreſſed the prince whoſe favors he claimed, and kiſſed the hands that had robbed him of the greateſt and the beſt of his children. Achilles was moved by his tears and entreaties, he reſtored Hector, and permitted Priam a truce of 12 days for the funeral of his ſon. Some time after Troy was betrayed into the hands of the Greeks by Antenor and Æneas, and Priam upon this reſolved to die in the defence of his country. He put on his armour, and advanced to meet the Greeks, but Hecuba by her tears and entreaties detained him near an altar of Jupiter, whither ſhe had fled for protection. While Priam yielded to the prayers of his wife, Polites, one of his ſons, fled alſo to the altar before Neoptolemus, who purſued him with fury. Polites, wounded and overcome, fell dead at the feet of his parents, and the aged father, fired with indignation, vented the moſt bitter invectives againſt the Greek, who paid no regard to the ſanctity of altars and temples, and raiſing his ſpear darted it upon him. The ſpear, hurled by the feeble hand of Priam, touched the buckler of Neoptolemus, and fell to the ground. This irritated the ſon of Achilles, he ſeized the grey hair of Priam, and, without compaſſion or reverence for the ſanctity of the place, he plunged his dagger into his breaſt. His head was cut off, and the mutilated body was left among the heaps of ſlain. Dictyſ. Cret. 1, &c.—Dares Phryg.—Herodot. 2.—Pauſ. 10, c. 27.—Homer. Il. 22, &c.—Eurip. in Troad.—*Cic. PRIĀPUS, a deity among the antients, who preſided over gardens, and the parts of generation in the ſexes. He was ſon of Venus by Mercury or Adonis; or according to the more received opinion, by Bacchus. The goddeſs of beauty, who was enamoured of Bacchus, went to meet him as he returned victorious from his Indian expedition, and by him ſhe had Priapus, who was born at Lampſacus. Priapus apus was ſo deformed in all his limbs, particularly the genitals, by means of Juno, who had aſſiſted at the delivery of Venus, that the mother, aſhamed to have given birth to ſuch a monſter, ordered him to be expoſed on the mountains. His life, however, was preſerved by ſhepherds, and he received the name of Priapus, propter deformitatem & membri virilis magnitudinem. He ſoon became a favorite of the people of Lampſacus, but he was expelled by the inhabitants on account of the freedom he took with their wives. This violence was puniſhed by the ſon of Venus, and when the Lampſacenians had been afflicted with a diſeaſe in the genitals, Priapus was recalled, and temples erected to his honor. Feſtivals were alſo celebrated, and the people, naturally idle and indolent, gave themſelves up to every laſciviouſneſs and impurity during the celebration. His worſhip was alſo introduced in Rome; but the Romans revered him more as a god of orchards and gardens, than as the patron of licentiouſneſs. A crown painted with different colors was offered to him in the ſpring, and in the ſummer a garland of ears of corn. An aſs was generally ſacrificed to him, becauſe that animal, by its braying, awoke the nymph Lotis, to whom Priapus was going to offer violence. He is generally repreſented with an human face and the ears of a goat; he holds a ſtick in his hand, with which he terrifies birds, as alſo a club to drive away thieves, and a ſcythe to prune the trees and cut down the corn. He was crowned with the leaves of the vine, and ſometimes with laurel, or rocket. The laſt of theſe plants is ſacred to him, and it is ſaid to raiſe the paſſions and excite love. Priapus is often diſtinguiſhed by the epithet of phallus, faſcinus, Itythallus, or ruber, or rubicundus, which are all expreſſive of his deformity. Catull. ep. 19 & 20.—Colum. 2. de Cult. hort.—Horat. 1, ſat. 1.—Tibull. 1, el. 1, v. 18.—*Ovid. Proba, the wife of the emperor Probus.—A woman who opened the gates of Rome to the Goths.

Probus, M. Aurelius Severus, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His father was originally a gardener, who by entering the army roſe to the rank of a military tribune. His ſon obtained the ſame office in the 22d year of his age, and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much by his probity, his valor, his intrepidity, moderation, and clemency, that at the death of the emperor Tacitus, he was inveſted with the imperial purple by the voluntary and uninfluenced choice of his ſoldiers. His election was univerſally approved by the Roman ſenate and the people; and Probus, ſtrengthened on his throne by the affection and attachment of his ſubjects, marched againſt the enemies of Rome, in Gaul and Germany. Several battles were fought, and after he had left 400,000 barbarians dead in the field, Probus turned his his arms againſt the Sarmatians. The ſame ſucceſs attended him, and after he had quelled and terrified to peace the numerous barbarians of the north, he marched through Syria againſt the Blemmyes in the neighbourhood of Egypt. The Blemmyes were defeated with great ſlaughter, and the military character of the emperor was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that the king of Perſia ſued for peace by his ambaſſadors, and attempted to buy the conqueror's favors with the moſt ſplendid preſents. Probus was then feaſting upon the moſt common food when the ambaſſadors were introduced; but without even caſting his eyes upon them, he ſaid, that if their maſter did not give proper ſatisfaction to the Romans, he would lay his territories deſolate, and as naked as the crown of his head. As he ſpoke, the emperor took off his cap, and ſhewed the baldneſs of his head to the ambaſſadors. His conditions were gladly accepted by the Perſian monarch, and Probus retired to Rome to convince his ſubjects of the greatneſs of his conqueſts, and to claim from them the applauſe which their anceſtors had given to the conqueror of Macedonia or the deſtroyer of Carthage, as he paſſed along the ſtreets of Rome. His triumph laſted ſeveral days, and the Roman populace were long entertained with ſhows and combats. But the Roman empire, delivered from its foreign enemies, was torn by civil diſcord, and peace was not re-eſtabliſhed till three uſurpers had been ſeverally defeated. While his ſubjects enjoyed tranquillity, Probus encouraged the liberal arts, he permitted the inhabitants of Gaul and Illyricum to plant vines in their territories, and he himſelf repaired 70 cities in different parts of the empire which had been reduced to ruins. He alſo attempted to drain the waters which were ſtagnated in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, by conveying them to the ſea by artificial canals. His armies were employed in this laborious undertaking; but as they were unaccuſtomed to ſuch toils, they ſoon mutinied, and fell upon the emperor as he was paſſing into one of the towns of Illyricum. He fled into an iron tower which he himſelf had built to obſerve the marſhes, but as he was alone and without arms, he was ſoon overpowered and murdered in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of ſix years and four months, on the ſecond of November, before Chriſt 282. The news of his death was received with the greateſt conſternation, not only his friends, but his very enemies deplored his fate, and even the army, which had been concerned in his fall, erected a monument over his body, and placed upon it this inſcription: Hic Probus imperator, verè probus ſitus eſt, victor omnium gentium barbararum, victor etiam tyrannorum. He was then preparing in a few days to march againſt the Perſians that had revolted; and his victories there might have been as great as thoſe he obtained in the two other quarters of the globe. He was ſucceeded by Carus, and his family, who had ſhared his greatneſs, immediately retired from Rome, not to become objects either of private or public malice. Zoſ.—Prob.—Saturn.——Æmilius, a grammarian in the age of Theodoſius. Pro-

Procopius, a celebrated officer of a noble family in Cilicia, related to the emperor Julian, with whom he lived in great intimacy. He was univerſally admired for his integrity, but he was not deſtitute of ambition or pride. After he had ſignalized himſelf under Julian and his ſucceſſor, he retired from the Roman provinces among the barbarians in the Thracian Cherſoneſus, and ſome time after he ſuddenly made his appearance at Conſtantinople, when the emperor Valens had marched into the eaſt, and he proclaimed himſelf maſter of the eaſtern empire. His uſurpation was univerſally acknowledged, and his victories were ſo rapid, that Valens would have reſigned the imperial purple, had not his friends intervened. But now fortune changed, Procopius was defeated in Phrygia, and abandoned by his army. His head was cut off, and carried to Valentinian in Gaul, A. D. 366. Procopius was ſlain the 42d year of his age, and he had uſurped the title of emperor for about eight months. Ammian. Marcell. 25 & 26.——A Greek hiſtorian of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, ſecretary to the celebrated Beliſarius, A. D. 534. He wrote the hiſtory of the reign of Juſtinian, and greatly celebrated the hero whoſe favors and patronage he enjoyed. This hiſtory is divided into 8 books, 2 of which give an account of the Perſian war, 2 of the Vandals, and 4 of the Goths, to the year 553, which was afterwards continued in 5 books by Agathias till 559. Of this performance the character is great, though perhaps the hiſtorian is often too ſevere on the emperor. The works of Procopius were edited in 2 vols. folio. Paris, 1662.

Procris, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. She married Cephalus. [Vid. Cephalus.] Virg. Æn. 6, v. 445.—A daughter of Theſtius.

Procrustes, a famous robber of Attica, killed by Theſeus, near the Cephiſus. He tied travellers on a bed, and if their length exceeded that of the bed, he uſed to cut it off, but if they were ſhorter, he had them ſtretched to make their length equal to it. He is called by ſome Damaſtes and Polypemon. Ovid. Heroid. 2, v. 69. Met. 7, v. 43.—Plut. in Theſ.

Procŭla, a proſtitute in Juvenal's age, 2, v. 68.

Procŭleius, a Roman knight very intimate with Auguſtus. He is celebrated for his humanity and fraternal kindneſs to his brothers Muræna and Scipio, with whom he divided his poſſeſſions, after they had forfeited their eſtates, and incurred the diſpleaſure of Auguſtus for ſiding with young Pompey. He was ſent by Auguſtus to Cleopatra, to endeavour to bring her alive into his preſence, but to no purpoſe. Procŭlus Julius, a Roman who, after the death of Romulus, declared that he had ſeen him in appearance more than human, and that he had ordered him to bid the Romans to offer him ſacrifices under the name of Quirinus, and to reſt aſſured that Rome was deſtined, by the gods, to become the capital of the world. Plut. in Rom.—Liv. 1, c. 16.—Geganius, a Roman conſul.—Placitius, a Roman who conquered the Hernici.—A friend of Vitellius. —A conſul under Nerva.—A man accuſed of extortion.—An African in the age of Aurelius. He publiſhed a book intitled de regionibus, or religionibus, on foreign countries, &c.—An officer who proclaimed himſelf emperor in Gaul, in the reign of Probus. He was ſoon after defeated, and expoſed on a gibbet. He was very debauched and licentious in his manners, and had acquired riches by piratical excurſions.

Procyon, a ſtar near Sirius, or the dog ſtar, before which it generally riſes in July. Cicero calls it Anticanis, which is of the ſame ſignification (προ κυνος). Horat. 3, od. 29.—Cic. de nat. D. 2, c. 44.

Prodicus, a ſophiſt and rhetorician of Cos, about 396 years before Chriſt. He was ſent as ambaſſador by his countrymen to Athens, where he publicly taught, and had among his pupils Euripides, Socrates, Theramenes, and Iſocrates. He travelled from town to town in Greece, to procure admirers and get money. He made his auditors pay to hear him harangue, which has given occaſion to ſome of the antients to ſpeak of the orations of Prodicus, for 50 drachmas. In his writings, which were numerous, he compoſed a beautiful epiſode, in which virtue and pleaſure were introduced, as attempting to make Hercules one of their votaries. The hero at laſt yielded to the charms of virtue, and rejected pleaſure. This has been imitated by Lucian. Prodicus was at laſt put to death by the Athenians, on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth. Xenoph. memor.

Proerna, a town of Phthiotis. Liv. 63, c. 14.

Prœtides, the daughters of Prœtus, king of Argolis, were three in number, Lyſippe, Iphinoe, and Iphianaſſa. They became inſane for neglecting the worſhip of Bacchus, or according to others, for preferring themſelves to Juno, and they ran about the fields believing themſelves to be cows, and flying away not to be harneſſed to the plow plow or to the chariot. Prœtus applied to Melampus to cure his daughters of their inſanity, but he refuſed to employ him when he demanded the third part of his kingdom as a reward. This neglect of Prœtus was puniſhed, the inſanity became contagious, and the monarch at laſt promiſed Melampus two parts of his kingdom and one of his daughters, if he would reſtore them and the Argian women to their ſenſes. Melampus conſented, and after he had wrought the cure, he married the moſt beautiful of the Prœtides. Some have called them Lyſippe, Ipponoe, and Cyrianaſſa. Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—Ovid. Met. 15.—Lactant. ad Stat. Theb. 1 & 3.

PRŒTUS, a king of Argos, ſon of Abas and Ocalea. He was twin brother to Acriſius, with whom he quarrelled even before their birth. This diſſention between the two brothers encreaſed with their years. After their father's death, they both tried to obtain the kingdom of Argos; but the claims of Acriſius prevailed, and Prœtus left Peloponneſus and retired to the court of Jobates, king of Lycia, where he married Stenobœa, called by ſome Antea or Antiope. He afterwards returned to Argolis, and by means of his father-in-law, he made himſelf maſter of Tirynthus. Stenobœa had accompanied her huſband to Greece, and ſhe became by him mother of the Prœtides, and of a ſon called Megapenthes, who, after his father's death, ſucceeded on the throne of Tirynthus. [Vid. Stenobœa.] Homer. Il. 6.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.

PROMĔDON, a native of the iſland of Naxos, &c.

PROMENÆA, one of the prieſteſſes of the temple of Dodona. It was from her that Herodotus received the tradition that two doves had flown from Thebes in Egypt, one to Dodona, and the other to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, where they gave oracles. Herodot. 2, c. 55.

PROMETHEI JUGUM & ANTRUM, a place on the top of mount Caucaſus, in Albania.

PROMĒTHEUS, a ſon of Iapetus by Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Atlas, Menœtius, and Epimetheus, and ſurpaſſed all mankind in cunning and fraud. He ridiculed the gods, and deceived Jupiter himſelf. He ſacrificed two bulls, and filled their ſkins, one with the fleſh and the other with the bones, and aſked the father of the gods, which of the two he preferred as an offering. Jupiter became the dupe of his artifice, and choſe the bones, and from that time the prieſts of the temples were ever after ordered to burn the whole victims on the altars, the fleſh and the bones altogether. To puniſh Prometheus and the reſt of mankind, Jupiter took fire away from the earth, but the ſon of Iapetus out-witted the father of the gods. He climbed the heavens by the aſſiſtance of Minerva, and ſtole fire from the chariot of the ſun, which he brought down upon the earth, at the end of a ferula. This provoked Jupiter the more; he ordered Vulcan to make a woman of clay, and after he had given her life, he ſent her to Prometheus, with a box of the richeſt and moſt valuable preſents which ſhe had received from the gods. [Vid. Pandora.] Prometheus, who ſuſpected Jupiter, took no notice of Pandora or her box, but he made his brother Epimetheus marry her, and the god, now more irritated, ordered Mercury or Vulcan, according to Æſchylus, to carry this artful mortal to mount Caucaſus, and there tie him to a rock, where for 30,000 years, a vulture was to feed upon his liver, which was never diminiſhed, though continually devoured. He was delivered from this painful confinement about 30 years afterwards by Hercules, who killed the bird of prey. The vulture, or according to others, the eagle, which devoured the liver of Prometheus, was born from Typhon and Echidna. According to Apollodorus, Prometheus made the firſt man and woman that ever were upon the earth, with clay, which he animated by means of the fire which he had ſtolen from heaven. On this account therefore, the Athenians raiſed him an altar in the grove of Academus, where they yearly celebrated games in his honor. During theſe games there was a race, and he who carried a burning torch in his hand without extinguiſhing it, obtained the prize. Prometheus, as it is univerſally credited, had received the gift of prophecy, and all the gods, and even Jupiter himſelf conſulted him as a moſt infallible oracle. To him mankind are indebted for the invention of many of the uſeful arts; he taught them the uſe of plants, with their phyſical power, and from him they received the knowledge of taming horſes and different animals, either to cultivate the ground, or for the purpoſes of luxury. *Heſiod. PROMŬLUS, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 574.

PRONAPIDES, an ancient Greek poet of Athens, who was, according to ſome, preceptor to Homer. It is ſaid that he firſt taught the Greeks how to write from the left to the right, contrary to the cuſtom of writing from the right to the left, which is ſtill obſerved by ſome of the eaſtern nations. Diod. 3.

PRONAX, a brother of Adraſtus king of Argos, ſon of Talaus and Lyſimache. Pauſ. 3, c. 18.

PRONOE, a daughter of Phorbus, mother of Pleuron and Calydon, by Æolus.

PRONŎMUS, a Theban who played ſo ſkilfully on the flute, that the invention of that muſical inſtrument is attributed to him. Pauſ. 9, c. 12.

PRONOUS, a ſon of Phlegeas, killed by the ſons of Alcmæon.

PRONŬBA, a ſirname of Juno, becauſe ſhe preſided over marriages. Virg.

PROPERTIUS (Sextus Aurelius,) a Latin poet born at Mevania, in Umbria. His father was a Roman knight, whom Auguſtus proſcribed, becauſe he had followed the intereſt of Antony. He came to Rome, where his genius and poetical talents ſoon recommended him to the notice of the great and powerful. Mecænas, Gallus, and Virgil, became his friends, and Auguſtus his patron. Mecænas wiſhed him to attempt an epic poem, of which he propoſed the emperor for hero; but Propertius refuſed, obſerving that his abilities were unequal to the taſk. He died about 19 years before Chriſt, in the 40th year of his age. His works conſiſt of four books of elegies, which are written with ſo much ſpirit, vivacity, and energy, that many authors call him the prince of the elegiac poets among the Latins. His poetry, though elegant, is not free from faults, and the many laſcivious expreſſions which he uſes, deſervedly expoſe him to cenſure. Cynthia, who is the heroine of all his elegies, was a Roman lady, whoſe real name was Hoſtia, or Hoſtilia, of whom the poet was deeply enamoured. Though Mevania is more generally ſuppoſed to be the place of his birth, yet four other cities of Umbria have diſputed the honor of it; Heſpillus, Ameria, Peruſia, and Aſſiſium. The beſt edition is that of Santenius, 4to. Traj. ad Rh. 1780, and when publiſhed together with Catullus, and Tibullus, thoſe of Grævius, 8vo. Utr. 1680, of Vulpius, 4 vols. Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755, and the edition of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754. *Ovid. PROPŒTIDES, ſome women of Cyprus, ſeverely puniſhed by Venus, whoſe divinity they had deſpiſed. They ſent their daughters to the ſea ſhore, where they proſtituted themſelves to ſtrangers. The poets have feigned, that they were changed into ſtones, on account of their inſenſibility to every virtuous ſentiment. Juſtin. 18, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 238.

PROPONTIS, a ſea which has a communication with the Euxine, by the Thracian Boſphorus, and with the Ægean by the Helleſpont, now called the ſea of Marmora. It is about 175 miles long and 62 broad, and it received its name from its vicinity to Pontus. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 2.—Ovid. 1. Triſt. 9, v. 29.—Propert. 3, el. 22.

PROPYLEA, a ſirname of Diana. She had a temple at Eleuſis in Attica.

PROSCHYSTIUS, a ſirname of Neptune, among the Greeks. Pauſ. 2.

PROSERPĪNA, a daughter of Ceres by Jupiter, called by the Greeks Perſephone. She was ſo beautiful, that the father of the gods himſelf became enamoured of her, and deceived her by changing himſelf into a ſerpent, and folding her in his wreaths. Proſerpine made Sicily the place of her reſidence, and delighted herſelf with the beautiful views, the flowery meadows, and limpid ſtreams, which ſurrounded the plains of Enna. In this ſolitary retreat, as ſhe amuſed herſelf with her female attendants in gathering flowers, Pluto carried her away into the infernal regions, of which ſhe became the queen. [Vid. Pluto.] Ceres was ſo diſconſolate at the loſs of her daughter, that ſhe travelled all over the world, but her inquiries were in vain, and ſhe never would have diſcovered whither ſhe had been carried, had not ſhe found the girdle of Proſerpine on the ſurface of the waters of the fountain Cyane, near which the raviſher had had opened himſelf a paſſage to his kingdom by ſtriking the earth with his trident. Ceres ſoon learned from the nymph Arethuſa that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto, and immediately ſhe repaired to Jupiter, and demanded of him to puniſh the raviſher. Jupiter in vain attempted to perſuade the mother, that Pluto was not unworthy of her daughter, and when he ſaw that ſhe was inflexible for the reſtitution of Proſerpine, he ſaid that ſhe might return on earth, if ſhe had not taken any aliments in the infernal regions. Her return, however, was impoſſible, Proſerpine, as ſhe walked in the Elyſian fields, had gathered a pomegranate from a tree and eaten it, and Aſcalaphus was the only one who ſaw it, and for his diſcovery the goddeſs inſtantly turned him into an owl. Jupiter, to appeaſe the reſentment of Ceres, and ſooth her grief, permitted that Proſerpine ſhould remain ſix months with Pluto in the infernal regions, and that ſhe ſhould ſpend the reſt of the year with her mother on earth. As queen of hell, and wife of Pluto, Proſerpine preſided over the death of mankind, and, according to the opinion of the ancients, no one could die, if the goddeſs herſelf, or Atropos her miniſter, did not cut off one of the hairs from the head. From this ſuperſtitious belief, it was uſual to cut off ſome of the hair of the deceaſed, and to ſtrew it at the door of the houſe, as an offering for Proſerpine. The Sicilians were very particular in their worſhip to Proſerpine, and as they believed that the fountain Cyane had riſen from the earth at the very place where Pluto had opened himſelf a paſſage, they annually ſacrificed there a bull, of which they ſuffered the blood to run into the water. Proſerpine was univerſally worſhipped by the ancients, and ſhe was known by the different names of Core, Theogamia, Libitina, Hecate, Juno inferna, Antheſphoria, Cotyto, Deois, Libera, &c. Plut. in Luc.—Pauſ. 8, c. 37. l. 9, c. 31.—*Ovid. PROSPER, one of the fathers who died A. D. 466. His works have been edited by Mangeant, fol. Paris, 1711.

PROSYMNA, a part of Argolis, where Juno was worſhipped. It received its name from a nymph who nurſed Juno. Pauſ. 2.

PROTAGŎRAS, a Greek philoſopher of Abdera in Thrace, who was originally a porter. He became one of the diſciples of Democritus, when that philoſopher had ſeen him carrying faggots on his head, poiſed in a proper equilibrium. He ſoon rendered himſelf ridiculous by his doctrines, and in a book which he publiſhed, he denied the exiſtence of a ſupreme being. This doctrine he ſupported by obſerving, that his doubts aroſe from the uncertainty of the exiſtence of a ſupreme power, and from the ſhortneſs of human life. This book was publicly burnt at Athens, and the philoſopher baniſhed from the city, as a worthleſs and contemptible being. Protagoras viſited, from Athens, different iſlands in the Mediterranean, and died in Sicily in a very advanced age, about 400 years before the Chriſtian era. He generally reaſoned by dilemmas, and always left the mind in ſuſpence about all the queſtions which he propoſed. Some ſuppoſe that he was drowned. Diog. 9.—Plut. in Protag.—— A king of Cyprus, tributary to the court of Perſia.——Another.

PROTAGORĬDES, an hiſtorian of Cyzicus, who wrote a treatiſe on the games of Daphne, celebrated at Antioch.

PROTESILAI TURRIS, the monument of Proteſilaus, on the Helleſpont. Plin. 4, c. 11.—Mela. 2, c. 2.

PRŌTĔSĬLĀUS, a king of part of Theſſaly, ſon of Iphiclus, originally called Iolaus, grandſon of Phylacus, and brother to Alcimede, the mother of Jaſon. He married Laodamia, the daughter of Acaſtus, and ſome time after he departed with the reſt of the Greeks for the Trojan war with 40 ſail. He was the firſt of the Greeks who ſet foot on the Trojan ſhore, and as ſuch he was doomed by the oracle to periſh, therefore he was killed, as ſoon as he had leaped from his ſhip, by Æneas or Hector. Homer has not mentioned the perſon who killed him. His wife Laodamia deſtroyed herſelf, when ſhe heard of his death. [Vid. Laodamia.] Proteſilaus has received the patronymic of Phylacides, either becauſe he was deſcended from Phylacus, or becauſe he was a native of Phylace. He was buried on the Trojan ſhore, and, according to Pliny, there were near his tomb certain trees which grew to an extraordinary height, which as ſoon as they could be diſcovered and ſeen from Troy, immediately withered and decayed, and afterwards grew up again to their former height, and ſuffered the ſame viciſſitude. *Homer. PROTEUS, PROTEUS, a ſea deity, ſon of Oceanus and Tethys, or according to ſome of Neptune and Phœnice. He had received the gift of prophecy from Neptune, and from his knowledge of futurity, mankind received the greateſt ſervices. He uſually reſided in the Carpathian ſea, and, like the reſt of the gods, he repoſed himſelf on the ſea ſhore, where ſuch as wiſhed to conſult him generally reſorted. He was difficult of acceſs, and when conſulted he refuſed to give anſwers, by immediately aſſuming different ſhapes and eluding the graſp, if not properly ſecured in fetters. Ariſtus was in the number of thoſe who conſulted him, as alſo Hercules. Some ſuppoſe that he was originally a king of Egypt, known among his ſubjects by the name of Cetes, and they aſſert that he had two ſons, Telegonus and Polygonus, who were both killed by Hercules. He had alſo ſome daughters, among whom were Cabira, Eidothea, and Rhetia. Homer. Od. 4, v. 360.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 10. Am. el. 12, v. 36.—Heſiod. Theog.—*Virg. PROTHEUS, a Greek at the Trojan war.——A Spartan who endeavoured to prevent a war with the Thebans.

PROTOGENĒA, a daughter of Calydon, by Æolia the daughter of Amythaon. She had a ſon called Oxillus by Mars. Apollod. 1.

PROTOGĔNES, a painter of Rhodes, who floriſhed about 328 years before Chriſt. He was originally ſo poor that he painted ſhips to maintain himſelf. His countrymen were ignorant of his ingenuity before Apelles came to Rhodes, and offered to buy all his pieces. This opened the eyes of the Rhodians, they became ſenſible of the merit of their countryman, and liberally rewarded him. Protogenes was employed for ſeven years in finiſhing a picture of Jaſyſus, a celebrated huntſman, ſuppoſed to have been the ſon of Apollo, and the founder of Rhodes. During all this time the painter lived only upon lupines and water, thinking that ſuch aliments would leave him greater flights of fancy; but all this did not ſeem to make him more ſucceſsful in the perfection of his picture. He was to repreſent in the piece a dog panting, and with froth at his mouth, but this he never could do with ſatisfaction to himſelf; and when all his labors ſeemed to be without ſucceſs, he threw his ſponge upon the piece in a fit of anger. Chance alone brought to perfection what the labors of art could not do, the fall of the ſponge upon the picture repreſented the froth at the mouth of the dog in the moſt perfect and natural manner, and the piece was univerſally admired. Protogenes was very exact in his repreſentations, and copied nature with the greateſt nicety, and this was blamed as a fault by his friend Apelles. When Demetrius beſieged Rhodes, he refuſed to ſet fire to a part of the city which might have made him maſter of the whole, becauſe he knew that Protogenes was then working in that quarter. When the town was taken, the painter was found cloſely employed in a garden in finiſhing a picture; and when the conqueror aſked him, why he ſhowed not more concern at the general calamity? he replied, that Demetrius made war againſt the Rhodians, and not againſt the fine arts. Pauſ. 1, c. 3.—Plin. 35, c. 10.—*Ælian. PRUDENTIUS Aurelius Clemens, a Latin poet who floriſhed A. D. 392, and was ſucceſſively a ſoldier, an advocate, and a judge. His poems are numerous, and all theological, devoid of the elegance and purity of the Auguſtan age, and yet greatly valued. The beſt editions are the Delphin, 4to. Paris 1687; that of Cellarius, 12mo. Halæ 1703; and that of Parma, 2 vols. 4to. 1788.

PRUMNIDES, a king of Corinth.

PRUSÆUS, Dion, floriſhed A. D. 105.

PRUSIAS, a king of Bithynia, who floriſhed 221 B. C.——Another, ſirnamed Venator, who made an alliance with the Romans when they waged war with Antiochus, king of Syria. He gave a kind reception to Annibal, and by his advice he made war againſt Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and defeated him. Eumenes, who was an ally of Rome as well as Pruſias, complained before the Romans of the hoſtilities of the king of Bithynia. Q. Flaminius was ſent from Rome to ſettle the diſputes disputes of the two monarchs, and he was no sooner arrived in Bithynia, than Prusias, to gain his favor, prepared to deliver to him, at his request, the celebrated Carthaginian, to whom he was indebted for all the advantages he had obtained over Eumenes; but Annibal prevented it by a voluntary death. Prusias was obliged by the Roman ambassador to make a restitution of the provinces he had conquered, and by his meanness he continued to enjoy the favors of the Romans. When some time after he visited the capital of Italy, he appeared in the habit of a manumitted slave, calling himself the freed-man of the Romans; and when he was introduced into the senate-house, he saluted the senators by the name of visible deities, of saviors and deliverers. Such abject behaviour rendered him contemptible not only in the eyes of the Romans, but of his subjects, and when he returned home the Bithynians revolted, and placed his son Nicomedes on the throne. The banished monarch fled to Nicomedia, where he was assassinated near the altar of Jupiter, about 149 years before Christ. Some say that his son became his murderer. Prusias, according to Polybius, was the meanest of monarchs, without honesty, without morals, virtue, or principle; he was cruel and cowardly, intemperate and voluptuous, and an enemy to all learning. He was naturally deformed, and he often appeared in public in the habit of a woman to render his deformities more visible. Polyb.—Liv.—Justin. 31, &c.—C. Nep. in Annib.—Plut. in Flam. &c.

Prytănes, certain magistrates at Athens who presided over the senate, and had the privilege of assembling it when they pleased, festivals excepted. They generally met in a large hall, called prytaneum, where they gave audiences, offered sacrifices, and feasted together with all those who had rendered signal service to their country. The Prytanes were elected from the senators which were in number 500, 50 of which were chosen from each tribe. When they were elected, the names of the 10 tribes of Athens were thrown into one vessel, and into another were placed nine black beans and a white one. The tribe whose name was drawn with the white bean, presided the first, and the rest in the order in which they were drawn. They presided each for 35 days, as the year was divided into 10 parts; but it is unknown what tribe presided the rest of those days which were supernumerary. When the number of tribes was increased to 12, each of the Prytanes presided one full month.——Some of the principal magistrates of Corinth were also called Prytanes.

Psammenītus, succeeded his father Amasis on the throne of Egypt. Cambyses made war against him, and as he knew that the Egyptians paid the greatest veneration to cats, the Persian monarch placed some of these animals at the head of his army, and the enemy, unable to defend themselves, and unwilling to kill those objects of adoration, were easily conquered. Psammenitus was twice beaten, at Pelusium and in Memphis, and became one of the prisoners of Cambyses, who treated him with great humanity. Psammenitus, however raised seditions against the Persian monarch; and attempted to make the Egyptians rebel, for which he was put to death by drinking bull's blood. He had reigned about six months. He flourished about 525 years before the Christian era. Herodot. 3, c. 10, &c.

Psammetĭchus, a king of Egypt. He was one of the 12 princes who shared the kingdom among themselves; but as he was more popular than the rest, he was banished from his dominions, and retired into the marshes near the sea shore. A descent of some of the Greeks upon Egypt proved favorable to his cause; he joined the enemy, and defeated the 11 princes who had expelled him from the country. He rewarded the Greeks, by whose valor he had recovered Egypt, he allotted them some territory on the sea coast, patronized the liberal arts, and encouraged commerce among his subject. He made useless enquiries to find the sources of the Nile, and he stopped, by bribes and money, a large army of Scythians that were marching against him. He died 617 years before the Christian era, and was buried in Minerva's temple at Sais. During his reign there was a contention among some of the neighbouring nations about the antiquity of their language. Psammetichus took a part in the conteſt. He confined two young children, and fed them with milk; the ſhepherd to whoſe care they were entruſted, was ordered never to ſpeak to them, but to watch diligently their articulations. After ſome time the ſhepherd obſerved, that whenever he entered the place of their confinement they repeatedly exclaimed Beccos, and he gave information of this to the monarch. Pſammetichus made enquiries, and found that the word Beccos ſignified bread in the Phœnician language, and from that circumſtance, therefore, it was univerſally concluded that the language of Phœnicia was of the greateſt antiquity. Herodot. 2, c. 28, &c.—Polyæn. 8.—Strab. 16.——A ſon of Gordius, brother to Periander, who held the tyranny at Corinth for three years, B. Psyche, a nymph whom Cupid married and carried into a place of bliſs, where he long enjoyed her company. Venus put her to death becauſe ſhe had robbed the world of her ſon; but Jupiter, at the requeſt of Cupid, granted immortality to Pſyche. The word ſignifies the ſoul, and this perſonification of Pſyche is poſterior to the Auguſtan age, though ſtill it is connected with ancient mythology. Pſyche is generally repreſented with the wings of a butterfly, to intimate the lightneſs of the ſoul, of which the butterfly is the ſymbol, and on that account, among the ancients, when a man had juſt expired, a butterfly appeared fluttering above, as if riſing from the mouth of the deceaſed.

Psychrus, a river of Thrace. When ſheep drank of its waters they were ſaid always to bring forth black lambs. Ariſtot.

Ptolemæus 1ſt, ſirnamed Lagus, a king of Egypt, ſon of Arſinoe, who, when pregnant by Philip of Macedonia, married Lagus, a man of mean extraction. [Vid. Lagus.] Ptolemy was educated in the court of the king of Macedonia, he became one of the friends and aſſociates of Alexander, and when that monarch invaded Aſia, the ſon of Arſinoe attended him as one of his generals. During the expedition, he behaved with uncommon valor; he killed one of the Indian monarchs in ſingle combat, and it was to his prudence and courage that Alexander was indebted for the reduction of the rock Aornus. After the conqueror's death, in the general diviſion of the Macedonian empire, Ptolemy obtained as his ſhare the government of Egypt, with Libya, and part of the neighbouring territories of Arabia. In this appointment the governor ſoon gained the eſteem of the people by acts of kindneſs, by benevolence and clemency, and though he did not aſſume the title of independent monarch, till 19 years after, yet he was ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, that the attempts of Perdiccas to drive him away from his poſſeſſions proved abortive; and Ptolemy, after the murder of his rival by Grecian ſoldiers, might have added the kingdom of Macedonia to his Egyptian territories. He made himſelf maſter of Cœloſyria, Phœnicia, and the neighbouring coaſt of Syria, and when he had reduced Jeruſalem, he carried above 100,000 priſoners to Egypt to people the extenſive city of Alexandria, which became the capital of his dominions. After he had rendered theſe priſoners the moſt attached and faithful of his ſubjects by his liberality and the grant of privileges, Ptolemy aſſumed the title of king of Egypt, and ſoon arter reduced Cyprus under his power. He made war with ſucceſs againſt Demetrius and Antigonus, who diſputed his right to the provinces of Syria; and from the aſſiſtance he gave to the people people of Rhodes againſt their common enemies, he received the name of Soter. While he extended his dominions, Ptolemy was not negligent of the advantages of his people. The bay of Alexandria being dangerous of acceſs, he built a tower to conduct the ſailors in the obſcurity of the night, [Vid. Pharos,] and that his ſubjects might be acquainted with literature, he laid the foundation of a library, which, under the ſucceeding reigns, became the moſt celebrated in the world. He alſo eſtabliſhed in the capital of his dominions a ſociety called muſeum, of which the members, maintained at the public expence, were employed in philoſophical reſearches, and in the advancement of ſcience and the liberal arts. Ptolemy died in the 84th year of his age, after a reign of 39 years, about 284 years before Chriſt. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had been his partner on the throne the laſt ten years of his reign. Ptolemy Lagus has been commended for his abilities, not only as a ſovereign, but as a writer; and among the many valuable compoſitions which have been loſt, we are to lament an hiſtory of Alexander the Great, by the king of Egypt, greatly admired and valued for elegance and authenticity. All his ſucceſſors were called Ptolemies from him. Pauſ. 10, c. 7.—Juſtin. 13, &c.—Polyb. 2.—Arrian.—Curt.—Plut. in Alex.——The 2d, ſon of Ptolemy the firſt, ſucceeded his father on the Egyptian throne and was called Philadelphus by antiphraſis becauſe he killed two of his brothers. He ſhewed himſelf worthy in every reſpect to ſucceed his great father, and conſcious of the advantages which ariſe from an alliance with powerful nations, he ſent ambaſſadors to Italy to ſolicit the friendſhip of the Romans, whoſe name and military reputation had become univerſally known for the victories which they had juſt obtained over Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. His ambaſſadors were received with marks of the greateſt attention, and immediately after four Roman ſenators came to Alexandria, where they gained the admiration of the monarch and of his ſubjects, and by refuſing the crowns of gold and rich preſents which were offered to them, convinced the world of the virtue and of the diſintereſtedneſs of their nation. But while Ptolemy ſtrengthened himſelf by alliances with foreign powers, the internal peace of his kingdom was diſturbed by the revolt of Magas his brother, king of Cyrene. The ſedition however was ſtopped, though kindled by Antiochus king of Syria, and the death of the rebellious prince re-eſtabliſhed peace for ſome time in the family of Philadelphus. Antiochus the Syrian king married Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and the father, though old and infirm, conducted his daughter to her huſband's kingdom, and aſſiſted at the nuptials. Philadelphus died in the 64th year of his age, 246 years before the chriſtian era. He left two ſons and a daughter, by Arſinoe the daughter of Lyſimachus. He had afterwards married his ſiſter Arſinoe whom he loved with uncommon tenderneſs, and to whoſe memory he began to erect a celebrated monument. [Vid. Dinocrates.] During the whole of his reign Philadelphus was employed in exciting induſtry, and in encouraging the liberal arts and uſeful knowledge among his ſubjects. The inhabitants of the adjacent countries were allured by promiſes and preſents to encreaſe the number of the Egyptian ſubjects, and Ptolemy could boaſt of reigning over 33,339 well peopled cities. He gave every poſſible encouragement to commerce, and by keeping two powerful fleets, one in the Mediterranean, and the other in the Red ſea, he made Egypt the mart of the world. His army conſiſted of 200,000 foot, 40,000 horſe, beſides 300 elephants and 2000 armed chariots. With juſtice therefore he has been called the richeſt of all the princes and monarchs of his age, and indeed the remark is not falſe when it is obſerved, that at his death he left in his treaſury 750,000 Egyptian talents, a ſum equivalent to two hundred millions ſterling. His palace was the aſylum of learned men, whom he admired and patronized. He paid particular attention to Euclid, Theocritus, Callimachus, and Lycophron, and by increaſing the library, which his father had founded, he ſhewed his taſte for learning, and his wiſh to encourage genius. This celebrated library at his death contained 200,000 volumes of the beſt and choiceſt books, and it was afterwards encreaſed to 700,000 volumes. Part of it was burnt by the flames of Cæſar's fleet when he ſet it on fire to ſave himſelf, a circumſtance however not mentioned by the general, and the whole was again magnificently repaired by Cleopatra, who added to the Egyptian library that of the kings of Pergamus. It is ſaid that the old teſtament was tranſlated into Greek during his reign, a tranſlation which has been called Septuagint, becauſe tranſlated by the labors of 70 different perſons. Eutrop.—Juſtin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut.—Theocrit.—Athen. 12.—Plin. 13, c. 12.—Dio. 42.—Gellius 6, c. 17.——The 3d, ſucceeded his father Philadelphus on the Egyptian throne. He early engaged in a war againſt Antiochus Theus, for his unkindneſs to Berenice the Egyptian king's ſiſter, whom he had married with the conſent of Philadelphus. With the moſt rapid ſucceſs he conquered Syria and Cilicia, and advanced as far as the Tigris, but a ſedition at home ſtopped his progreſs, and he returned to Egypt loaded with the ſpoils of conquered nations. Among the immenſe riches which he brought he had above 2500 ſtatues of the Egyptian gods, which Cambyſes had carried away into Perſia when he conquered Egypt. Theſe were reſtored to the temples, and the Egyptians called their ſovereign Evergetes, in acknowledgment of his attention, beneficence, and religious zeal for the gods of his country. The laſt years of Ptolemy's reign were paſſed in peace, if we except the refuſal of the Jews to pay the tribute of 20 ſilver talents which their anceſtors had always paid to the Egyptian monarchs. He alſo intereſted himſelf in the affairs of Greece, and aſſiſted Cleomenes the Spartan king againſt the leaders of the Achæan league; but he had the mortification to ſee his ally defeated, and even a fugitive in Egypt. Evergetes died 221 years before Chriſt, after a reign of 25 years, and, like his two illuſtrious predeceſſors, he was the patron of learning, and indeed he is the laſt of the Lagides who gained popularity among his ſubjects by clemency, moderation, and humanity, and who commanded reſpect even from his enemies, by valor, prudence, and reputation. It is ſaid that he depoſited 15 talents in the hands of the Athenians to be permitted to tranſlate the original manuſcripts of Æſchylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. Plut. in Cleom. &c.—Polyb. 2.—Juſtin. 29, &c.——The 4th, ſucceeded his father Evergetes on the throne of Egypt and received the ſirname of Philopater by antiphraſis, becauſe, according to ſome hiſtorians, he deſtroyed his father by poiſon. He began his reign with acts of the greateſt cruelty, and he ſucceſſively ſacrificed to his avarice his own mother, his wife, his ſiſter, and his brother. He received the name of Typhon, from his extravagance and debauchery, and that of Gallus, becauſe he appeared in the ſtreets of Alexandria like one of the bacchanals, and with all the geſtures of the prieſts of Cybele. In the midſt of his pleaſures Philopater was called to war againſt Antiochus king of Syria, and at the head of a powerful army he ſoon invaded his enemy's territories, and might have added the kingdom of Syria to Egypt, if he had made a prudent uſe of the victories which attended his arms. In his return he viſited Jeruſalem, but the Jews prevented him forcibly from entering their temple, for which inſolence to his majeſty the monarch determined to extirpate the whole nation. He ordered an immenſe number of Jews to be expoſed in a plain, and trodden under the feet of elephants, but by a ſupernatural inſtinct the generous animals turned their fury not on thoſe that had been devoted to death, but upon the Egyptian ſpectators. This circumſtance terrified Philopater, and he behaved with more than common kindneſs to a nation which he had ſo lately devoted to deſtruction. In the latter part of his reign the Romans, whom a dangerous war with Carthage had weakened, but at the ſame time roufed to ſuperior activity, renewed, for political reaſons, the treaty of alliance which had been made with the Egyptian monarchs. Philopater at laſt, weakened and enervated by intemperance and continual debauchery, died in the 37th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years, 204 years before the Chriſtian æra. His death was immediately followed by the murder of the companions of his voluptuouſneſs and extravagance, and their carcaſes were dragged with the greateſt ignominy through the ſtreets of Alexandria. Polyb. —Juſtin. 30, &c.—Plut. in Cleom.——The 5th, ſucceeded his father Philopater as king of Egypt, though only in the 4th year of his age. During the years of his minority he was under the protection of Soſicius and of Ariſtomenes, by whoſe prudent adminiſtration Antiochus was diſpoſſeſſed of the provinces of Cœloſyria and Paleſtine, which he had conquered by war. The Romans alſo renewed their alliance with him after their victories over Annibal, and the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war. This flattering embaſſy induced Ariſtomenes to offer the care of the patronage of the young monarch to the Romans, but the regent was confirmed in his honorable office, and by making a treaty of alliance with the people of Achaia, he convinced the Egyptians that he was qualified to wield the ſceptre and to govern the nation. But now that Ptolemy had reached his 14th year, according to the laws and cuſtoms of Egypt, the years of his minority had expired. He received the ſirname of Epiphanes, or illuſtrious, and was crowned at Alexandria with the greateſt ſolemnity, and the faithful Ariſtomenes reſigned into his hands an empire which he had governed with honor to himſelf, and with credit to his ſovereign. Young Ptolemy was no ſooner delivered from the ſhackles of a ſuperior, than he betrayed the ſame vices which had characterized his father, the counſels of Ariſtomenes were deſpiſed, and the miniſter who for ten years had governed the kingdom with equity and moderation, was ſacrificed to the caprice of the ſovereign, who abhorred him for the ſalutary advice which his own vicious inclinations did not permit him to follow.

His

His cruelties raiſed ſeditions among his ſubjects, but theſe were twice quelled by the prudence and the moderation of one Polycrates, the moſt faithful of his corrupt miniſters. In the midſt of his extravagance Epiphanes did not forget his alliance with the Romans; above all others he ſhewed himſelf eager to cultivate friendſhip with a nation from whom he could derive ſo many advantages, and during their war againſt Antiochus he offered to aſſiſt them with money againſt a monarch, whoſe daughter Cleopatra he had married, but whom he hated on account of the ſeditions he had raiſed in the very heart of Egypt. After a reign of 24 years, 180 years before Chriſt, Ptolemy was poiſoned by his miniſters, whom he had threatened to rob of their poſſeſſions to carry on a war againſt Seleucus king of Syria. Liv. 35, c. 13, &c.—Juſtin. &c.——The 6th, ſucceeded his father Epiphanes on the Egyptian throne, and received the ſirname of Philometor, on account of his hatred againſt his mother Cleopatra. He was in the 6th year of his age when he aſcended the throne, and during his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother, and at her death by an eunuch who was one of his favorites. He made war againſt Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, to recover the provinces of Paleſtine and Cœloſyria, which were part of the Egyptian dominions, and after ſeveral ſucceſſes he fell into the hands of his enemy, who detained him in confinement. During the captivity of Philometor, the Egyptians raiſed to the throne his younger brother Ptolemy Evergetes, or Phyſcon, alſo ſon of Epiphanes, but he was no ſooner eſtabliſhed in his power than Antiochus turned his arms againſt Egypt, drove the uſurper, and reſtored Philometor to all his rights and privileges as king of Egypt. This artful behaviour of Antiochus, was ſoon comprehended by Philometor, and when he ſaw that Peluſium, the key of Egypt, had remained in the hands of his Syrian ally, he recalled his brother Phyſcon, and made him partner on the throne, and concerted with him how to repel their common enemy. This union of intereſt in the two royal brothers incenſed Antiochus; he entered Egypt with a large army, but the Romans checked his progreſs, and obliged him to retire. No ſooner were they delivered from the impending war than Philometor and Phyſcon, whom the fear of danger had united, began with mutual jealouſy to oppoſe each other's views. Phyſcon was at laſt baniſhed by the ſuperior power of his brother, and as he could find no ſupport in Egypt, he immediately repaired to Rome. To excite more effectually the compaſſion of the Romans, and to gain their aſſiſtance, he appeared in the meaneſt dreſs, and took his reſidence in the moſt obſcure corner of the city. He received an audience from the ſenate, and the Romans ſettled the diſpute between the two royal brothers, by making them independent of one another, and giving the government of Libya and Cyrene to Phyſcon, and confirming Philometor in the poſſeſſion of Egypt, and the iſland of Cyprus. Theſe terms of accommodation were gladly accepted, but Phyſcon ſoon claimed the dominion of Cyprus, and in this he was ſupported by the Romans, who wiſhed to aggrandize themſelves by the diminution of the Egyptian power. Philometor refuſed to deliver up the iſland of Cyprus, and to call away his brother's attention, he fomented the ſeeds of rebellion in Cyrene. But the death of Philometor 145 years before the Chriſtian era, left Phyſcon maſter of Egypt, and all the dependent provinces. Philometor has been commended by ſome hiſtorians for his clemency and moderation. Diod.—Liv.—Polyb.——The 7th Ptolemy, ſirnamed Phyſcon, on account of the prominence of his belly, aſcended the throne of Egypt after the death of his brother Philometor, and as he had reigned for ſome time conjointly with him, [Vid. Ptolemæus 6th.] his ſucceſſion was approved, though the wife and the ſon of the deceaſed monarch laid claims to the crown. Cleopatra was ſupported in her claims by the Jews, and it was at laſt agreed that Phyſcon ſhould marry the queen, and that her ſon ſhould ſucceed on the throne at his death. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but on that very day the tyrant murdered Cleopatra's ſon in her arms. He ordered himſelf to be called Evergetes, but the Alexandrians refuſed to do it, and ſtigmatized him with the appellation of Kakergetes, or evil doer, a ſirname which he deſerved by his tyranny and oppreſſion. A ſeries of barbarity rendered him odious, but as no one attempted to rid Egypt of her tyrant, the Alexandrians abandoned their habitations, and fled from a place which continually ſtreamed with the blood of their maſſacred fellow citizens. If their migration proved fatal to the commerce and proſperity of Alexandria, it was of the moſt eſſential ſervice to the countries where they retired; and the numbers of Egyptians that ſought a ſafer aſylum in Greece and Aſia, introduced among the inhabitants of thoſe countries the different profeſſions that were practiſed with ſucceſs in the capital of Egypt. Phyſcon endeavoured to re-people the city which his cruelty had laid deſolate; but the fear of ſharing the fate of its former inhabitants, prevailed more than the promiſe of riches, rights, and immunities. The king at laſt diſguſted with Cleopatra, repudiated her, and married her daughter by Philometor, called alſo Cleopatra. He ſtill continued to exerciſe the greateſt cruelty upon his ſubjects, but the prudence and vigilance of his miniſters kept the people in tranquillity, till all Egypt revolted when the king had baſely murdered all the young men of Alexandria. Without friends or ſupport in Egypt, he fled to Cyprus, and Cleopatra, the divorced queen, aſcended the throne. In his baniſhment Phyſcon dreaded leſt the Alexandrians ſhould alſo place the crown on the head of his ſon, by his ſiſter Cleopatra, who was then governor of Cyrene, and under theſe apprehenſions he ſent for the young prince, called Memphitis, to Cyprus, and murdered him as ſoon as he reached the ſhore. To make the barbarity more complete, he ſent the limbs of Memphitis to Cleopatra, and they were received as the queen was going to celebrate her birth day. Soon after this he invaded Egypt with an army, and obtained a victory over the forces of Cleopatra, who being left without friends or aſſiſtance, fled to her eldeſt daughter Cleopatra, who had married Demetrius, king of Syria. This deciſive blow reſtored Phyſcon to his throne, where he continued to reign for ſome time hated by his ſubjects and feared by his enemies. He died at Alexandria in the 67th year of his age, after a reign of 29 years, about 116 years before Chriſt. Some authors have extolled Phyſcon for his fondneſs for literature; they have obſerved, that from his extenſive knowledge he was called the philologiſt, and that he wrote a comment upon Homer, beſides an hiſtory in 24 books, admired for its elegance, and often quoted by ſucceeding authors whoſe pen was employed on the ſame ſubject. Diod.—Juſtin. 38, &c.—Athen. 2.—Porphyr.——The 8th, ſurnamed Lathyrus, from an excreſcence like a pea on the noſe, ſucceeded his father Phyſcon as king of Egypt. He had no ſooner aſcended the throne than his mother Cleopatra, who reigned conjointly with him, expelled him to Cyprus, and placed the crown on the head of his brother Ptolemy Alexander, her favorite ſon. Lathyrus, baniſhed from Egypt, became king of Cyprus; and ſoon after he appeared at the head of a large army, to make war againſt Alexander Jannæus, king of Judæa, through whoſe aſſiſtance and intrigue he had been expelled by Cleopatra. The Jewiſh monarch was conquered, and 50,000 of his men were left on the field of battle. Lathyrus, after he had exerciſed the greateſt cruelty upon the Jews, and made vain attempts to recover the kingdom of Egypt, retired to Cyprus till the death of his brother Alexander reſtored him to his native dominions. Some of the cities of Egypt refuſed to acknowledge him as their ſovereign, and Thebes, for its obſtinacy, was cloſely beſieged for three ſucceſſive years, and from a powerful and populous city it was reduced to ruins. In the latter part of his reign Lathyrus was called upon to aſſiſt the Romans with a navy for the conqueſt of Athens, but Lucullus, who had been ſent to obtain the wanted ſupply, though received with kingly honors, was diſmiſſed with evaſive and unſatisfactory anſwers, and the monarch refuſed to part with troops which he deemed neceſſary to preſerve the peace of his kingdom. Lathyrus died 81 years before the Chriſtian era, after a reign of 35 years ſince the death of his father Phyſcon, eleven of which he had paſſed with his mother Cleopatra on the Egyptian throne, eighteen in Cyprus and ſeven after his mother's death. He was ſucceeded by his only daughter Cleopatra, whom Alexander the ſon of Ptolemy Alexander, by means of the dictator Sylla ſoon after married and murdered. Joſeph. Hiſt.—Juſtin. 39.—Plut. in Luc.—Appian. in Mithrid.——The 9th. Vid. Alexander Ptolemy 1ſt; for the 10th Ptolemy, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 2d; for the 11th, vid. Alexander Ptolemy 3d.——The 12th, the illegitimate ſon of Lathyrus, aſcended the throne of Egypt at the death of Alexander 3d. He received the ſirname of Auletes becauſe he played ſkilfully on the flute. His riſe ſhowed great marks of prudence and circumſpection, and as his predeceſſor had his will had left the kingdom of Egypt to the Romans, Auletes knew that he could not be firmly eſtabliſhed on his throne without the approbation of the Roman ſenate. He was ſucceſsful in his application and Cæſar, who was then conſul, and in want of money, eſtabliſhed his ſucceſſion and granted him the alliance of the Roman after he had received the enormous ſum of about a million and 162,500l. ſterling. But theſe meaſures rendered him unpopular at home, and when he had ſuffered the Romans quietly to take poſſeſſion of Cyprus the Egyptians revolted, and Auletes was obliged to fly from his kingdom, and ſought protection among the moſt powerful of his allies. His complaints were heard at Rome at firſt with indifference, and the murder of 100 noblemen of Alexandria, whom the Egyptians had ſent to juſtify their proceedings before the Roman ſenate, rendered him unpopular and ſuſpected. Pompey however, ſupported his cauſe, and the ſenators decreed to re-eſtabliſh Auletes on the throne; but as they proceeded ſlowly in the execution of their plans, the mon-retired from Rome to Epheſus, where he lay concealed for ſome time in the temple of Diana. During his abſence from Alexandria, his daughter Berenice had made herſelf abſolute, and eſtabliſhed herſelf on the throne by a marriage with Archelaus, a prieſt of Bellona's temple at Comana, but ſhe was ſoon driven from Egypt, when Gabinius, at the head of a Roman army, approached to replace Auletes on his throne. Auletes was no ſooner reſtored to power than he ſacrificed to his ambition his daughter Berenice, and behaved with the greateſt ingratitude and perfidy to Rabirius a Roman who had ſupplied him with money when expelled from his kingdom. Auletes died four years after his reſtoration, about 51 years before the Chriſtian era. He left two ſons and two daughters, and by his will ordered the eldeſt of his ſons to marry the eldeſt of his ſiſters, and to aſcend with her the vacant throne. As theſe children were young, the dying monarch recommended them to the protection and paternal care of the Romans, and accordingly Pompey the Great was appointed by the ſenate to be their patron and their guardian. Their reign was as turbulent as that of their predeceſſors, and it is remarkable for no uncommon events, only we may obſerve that the young queen was the Cleopatra who ſoon after became ſo celebrated as being the miſtreſs of J. Cæſar, the wife of M. Antony, and the laſt of the Egyptian monarchs of the family of Lagus. Cic. pro Rabir.—Strab. 17.—Dion. 39.—Appian. de Civ.——The 13th, ſirnamad Dionyſius or Bacchus, aſcended the throne of Egypt conjointly with his ſiſter Cleopatra, whom he had married, according to the directions of his father Auletes. He was under the care and protection of Pompey the Great, [Vid. Ptolemæus 12th.] but the wickedneſs and avarice of his miniſters ſoon obliged him to reign independent. He was then in the 13th year of his age when his guardian, after the fatal battle of Pharſalia, came to the ſhores of Egypt, and claimed his protection. He refuſed to grant the required aſſiſtance, and by the advice of his miniſters he baſely murdered Pompey after he had brought him to ſhore under the maſk of friendſhip and cordiality. To curry the favor of the conqueror of Pharſalia, Ptolemy cut off the head of Pompey, but Cæſar turned with indignation from ſuch perfidy, and when he arrived at Alexandria he found the king of Egypt as faithleſs to his cauſe as to that of his fallen enemy. Cæſar ſat as judge to hear the various claims of the brother and ſiſter to the throne; and to ſatisfy the people, he ordered the will of Auletes to be read, and confirmed Ptolemy and Cleopatra in the poſſeſſion of Egypt, and appointed the two younger children maſters of the iſland of Cyprus. This fair and candid deciſion might have left no room for diſſatisfaction, but Ptolemy was governed by cruel and avaricious miniſters, and therefore he refuſed to acknowledge Cæſar as a judge or a mediator. The Roman enforced his authority by arms, and three victories were obtained over the Egyptian forces. Ptolemy, who had been for ſome time a priſoner in the hands of Cæſar, now headed his armies, but a defeat was fatal, and as he attempred to ſave his life by flight, he was drowned in the Nile, about 46 years before Chriſt, and three years and eight months after the death of Auletes. Cleopatra, at the death of her brother, became ſole miſtreſs of Egypt; but as the Egyptians were no friends to female government, Cæſar obliged her to marry her younger brother Ptolemy who was then in the eleventh year of his age. Appian. Civ.—Cæſar in Alex.—Strab. 17.—Joſeph. Ant.—Dio.—Plut. in Ant. &c.—Sueton. in Cæſ.——Apion, king of Cyrene, was the illegitimate ſon of Ptolemy Phyſcon. The Romans preſented his ſubjects with their independence. Liv. 70.——Ceraunus, a ſon of Ptolemy Soter by Eurydice the daughter of Antipater. Unable to ſucceed to the throne of Egypt, Ceraunus fled to the court of Seleucus, where he was received with friendly marks of attention. Seleucus was then king of Macedonia, an empire which he had lately acquired by the death of Lyſimachus in a battle in Phrygia, but his reign was ſhort, and Ceraunus perfidiouſly murdered him and aſcended his throne 280 B. C. The murderer, however, could not be firmly eſtabliſhed in Macedonia, as long as Arſinoe the widow, and the children of Lyſimachus were alive, and entitled to claim his kingdom as the lawful poſſeſſion of their father. To remove theſe obſtacles Ceraunus made offers of marriage to Arſinoe who was his own ſiſter. The queen at firſt refuſed, but the proteſtations and ſolemn promiſes of the uſurper at laſt prevailed upon her to conſent. The nuptials, however, were no ſoon ercelebrated than Ceraunus murdered the two young princes, and confirmed his uſurpation by rapine and cruelty. But now three powerful princes claimed the kingdom of Macedonia as their own; Antiochus, the ſon of Seleucus; Antigonus, the ſon of Demetrius; and Pyrrhus, the king of Epirus. Theſe enemies, however, were ſoon removed; Ceraunus conquered Antigonus in the field of battle, and ſtopped the hoſtilities of his two other rivals by promiſes and money. He did not long remain inactive, a barbarian army of Gauls claimed a tribute from him, and the monarch immediately marched to meet them in the field. The battle was long and bloody. The Macedonians might have obtained the victory if Ceraunus had shown more prudence. He was thrown down from his elephant, and taken prisoner by the enemy, who immediately tore his body to pieces. Ptolemy had been king of Macedonia only 18 months. Justin. 24. &c.—Paus. 10, c. 10. ——An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus, of which he was tyrannically dispossessed by the Romans. Cato was at the head of the forces which were sent against Ptolemy by the senate, and the Roman general proposed to the monarch to retire from the throne, and to pass the rest of his days in the obscure office of high priest in the temple of Venus at Paphos. This offer was rejected with the indignation which it merited, and the monarch poisoned himself at the approach of the enemy. The treasures found in the island amounted to the enormous sum of 1,356,250l. sterling, which were carried to Rome by the conquerors. Plut. in Cat.—Val Max. 9—Flor. 3.——A man who attempted to make himself king of Macedonia, in opposition to Perdiccas. He was a native of Alexandria, or according to others, of Pelusium, and on account of his great learning, he received the name of most wise, and most divine, among the Greeks. In his system of the world, he places the earth in the centre of the universe, a doctrine universally believed and adopted till the 16th century, when it was confuted and rejected by Copernicus. His geography is valued for its learning, and the very useful information which it gives. Besides his system and geography, Ptolemy wrote other books, in one of which he gives an account of the fixed stars, of 1022 of which he gives the certain and definite longitude and latitude. The best edition of Ptolemy's geography, is that of Bertius, fol. Amst. 1618, and that of his treatise de Judiciis Astrologicis by Camerar. 4to. 1535, and of the Harmonica, 4to. Wallis, Oxon, 1683.

Ptolemăis, a town of Thebais in Egypt, called after the Ptolemies, who beautified it. There was also another city of the same name in the territories of Cyrene. It permitted one of the cenſors to be elected from the plebeians, ſince one of the conſuls was choſen from that body. Liv. 8, c. 12. ——Another, by which it was ordained, that all laws ſhould be previouſly approved by the ſenators, before they were propoſed by the people.

PUBLIUS SYRUS, a Syrian mimic poet, who floriſhed about 44 years before Chriſt. He was originally a ſlave ſold to a Roman patrician, called Domitius, who brought him up with great attention, and gave him his freedom when of age. He gained the eſteem of the moſt powerful at Rome, and reckoned J. Cæſar among his patrons. He ſoon eclipſed the poet Laberius, whoſe burleſque compoſitions were in general eſteem. There remains of Publius, a collection of moral ſentences, written in iambics, and placed in alphabetical order, the neweſt edition of which is that of Patav. Comin. 1740.

PUBLIUS, a prænomen, common among the Romans.——Caius, a man who conſpired with Brutus againſt J. Cæſar.——A prætor who conquered Palæpolis. He was only a plebeian, and though neither conſul nor dictator, he obtained a triumph in ſpite of the oppoſition of the ſenators. PUNĬCUM BELLUM, the firſt Punic war was undertaken by the Romans againſt Carthage, B. C. 264. The ambition of Rome was the origin of this war. For upwards of 240 years, the two nations had beheld with ſecret jealouſy each other's power, but they had totally eradicated every cauſe of contentions, by ſettling in three different treaties the boundaries of their reſpective territories, the number of their allies, and how far one nation might ſail in the Mediterranean without giving offence to the other. Sicily, an iſland of the higheſt conſequence to the Carthaginians as a commercial nation, was the ſeat of the firſt diſſentions. The Mamertini, a body of Italian mercenaries, were appointed by the king of Syracuſe to guard the town of Meſſana, but this tumultuous tribe, inſtead of protecting the citizens, baſely maſſacred them, and ſeized their poſſeſſions. This act of cruelty raiſed the indignation of all the Sicilians, and Hiero, king of Syracuſe, who had employed them, prepared to puniſh their perfidy; and the Mamertini, beſieged in Meſſana, and without friends or reſources, reſolved to throw themſelves for protection into the hands of the firſt power that could relieve them. They were however divided in their ſentiments, and, while ſome implored the aſſiſtance of Carthage, others called upon the Romans for protection. Without heſitation or delay, the Carthaginians entered Meſſana, and the Romans alſo hastened to give to the Mamertini, that aid which had been claimed from them with as much eagerneſs as from the Carthaginians. At the approach of the Roman troops, the Mamertini, who had implored their aſſiſtance, took up arms and forced the Carthaginians to evacuate Meſſana. Freſh forces were poured in on every ſide, and though Carthage ſeemed ſuperior in arms and in reſources, yet the valor and intrepidity of the Romans, daily appeared more formidable, and Hiero, the Syracuſan king, who hitherto embraced the intereſt of the Carthaginians, became the moſt faithful ally of the republic. From a private quarrel the war became general. The Romans obtained a victory in Sicily, but as their enemies were maſters at ſea, the advantages they gained were ſmall and inconſiderable. To make themſelves equal to their adverſaries, they aſpired to the dominion of the ſea, and in 60 days timber was cut down, and a fleet of 120 gallies completely manned and proviſioned. The ſucceſſes they met by ſea were trivial, and little advantage could be gained over an enemy that were ſailors by actual practice and long experience. Duilius at laſt obtained a victory, and he was the firſt Roman who ever received a triumph after a naval battle. The loſſes they had already ſuſtained, induced the Carthaginians to ſue for peace, and the Romans, whom an unſucceſsful deſcent ſcent upon Africa, under Regulus, [Vid. Regulus.] had rendered diffident, liſtened to the propoſal, and the firſt Punic war was concluded B. C. 241, on the following terms.—The Carthaginians pledged themſelves to pay to the Romans within 20 years, the ſum of 3000 Euboic talents, they promiſed to releaſe all the Roman captives without ranſom, to evacuate Sicily, and the other iſlands in the Mediterranean, and not to moleſt Hiero, king of Syracuſe, or his allies. After this treaty the Carthaginians who had loſt the dominion of Sardinia and Sicily, made new conqueſts in Spain, and ſoon began to repair their loſſes by induſtry and labor. They planted colonies, and ſecretly prepared to revenge themſelves upon their powerful rivals. The Romans were not inſenſible of their ſucceſſes in Spain, and to ſtop their progreſs towards Italy they made a ſtipulation with the Carthaginians, by which they were not permitted to croſs the Iberus, or to moleſt the cities of their allies, the Saguntines. This was for ſome time obſerved, but when Annibal ſucceeded to the command of the Carthaginian armies in Spain, he ſpurned the boundaries which the jealouſy of Rome had ſet to his arms, and he immediately formed the ſiege of Saguntum. The Romans were appriſed of the hoſtilities which had been begun againſt their allies, but Saguntum was in the hands of the active enemy before they had taken any ſteps to oppoſe him. Complaints were carried to Carthage, and war was determined upon by the influence of Annibal in the Carthaginian ſenate. Without delay or diffidence, B. C. 218, Annibal marched a numerous army of 90,000 foot and 12,000 horſe, towards Italy, reſolved to carry on the war to the gates of Rome. He croſſed the Rhône, the Alps, and the Apennines, with uncommon celerity, and the Roman conſuls who were ſtationed to ſtop his progreſs, were ſeverally defeated. The battle of Trebia, and that of the lake of Thraſymenus, threw Rome into the greateſt apprehenſions, but the prudence and the dilatory meaſures of the dictator Fabius ſoon taught them to hope for better times. Yet the conduct of Fabius was univerſally cenſured as cowardice, and the two conſuls who ſucceeded him in the command, by purſuing a different plan of operations, ſoon brought on a deciſive action at Cannæ, in which 45,000 Romans were left in the field of battle. This bloody victory cauſed ſo much conſternation at Rome, that ſome authors have declared, that if Annibal had immediately marched from the plains of Cannæ to the city, he would have met with no reſiſtance, but would have terminated a long and dangerous war with glory to himſelf, and the moſt ineſtimable advantages to his country. This celebrated victory at Cannæ left the conqueror maſter of two camps, and of an immenſe booty; and the cities which had hitherto obſerved a neutrality, no ſooner ſaw the defeat of the Romans, than they eagerly embraced the intereſt of Carthage. The news of this victory was carried to Carthage by Mago, and the Carthaginians refuſed to believe it till three buſhels of golden rings were ſpread before them, which had been taken from the Roman knights in the field of battle. After this Annibal called his brother Aſdrubal from Spain with a large reinforcement; but the march of Aſdrubal was intercepted by the Romans, his army was defeated, and himſelf ſlain. Affairs now had taken a different turn, and Marcellus, who had the command of the Roman legions in Italy, ſoon taught his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible in the field. In different parts of the world the Romans were making very rapid conqueſts, and if the ſudden arrival of a Carthaginian army in Italy, at firſt raiſed fears and apprehenſions, they were ſoon enabled to diſpute with their enemies for the ſovereignty of Spain, and the dominion of the ſea. Annibal no longer appeared formidable in Italy; if he conquered towns in Campania or Magna Græcia, he remained maſter of them only while his army hovered in the neighbourhood, and if he marched towards Rome the alarm he occaſioned was but momentary, the Romans were prepared to oppoſe him, and his retreat was therefore the more diſhonorable. The conqueſts of young Scipio in Spain had now raiſed the expectations of the Romans, and he had no ſooner returned to Rome than he propoſed to remove Annibal from the capital of Italy by carrying the war to the gates of Carthage. This was a bold and hazardous enterprize, but though Fabius oppoſed it, it was univerſally approved by the Roman ſenate, and young Scipio was empowered to ſail to Africa. The conqueſts of the young Roman were as rapid in Africa as in Spain, and the Carthaginians, apprehenſive for the fate of their capital, recalled Annibal from Italy, and preferred their ſafety at home, to the maintaining of a long and expenſive war in another quarter of the globe. Annibal received their orders with indignation, and with tears in his eyes he left Italy, where for 16 years he had known no ſuperior in the field of battle. At his arrival in Africa, the Carthaginian general ſoon collected a large army, and met his exulting adverſary in the plains of Zama. The battle was long and bloody, and though one nation fought for glory, and the other for the dearer dearer ſake of liberty, the Romans obtained the victory, and Annibal, who had ſworn eternal enmity to the gods of Rome, fled from Carthage after he had adviſed his countrymen to accept the terms of the conqueror. This battle of Zama was deciſive, the Carthaginians ſued for peace, which the haughty conquerors granted with difficulty. The conditions were theſe: Carthage was permitted to hold all the poſſeſſions which ſhe had in Africa before the war, and to be governed by her own laws and inſtitutions. She was ordered to make reſtitution of all the ſhips and other effects which had been taken in violation of a truce that had been agreed upon by both nations. She was to ſurrender the whole of her fleet, except 10 gallies; ſhe was to releaſe and deliver up all the captives, deſerters, or fugitives, taken or received during the war; to indemnify Maſiniſſa for all the loſſes which he had ſuſtained; to deliver up all their elephants, and for the future never more to tame or break any more of theſe animals. She was not to make war upon any nation whatever, without the conſent of the Romans, and ſhe was, to reimburſe the Romans, to pay the ſum of 10,000 talents, at the rate of 200 talents a year for fifty years, and ſhe was to giveup hoſtages from the nobleſt families for the performance of theſe ſeveral articles; and till the ratification of the treaty, to ſupply the Roman forces with money and proviſions. Theſe humiliating conditions were accepted 201 B. C. and immediately 4000 Roman captives were releaſed, five hundred gallies were delivered and burnt on the ſpot, but the immediate exaction of 200 talents was more ſeverely felt, and many of the Carthaginian ſenators burſt into tears. During the 50 years which followed the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war, the Carthaginians were employed in repairing their loſſes by unwearied application and induſtry; but they found ſtill in the Romans a jealous rival, and a haughty conqueror, and in Maſiniſſa the ally of Rome, an intriguing and ambitious monarch. The king of Numidia made himſelf maſter of one of their provinces; but as they were unable to make war without the conſent of Rome, the Carthaginians ſought relief by embaſſies, and made continual complaints in the Roman ſenate of the tyranny and oppreſſion of Maſiniſſa. Commiſſioners were appointed to examine the cauſe of their complaints; but as Maſiniſſa was the ally of Rome, the intereſt of the Carthaginians was neglected, and whatever ſeemed to depreſs their republic, was agreeable to the Romans. Cato, who was in the number of the commiſſioners, examined the capital of Africa with a jealous eye; he ſaw it with concern, riſing as it were from its ruins; and when he returned to Rome he declared in full ſenate, that the peace of Italy would never be eſtabliſhed while Carthage was in being. The ſenators, however, were not guided by his opinion, and the delenda eſt Carthago of Cato did not prevent the Romans from acting with moderation. But while the ſenate were debating about the exiſtence of Carthage, and while they conſidered it as a dependent power, and not as an ally, the wrongs of Africa were without redreſs, and Maſiniſſa continued his depredations. Upon this the Carthaginians reſolved to do to their cauſe that juſtice which the Romans had denied them; they entered the field againſt the Numidians, but they were defeated in a bloody battle by Maſiniſſa, who was then 90 years old. In this bold meaſure they had broken the peace; and as their late defeat had rendered them deſperate, they haſtened with all poſſible ſpeed to the capital of Italy to juſtify their proceedings, and to implore the forgiveneſs of the Roman ſenate. The news of Maſiniſſa's victory had already reached Italy, and immediately ſome forces were ſent to Sicily, and from thence ordered to paſs into Africa. The ambaſſadors of Carthage received evaſive and unſatisfactory anſwers from the ſenate; and when they ſaw the Romans landed at Utica, they reſolved to purchaſe peace by the moſt ſubmiſſive terms which even the moſt abject ſlaves could offer. The Romans acted with the deepeſt policy, no declaration of war had been made, though hoſtilities appeared inevitable; and in anſwer to the ſubmiſſive offers of Carthage the conſuls replied, that to prevent every cauſe of quarrel, the Carthaginians muſt deliver into their hands 300 hoſtages, all children of ſenators, and of the moſt noble and reſpectable families. The demand was great and alarming, but it was no ſooner granted, than the Romans made another demand, and the Carthaginians were told that peace could not continue if they refuſed to deliver up all their ſhips, their arms, engines of war, with all their naval and military ſtores. The Carthaginians complied, and immediately 40,000 ſuits of armour, 20,000 large engines of war, with a plentiful ſtore of ammunitions and miſſile weapons were ſurrendered. After this duplicity had ſucceeded, the Romans laid open the final reſolutions of the ſenate, and the Carthaginians were then told that, to avoid hoſtilities, they muſt leave their antient habitations and retire into the inland parts of Africa, and found another city, at the diſtance of not leſs than ten miles from the ſea.

ſea. This was heard with horror and indignation; the Romans were fixed and inexorable, and Carthage was filled with tears and lamentations. But the ſpirit of liberty and independence was not yet extinguiſhed in the capital of Africa, and the Carthaginians determined to ſacrifice their lives for the protection of their gods, the tombs of their forefathers, and the place which had given them birth. Before the Roman army approached the city, preparations to ſupport a ſiege were made, and the ramparts of Carthage were covered with ſtones, to compenſate for the weapons and inſtruments of war which they had ignorantly betrayed to the duplicity of their enemies. Aſdrubal, whom the deſpair of his countrymen had baniſhed on account of the unſucceſsful expedition againſt Maſiniſſa, was immediately recalled; and in the moment of danger, Carthage ſeemed to have poſſeſſed more ſpirit and more vigor, than when Annibal was victorious at the gates of Rome. The town was blocked up by the Romans, and a regular ſiege begun. Two years were ſpent in uſeleſs operations, and Carthage ſeemed ſtill able to riſe from its ruins, to diſpute for the empire of the world; when Scipio, the deſcendant of the great Scipio, who finiſhed the ſecond Punic war, was ſent to conduct the ſiege. The vigor of his operations ſoon baffled the efforts and the bold reſiſtance of the beſieged; the communications which they had with the land were cut off, and the city, which was twenty miles in circumference, was completely ſurrounded on all ſides by the enemy. Deſpair and famine now raged in the city, and Scipio gained acceſs to the city walls, where the battlements were low and unguarded. His entrance into the ſtreets was diſputed with uncommon fury, the houſes as he advanced were ſet on fire to ſtop his progreſs; but when a body of 50,000 perſons of either ſex, had claimed quarter, the reſt of the inhabitants were diſheartened, and ſuch as diſdained to be priſoners of war, periſhed in the flames, which gradually deſtroyed their habitations, 147 B. C. after a continuation of hoſtilities for three years. During 17 days Carthage was in flames; and the ſoldiers were permitted to redeem from the fire whatever poſſeſſions they could. But while others profited from the deſtruction of Carthage, the philoſophic general, ſtruck by the melancholy aſpect of the ſcene, repeated two lines from Homer, which contained a prophecy concerning the fall of Troy. He was aſked by the hiſtorian Polybius, to what he then applied his prediction? To my country, replied Scipio, for her too I dread the viciſſitude of human affairs, and in her turn ſhe may exhibit another flaming Carthage. This remarkable event happened about the year of Rome 606. The news of this victory cauſed the greateſt rejoicings at Rome; and immediately commiſſioners were appointed by the Roman ſenate, not only to raze the walls of Carthage, but even to demoliſh and burn the very materials with which they were made; and in a few days, that city which had been once the ſeat of commerce, the model of magnificence, the common ſtore of the wealth of nations, and one of the moſt powerful ſtates of the world, left behind no traces of its ſplendor, of its power, or even of its exiſtence. Polyb.—Oroſius.—Appian. de Punic, &c.—Flor.—Plut. in Cat. &c.—Strab.—Liv. epit.—Diod.

Pupia lex de ſenatu, required that the ſenate ſhould not be aſſembled from the 18th of the calends of February to the calends of the ſame month, and that before the embaſſies were either accepted or rejected, the ſenate ſhould be held on no account.

Pupius, a centurion of Pompey's army, ſeiſed by Cæſar's ſoldiers, &c. Cæſ. B. C. 1, c. 13.

Pupienus, Marcus Claudius Maximus, a man of an obſcure family, who raiſed himſelf by his merit to the higheſt offices in the Roman armies, and gradually became a pretor, conſul, prefect of Rome, and a governor of the provinces. His father was a blackſmith. After the death of the Gordians, Pupienus was elected with Balbinus to the imperial throne, and to rid the world of the uſurpation and tyranny of the Maximini, he immediately marched againſt theſe tyrants; but he was ſoon informed that they had been ſacrificed to the fury and reſentment of their own ſoldiers; and therefore he retired to Rome, to enjoy the tranquillity which his merit claimed. He ſoon after prepared to make war againſt the Perſians, who inſulted the majeſty of Rome, but in this he was prevented, and was maſſacred A. D. 236, by the pretorian guards. Balbinus ſhared his fate. Pupienus is ſometimes called Maximus. In his private character he appeared always grave and ſerious, he was the conſtant friend of juſtice, moderation, and clemency, and no greater encomium can be paſſed upon his virtues, than to ſay that he was inveſted with the purple without ſoliciting for it, and that the Roman ſenate ſaid that they had ſelected him from thouſands, becauſe they knew no perſon more worthy or better qualified to ſupport the dignity of an emperor.

Puppius, a tragic poet in the age of J. Cæſar.

Cæsar. His tragedies were so pathetic, that when they were represented on the Roman stage, the audience melted into tears, from which circumstance Horace calls them lacrymosa, 1 ep. 1, v. 67.

PURPURĂRIÆ, two islands of the Atlantic on the African coast, now Lancarota and Fortuventura. Plin. 6, c. 31. l. 35, c. 6.

PUTĔŎLI, a maritime town of Campania, between Baiæ and Naples, founded by a colony from Cumæ. It was originally called Dicæarchia, and afterwards Puteoli, from the great number of wells that were in the neighbourhood. It was much frequented by the Romans, on account of its mineral waters and hot baths, and near it Cicero had a villa called Puteolanum. It is now called Puzzoli, and contains, instead of its antient magnificence, not more than 10,000 inhabitants. Sil. 13, v. 385. Strab. 5.—Varro. L. L. 4, c. 5.—Cic. Phil. 8, c. 3, fam. 5, ep. 15.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Pauf. 8, c. 7.

PUTICULÆ, a place of the Esquiline gate, where the meanest of the Roman populace were buried. Part of it was converted into a garden by Mecænas, who received it as a present from Augustus. Horat. 1. Sat. 8, v. 8.—Varro. L. L. 4, c. 5.

PYANEPSIA, an Athenian festival, celebrated in honor of Theseus and his companions; who, after their return from Crete, were entertained with all manner of fruits, and particularly pulse. From this circumstance the Pyanepsia was ever after commemorated by the boiling of pulse, ἀπο του ἑψειν πυανια. Some however suppose, that it was observed in commemoration of the Heraclidæ, who were entertained with pulse by the Athenians.

PYDNA, a town of Macedonia, originally called Citron, situate between the mouth of the rivers Aliacmon and Lydius. It was in this city that Cassander massacred Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, his wife Roxane, and his son Alexander Pydna is famous for a battle which was fought there, on the 22d of June, B. C. 168, between the Romans under Paulus and king Philip, in which the latter was conquered, and Macedonia soon after reduced into the form of a Roman province. Justin. 14, c. 6.—Flor.—Plut. in Paul.—Liv. 44, c. 10.

PYGELA, a seaport town of Ionia. Liv. 37, c. 11.

PYGMÆI, a nation of dwarfs, in the extremest parts of India, or according to others, in Æthiopia. Some authors affirm, that they were no more than one foot high, and that they built their houses with egg-shells. Aristotle says that they lived in holes under the earth, and that they came out in the harvest time with hatchets to cut down the corn as if to fell a forest. They went on goats and lambs of proportionable stature to themselves, to make war against certain birds, whom some call cranes, which came there yearly from Scythia to plunder them. They were originally governed by Gerana a princess, who was changed into a crane, for boasting herself fairer than Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 90.—Homer. Il. 3.—Strab. 7.—Arist. Anim 8, c. 12.—Juv. 13, v. 186.—Plin. 4, &c.—Mela. 3, c. 8.—Suet. in Aug. 83.——Philostr. icon. 2, c. 22, mentions that Hercules once fell asleep in the deserts of Africa, after he had conquered Antæus, and that he was suddenly awakened by an attack which had been made upon his body, by an army of these Liliputians, who discharged their arrows with great fury upon his arms and legs. The hero, pleased with their courage, wrapped the greatest number of them in the skin of the Nemæan lion, and carried them to Eurystheus.

PYGMĂLION, a king of Tyre, son of Belus, and brother to the celebrated Dido, who founded Carthage. At the death of his father, he ascended the vacant throne, and soon became odious by his cruelty and avarice. He sacrificed every thing to the gratification of his predominant passions, and he did not even spare the life of Sichæus, Dido's husband, because he was the most powerful and opulent of all the Phœnicians. This murder he committed in a temple, of which Sichæus was the priest; but instead of obtaining the riches which he desired, Pygmalion was shunned by his subjects, and Dido, to avoid further acts of cruelty, fled away with her husband's treasure, and a large colony to the coast of Africa, where she founded a city. Pygmalion died in the 56th year of his age, and in the 47th of his reign. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Justin. 18, c. 5.—Apollod. 3, Ital. 1.—— A celebrated statuary of the island of Cyprus. The debauchery of the females of Amathus, to which he was a witness, created in him such an aversion for the fair sex, that he resolved never to marry. The affection which he had denied to the other sex, he liberally bestowed upon the works of his own hands. He became enamoured of a beautiful statue of marble which he had made, and at his earnest request and prayers, according to the mythologists, the goddess of beauty changed this favorite statue into a woman, whom the artist married, and by whom he had a son called Paphus, who founded the city of that name in Cyprus. Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 9.

PYLĂDES, a son of Strophius, king of Phocis,

Phocis, by one of the ſiſters of Agamemnon. He was educated, together with his couſin Oreſtes, with whom he formed the moſt inviolable friendſhip, and whom he aſſiſted to revenge the murder of Agamemnon, by aſſaſſinating Clytemneſtra and Ægyſthus. He alſo accompanied him to Taurica Cherſoneſus, and for his ſervices Oreſtes rewarded him, by giving him his ſiſter Electra in marriage. Pylades had by her two ſons, Medon and Strophius. The friendſhip of Oreſtes and Pylades became proverbial. [*Vid. Pylæ, a town of Aſia, between Cappadocia and Cilicia. Cic. 5, ad. att. The word Pylæ which ſignifies gates, was often applied by the Greeks to any ſtreights or paſſages which opened a communication between one country and another, ſuch as the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, of Perſia, Hyrcania, &c.

Pylæmĕnes, a Paphlagonian, who came to the Trojan war, and was killed by Menelaus. His ſon, called Harpalion, was killed by Meriones. Dictyſ. Cret. 2, c. 34. —Homer. Il. 2, &c.——A king of Mæonia, who ſent his ſons, Meſtes and Antiphus, to the Trojan war.——Another ſon of Nicomedes, baniſhed from Paphlagonia by Mithridates, and reſtored by Pompey. Eutrop. 5 & 6.

Pylagŏræ, a name given to the Amphictyonic council, becauſe they always aſſembled at Pylæ, near the temple of Delphi.

Pylāon, a ſon of Neleus and Chloris, killed by Hercules with his brothers. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Pylarge, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.

Pylartes, a Trojan killed by Patroclus. Homer. Il. 16.

Pylas, a king of Megara. He had the misfortune accidentally to kill his uncle Bias, for which he fled away, leaving his kingdom to Pandion, his ſon-in-law, who had been driven from Athens. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 39.

Pylēne, a town of Ætolia. Homer. Il. 2.

Pyleus, a Trojan chief, killed by Achilles.——A ſon of Clymenus, king of Orchomenos.

Pylleon, a town of Theſſaly. Liv. 42, c. 42.

Pylo, a daughter of Theſpius, mother of Hippotas. Apollod.

Pylos, now Navarin, a town of Meſſenia, ſituate on the weſtern coaſt of the Peloponneſus, oppoſite the iſland Sphacteria in the Ionian ſea. It was alſo called Coryphaſion, from the promontory on which it was erected. It was built by Pylus, at the head of a colony from Megara. The founder was diſpoſſeſſed of it by Neleus, and fled into Elis, where he dwelt in a ſmall town, which he alſo called Pylos.——A town of Elis, at the mouth of the river Alpheus, between the Peneus and the Selleis.——Another town of Elis, called Triphyliacha, from Triphylia, a province of Elis, where it was ſituate. Theſe three cities, which bore the name of Pylos, diſputed their reſpective right to the honor of having given birth to the celebrated Neſtor, ſon of Neleus. The Pylos, which is ſituate near the Alpheus, ſeems to win the palm, as it had in its neighbourhood a ſmall village called Geranus, and a river called Geron, of which Homer makes mention. Pindar, however, calls Neſtor king of Meſſenia, and therefore gives the preference to the firſt mentioned of theſe three cities. Apollod. 1, c. 19. l. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 39.—Strab. 9.—*Homer. Pyra, a part of mount Œta, on which the body of Hercules was burnt. Liv. 36, c. 30.

Pyracmon, one of Vulcan's workmen in the forges of Mount Ætna. The name is derived from two Greek words, which ſignify fire and an anvil. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Pyracmos, a man killed by Cæneus. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 460.

Pyræchmes, a king of Eubœa.——A king of Pæonia during the Trojan war.

Pyrămus, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thiſbe, a beautiful virgin, who dwelt in the neighbourhood. The flame was mutual, and the two lovers, whom their parents forbad to marry, regularly received each other's addreſſes, through the chink of a wall, which ſeparated their houſes. After the moſt ſolemn vows of ſincerity, they both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet one another at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry tree, without the walls of Babylon. Thiſbe came firſt to the appointed place, but the ſudden arrival of a lioneſs frightened her away; and as ſhe fled into a neighbouring cave ſhe dropped her veil, which the lioneſs found and beſmeared with blood. Pyramus ſoon arrived, he found Thiſbe's veil all bloody, and concluding that ſhe had been torn to pieces by the wild beaſts of the place, he ſtabbed himſelf with his ſword. Thiſbe, when her fears were vaniſhed, returned from the cave; and at the ſight of the dying Pyramus, ſhe fell upon the ſword which ſtill reeked with his blood. This tragical ſcene happened under a mulberry tree, which, as the poets mention, was ſtained with the blood of the lovers, and ever after bore fruit of the color of blood. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 55, &c.—Hygin. fab. 243.——A river of Cilicia, riſing in mount Taurus, and falling into the Pamphylian ſea. Cic. 3, fam. 11.—Dionyſ. Perieg.

Pyrenæa Venus, a town of Gallia Narbonenſis.

Pyrēnæi, a mountain, or a long ridge of high mountains, which ſeparate Gaul from Spain, and extend from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean ſea. They receive their name from Pyrene the daughter of Bebrycius, [Vid. Pyrene] or from the fire (πῦρ) which once raged there for ſeveral days. This fire was originally kindled by ſhepherds, and ſo intenſe was the heat which it occaſioned, that all the ſilver mines of the mountains were melted, and ran down in large rivulets. This account is deemed fabulous by Strabo and others. Diod. 5.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Ital. 3, v. 415.—Liv. 21, c. 60.—Plin. 4, c. 20.

Pyrenæus, a king of Thrace, who during a ſhower of rain, gave ſhelter in his houſe to the nine muſes, and attempted to offer them violence. The goddeſſes upon this, took to their wings and flew away. Pyrenæus, who attempted to follow them, as if he had wings, threw himſelf down from the top of a tower and was killed. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 274.

Pyrēne, a daughter of Bebrycius, king of the ſouthern parts of Spain. Hercules offered violence to her before he went to attack Geryon, and ſhe brought into the world a ſerpent, which ſo terrified her, that ſhe fled into the woods, where ſhe was torn to pieces by wild beaſts.——A nymph, mother of Cycnus by Mars. Apollod.——A fountain near Corinth.——A ſmall village in Celtic Gaul, near which, according to ſome, the river Iſter took its riſe.

Pyrgo, the nurſe of Priam's children who followed Æneas in his flight from Troy. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 645.

Pyrgotĕles, a celebrated engraver on gems, in the age of Alexander the Great. He had the excluſive privilege of engraving the conqueror, as Lyſippus was the only ſculptor who was permitted to make ſtatues of him. Plin. 37.

Pyrgus, a fortified place of Elis in the Peloponneſus.

Pyrippe, a daughter of Theſpius.

Pyronia, a ſurname of Diana.

Pyrrha, a daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora, who married Deucalion, the ſon of Prometheus, who reigned in Theſſaly. In her age all mankind were deſtroyed by a deluge, and ſhe alone, with her huſband, eſcaped from the general deſtruction, by ſaving themſelves in a boat which Deucalion had made by his father's advice. When the waters had retired from the ſurface of the earth, Pyrrha, with her huſband, went to the oracle of Themis, where they were directed, to repair the loſs of mankind, to throw ſtones behind their backs. They obeyed, and the ſtones which Pyrrha threw were changed into women, and thoſe of Deucalion into men. [Vid. Deucalion.] Pyrrha became mother of Amphictyon, Hellen, and Protogenea, by Deucalion. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 350, &c.—Hygin. fab. 153.—*Apollon. Pyrrheus, a place in the city of Ambracia. Liv. 38, c. 5.

Pyrrhi castra, a place of Lucania. Liv. 35, c. 27.

Pyrrhias, a boatman of Ithaca, remarkable for his humanity. He delivered from ſlavery on old man who had been taken by pirates, and robbed of ſome pots full of pitch. The old man was ſo grateful for this kindneſs, that he gave the pots to his deliverer, after he had told him that they contained gold under the pitch. Pyrrhias upon this, offered the ſacrifice of a bull to the old man, and retained him in his houſe, with every act of kindneſs and attention, till the time of his death. Plut. in quæſt. G.——A general of the Ætolians, defeated by Philip, king of Macedonia.

Pyrrhicha, a kind of dance ſaid to be invented and introduced into Greece by Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles. The dancers were generally armed.

Pyrrhicus, a free town of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 21.

Pyrrhidæ, a patronymic given to the ſucceſſors of Neoptolemus in Epirus.

Pyrrho, a philoſopher of Elis, diſciple to Anaxarchus, and originally a painter. His father's name was Pliſtarchus or Piſtocrates. He was in continual ſuſpenſe of judgment, he doubted of every thing, never made any concluſions, and when he had carefully examined a ſubject, and inveſtigated all its parts, he concluded by ſtill doubting of its evidence. This manner of doubting in the philoſopher has been called Pyrrhonyſm, and his diſciples have received the appellation of ſceptics, inquiſitors, examiners, &c. He pretended to have acquired an uncommon dominion over opinion and paſſions. The former of theſe virtues he called ataraxia, and the latter matriopathia, and ſo far did he carry his want of common feeling and ſympathy, that he paſſed with unconcern, near a ditch in which his maſter Anaxarchus had fallen, and where he nearly periſhed. He was once in a ſtorm, and when all hopes were vaniſhed, and deſtruction certain, the philoſopher remained unconcerned; and while the reſt of the crew were loſt in lamentations, he plainly told them to look at a pig which was then feeding himſelf on board the veſſel, exclaiming, This is a true model for the wiſe man. As he ſhowed ſo much indifference in every thing, and declared that life and death were the ſame thing, ſome of his diſciples aſked him, why he did not hurry himſelf out of the world; becauſe, ſays he, there is no difference between life and death. When he walked in the ſtreets he never looked behind, or moved from the road for a chariot, even in its moſt rapid courſe; and indeed, as ſome authors remark, this indifference for his ſafety, often expoſed him to the greateſt and moſt imminent dangers, from which he was ſaved by the interference of his friends who followed him. He floriſhed B. C. 304, and died at the advanced age of 90. He left no writings behind him. His countrymen were ſo partial to him, that they raiſed ſtatues to his memory, and exempted all the philoſophers of Elis from taxes. Diog. 9.—Cic. de orat. 3.—Paus. 6, c. 24.

Pyrrhus, a ſon of Achilles and Deidamia, the daughter of king Lycomedes, who received this name from the yellowneſs of his hair. He was alſo called Neoptolemus, or new warrior, becauſe he came to the Trojan war in the laſt years of the celebrated ſiege of the capital of Troas. Vid. Neoptolemus.

——A king of Epirus, deſcended from Achilles, by the ſide of his mother, and from Hercules by that of his father, and ſon of Æacides and Phthia. He was ſaved when an infant, by the fidelity of his ſervants, from the purſuits of the enemies of his father, who had been baniſhed from his kingdom, and he was carried to the court of Glautias king of Illyricum, who educated him with great tenderneſs. Caſſander, king of Macedonia, wiſhed to diſpatch him, as he had ſo much to dread from him; but Glautias, not only refuſed to deliver him up into the hands of his enemy, but he even went with an army, and placed him on he throne of Epirus, though only 12 years of age. About five years after, the abſence of Pyrrhus, to attend the nuptials of one of the daughters of Glautias, raiſed new commotions. The monarch was expelled from his throne by Neoptolemus, who had uſurped it after the death of Æacides; and being ſtill without reſources, he applied to his brother-in-law Demetrius for aſſiſtance. He accompanied Demetrius at the battle of Ipſus, and fought there with all the prudence and intrepidity of an experienced general. He afterwards paſſed into Egypt, where by his marriage with Antigone the daughter of Berenice, he ſoon obtained a ſufficient force to attempt the recovery of his throne. He was ſucceſsful in the undertaking, but to remove all cauſes of quarrel, he took the uſurper to ſhare with him the royalty, and ſome time after he put him to death under pretence that he had attempted to poiſon him. In the ſubſequent years of his reign, Pyrrhus engaged in the quarrels which diſturbed the peace of the Macedonian monarchy, he marched againſt Demetrius, and gave the Macedonian ſoldiers freſh proofs of his valor and activity. By diſſimulation he ingratiated himſelf in the minds of his enemy's ſubjects, and when Demetrius labored under a momentary illneſs, Pyrrhus made an attempt upon the crown of Macedonia, which, if not then ſucceſsful, ſoon after rendered him maſter of the kingdom. This he ſhared with Lyſimachus for ſeven months, till the jealouſy of the Macedonians, and the ambition of his colleague, obliged him to retire. Pyrrhus was meditating new conqueſts, when the Tarentines invited him to Italy to aſſiſt them againſt the encroaching power of Rome. He gladly accepted the invitation, but his paſſage acroſs the Adriatic proved nearly fatal, and he reached the ſhores of Italy, after the loſs of the greateſt part of his troops in a ſtorm. At his entrance into Tarentum B. C. 280, he began to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and, by introducing the ſtricteſt diſcipline among their troops, to accuſtom them to bear fatigue and to deſpiſe dangers. In the firſt battle which he fought with the Romans,

Romans, he obtained the victory, but for this he was more particularly indebted to his elephants, whose bulk, and uncommon appearance, astonished the Romans, and terrified their cavalry. The number of the slain was equal on both sides, and the conqueror said that such another victory would totally ruin him. He also sent Cineas, his chief minister, to Rome, and though victorious, he sued for peace. These offers of peace were refused, and when Pyrrhus questioned Cineas about the manners and the character of the Romans, the sagacious minister replied, that their senate was a venerable assembly of kings, and that to fight against them was to attack another Hydra. A second battle was soon after fought near Asculum, but the slaughter was so great, and the valor so conspicuous on both sides, that the Romans and their enemies reciprocally claimed the victory as their own. Pyrrhus still continued the war in favor of the Tarentines, when he was invited into Sicily by the inhabitants, who labored under the yoke of Carthage, and the cruelty of their own petty tyrants. His fondness of novelty soon determined him to quit Italy, he left a garrison at Tarentum, and crossed over to Sicily, where he obtained two victories over the Carthaginians, and took many of their towns. He was for a while successful, and formed the project of invading Africa, but soon his popularity vanished, his troops became insolent, and he behaved with haughtiness, and shewed himself oppressive, so that his return to Italy was deemed a fortunate event for all Sicily. He had no sooner arrived at Tarentum, than he renewed hostilities with the Romans with great acrimony, but when his army of 80,000 men had been defeated by 20,000 of the enemy, under Curius, he left Italy with precipitation, B. C. 274, ashamed of the enterprize, and mortified by the victories which had been obtained, over one of the descendants of Achilles. In Epirus he began to repair his military character, by attacking Antigonus, who was then on the Macedonian throne. He gained some advantages over his enemy, and was at last restored to the throne of Macedonia. He afterwards marched against Sparta, at the request of Cleonymus, but when all his vigorous operations were insufficient to take the capital of Laconia, he retired to Argos, where the treachery of Aristeus invited him. The Argives desired him to retire, and not to interfere in the affairs of their republic, which were confounded by the ambition of two of their nobles. He complied with their wishes, but in the night he marched his forces into the town, and might have made himself master of the place, had not he retarded his progress by entering it with his elephants. The combat that ensued was obstinate and bloody, and the monarch, to fight with more boldness, and to encounter dangers with more facility, exchanged his dress. He was attacked by one of the enemy, but as he was going to run him through in his own defence, the mother of the Argive, who saw her son's danger from the top of a house, threw down a tile, and brought Pyrrhus to the ground. His head was cut off, and carried to Antigonus, who gave his remains a magnificent funeral, and presented his ashes to his son Helenus, 272 years before the Christian era. Pyrrhus has been deservedly commended for his talents as a general; and not only his friends, but also his enemies, have been warm in extolling him; and Annibal declared, that for experience and sagacity the king of Epirus was the first of commanders. He had chosen Alexander the Great for a model, and in every thing he wished not only to imitate, but to surpass him. In the art of war none were superior to him, he made it not only his study as a general, but even he wrote many books on encampments, and the different ways of training up an army, and whatever he did, was by principle and rule. His uncommon understanding, and his penetration, are also admired; but the general is severely censured, who has no sooner conquered a country, than he looks for other victories, without regarding, or securing what he has already obtained, by measures and regulations honorable to himself, and advantageous to his subjects. The Romans passed great encomiums upon him, and Pyrrhus was no less struck with their magnanimity and valor; so much indeed, that he exclaimed, that if he had soldiers like the Romans, or if the Romans had him for a general, he would leave no corner of the earth unseen, and no nation unconquered. Pyrrhus married many wives, and all for political reasons; besides Antigone he had Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as also a daughter of Autoleon king of Pæonia. His children, as his biographer observes, derived a warlike spirit from their father, and when he was asked by one to which of them he should leave the kingdom of Epirus, he replied, to him who has the sharpest sword. *Ælian. Pythagoras, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. His father Mneſarchus was a perſon of diſtinction, and, therefore, the ſon received that education which was moſt calculated to enlighten his mind and invigorate his body. Like his contemporaries, he was early made acquainted with poetry and muſic; eloquence and aſtronomy became his private ſtudies, and, in gymnaſtic exerciſes, he often bore the palm for ſtrength and dexterity. He firſt made himſelf known in Greece, at the Olympic games, where he obtained, in the 18th year of his age, the prize for wreſtling; and, after he had been admired for the elegance and the dignity of his perſon, and the brilliancy of his underſtanding, he retired into the eaſt. In Egypt and Chaldæa he gained the confidence of the prieſts, and learned from them the artful policy, and the ſymbolic writings, by which they governed the princes as well as the people, and, after he had ſpent many years in gathering all the information which could be collected from antique tradition concerning the nature of the gods and the immortality of the ſoul, Pythagoras viſited his native iſland. The tyranny of Polycrates at Samos diſguſted the philoſopher, who was a great advocate for national independence, and, though he was the favorite of the tyrant, he retired from the iſland, and a ſecond time aſſiſted at the Olympic games. His fame was too well known to eſcape notice; he was ſaluted in the public aſſembly by the name of Sophiſt, or wiſe man; but he refuſed the appellation, and was ſatisfied with that of philoſopher, or, the friend of wiſdom. "At the Olympic games," ſaid he, in explanation of this new appellation he wiſhed to aſſume, "ſome are attracted with the deſire of obtaining crowns and honors, others come to expoſe their different commodities to ſale, while curioſity draws a third claſs, and the deſire of contemplating whatever deſerves notice in that celebrated aſſembly: thus, on the more extenſive theatre of the world, while many ſtruggle for the glory of a name, and many pant for the advantages of fortune, a few, and indeed but a few, who are neither deſirous of money, nor ambitious of fame, are ſufficiently gratified to be ſpectators of the wonder, the hurry, and the magnificence of the ſcene." From Olympia the philoſopher viſited the republics of Elis and Sparta, and retired to Magna Græcia, where he fixed his habitation in the town of Crotona, about the 40th year of his age. Here he founded a ſect which has received the name of the Italian, and he ſoon ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by a great number of pupils, which the recommendation of his mental, as well as his perſonal, accompliſhments, had procured. His ſkill in muſic and medicine, and his knowledge of mathematics, and of natural philoſophy, gained him friends and admirers, and, amidſt the voluptuouſneſs that prevailed among the inhabitants of Crotona, the Samian ſage found his inſtructions reſpected, and his approbation courted: the moſt debauched and effeminate were pleaſed with the eloquence and the graceful delivery of the philoſopher, who boldly upbraided them for their vices, and called them to more virtuous and manly purſuits. Theſe animated harangues were attended with rapid ſucceſs, and a reformation ſoon took place in the morals and the life of the people of Crotona. The females were exhorted to become modeſt, and they left off their gaudy ornaments; the youths were called away from the purſuits of pleaſure, and inſtantly they forgot their intemperance, and paid to their parents that ſubmiſſive attention and deference which the precepts of Pythagoras required. As to the old, they were directed no longer to ſpend their time in amaſſing money, but to improve their underſtanding, and to ſeek that peace and thoſe comforts of mind which frugality, benevolence, and philanthropy, alone can produce. The ſober and religious behaviour of the philoſopher ſtrongly recommended the neceſſity and importance of theſe precepts. Pythagoras was admired for his venerable aſpect, his voice was harmonious, his eloquence perſuaſive, and the reputation he had acquired by his diſtant travels, and by being crowned at the Olympic games, was great and important. He regularly frequented the temples of the gods, and paid his devotion to the divinity at an early hour; he lived upon the pureſt and moſt innocent food, he cloathed himſelf like the prieſts of the Egyptian gods, and by his continual purifications, and regular offerings, he ſeemed to be ſuperior to the reſt of mankind in ſanctity. Theſe artful meaſures united to render him an object not only of reverence, but of imitation. To ſet himſelf at a greater diſtance from his pupils, a number of years was required to try their various diſpoſitions; the moſt talkative were not permitted to ſpeak in the preſence of their maſter before they had been his auditors for five years, and thoſe who poſſeſſed a natural taciturnity were allowed to ſpeak after a probation of two years. When they were capable of receiving the ſecret inſtructions of the philoſopher, they were taught the uſe of cypher and hieroglyphic writings, and Pythagoras might boaſt that his pupils could correſpond together, though in the moſt diſtant regions, in unknown characters; and by the ſigns and words which they had received they could diſcover, though ſtrangers and barbarians, thoſe that had been educated in the Pythagorean ſchool. So great was his authority among his pupils, that, to diſpute his word was deemed a crime, and the moſt ſtubborn were drawn to coincide with the opinions of their opponents when they helped their arguments by the words of the maſter ſaid ſo, an expreſſion which became proverbial in jurare in verba magiſtri. The great influence which the philoſopher poſſeſſed in his ſchool was transferred to the world; the pupils divided the applauſe and the approbation of the people with their venerated maſter, and, in a ſhort time, the rulers and the legiſlators of all the principal towns of Greece, Sicily, and Italy, boaſted in being the diſciples of Pythagoras. The Samian philoſopher was the firſt who ſupported the doctrine of metempſychoſis, or tranſmigration of the ſoul into different bodies, and thoſe notions he ſeemed to have imbibed among the prieſts of Egypt, or in the ſolitary retreats of the Brachmans. More ſtrenuouſly to ſupport this chimerical ſyſtem, he declared he recollected the different bodies his ſoul had animated before that of the ſon of Mneſarchus. He remembered to have been Æthalides, the ſon of Mercury, to have aſſiſted the Greeks during the Trojan war in the character of Euphorbus, [Vid. Euphorbus.] to have been Hermotimus, afterwards a fiſherman, and laſt of all Pythagoras. He forbad his diſciples to eat fleſh, as alſo beans, becauſe he ſuppoſed them to have been produced from the ſame putrified matter from which, at the creation of the world, man was formed. In his theological ſyſtem Pythagoras ſupported that the univerſe was created from a ſhapeleſs heap of paſſive matter, by the hands of a powerful being, who himſelf was the mover and ſoul of the world, and of whoſe ſubſtance the ſouls of mankind were a portion. He conſidered numbers as the principles of every thing, and perceived in the univerſe regularity, correſpondence, beauty, proportion, and harmony, as intentionally produced by the creator. In his doctrines of morality, he perceived in the human mind, propenſities common to us with the brute creation; but, beſides theſe, and the paſſions of avarice and ambition, he diſcovered the nobler ſeeds of virtue, and ſupported that the moſt ample and perfect gratification was to be found in the enjoyment of moral and intellectual pleaſures. The thoughts of the paſt he conſidered as always preſent to us, and he believed that no enjoyment could be had where the mind was diſturbed by conſciouſneſs of guilt, or fears about futurity. This opinion induced the philoſopher to recommend to his followers a particular mode of education. The tender years of the Pythagoreans were employed in continual labor, in ſtudy, in exerciſe, and repoſe; and the philoſopher maintained this well known and important maxim, that many things, eſpecially love, are beſt learnt late. In a more advanced age, the adult was deſired to behave with caution, ſpirit, and patriotiſm, and to remember, that the community and civil ſociety demanded his exertions, and that the good of the public, and not his own private enjoyments, were the ends of his creation. From leſſons like theſe, the Pythagoreans were ſtrictly enjoined to call to mind, and carefully to review, the actions, not only of the preſent, but of the preceding days. In their acts of devotion, they early repaired to the moſt ſolitary places of the mountains, and after they had examined their private and public conduct, and converſed with themſelves, they joined in the company of their friends, and early refreſhed their body with light and frugal aliments. Their converſation was of the moſt innocent nature; political or philoſophic ſubjects were diſcuſſed with propriety, but without warmth, and, after the conduct of the following day was regulated, the evening was ſpent with the ſame religious ceremony as the morning, in a ſtrict and partial ſelf-examination. From ſuch regularity nothing but the moſt ſalutary conſequences could ariſe, and it will not appear wonderful that the diſciples of Pythagoras were ſo much reſpected and admired as legiſlators, and imitated for their conſtancy, friendſhip, and humanity. The authors that lived in, and after, the age of Alexander, have rather tarniſhed than brightened the glory of the founder of the Pythagorean ſchool, and they have obſcured his fame by attributing to him actions which were diſſonant with his character as a man and a moraliſt. To give more weight to his exhortations, as ſome writers mention, Pythagoras retired into a ſubterraneous cave, where his mother ſent him intelligence of every thing which happened during his abſence. After a certain number of months he again re-appeared on the earth with a grim and ghaſtly countenance, and declared, in the aſſembly of the people, that he was returned from hell. From ſimilar exaggerations, it has been aſſerted that he appeared at the Olympic games with a golden thigh, and that he could write in letters of blood whatever he pleaſed on a looking glaſs, and that, by ſetting it oppoſite to the moon, when full, all the characters which were on the glaſs became legible on the moon's diſc. They alſo ſupport, that, by ſome magical words, he tamed a bear, ſtopped the flight of an eagle, and appeared on the ſame day and at the ſame inſtant in the cities of Crotona and Metapontum, &c. The time and the place of the death of this great philoſopher are unknown; yet many ſuppoſe that he died at Metapontum about 497 years before Chriſt; and ſo great was the veneration of the people of Magna Græcia for him, that he received the ſame honors as were paid to the immortal gods, and his houſe became a ſacred temple. Succeeding ages likewiſe acknowledged his merits, and when the Romans, A. U. C. 411, were commanded by the oracle of Delphi, to erect a ſtatue to the braveſt and wiſeſt of the Greeks, the diſtinguiſhed honor was conferred on Alcibiades and Pythagoras. Pythagoras had a daughter, called Damo. There is now extant a poetical compoſition aſcribed to the philoſopher, and called the golden verſes of Pythagoras, which contain the greateſt part of his doctrines, and moral precepts; but many ſupport, that it is a ſuppoſititious compoſition, and that the true name of the writer was Lyſis. Pythagoras diſtinguiſhed himſelf alſo by his diſcoveries in geometry, aſtronomy, and mathematics, and it is to him that the world is indebted for the demonſtration of the 47th propoſition of the firſt book of Euclid's elements, about the ſquare of the hypothenuſe. It is ſaid, that he was ſo elated after making the diſcovery, that he made an offering of a hecatomb to the gods; but the ſacrifice was undoubtedly of ſmall oxen, made with wax, as the philoſopher was ever an enemy to ſhedding the blood of all animals. His ſyſtem of the univerſe, in which he placed the ſun in the center, and all the planets moving in elliptical orbits round it, was deemed chimerical and improbable, till the deep enquiries and the philoſophy of the 16th century proved it, by the moſt accurate calculations, to be true and inconteſtable. Diogenes, Porphyry, Iamblicus, and others, have written an account of his life, but with more erudition, perhaps, than veracity. *Cic. de Nat. Pytheas, an archon at Athens.——A native of Maſſilia, famous for his knowledge of aſtronomy, mathematics, philoſophy, and geography. He alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his travels, and, with a mind that wiſhed to ſeek information in every corner of the earth, he advanced far into the northern ſeas, and diſcovered the iſland of Thule, and entered that then unknown ſea which is now called the Baltic. His diſcoveries in aſtronomy and geography were ingenious, and, indeed, modern navigators have found it expedient to juſtify and accede to his concluſions. He was the firſt who eſtabliſhed a diſtinction of climate by the length of days and nights. He wrote different treatiſes in Greek, which have been loſt, though ſome of them were extant in the beginning of the fifth century. Pytheas lived, according to ſome, in the age of Ariſtotle. Strab. 2, &c.—Plin. 37.——An Athenian rhetorician, in the age of Demoſthenes, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his intrigues and oppoſition to the meaſures of Demoſthenes, of whom he obſerved, that his orations ſmelt of the lamp. Pytheas joined Antipater after the death of Alexander the Great. His orations were devoid of eleganee, harſh, unconnected, and diffuſe, and from this circumſtance he has not been ranked among the orators of Athens. Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 7.—Plut. in Dem. & Polit. pr.

Pythes, a native of Abdera, in Thrace, who obtained a crown at the Olympian games. Pauſ. 6.

Pytheus, a Lydian, famous for his riches, in the age of Xerxes. He kindly entertained the monarch and all his army, when he was marching on his expedition againſt Greece, and offered him to defray the expences of the whole war. Xerxes thanked him with much gratitude, and promiſed to give him whatever he ſhould require. Pytheus aſked him to diſmiſs his ſon from the expedition: upon which the monarch ordered the young man to be cut into two, and one half of the body to be placed on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that his army might march between them. Plut. de mul. virt.—Herodot.

Pythia, the prieſteſs of Apollo at Delphi. She delivered the anſwers of the god to ſuch as came to conſult the oracle, and was ſuppoſed to be ſuddenly inſpired by the ſulphureous vapors which iſſued from the hole of a ſubterraneous cavity within the temple, over which ſhe ſat bare on a three legged ſtool, called a tripod. In the ſtool was a ſmall aperture, through which the vapor was exhaled by the prieſteſs, and, at this divine inſpiration, her eyes ſuddenly ſparkled, her hair ſtood on end, and a ſhivering run over all her body. In this convulſive ſtate ſhe ſpoke the oracles of the god, often with loud howlings and cries, and her articulations were taken down by the prieſt, and ſet in order. Sometimes the ſpirit of inſpiration was more gentle, and not always violent; yet Plutarch mentions one of the prieſteſſes who was thrown into ſuch an exceſſive fury, that not only thoſe that conſulted the oracle, but alſo the prieſts that conducted her to the ſacred tripod, and attended her during the inſpiration, were terrified, and forſook the temple; and ſo violent was the fit, that ſhe continued for ſome days in the moſt agonizing ſituation, and at laſt died. The Pythia, before ſhe placed herſelf on the tripod, uſed to waſh her whole body, and particularly her hair, in the waters of the fountain Caſtalis, at the foot of mount Parnaſſus. She alſo ſhook a laurel tree that grew near the place, and ſometimes eat the leaves with which ſhe crowned herſelf. The prieſteſs was originally a virgin, but the inſtitution was changed when Echechrates, a Theſſalian, had offered violence to one of them, and none but women who were above the age of fifty were permitted to enter upon that ſacred office. They always appeared dreſſed in the garments of virgins to intimate their purity and modeſty, and they were ſolemnly bound to obſerve the ſtricteſt laws of temperance and chaſtity, that neither phantaſtical dreſſes nor laſcivious behaviour might bring the office, the religion, or the ſanctity of the place into contempt. There was originally but one Pythia, beſides ſubordinate prieſts, and afterwards two were choſen, and ſometimes more. The moſt celebrated of all theſe is Phemonoe, who is ſuppoſed by ſome to have been the firſt who gave oracles at Delphi. The oracles were always delivered in hexameter verſes, a cuſtom which was ſome time after diſcontinued. The Pythia was conſulted only one month in the year, about the ſpring. It was always required that thoſe who conſulted the oracle ſhould make large preſents to Apollo, and from thence aroſe the opulence, ſplendor, and the magnificence, of that celebrated temple of Delphi. Sacrifices were alſo offered to the divinity, and if the omens proved unfavorable the prieſteſs refuſed to give an anſwer. There were generally five prieſts who aſſiſted at the offering of the ſacrifices, and there was alſo another who attended the Pythia, and aſſiſted her in receiving the oracle, [Vid. Delphi, Oraculum.] Pauſ. 10, c. 5.—Diod. 16.—Strab. 6 & 9.—Juſtin. 24, c. 5.—Plut. de orat. def.—Eurip. in Ion.—Chryſoſt.——Games celebrated in honor of Apollo, near the temple of Delphi. They were firſt inſtituted, according to the more received opinion, by Apollo himſelf, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over the ſerpent Python, from which they received their name; though others maintain that they were firſt eſtabliſhed by Agamemnon, or Diomedes, or by Amphictyon, or laſtly by the council of the Amphictyons, B. C. 1263. They were originally celebrated once in nine years, but afterwards every fifth year, on the ſecond year of every olympiad, according to the number of the Parnaſſian nymphs who congratulated Apollo after his victory. The gods themſelves were originally among the number of the combatants, and according to ſome authors the firſt prizes were won by Pollux, in boxing; Caſtor, in horſe-races; Hercules, in the pancratium; Zetes, in fighting with the armour; Calais, in running; Telamon, in wreſtling; and Peleus, in throwing the quoit. Theſe illuſtrious conquerors were rewarded by Apollo himſelf, who was preſent, with crowns and laurel. Some however obſerve, that at firſt it was nothing but a muſical contention, in which he who ſung beſt the praiſes of Apollo obtained the prize, which was preſents of gold or ſilver, which were afterwards exchanged for a garland of the palm tree, or of beech leaves. It is ſaid, that Heſiod was refuſed admiſſion to theſe games, becauſe he was not able to play upon the harp, which was required of all ſuch as entered the liſts. The ſongs which were ſung were called πυθικοι νομοι, the Pythian modes, divided into five parts, which contained a repreſentation of the fight and victory of Apollo over Python; αναπροσις, the preparation for the fight; εμπειρια, the firſt attempt; καταχελευσμος, taking breath and collecting courage; ιαμβοι και δακτυλοι, the inſulting ſarcaſms of the god over his vanquiſhed enemy; συριγγες, an imitation of the hiſſes of the ſerpent; juſt as he expired under the blows of Apollo. A dance was alſo introduced; and in the 48th Olympiad, the Amphictyons, who preſided over the games, encreaſed the number of muſical inſtruments by the addition of a flute, but, as it was more peculiarly uſed in funeral ſongs and lamentations, it was ſoon rejected, as unfit for merriment, and the feſtivals which repreſented the triumph of Apollo over the conquered ſerpent. The Romans, according to ſome, introduced them into their city, and called them Apollinares ludi. Pauſ. 10, c. 13 & 37.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 447.—Plin. 7.—Liv. 25.

PYTHIUS, a Syracuſan, who defrauded Canius, a Roman knight, to whom he had ſold his gardens, &c. Cic. de off. 3, c. 14. ——A ſirname of Apollo, which he received for his having conquered the ſerpent Python, or becauſe he was worſhipped at Delphi; called alſo Pytho.

PYTHO, the ancient name of the town of Delphi, which it received απο του πυθεσθαι, becauſe the ſerpent which Apollo killed rotted there. It was alſo called Parnaſſia Nape. Vid. Delphi.

PYTHOCHARIS, a muſician who aſſuaged the fury of ſome wolves by playing on a muſical inſtrument, &c. Ælian.

PYTHOCLES, an Athenian deſcended from Aratus. It is ſaid, that on his account, and for his inſtruction, Plutarch wrote the life of Aratus.——A man put to death with Phocion.——A man who wrote on Italy.

PYTHODORUS, an Athenian archon in the age of Themiſtocles.

PYTHOLAUS, the brother of Theba, the wife of Alexander tyrant of Pheræ. He aſſiſted his ſiſter in diſpatching her huſband. Plut.

PYTHON, a native of Byzantium, in the age of Philip of Macedonia. He was a great favorite of the monarch who ſent him to Thebes, when that city, at the inſtigation of Demoſthenes, was going to take up arms againſt Philip. Plut. in Dem.—Diod. ——One of the friends of Alexander put to death by Ptolemy Lagus.——A man who killed Cotys king of Thrace at the inſtigation of the Athenians.——A celebrated ſerpent ſprung from the mud and ſtagnated waters which remained on the ſurface of the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. Some, however, ſuppoſe that it was produced from the earth by Juno, and ſent by the goddeſs to perſecute Latona, who was then pregnant by Jupiter. Latona eſcaped his fury by means of her lover, who changed her into a quail during the remaining months of her pregnancy, and afterwards reſtored her to her original ſhape in the iſland of Delos, where ſhe gave birth to Apollo and Diana. Apollo, as ſoon as he was born, attacked the monſter, and killed him with his arrows, and in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained, he inſtituted the celebrated Pythian games. Strab. 8.—Pauſ. 2, c. 7. l. 10, c. 6.—Hygin.—*Ovid. PYTHONICE, an Athenian proſtitute greatly honored by Harpalus, whom Alexander ſometime before had intruſted with the treaſures of Babylon. He married her; and according to ſome, ſhe died the very moment that the nuptials were going to be celebrated. He raiſed her a ſplendid monument on the road which led from Athens to Eleuſis, which coſt him 30 talents. Diod. 17.—Pauſ. 1.—Athen. 13, &c.

PYTHONISSA, a name given to the prieſteſs of Apollo's temple at Delphi. She is more generally called Pythia. [Vid. Pythia.] The word Pythoniſſa was commonly applied to women who attempted to explain futurity.

PYTTALUS, a celebrated athlete who obtained a prize at the Olympic games. Pauſ. 9, c. 16.

QUADERNA, a town of Italy.

QUADI, an antient nation of Germany, near the country of the Marcomanni, on the borders of the Danube, in modern Moravia. They rendered themſelves celebrated by their oppoſition to the Romans, by whom they were often defeated, though not totally ſubdued. Tacit. in Germ. 42 & 43. An. 2, c. 63.

QUADRATUS, a ſirname given to Mercury, becauſe ſome of his ſtatues were ſquare.——A governor of Syria in the age of Nero.

QUADRIFRONS or QUADRICEPS, a ſirname of Janus, becauſe he was repreſented with four heads. He had a temple on the Tarpeian rock, raiſed by L. Catulus.

QUÆSTORES, two officers at Rome, firſt created A. U. C. 269. They received their name a quærendo, becauſe they collected the revenues of the ſtate, and had the total management of the public treaſury. The quæſtorſhip was the firſt office which could be had in the ſtate. It was requiſite that the candidates ſhould be 24 or 25 years of age, or according to ſome 27. In the year 332, U. C. two more were added to the others, to attend the conſuls, to take care of the pay of the armies abroad, abroad, and to ſell the plunder and booty which had been acquired by conqueſt. Theſe were called Peregrini, whilſt the others, whoſe employment was in the city, received the name of Urbani. When the Romans were maſters of all Italy, four more were created, A. U. C. 439, to attend the pro-conſuls and proprætors in their provinces, and to collect all the taxes and cuſtoms which each particular diſtrict owed to the republic. They were called Provinciales. Sylla the dictator created 20 quæſtors, and J. Cæſar 40, to fill up the vacant ſeats in the ſenate; from whence it is evident that the quæſtors ranked as ſenators in the ſenate. The quæſtors were always appointed by the ſenate at Rome, and if any perſon was appointed to the quæſtorſhip without their permiſſion he was only called Proquæſtor. The quæſtores urbani were apparently of more conſequence than the reſt, the treaſury was entruſted to their care, they kept an account of all receipts and diſburſements, and the Roman eagles or enſigns were always in their poſſeſſion when the armies were not on an expedition. They required every general before he triumphed to tell them, upon his oath, that he had given a juſt account of the number of the ſlain on both ſides, and that he had been ſaluted imperator by the ſoldiers, a title which every commander generally received from his army after he had obtained a victory, and which was afterwards confirmed and approved by the ſenate. The city quæſtors had alſo the care of the ambaſſadors, they lodged and received them, and ſome time after, when Auguſtus was declared emperor, they kept the decrees of the ſenate, which had been before entruſted with the ediles and the tribunes. This gave riſe to two new offices of truſt and honor, one of which was quæſtor palatii, and the other quæſtor principis or auguſti, ſometimes called candidatus principis. The tent of the quæſtor in the camp was called quæſtorium. It ſtood near that of the general.

QUARI, a people of Gaul.

QUARIUS, a river of Bœotia.

QUERCENS, a Rutulian who fought againſt the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 684.

QUERQUETULANUS, a name given to mount Cœlius at Rome, from the oaks which grew there. Tacit. An. 4, c. 65.

QUIETIS FANUM, a temple without the walls of the city of Rome. Quies was the goddeſs of reſt. Her temple was ſituate near the Colline gate.

L. QUIĒTUS, an officer under the emperor Trajan, who behaved with great valor in the expeditions which were undertaken by the army which he commanded. He was put to death by Adrian.

QUINDA, a town of Cilicia.

QUINDECIMVĪRI, an order of prieſts whom Tarquin the proud appointed to take care of the Sibylline books. They were originally two, but afterwards the number was increaſed to ten, to whom Sylla added five more, whence their name. Vid. Decemviri & Duumviri.

QUINQUATRIA, a feſtival in honor of Minerva at Rome, which continued during five days. The beginning of the celebration was the 18th of March. The firſt day's ſacrifices and oblations were preſented, but, however, without the effuſion of blood. On the ſecond, third, and fourth days, ſhows of gladiators were exhibited, and on the fifth day there was a ſolemn proceſſion through the ſtreets of the city. On the days of the celebration, ſcholars obtained holydays, and it was uſual for them to offer prayers to Minerva for learning and wiſdom, which the goddeſs patronized; and on their return to ſchool, they preſented their maſter with a gift which has received the name of Minerval. They were much the ſame at the Panathenæa of the Greeks. Plays were alſo acted and diſputations were held on ſubjects of literature. They received their name from the five days which were devoted for the celebration.

QUINQUENNĀLES LUDI, games celebrated by the Chians in honor of Homer every fifth year. There were alſo ſome games among the Romans which bore this name. They are the ſame as the Actian games. Vid. Actia.

QUINTIA PRATA, a place on the borders of the Tiber near Rome, which had been cultivated by the great Cincinnatus. Liv. 3. c. 26.

QUINTILIĀNUS Marcus Fabius, a celebrated rhetorician born in Spain. He opened a ſchool of rhetoric at Rome, and was the firſt who obtained a ſalary from the ſtate as being a public teacher. After he had remained twenty years in this laborious employment, and obtained the merited applauſe of the moſt illuſtrious Romans, not only as a preceptor, but as a pleader at the bar, Quintilian, by the permiſſion of the emperor Domitian, retired to enjoy the fruits of his labors and induſtry. In his retirement he aſſiduouſly dedicated his time to the ſtudy of literature, and wrote a treatiſe on the cauſes of the corruption of eloquence. Some time after, at the preſſing ſolicitations of his friends, he wrote his inſtitutiones oratoriæ, the moſt perfect and complete ſyſtem of oratory extant. It is divided into 12 books, in which the author explains from obſervation, as well as from experience, what can conſtitute a good and perfect orator, and in this he not only mentions the purſuits and the employments of the rhetorician, but he alſo ſpeaks of his education, and begins with the attention which ought to be ſhewn him even in his cradle. He was appointed preceptor to the two young princes whom Domitian deſtined for his ſucceſſors on the throne, but the pleaſures which the rhetorician received from the favors and the attention of the emperor, and from the ſucceſs which his writings met in the world, were embittered by the loſs of his wife, and of his two ſons. It is ſaid that Quintilian was poor in his retirement, and that his indigence was relieved by the liberality of his pupil, Pliny the younger. He died A. D. 95. His inſtitutions were diſcovered in the 1415th year of the Chriſtian era, in an old tower of a monaſtery at St. Gal, by Poggio Bracciolini, a native of Florence. The beſt editions of Quintilian are thoſe of Geſner, 4to. Gotting. 1738; of L. Bat. 8vo. cum notis variorum 1665; of Gibſon, 4to. Oxon. 1693; and that of Rollin republiſhed in 8vo. London, 1792.

QUINTILIUS VARUS, a Roman governor of Syria. [Vid. Varus.]——A friend of the emperor Alexander.——A man put to death by the emperor Severus.

QUINTILLA, a courtezan at Rome, &c. Juv. 7, v. 75.

QUINTILLUS M. Aurelius Claudius, a brother of Claudius, who proclaimed himſelf emperor, and 17 days after deſtroyed himſelf by opening his veins in a bath, when he heard that Aurelian was marching againſt him, about the 270th year of the Chriſtian era.

QUINTUS, or QUINCTIUS, one of the names of Cincinnatus. Perſ. 1, v. 73.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, a Latin hiſtorian, who floriſhed, as ſome ſuppoſe, in the reign of Veſpaſian or Trajan. He has rendered himſelf known by his hiſtory of the reign of Alexander the great. This hiſtory was divided into 10 books, of which the two firſt, the end of the fifth, and the beginning of the ſixth are loſt. This work is admired for its elegance, the purity, and the floridneſs of the ſtyle. It is however blamed for great anachroniſms, and glaring miſtakes in geography, as well as hiſtory. Freinſhemius has written a ſupplement to Curtius, in which he ſeems to have made ſome very ſatisfactory amends for the loſs which the hiſtory has ſuffered, by a learned collection of facts and circumſtances from all the different authors who have employed their pen in writing an account of Alexander, and of his Aſiatic conqueſts. Some ſuppoſe that the hiſtorian is the ſame with that Curtius Rufus, who lived in the age of Claudius, under whom he was made conſul. This Rufus was born of an obſcure family, and he attended a Roman quæſtor in Africa, when he was met at Adrumetum by a woman above an human ſhape, as he was walking under the porticos in the middle of the day. This extraordinary character addreſſed the indigent Roman, and told him that the day ſhould come in which he ſhould govern Africa with conſular power. This ſtrange prophecy animated Rufus; he repaired to Rome, where he gained the favors of the emperor, obtained conſular honors, and at laſt retired as pro-conſul to Africa, where he died. The beſt editions of Curtius are thoſe of Elzevir, 8vo. Amſt. 1673; of Snakenburg 4to. L. Bat. 1724; and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris 1757. Tacit. ann. 11, c. 23, &c.

QUINTUS VERANIUS, a governor of Cappadocia.——Cicero, the brother of Cicero.——Catulus, a Roman conſul.——A friend of Cæſar.

QUIRINALIA, feſtivals in honor of Romulus, ſurnamed Quirinus, celebrated on the 13th of the calends of March.

QUIRINĀLIS, a hill at Rome, originally called Agonius, and afterwards Collinus. The name of Quirinalis it obtained from the inhabitants of Cures, who ſettled there under their king Tatius. It was alſo called Cabalinus, from two marble ſtatues of a horſe, one of which was the work of Phidias, and the other of Praxiteles. Liv. 1, c. 44.

c. 44.—Ovid. Faſt. 375. Met. 14, v. 845.——One of the gates of Rome near mount Quirinalis.

QUIRĪNUS, a ſirname of Mars among the Romans. This name was alſo given to Romulus when he had been made a god by his ſuperſtitious ſubjects. Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 475.——Alſo a ſirname of the god Janus.——Sulpitius, a Roman conſul born at Lanuvium. Though deſcended of an obſcure family, he was raiſed to the greateſt honors by Auguſtus. He was appointed governor of Syria, and was afterwards made preceptor to Caius, the grandſon of the emperor. He married Æmilia Lepida, the grand-daughter of Sylla and Pompey, but ſome time after he ſhamefully repudiated her. He died A. D. 22. Tacit. Ann. 3, &c.

QUIRĪTES, a name given to the Roman citizens, becauſe they admitted into their city the Sabines, who inhabited the town of Cures, and who on that account were called Quirites. After this union, the two nations were indiſcriminately and promiſcuouſly called by that name. It is, however, to be obſerved that the word was confined at Rome, and not uſed in the armies, as we find ſome of the generals applying it only to ſuch of their ſoldiers as they diſmiſſed or diſgraced. Even ſome of the emperors appeaſed a ſedition, by calling their rebellious ſoldiers by the degrading appellation of Quirites. Sueton. Cæſ. 70.—Lamprid. 53.—Lucan 5, v. 558.—Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 1.—Varro. de L. L. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 479.

RABIRIUS, C. a Roman knight, who lent an immenſe ſum of money to Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt. The monarch afterwards, not only refuſed to repay him, but even confined him, and endangered his life. Rabirius eſcaped from Egypt with difficulty, but at his return to Rome, he was accuſed by the ſenate of having lent money to an African prince, for unlawful purpoſes. He was ably defended by Cicero, and acquitted with difficulty. Cic. pro Rab.——A Latin poet in the age of Auguſtus, who wrote a poem on the victory which the emperor had gained over Antony at Actium. Seneca has compared him to Virgil for elegance and majeſty, but Quintilian is not ſo favorable to his poetry.——An architect in the reign of Domitian, who built a celebrated palace for the emperor, of which the ruins are ſtill ſeen at Rome.

RACILIA, the wife of Cincinnatus. Liv. 3, c. 26.

RACILIUS, a tribune who complained in the ſenate of the faction of Clodius. Cic. in Verr. 2, c. 12. ad Q. fr. 2, c. 1.

RÆSACES, an officer of Artaxerxes. He revolted from his maſter, and fled to Athens.

RAMISES, a king of Egypt. Vid. Rhamſes.

RAMNES, or RHAMNENSES, one of the three centuries inſtituted by Romulus. After the Roman people had been divided into three tribes, the monarch elected out of each 100 young men of the beſt and nobleſt families, with which he formed three companies of horſe. One of them was called Ramnes, either from the tribe of which it was choſen, or from Romulus. Another was called Tatian, and the third Luceres. Varr. de L. L. 4, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Horat. de Art. poet. 340.—Plut. in Rom.

RANDA, a village of Perſia, where 3000 rebellious Perſians were ſlain by Chiles. Polyæn. 7.

RAPO, a Rutulian chief, &c. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 748.

RASCIPŎLIS, a Macedonian ſent to the aſſiſtance of Pompey. Cæſar. bell. Civ. 3, c. 4.

RAVENNA, a town of Italy on the Adriatic, which became celebrated under the Roman emperors for its capacious harbour, which could contain 250 ſhips, and for being for ſome time the ſeat of the weſtern empire. It was difficult of acceſs by land, as it ſtood on a ſmall peninſula; and ſo ill ſupplied with water, that it ſold at a higher price than wine, according to Martial. The emperors kept one of their fleets there, and the other at Miſenum, on the other ſide of Italy. It was founded by a colony of Theſſalians, or, according to others, of Sabines. Strab. 5.—Suet. in Aug. 49.—Plin. 36, c. 12.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Martial. 3, ep 93, v. 8, &c.

RĀVŎLA, a celebrated debauchee, &c. Juv. 9.

RAURACI, a people of Gaul, whoſe chief town is now Augſt on the Rhine. Cæſ. G. 1, c. 5.

REĀTE, a pleaſant town of Umbria, built as ſome ſuppoſe before the Trojan war, about 15 miles from Fanum Vacunæ, near the lake Velinus. Cybele was the chief deity of the place. It was famous for its aſſes. Strab. 5.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Varro. de R. R. 1.—Liv. 25, c. 7. l. 26, c. 11. l. 28, c. 45.—Cic. Cat. 3, c. 2. N. D. 2, c. 2.

Redicŭlus, a deity whoſe name is derived from the word redire, (to return). The Romans raiſed a temple to this imaginary deity on the ſpot where Annibal had retired when he approached Rome, as if to beſiege it.

Redŏnes, a nation among the Armorici, now the people of Rennes and St. Maloes, in Britanny. Cæſ. B. G. 2, c. 46.

Regillæ, or Regillum, a town in the country of the Sabines in Italy, about 20 miles from Rome, celebrated for a battle which was fought there, A. U. C. 258, between 24,000 Romans, and 40,000 Etrurians, who were headed by the Tarquins. The Romans obtained the victory, and ſcarce 10,000 of the enemy eſcaped from the field of battle. Caſtor and Pollux, according to ſome accounts, were ſeen mounted on white horſes, and fighting at the head of the Roman army. Liv. 2, c. 16.—Dionyſ. Hal. 5.—Plut. in Cor.—Val. Max. 1.—Flor. 1.—Suet. Tib. 1.

Regilliānus, Q. Nonius, a Dacian who entered the Roman armies, and was raiſed to the greateſt honors under Valerian. He was elected emperor by the populace, who were diſſatisfied with Gallienus, and was ſoon after murdered by his ſoldiers, A. D. 262.

Regillus, a ſmall lake of Latium, whoſe waters fall into the Anio, at the eaſt of Rome. The dictator Poſthumius defeated the Latin army near it. Liv. 2, c. 19.

Regīnum, a town of Germany, now ſuppoſed Ratiſbon or Regenſburg.

Regium Lepidum, a town of Modena, now Regio, at the ſouth of the Po. Plin. 3, c. 15.—Cic. 12, fam. 5. l. 13, ep. 7.

M. Attilius Regŭlus, a conſul during the firſt Punic war. He reduced Brunduſium, and in his ſecond conſulſhip he took 64, and ſunk 30, gallies of the Carthaginian fleet, on the coaſts of Sicily. Afterwards he landed in Africa, and ſo rapid was his ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time he made himſelf maſter of about 200 places of conſequence on the coaſt. The Carthaginians ſued for peace, but the conqueror refuſed to grant it, and ſoon after he was defeated in a battle by Xanthippus, and 30,000 of his men were left on the field of battle, and 15,000 taken priſoners. Regulus was in the number of the captives, and he was carried in triumph to Carthage. He was afterwards ſent by the enemy to Rome, to propoſe an accommodation, and an exchange of priſoners; and if his commiſſion was unſucceſsful, he was bound by the moſt ſolemn oaths to return to Carthage, without delay. When he came to Rome, Regulus diſſuaded his countrymen from accepting the terms which the enemy propoſed, and when his opinion had had due influence on the ſenate, Regulus retired to Carthage agreeable to his engagements. The Carthaginians were told that their offers of peace had been rejected at Rome, by the means of Regulus, and therefore they prepared to puniſh him with the greateſt ſeverity. His eye-brows were cut, and he was expoſed for ſome days to the exceſſive heat of the meridian ſun, and afterwards confined in a barrel, whoſe ſides were every where filled with large iron ſpikes, till de died in the greateſt agonies. His ſufferings were heard at Rome, and the ſenate permitted his widow to inflict whatever puniſhment ſhe pleaſed on ſome of the moſt illuſtrious captives of Carthage, who were in their hands. She confined them alſo in preſſes filled with ſharp iron points, and was ſo exquiſite in her cruelty, that the ſenate at laſt interfered, and ſtopped the barbarity of her puniſhments. Regulus died about 251 years before Chriſt. Sil. 6, v. 319.—Flor. 2, c. 3.—Horat. 3, Od. 5.—Cic. de off. 1, c. 13.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1. l. 9, c. 2.—Liv. ep. 16.——Memmius, a Roman made governor of Greece by Caligula. While Regulus was in his province, the emperor wiſhed to bring the celebrated ſtatue of Jupiter Olympius, by Phidias, to Rome; but this was ſupernaturally prevented, and according to antient authors, the ſhip which was to convey it was deſtroyed by lightning, and the workmen who attempted to remove the ſtatue, were terrified away by ſudden noiſes. Dio. Caſſ. ——A man who condemned Sejanus.——Roſcius, a man who held the conſulſhip but for one day, in the reign of Vitellius.

Remi, a nation of Gaul, whoſe principal town Duricortorium, is now Rheims, in the north of Champagne. Plin. 4, c. 17.—Cæſ. B. G. 2, c. 5.

Remmia lex de judiciis, was enacted to puniſh all calumniators. The letter K was marked on their forehead. This law was aboliſhed by Conſtantine the Great. Cic. pro Roſ.

Rĕmŭlus, a chief of Tibur whoſe arms were ſeized by the Rutulians, and afterwards became part of the plunder which Euryalus obtained. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 360.——A friend of Turnus, trampled to death by his horſe, which Orſilochus had wounded. Id. 11, v. 636, &c.

Rĕmŭlus Sylvius, a king of Alba, deſtroyed by lightning on account of his impiety. Ovid. Triſt. 4, v. 50.

Remuria, feſtivals eſtabliſhed at Rome by by Romulus, to appeaſe the manes of his brother Remus. They were afterwards called Lemuria, and celebrated yearly.

Remus, the brother of Romulus, was expoſed together with him, by the cruelty of his grandfather. In the conteſt which happened between the two brothers about building a city, Romulus obtained the preference, and Remus, for ridiculing the riſing walls, was put to death by his brother's orders, or by Romulus himſelf. [Vid. Romulus.] The Romans were afflicted with a plague after this murder, upon which the oracle was conſulted, and the manes of Remus appeaſed by the inſtitution of the Remuria. Ovid.——One of the auxiliaries of Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 330.

Resæna, a town of Meſopotamia, famous for the defeat of Sapor by Gordian.

Resus, a ſmall river of Aſia Minor, falling into the Mæander.

Retina, a village near Miſenum. Plin. 6, ep. 16.

Reudigni, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 40.

Rha, a large river, now the Volga, of Ruſſia. A medicinal root which grew on its bank was called Rha barbarum, Rhubarb.

Rhacia, a promontory in the Mediterranean ſea, projecting from the Pyrenean mountains.

Rhacius, a Cretan prince, the firſt of that nation who entered Ionia with a colony. He ſeized Claros, of which he became the ſovereign. He married Manto, the daughter of Tireſias, who had been ſeized on his coaſts. Pauſ. 7, c. 3.

Rhacōtis, an antient name of Alexandria, the capital of Egypt. Strab.—Pauſ. 5, c. 21.

Rhadamanthus, a ſon of Jupiter and Europa. He was born in Crete, which he abandoned about the 30th year of his age. He paſſed into ſome of the Cyclades, where he reigned with ſo much juſtice and impartiality, that the antients have ſaid he became one of the judges of hell, and that he was employed in the infernal regions in obliging the dead to confeſs their crimes, and in puniſhing them for their offences. Rhadamanthus reigned not only over ſome of the Cyclades, but over many of the Greek cities of Aſia. Pauſ. 8, c. 53.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 435.—Diod. 5.—Plato.—Homer. Il. 4, v. 564.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 566.

Rhadamistus, a ſon of Pharnaſmanes king of Iberia. He married Zenobia, the daughter of his uncle Mithridates, king of Armenia, and ſome time after put him to death. He was put death by his father for his cruelties, about the year 52 of the Chriſtian era. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 37.

Rhadius, a ſon of Neleus.

Rhæteum, a city of Phrygia.

Rhæti, or Ræti, an antient and warlike nation of Etruria. They were driven from their native country by the Gauls, and went to ſettle on the other ſide of the Alps. Vid. Rhætia. Plin. 3, c. 20.—Juſtin. 20, c. 5.

Rhætia, a country at the north of Italy, between the Alps and the Danube, which now forms the territories of the Griſons, of Tyrol, and part of Italy. It was divided into two parts, Rhætia prima and Rhætia ſecunda. The firſt extended from the ſources of the Rhine to thoſe of the Licus, a ſmall river which falls into the Danube. The other, called alſo Vindelicia, extended from the Licus to another ſmall river called Œnus, towards the eaſt. The principal towns of Rhætia were called Curia, Tridentum, Belunum, Feltria. The Rhætians rendered themſelves formidable by the frequent invaſions they made upon the Roman empire, and were at laſt conquered by Druſus, the brother of Tiberius, and others under the Roman emperors. Virg. G. 2, v. 96.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 3, c. 20. l. 14, c. 2, &c.—Horat. 4, Od. 4 & 14.

Rhamnes, a king and augur, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. He was killed in the night by Niſus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 325.

Rhamnus, a town of Attica, famous for a temple of Amphiaraus, and a ſtatue of the goddeſs Nemeſis, who was from thence called Rhamnuſia. This ſtatue was made by Phidias, out of a block of Parian marble which the Perſians intended as a pillar to be erected to commemorate their expected victory over Greece. Pauſ. 1.—Plin. 36.

Rhamnusia, a name of Nemeſis. Vid. Rhamnus.

Rhampsinītus, an opulent king of Egypt who ſucceeded Proteus. He built a large tower with ſtones, at Memphis, where his riches were depoſited, and of which he was robbed by the artifice of the architect, &c. Herodot. 2, c. 121, &c.

Rhamses, or Ramises, a powerful king of Egypt, who with an army of 700,000 men, conquered Æthiopia, Libya, Perſia, and other eaſtern nations. In his reign, according to Pliny, Troy was taken. Some authors conſider him to be the ſame as Seſoſtris. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 60.—Plin. 36, c. 8.

Rhanis, one of Diana's attendant nymphs. Ovid. Met. 3.

Rharos, or Rharium, a plain of Attica, where corn was firſt ſown by Triptolemus.

lemus. It received its name from the ſower's father, who was called Rharos.

Rhascupŏris, a king a Thrace, who invaded the poſſeſſions of Cotys, and was put to death by order of Tiberius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 64.

Rhea, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Saturn, by whom ſhe had Veſta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, &c. Her huſband, however, devoured them all as ſoon as born, as he had ſucceeded to the throne with the ſolemn promiſe that he would raiſe no male children, or according to others, becauſe he had been informed by an oracle, that one of his ſons would dethrone him. To ſtop the cruelty of her huſband, Rhea conſulted her parents, and was adviſed to impoſe upon him, or perhaps to fly into Crete. Accordingly, when ſhe brought forth, the child was immediately concealed, and Saturn devoured up a ſtone which his wife had given him as her own child. The fears of Saturn were ſoon proved to be well founded. A year after, the child, whoſe name was Jupiter, became ſo ſtrong and powerful, that he drove his father from his throne. Rhea has been confounded by the mythologiſts with ſome of the other goddeſſes, and many have ſuppoſed that ſhe was the ſame divinity that received adoration under the various names of Bona Dea, Cybele, Dindymena, Magna mater, Ceres, Veſta, Titæa and Terra, Tellus, and Ops. [Vid. Cybele, Ceres, Veſta, &c.] Rhea, after the expulſion of her huſband from his throne, followed him to Italy, where he eſtabliſhed a kingdom. Her benevolence in this part of Europe was ſo great, that the golden age of Saturn is often called the age of Rhea. Heſiod. Theog. — Orpheus. in Hymn.—Homer. ib.—Æſchyl. Prom.—Euripid. Bacc. & Elect.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 197. —Apollod. 1, c. 1, &c.——Sylvia, the mother of Romulus and Remus. She is alſo called Ilia. Vid. Ilia.——A nymph of Italy, who is ſaid to have borne a ſon called Aventinus to Hercules. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 659.

Rhebas, or Rhebus, a river of Bithynia, flowing from mount Olympus into the Euxine ſea. Flacc. 7, v. 698.

Rhedŏnes. Vid. Redones.

Rhegium, now Rheggio, a town of Italy, in the country of the Brutii, oppoſite Meſſana in Sicily, where a colony of Meſſenians under Alcidamidas ſettled, B. C. 723. It was originally called Rhegium, and afterwards Rhegium Julium, to diſtinguiſh it from Rhegium Lepidi, a town of Ciſalpine Gaul. Some ſuppoſe that it received its name from the Greek word ῥηγνυμι, to break, becauſe it is ſituate on the ſtreights of Carybdis, which were formed when the iſland of Sicily, as it were, was broken and ſeparated from the continent of Italy. This town has always been ſubject to great earthquakes, by which it has often been deſtroyed. The neighbourhood is remarkable for its great fertility, and for its delightful views. Sil. 13, v. 94.—Cic. pro Arch. 3.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 5 & 48.—Juſtin. 4, c. 1. —Mela. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 6.

Rhegusci, a people of the Alps.

Rhemi. Vid. Remi.

Rhene, a ſmall iſland of the Ægean, about 200 yards from Delos, 18 miles in circumference. The inhabitants of Delos always buried their dead there, as their own iſland was conſecrated to Apollo, where no dead bodies were to be inhumated. Strabo ſays, that it was uninhabited, though it was once as populous and floriſhing as the reſt of the Cyclades. Polycrates conquered it, and conſecrated it to Apollo, after he had tied it to Delos by means of a long chain. Rhene was ſometimes called the ſmall Delos, and the iſland of Delos the great Delos. Thucyd. 3.—Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

Rheni, a people on the borders of the Rhine.

Rhenus, one of the largeſt rivers of Europe, which divides Germany from Gaul. It riſes in the Rhætian Alps, and falls into the German ocean. Virgil has called it bicornis, becauſe it divides itſelf into two ſtreams. The river Rhine was a long time a barrier between the Romans and the Germans, and on that account its banks were covered with ſtrong caſtles. J. Cæſar was the firſt Roman who croſſed it to invade Germany. The waters of that river were held in great veneration, and were ſuppoſed by the antient Germans to have ſome peculiar virtue, as they threw their children into it, either to try the fidelity of the mothers, or to brace and invigorate their limbs. If the child ſwam on the ſurface, the mother was acquitted of ſuſpicion, but if it ſunk to the bottom, its origin was deemed illegitimate. In modern geography the Rhine is known as dividing itſelf into four large branches, the Waal, Lech, Iſſel, and the Rhine. That branch which ſtill retains the name of Rhine, loſes itſelf in the ſands above modern Leyden, and is afterwards no longer known by its antient appellation, ſince the year 860, A. D. when the inundations of the ſea deſtroyed the regularity of its mouth. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 258.—Strab. 4.—Mela. 2, c. 5. l. 3, c. 2.—Cæſar de bell. G. 4, c. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 727.——A ſmall river of Italy, falling into the Po on the ſouth, now Rheno. Sil. 8, v. 600.—Plin. 3, c. 16. l. 16, c. 36.

Rheomitres, a Perſian who revolted from Artaxerxes, &c. Diod. 15.——A Perſian officer killed at the battle of Iſſus. Curt. 2, c. 5.

Rhesus, a king of Thrace, ſon of the Strymon and Terpſichore, or, according to others, of Eioneus by Euterpe. After many warlike exploits and conqueſts in Europe, he marched to the aſſiſtance of Priam, king of Troy, againſt the Greeks. He was expected with great impatience, as an antient oracle had declared, that Troy ſhould never be taken, if the horſes of Rheſus drank the waters of the Xanthus, and fed upon the graſs of the Trojan plains. This oracle was well known to the Greeks, and therefore two of their beſt generals, Diomedes and Ulyſſes, were commiſſioned by the reſt to intercept the Thracian prince. The Greeks entered his camp in the night, ſlew him, and carried away his horſes to their camp. Homer. Il. 10.—Dictys. Cret. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 473.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 98.

Rhŏdŏpe, or Rhodōpis, a celebrated courtezan of Greece, who was fellow ſervant with Æſop, at the court of a king of Samos. She was carried to Egypt by Xanthus, and her liberty was at laſt bought by Charaxes of Mitylene, the brother of Sappho, who was enamoured of her, and who married her. She ſold her favors at Naucratis, where ſhe collected ſo much money, that, to render her name immortal, ſhe conſecrated a number of ſpits in the temple of Apollo at Delphi; or, according to others, erected one of the pyramids of Egypt. Ælian ſays, that as Rhodope was one day bathing herſelf, an eagle carried away away one of her ſandals, and dropped it near Pſammetichus, king of Egypt, at Memphis. The monarch was ſtruck with the beauty of the ſandal, ſtrict enquiry was made to find the owner, and Rhodope, when diſcovered, married Pſammetichus. Herodot. 2, c. 134, &c.—*Ovid. Rhodunia, the top of mount Œta. Liv. 36, c 16.

Rhodus, a celebrated iſland in the Carpathian ſea, 120 miles in circumference, at the ſouth of Caria, from which it is diſtant about 20 miles. Its principal cities were Rhodes, founded about 408 years before the Chriſtian era, Lindus, Camiſus, Jalyſus. Rhodes was famous for the ſiege which it ſupported againſt Demetrius, and for a celebrated ſtatue of Apollo. [Vid. Coloſſus.] The Rhodians were originally governed by kings, and were independent, but this government was at laſt exchanged for a democracy and an ariſtocracy. They were naturally given up to commerce, and during many ages, they were the moſt powerful nation by ſea. Their authority was reſpected, and their laws were ſo univerſally approved, that every country made uſe of them to decide diſputes concerning maritime affairs, and they were at laſt adopted by other commercial nations, and introduced into the Roman codes. When Alexander made himſelf maſter of Aſia, the Rhodians loſt their independence, but they ſoon after aſſerted their natural privileges under his cruel ſucceſſors, and continued to hold that influence among nations to which their maritime power and conſequence entitled them. They aſſiſted Pompey againſt Cæſar, and were defeated by Caſſius, and became dependent upon the Romans. The iſland of Rhodes has been known by the ſeveral names of Ophiuſa, Stadia, Telchinis, Corymbia, Trinacria, Æthrea, Aſteria, Poeſſa, Atabyria, Oloeſſa, Marcia, and Pelagia. It received the name of Rhodes, either on account of Rhode, a beautiful nymph who dwelt there, and who was one of the favorites of Apollo, or becauſe roſes, (ῥόδον), grew in great abundance all over the iſland. Strab. 14.—*Homer. Ripheus, a Trojan who joined Æneas the night that Troy was reduced to aſhes, and was at laſt killed after making a great carnage of the Greeks. He is commended for his love of juſtice and equity. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 339 & 426.——One of the Centaurs. Ovid. Met. 12.

Rixamăræ, a people of Illyricum. Liv. 45, c. 26.

Robīgo, or Rubīgo, a goddeſs at Rome, particularly worſhipped by huſbandmen, as ſhe preſided over corn. Her feſtivals, called Robigalia, were celebrated on the 25th of April, and incenſe was offered to her, as alſo the intrails of a ſheep, and of a dog. She was intreated to preſerve the corn from blights. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 911.—Virg. G. 1, v. 151.—Varro. de L. L. 5, de R. R. 1, c. 1.

Rodumna, now Roanne, a town of the Ædui, on the Loire.

Roma, a city of Italy, the capital of the Roman empire; ſituate on the banks of the river Tiber, at the diſtance of about 16 miles from the ſea. The name of its founder, and the manner of its foundation, are not preciſely known. Romulus, however, is univerſally ſuppoſed to have laid the foundations of that celebrated city, on the 20th of April, according to Varro, in the year 3961 of the Julian period, 3251 years after the creation of the world, 753 before the birth of Chriſt, and 431 years after the Trojan war, and in the 4th year of the ſixth Olympiad. In its original ſtate, Rome was but a ſmall caſtle on the ſummit of mount Palatine; and the founder, to give his followers the appearance of a nation, or a barbarian horde, was obliged to erect a ſtandard as a common aſylum for every criminal, debtor, or murderer, who fled from their native country to avoid the puniſhment which attended them. From ſuch an aſſemblage a numerous body was ſoon collected, and before the death of the founder, the Romans had covered with their habitations, the Palatine, Capitoline, Aventine, Eſquiline hills, with mount Cœlius, and Quirinalis. After many ſucceſsful wars againſt the neighbouring ſtates, the views of Romulus were directed to regulate a nation naturally fierce, warlike, and uncivilized. The people were divided into claſſes, the intereſts of the whole were linked in a common chain, and the labors of the ſubject, as well as thoſe of his patron, tended to the ſame end, the aggrandizement of the ſtate. Under the ſucceſſors of Romulus, the power of Rome was encreaſed, and the boundaries of her dominions extended; while one was employed in regulating the forms of worſhip, and in inculcating in the minds of his ſubjects a reverence for the deity, the other was engaged in enforcing diſcipline among the army, and raiſing the conſequence of the ſoldiers in the government of the ſtate, and a third made the object of his adminiſtration conſiſt in adorning his capital, in beautifying the edifices, and in fortifying it with towers and walls. During 244 years, the Romans were governed by kings, but the tyranny, the oppreſſion, and the violence of the laſt of theſe monarchs, and of his family, became ſo atrocious, that a revolution was effected in the ſtate, and the democratical government was eſtabliſhed. The monarchical government exiſted under ſeven princes, who began to reign in the following order: Romulus, B. C. 753; and after one year's interregnum, Numa, 715; Tullus Hoſtilius, 672; Ancus Martius, 640; Tarquin Priſcus, 616; Servius Tullius, 578; and Tarquin the Proud, 534, expelled 25 years after, B. C. 509; and this regal adminiſtration has been properly denominated the infancy of the Roman empire. After the expulſion of the Tarquins from the throne, the Romans became more ſenſible of their conſequence: with their liberty they acquired a ſpirit of faction, and they became ſo jealous of their independence, that the firſt of their conſuls who had been the moſt zealous and animated in the aſſertion of their freedom, was baniſhed from the city becauſe he bore the name, and was of the family, of the tyrants; and another, to ſtop their ſuſpicions, was obliged to pull down his houſe, whoſe ſtateline's and magnificence above the reſt, ſeemed incompatible with the duties and the rank of a private citizen. They knew more effectually their power when they had fought with ſucceſs againſt Porſenna, the king of Etruria, and ſome of the neighbouring ſtates, who ſupported the claim of the tyrant, and attempted to replace him on his throne by force of arms. A government which is entruſted into the hands of two of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of its members, for the limited ſpace of one year, cannot but give riſe to great men, glorious exploits, and tremendous ſeditions. The general who is placed at the head of an army during a campaign, muſt be active and diligent, when he knows that his power is terminated with the year, and if he has a becoming ambition, he will diſtinguiſh his conſulſhip by ſome uncommon act of valor, before he deſcends from the dignity of an abſo-

lute magiſtrate to the dependence of a fellow citizen. Yet theſe attempts for the attainment of glory, often fail of ſucceſs; and though the Romans could once boaſt that every individual in their armies could diſcharge with fidelity and honor the ſuperior offices of magiſtrate and conſul, there are to be found in their annals many years marked by overthrows, or diſgraced by the ill conduct, the oppreſſion, and the wantonneſs of their generals. [Vid. Conſul.] To the fame which their conqueſts and daily ſucceſſes had gained abroad, the Romans were not a little indebted for their gradual riſe to ſuperiority, and to this may be added the policy of the cenſus, which every fifth year told them their actual ſtrength, and how many citizens were able to bear arms. And indeed it was no ſmall ſatisfaction to a people who were continually making war, to ſee, that in ſpite of all the loſſes which they might ſuſtain in the field, the increaſe of the inhabitants of the city was prodigious, and almoſt incredible, and had Romulus lived after the battle of Actium, he would have been perſuaded with difficulty that above four millions of inhabitants were contained within thoſe walls, which in the moſt floriſhing period of his reign could ſcarce muſter an army of 3000 infantry, and 300 horſe. But when Rome had floriſhed under the conſular government for about 120 years, and had beheld with pleaſure the conqueſts of her citizens over the neighbouring ſtates and cities which, according to a Roman hiſtorian, ſhe was aſhamed to recollect in the ſummit of her power, an irruption of the barbarians of Gaul rendered her very exiſtence precarious, and her name was nearly extinguiſhed. The valor of an injured individual, [Vid. Camillus,] ſaved it from deſtruction, yet not before its buildings and temples were reduced to aſhes. This celebrated event, which gave the appellation of another founder of Rome to Camillus, has been looked upon as a glorious æra to the Romans. The huts and cottages which Romulus had erected, and all his ſucceſſors repaired, were totally conſumed, and when the city aroſe again from its ruins, the ſtreets were enlarged, convenience as well as order was obſerved, taſte and regularity were conſulted, and the poverty, ignorance, and ruſticity of the Romans, ſeemed to be extinguiſhed with their old habitations. But no ſooner were they freed from the fears of their barbarian invaders, than they turned their arms againſt thoſe ſtates which refuſed to acknowledge their ſuperiority, or yield their independence. Their wars with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, diſplayed their character in a different view; if they before had fought for freedom and independence, they now drew their ſword for glory; and here we may ſee them conquered in the field, and yet refuſing to grant that peace for which their conqueror himſelf had ſued. The advantages they gained from their battles with Pyrrhus, were many. The Roman name became known in Greece, Sicily, and Africa, and in loſing or gaining a victory, the Romans were enabled to examine the manœuvres, obſerve the diſcipline, and contemplate the order and the encampments of thoſe ſoldiers whoſe friends and anceſtors had accompanied Alexander the Great in the conqueſt of Aſia. Italy became ſubjected to the Romans at the end of the war with the Tarentines, and that period of time has been called the ſecond age, or the adoleſcence of the Roman empire. After this memorable æra they tried their ſtrength not only with diſtant nations, but alſo upon a new element; and in the long wars which they waged againſt Carthage, they acquired territory, and obtained the ſovereignty of the ſea, and though Annibal for ſixteen years kept them in continual alarms, hovered round their gates, and deſtroyed their armies almoſt before their walls, yet they were doomed to conquer, [Vid. Punicum bellum,] and ſoon to add the kingdom of Macedonia, [Vid. Macedonicum bellum,] and the provinces of Aſia, [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum,] to their empire. But while we conſider the Romans as a nation ſubduing their neighbours by war, their manners, their counſels, and their purſuits at home are not to be forgotten. To be warriors was their profeſſion; their aſſemblies in the Campus Martius were a meeting of armed men, and very properly denominated an army. Yet while their conqueſts were ſo extenſive abroad, we find them torn by factions at home; and ſo far was the reſentment of the poorer citizens carried, that we ſee the enemy at the gates of the city, while all are unwilling to take up arms and to unite in the defence of their common liberty. The ſenators and the nobles were ambitious of power, and endeavoured to retain in their hands that influence which had been exerciſed with ſo much ſucceſs, and ſuch cruelty by their monarchs. This was the continual occaſion of tumults and ſedition. The people were jealous of their liberty. The oppreſſion of the nobles irritated them, and the ſtripes to which they were too often expoſed without mercy, was often productive of revolutions. The plebeians, though originally the pooreſt and moſt contemptible citizens of an indigent nation, whoſe food in the firſt ages of the empire was only bread and ſalt, and whoſe drink was water, ſoon gained rights and privileges by their oppoſition. Though really ſlaves, they became powerful in the ſtate; one conceſſion from the patricians produced another, and when their independence was boldly aſſerted by their tribunes, they were admitted to ſhare in the higheſt offices of the ſtate, and the laws which forbad the intermarriage of plebeian and patrician families, were repealed, and the meaneſt peaſant could by valor and fortitude be raiſed to the dignity of dictator and conſul. It was not till theſe privileges were obtained by the people from the ſenate, that Rome began to enjoy internal peace and tranquillity, her battles were then fought with more vigor, her ſoldiers were more animated, and her ſovereignty was more univerſally eſtabliſhed. But ſupreme power lodged in the hands of a factious and ambitious citizen, becomes too often dangerous. The greateſt oppreſſion and tyranny took place of ſubordination and obedience, and from thoſe cauſes proceeded the unparalleled ſlaughter and effuſion of blood under a Sylla or a Marius. It has been juſtly obſerved, that the firſt Romans conquered their enemies by valor, temperance and fortitude; their moderation alſo and their juſtice were well known among their neighbours, and not only private poſſeſſions, but even mighty kingdoms and empires, were left in their power, to be diſtributed among a family, or to be enſured in the hands of a ſucceſſor. They were alſo choſen umpires, to decide quarrels, but in this honorable office they conſulted their own intereſt; they artfully ſupported the weaker ſide, that the more powerful might be reduced, and gradually become their prey. Under J. Cæſar and Pompey, the rage of civil war was carried to unprecedented exceſs; it was not merely to avenge a private injury, but it was a conteſt for the ſovereignty, and though each of the adverſaries wore the maſk of pretended ſincerity, and profeſſed himſelf to be the ſupporter of the republic, not leſs than the abolition of freedom and public liberty was the aim. What Julius began, his adopted ſon atchieved, the antient ſpirit of national independence was extinguiſhed at Rome, and after the battle of Actium, the Romans ſeemed unable to govern themſelves without the aſſiſtance of a chief, who under the title of imperator, an appellation given to every commander by his army after ſome ſignal victory, reigned with as much power and as much ſovereignty as another Tarquin. Under their emperors the Romans lived a luxurious and indolent life, they had long forgot to appear in the field, and their wars were left to be waged by mercenary troops, who fought without ſpirit or animoſity, and who were ever ready to yield to him who bought their allegiance and fidelity with the greateſt ſums of money. Their leaders themſelves were not the moſt prudent or the moſt humane, the power which they had acquired by bribery was indeed precarious, and among a people, where not only the higheſt offices of the ſtate, but even the imperial purple itſelf, are expoſed to ſale, there cannot be expected much happineſs or tranquillity in the palace of the emperor. The reigns of the ſucceſſors of Auguſtus were diſtinguiſhed by variety; one was the moſt abandoned and profligate of men, whom his own vices and extravagance hurried out of the world, while his ſucceſſor, perhaps the moſt clement, juſt, and popular of princes, was ſacrificed in the midſt of his guards and attendants by the dagger of ſome offended favorite or diſappointed eunuch. Few indeed were the emperors of Rome whoſe days were not ſhortened by poiſon, or the ſword of an aſſaſſin. If one for ſome time had the imprudence to truſt himſelf in the midſt of a multitude, at laſt to periſh by his own credulity, the other conſulted his ſafety, but with no better ſucceſs, in the innumerable chambers of his palace, and changed every day, to elude diſcovery, the place of his retirement. After they had been governed by a race of princes, remarkable for the variety of their characters, the Roman poſſeſſions were divided into two diſtinct empires, by the enterprizing Conſtantine, A. D. 328. Conſtantinople became the ſeat of the eaſtern empire, and Rome remained in the poſſeſſion of the weſtern emperors, and continued to be the capital of their dominions. In the year 800 of the Chriſtian æra, Rome with Italy was delivered by Charlemagne, the then emperor of the weſt, into the hands of the Pope, who ſtill continues to hold the ſovereignty, and to maintain his independence under the name of the Eccleſiaſtical States.—The original poverty of the Romans has often been diſguiſed by their poets and hiſtorians, who wiſhed it to appear, that a nation who were maſters of the world, had had better beginning, than to be a race of ſhepherds and robbers. Yet it was to this ſimplicity they were indebted for their ſucceſſes. Their houſes were originally deſtitute of every ornament, they were made with unequal boards, and covered with mud, and theſe ſerved them rather as a ſhelter againſt the inclemency of the ſeaſons than for relaxation and eaſe. Till the age of Pyrrhus, they deſpiſed riches, and many ſalutary laws were enacted to reſtrain luxury and to puniſh indoſence. They obſerved great temperance in their meals: young men were not permitted to drink wine till they had attained their 30th year, and it was totally forbidden to women. Their national ſpirit was ſupported by policy; the triumphal proceſſion of a conqueror along the ſtreets amidſt the applauſe of thouſands, was well calculated to promote emulation, and the numbers of gladiators which were regularly introduced not only in public games and ſpectacles, but alſo at private meetings, ſerved to cheriſh their fondneſs for war, whilſt it ſteeled their hearts againſt the calls of compaſſion, and when they could gaze with pleaſure upon wretches whom they forcibly obliged to murder one another, they were not inactive in the deſtruction of thoſe whom they conſidered as inveterate foes or formidable rivals in the field. In their puniſhments, civil as well as military, the Romans were ſtrict and rigorous; a deſerter was ſeverely whipped and ſold as a ſlave, and the degradation from the rank of a ſoldier and dignity of a citizen was the moſt ignominious ſtigma which could be affixed upon a ſeditious mutineer. The tranſmarine victories of the Romans proved at laſt the ruin of their innocence and bravery. They grew fond of the luxury of the Aſiatics; and conquered by the vices and indolence of thoſe nations whom they had ſubdued, they became as effeminate and as diſſolute as their captives. Marcellus was the firſt who introduced a taſte for the fine arts among his countrymen. The ſpoils and treaſures that were obtained in the plunder of Syracuſe and Corinth, rendered the Romans partial to elegant refinement and ornamental equipage. Though Cato had deſpiſed philoſophy [Vid. Carneades] and declared that war was the only profeſſion of his countrymen, the Romans, by their intercourſe with the Greeks, ſoon became fond of literature; and though they had once baniſhed the ſophiſts of Athens from their city, yet they beheld with rapture their ſettlement among them, in the principal towns of Italy, after the conqueſt of Achaia. They ſoon after began to imitate their poliſhed captives, and to cultivate poetry with ſucceſs. From the valor of their heroes and conquerors, indeed, the ſublimeſt ſubjects were offered to the genius of their poets; but of the little that remains to celebrate the early victories of Rome, nothing can be compared to the nobler effuſions of the Auguſtan age. Virgil has done ſo much for the Latin name that the ſplendor and the triumphs of his country are forgotten for a while, when we are tranſported in the admiration of the majeſty of his numbers, the elegant delicacy of his expreſſions, and the fire of his muſe; and the applauſes given to the lyric powers of Horace, the ſoftneſs of Tibullus, the vivacity of Ovid, and to the ſuperior compoſitions of other reſpectable poets, ſhall be unceaſing ſo long as the name of Rome excites our reverence and our praiſes, and ſo long as genius, virtue, and abilities are honored amongſt mankind. Though they originally rejected with horror a law which propoſed the building of a public theatre, and the exhibition of plays, like the Greeks, yet the Romans ſoon proved favorable to the compoſitions of their countrymen. Livius was the firſt dramatic writer of conſequence at Rome, whoſe plays began to be exhibited A. U. C. 514. After him Nævius and Ennius wrote for the ſtage; and in a more poliſhed period Plautus, Terence, Cæcilius, and Afranius claimed the public attention, and gained the moſt unbounded applauſe. Satire did not make its appearance at Rome till 100 years after the introduction of comedy, and ſo celebrated was Lucilius in this kind of writing, that he was called the inventor of it. In hiſtorical writing the progreſs of the Romans was ſlow and inconſiderable, and for many years they imployed the pen of foreigners to compile their annals, till the ſuperior abilities of a Livy were made known.—In their worſhip and ſacrifices the Romans were uncommonly ſuperſtitious, the will of the gods was conſulted on every occaſion, and no general marched to an expedition without the previous aſſurance from the augurs, that the omens were propitious, and his ſucceſs almoſt indubitable. Their ſanctuaries were numerous, they raiſed altars not only to the gods, who, as they ſuppoſed, preſided over their city, but alſo to the deities of conquered nations, as well as to the different paſſions and virtues. There were no leſs than 420 temples at Rome, crouded with ſtatues, the prieſts were numerous, and each divinity had a particular college of ſacerdotal ſervants. Their wars were declared in the moſt awful and ſolemn manner, and prayers were always offered in the temples for the proſperity of Rome, when a defeat had been ſuſtained, or a victory won. The power of fathers over their children was very extenſive, and indeed unlimited; they could ſell them or put them to death at pleaſure, without the forms of trial or the interference of the civil magiſtrates. Many of their ancient families were celebrated for the great men which they had produced, but the vigorous and intereſted part they took in the management of the republic expoſed them often to danger, and ſome have obſerved that the Romans ſunk into indolence and luxury when the Cornelii, the the Fabii, the Æmylii, the Marcelli, &c. who had ſo often ſupported their ſpirit, and led them to victory, had been extinguiſhed in the bloody wars of Marius and of the two triumvirates. When Rome was become powerful, ſhe was diſtinguiſhed from other cities by the flattery of her neighbours and citizens, a form of worſhip was eſtabliſhed to her as a deity, and temples were raiſed in her honor not only in the city but in the provinces. The goddeſs Roma was repreſented, like Minerva, all armed and ſitting on a rock, holding a pike in her hand, with her head covered with a helmet, and a trophy at her feet. Liv. 1, &c.—*Cato de R. Rōmŭlus, a ſon of Mars and Ilia, grandſon of Numitor king of Alba, was born at the ſame birth with Remus. Theſe two children were thrown into the Tiber by order of Amulius, who uſurped the crown of his brother Numitor; but they were preſerved, and according to Florus the river ſtopped its courſe, and a ſhe-wolf came and fed them with her milk till they were found by Fauſtulus, one of the king's ſhepherds, who educated them as his own children. When they knew their real origin, the twins, called Romulus and Remus, put Amulius to death, and reſtored the crown to their grandfather Numitor. They afterwards undertook to build a city, and to determine which of the two brothers ſhould have the management of it, they had recourſe to omens and the flight of birds. Remus went to mount Aventine, and Romulus to mount Palatine. Remus ſaw firſt a flight of ſix vultures, and ſoon after, Romulus, twelve; and therefore, as his number was greater, he began to lay the foundations of the city, hopeful that it would become a warlike and powerful nation, as the birds from which he had received the omen were fond of prey and ſlaughter, Romulus marked with a furrow the place where he wiſhed to erect the walls; but their ſlenderneſs was ridiculed by Remus, who leaped over them with the greateſt contempt. This irritated Romulus, and Remus was immediately put to death, either by the hand of his brother or one of the workmen. When the walls were built, the city was without inhabitants; but Romulus, by making an aſylum of a ſacred grove, ſoon collected a multitude of fugitives, foreigners and criminals, whom he received as his lawful ſubjects. Yet, however numerous theſe might be, they were deſpiſed by the neighbouring inhabitants, and none were willing to form matrimonial connections with them. But Romulus obtained by force what was denied to his petitions. The Romans celebrated games in honor of the god Conſus, and forcibly carried away all the females who had aſſembled there to be ſpectators of theſe unuſual exhibitions. Theſe violent meaſures offended the neighbouring nations; they made war againſt the raviſhers with various ſucceſs, till at laſt they entered Rome, which had been betrayed to them by one of the ſtolen virgins. A violent engagement was begun in the middle of the Roman forum; but the Sabines were conquered, or, according to Ovid, the two enemies laid down their arms when the women had ruſhed between the two armies, and by their tears and entreaties raiſed compaſſion in the boſoms of their parents and huſbands. The Sabines left their original poſſeſſions and came to live in Rome, where Tatius, their king, ſhared the ſovereign power with Romulus. The introduction of the Sabines into the city of Rome was attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences, and the Romans, by purſuing this plan, and admitting the conquered nations among their citizens, rendered themſelves more powerful and more formidable. Afterwards Romulus divided the lands which he had obtained by conqueſt; one part was reſerved for religious uſes, to erect temples, and to conſecrate altars; the other was appropriated for the expences of the ſtate; and the third part was equally diſtributed among his ſubjects, who were divided into three claſſes or tribes. The moſt aged and experienced, to the number of 100, were alſo choſen, whom the monarch might conſult in matters of the higheſt importance, and from their age they were called ſenators, and from their authority patres. The whole body of the people was alſo diſtinguiſhed by the name of patricians and plebeians, patron and client, who by mutual intereſt were induced to preſerve the peace of the ſtate, and to promote the public good. Some time after Romulus diſappeared as he was giving inſtructions to the ſenators, and the eclipſe of the ſun, which happened at that time, was favorable to the rumor which aſſerted that the king had been taken up to heaven, 714 B. C. after a reign of 39 years. This was further confirmed by J. Proculus, one of the ſenators, who ſolemnly declared, that as he returned from Alba, he had ſeen Romulus in a form above human, and that he had directed him to tell the Romans to pay him divine honors under the name of Quirinus, and to aſſure them that their city was doomed one day to become the capital of the world. This report was immediately credited, and the more ſo as the ſenators dreaded the reſentment of the people, who ſuſpected them of having offered him violence. A temple was raiſed to him, and a regular prieſt, called Flamen Quirinalis, was appointed to offer him ſacrifices. Romulus was ranked by the Romans among the 12 great gods, and it is not to be wondered that he received ſuch diſtinguiſhed honors, when the Romans conſidered him as the founder of their city and empire, and the ſon of the god of war. He is generally repreſented like his father, ſo much that it is difficult to diſtinguiſh them. Q. Roscius, a Roman actor, ſo celebrated on the ſtage, that every comedian of excellence and merit has received his name. His eyes were naturally diſtorted, and he always appeared on the ſtage with a maſk, but the Romans obliged him to act his characters without, and they overlooked the deformities of his face, that they might the better hear his elegant pronunciation, and be delighted with the ſweetneſs of his voice. He was accuſed on ſuſpicion of diſhonorable practices; but Cicero, who had been one of his pupils, undertook his defence, and cleared him of the malevolent aſperſions of his enemies, in an elegant oration ſtill extant. Roſcius wrote a treatiſe, in which he compared with great ſucceſs and much learning, the profeſſion of the orator with that of the comedian. SABELLUS, a Latin poet in the reign of Domitian and Nerva.

JULIA SABĪNA, a Roman matron, who married Adrian by means of Plotina the wife of Trajan. She is celebrated for her private as well as public virtues. Adrian treated her with the greateſt aſperity, though he had received from her the imperial purple, and the empreſs was ſo ſenſible of his unkindneſs, that ſhe boaſted in his preſence that ſhe had diſdained to make him a father, leſt his children ſhould become more odious or more tyrannical than he himſelf was. The behaviour of Sabina at laſt exaſperated Adrian that he poiſoned her, or, according to ſome, obliged her to deſtroy herſelf. The emperor at that time laboured under a mortal diſeaſe, and therefore he was the more encouraged to ſacrifice Sabina to his reſentment, that ſhe might not ſurvive him. Divine honors were paid to her memory. She died after ſhe had been married 38 years to Adrian, A. D. 138.

SABĪNI, an antient people of Italy, numbered among the Aborigines, or thoſe inhabitants whoſe origin was not known. S[illegible] ſuppoſe that they were originally a Lacedæmonian colony, who ſettled in that part of the country. The poſſeſſions of the Sabines were ſituated in the neighbourhood of Rome, between the river Nar and the Anio, and bounded on the north by the Apennines and Umbria, ſouth by Latium, eaſt by the Æqui, and Etruria on the weſt. The greateſt part of the contiguous nations were deſcended from them, ſuch as the Umbrians, the Campanians, the Sabelli, the Oſci, Samnites, Hernici, Æqui, Marſi, Brutii, &c. The Sabines are celebrated in antient hiſtory as being the firſt who took up arms againſt the Romans, to avenge the rape of their females at a ſpectacle where they had been invited. After ſome engagements, the greateſt part of the Sabines left their antient poſſeſſions, and migrated to Rome, where they ſettled with their new allies. They were at laſt totally ſubdued, about the year of Rome 373, and ranked as Roman citizens. Their chief cities were Cures, Fidenæ, Reate, Cruſtumerium, Corniculum, Nomentum, Collatia, &c. and the character of the nation for chaſtity, for purity of morals, and for the knowledge of herbs and incantations, was very great. Horat. 17, ep. 28.—Cic. Vat. 15.—Plin. 3, c. 12.—Liv. 1, c. 9 & 18.—Dionyſ. 2, c. 51.—Strab. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 1. l. 3, c. 18.—Ital. 8, v. 424.—*Ovid. It had been founded by a colony of Zacynthians, and by ſome of the Rutuli of Ardea. Saguntum is celebrated for the clay in its neighbourhood, with which cups, pocula Saguntina, were made, but more particularly it is famous as being the cauſe of the ſecond Punic war, and for the attachment of its inhabitants to the intereſt of Rome. Hannibal took it after a ſiege of about eight months; and the inhabitants, not to fall into the enemy's hands, burnt themſelves with their houſes, and with all their effects. The conqueror afterwards rebuilt it, and placed a garriſon there, with all the noblemen whom he detained as hoſtages from the ſeveral neighbouring nations of Spain. Some ſuppoſe that he called it Spartagene. Flor. 2, c. 6. —Liv. 21, c. 2, 7, 9.—Sil. 1, v. 271.—Lucan. 3, v. 350.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.

SAIS, now Sa, a town in the Delta of Egypt, ſituate between the Canopic and Sebennytican mouths of the Nile, and antiently the capital of Lower Egypt. There was there a celebrated temple dedicated to Minerva, with a room cut out of one ſtone, which had been conveyed by water from Elephantis by the labors of 2000 men in three years. The ſtone meaſured on the outſide 21 cubits long, 14 broad, and 8 high. Oſiris was alſo buried near the town of Sais. The inhabitants were called Saitæ. One of the mouths of the Nile, which is adjoining to the town, has received the name of Saiticum. Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, &c.

SALA, a town of Thrace, near the mouths of the Hebrus.——A town of Mauritania—of Phrygia.—A river of Germany falling falling into the Elbe, near which are ſalt pits. Tacit. An. 13, c. 57.——Another falling into the Rhine, now the Iſſel.

SALĂCON, a poor man who pretended to be uncommonly rich, &c. Cic. ad Div. 7, c. 24.

SALAMĪNIA, a name given to a ſhip at Athens, which was employed by the republic in conveying the officers of ſtate to their different adminiſtrations abroad, &c. —A name given to the iſland of Cyprus, on account of Salamis, one of its capital cities.

SĂLĂMIS, a daughter of the river Aſopus, by Methone. Neptune became enamoured of her, and carried her to an iſland of the Ægean, which afterwards bore her name, and where ſhe gave birth to a ſon called Cenchreus. Diod. 4.

SĂLĂMIS, SALAMINS, or SALAMĪNA, now Colouri, an iſland in the Saronicus Sinus, on the ſouthern coaſt of Attica, oppoſite Eleuſis, at the diſtance of about a league, with a town and harbour of the ſame name. It is about 50 miles in circumference. It was originally peopled by a colony of Ionians, and afterwards by ſome of the Greeks from the adjacent iſlands and countries. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the fleets of the Greeks and that of the Perſians, when Xerxes invaded Attica. The enemy's ſhips amounted to above 2000, and thoſe of the Peloponneſians to about 380 ſail. In this engagement, which was fought on the 20th of October, B. C. 480, the Greeks loſt 40 ſhips, and the Perſians about 200, beſides an immenſe number which were taken, with all the ammunition they contained. The iſland of Salamis was anciently called Sciras, Cychria, or Cenchria, and its bay the gulf of Engia. It is ſaid that Xerxes attempted to join it to the continent. Teucer and Ajax, who went to the Trojan war, were natives of Salamis. Strab. 2.—Herodot. 8, c. 56, &c.—Plut. & C. Nep. in Them. &c.—Diod. 4. —*Val. SĂLĂMIS, or SALĂMĪNA, a town at the eaſt of the iſland of Cyprus. It was built by Teucer, who gave it the name of the iſland Salamis, from which he had been baniſhed, about 1270 years before the Chriſtian era; and from this circumſtance the epithets of ambigua and of altera were applied to it, as the mother country was alſo called vera, for the ſake of diſtinction. His deſcendants continued maſters of the town for above 800 years. It was deſtroyed by an earthquake, and rebuilt in the 4th century, and called Conſtantia. Strab. 9.—Herodot. 8, c. 94, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7, v. 21.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.—Lucan. 3, v. 183.

SĂLĂPIA, or SĂLĂPIÆ, now Salpe, a town of Apulia, where Annibal retired after the battle of Cannæ. It was taken from the Carthaginian general by Marcellus. Some remains of this place may be traced near a lake called Salapina Palus, now uſed for making ſalt, which, from the ſituation near the ſea, is eaſily conveyed by ſmall boats to ſhips of ſuperior burden. Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Val. Max. 3, c. 8.—Plin. 3, c. 11.

SALĂRA, a town of Africa propria, taken by Scipio. Liv. 29, c. 34, &c.

SALARIA, a ſtreet and gate at Rome which led towards the country of the Sabines. It received the name of Salaria, becauſe ſalt, (ſal), was generally conveyed to Rome that way. Mart. 4, ep. 64.—— A bridge called Salarius, was built 4 miles from Rome, thro' the Salarian gate on the river Anio.

SALASSI, a people of Ciſalpine Gaul, who were in continual war with the Romans. They cut off 10,000 Romans under Appius Claudius, A. U. C. 610, and were ſoon after defeated, and at laſt totally ſubdued and ſold as ſlaves by Auguſtus. Their country, now called Val D'Aouſta, after a colony ſettled there, and called Auguſta Prætoria, was ſituate in a valley between the Alps Graiæ and Penninæ, or Great and Little St. Bernard. Liv. 21, c. 38.—Plin. 3, c. 17.—Strab. 4.

SALEIUS, a poet of great merit in the age of Domitian, yet pinched by poverty, though born of illuſtrious parents, and diſtinguiſhed by purity of manners and integrity of mind. Juv. 7, v. 80.—Quint. 10, c. 1.

SALĒNI, a people of Spain. Mela 3, c. 1.

SALENTĪNI, a people of Italy, near Apulia, on the ſouthern coaſt of Calabria. Their chief towns were Brunduſium, Tarentum, and Hydruntum. Ital. 8, v. 579. —Virg. Æn. 3, v. 400.—Varro de R. R. 1, c. 24.—Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

SALERNUM, now Salerno, a town of the Picentini, on the ſhores of the Tyrrhene ſea, ſouth of Campania, and famous for a medical ſchool in the lower ages.— Plin. 13, c. 3.—Liv. 34, c. 45.—Lucan. 2, v. 425.—Paterc. 1, c. 15.—Horat. 1, ep. 15.

SALGANEUS, or SALGANEA, a town of Bœotia, on the Euripus. Liv. 35, c. 37, &c.

SALIA, a town of Spain, where Prudentius was born. Mela.

SALICA, a town of Spain.

Salii, a college of prieſts at Rome, inſtituted in honor of Mars, and appointed by Numa, to take care of the ſacred ſhields called Ancylia, B. C. 709. [Vid. Ancyle.] They were twelve in number, the three elders among them had the ſuperintendance of all the reſt; the firſt was called præſul, the ſecond vates, and the third magiſter. Their number was afterwards doubled by Tullus Hoſtilius, after he had obtained a victory over the Fidenates, in conſequence of a vow which he had made to Mars. The Salii were all of patrician families, and the office was very honorable. The firſt of March was the day in which the Salii obſerved their feſtivals in honor of Mars. They were generally dreſſed in a ſhort ſcarlet tunic, of which only the edges were ſeen; they wore a large purple colored belt about the waiſt, which was faſtened with braſs buckles. They had on their heads round bonnets with two corners ſtanding up, and they wore in their right hand a ſmall rod, and in their left a ſmall buckler. In the obſervation of their ſolemnity they firſt offered ſacrifices, and afterwards went through the ſtreets dancing in meaſured motions, ſometimes all together, or at other times ſeparately, while muſical inſtruments were playing before them. They placed their body in different attitudes, and ſtruck with their rods the ſhields which they held in their hands. They alſo ſung hymns in honor of the gods, particularly of Mars, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, and they were accompanied in the chorus by a certain number of virgins, habited like themſelves, and called Saliæ. The Salii inſtituted by Numa were called Palatini, in contradiſtinction from the others, becauſe they lived on mount Palatine, and offered their ſacrifices there. Thoſe that were added by Tullus were called Collini, Agonales, or Quirinales, from a mountain of the ſame name, where they had fixed their reſidence. Their name ſeems to have been derived a ſaliendo, or ſaltando, becauſe, during their feſtivals, it was particularly requiſite that they ſhould leap and dance. Their feaſts and entertainments were uncommonly rich and ſumptuous, whence dapes ſaliares is proverbially applied to ſuch repaſts as are moſt ſplendid and coſtly. It was uſual among the Romans when they declared war, for the Salii to ſhake their ſhields with great violence, as if to call upon the god Mars to come to their aſſiſtance. Liv. 1, c. 20.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 387.—Dionyſ. 3.—Flor. 1, c. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 285.——A nation of Germany who invaded Gaul, and were conquered by the emperor Julian. Amm. Mar. 17.

Salinator, a ſirname common to the family of the Livii, and others.

Salius, an Acarnanian at the games exhibited by Æneas in Sicily, and killed in the wars with Turnus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 298. l. 10, v. 753.

Crispus Sallustius, a Latin hiſtorian born at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines. He received his education at Rome, and made himſelf known as a public magiſtrate in the office of queſtor and conſul. His licentiouſneſs and the depravity of his manners, however, did not eſcape the cenſure of the age, and Salluſt was degraded from the dignity of a ſenator, B. C. 50. His amour with Fauſta, the daughter of Sylla, was a ſtrong proof of his debauchery; and Milo, the huſband, who diſcovered the adulterer in his houſe, revenged the violence offered to his bed by beating him with ſtripes, and ſelling him his liberty at a high price. A continuation of extravagance could not long be ſupported by the income of Salluſt, but he extricated himſelf from all difficulties by embracing the cauſe of Cæſar. He was reſtored to the rank of ſenator, and made governor of Numidia. In the adminiſtration of his province Salluſt behaved with unuſual tyranny; he enriched himſelf by plundering the Africans, and at his return to Rome he built himſelf a magnificent houſe, and bought gardens, which, from their delightful and pleaſant ſituation, ſtill preſerve the name of the gardens of Salluſt. He married Terentia, the divorced wife of Cicero; and from this circumſtance, according to ſome, aroſe an immortal hatred between the hiſtorian and the orator. Salluſt died in the 51ſt year of his age, 35 years before the Chriſtian era. As a writer he is peculiarly diſtinguiſhed. He had compoſed a hiſtory of Rome, but nothing remains of it except a few fragments, and his only compoſitions extant are his hiſtory of Catiline's conſpiracy, and of the wars of Jugurtha, king of Numidia. In theſe celebrated works the author is greatly commended for his elegance, the vigor and animation of his ſentences; he every where diſplays a wonderful knowledge of the human heart, and paints with a maſterly hand the cauſes that gave riſe to the great events which he relates. No one was better acquainted with the vices that prevailed in the capital of Italy, and no one ſeems to have been more ſevere againſt the follies of the age, and the failings of which he himſelf was guilty in the eyes of the world. His deſcriptions are elegantly correct, and his harangues are nervous and animated, and well ſuiting the character and the different purſuits of the great men in whoſe mouth they are placed. The hiſtorian, however, is blamed for tedious and inſipid exordiums, which often diſguſt the reader without improving him; his affectation of old and obſolete words and phraſes is alſo cenſured, and particularly his unwarrantable partiality in ſome of his narrations. Though faithful in every other reſpect, he has not painted the character of Cicero with all the fidelity and accuracy which the reader claims from the hiſtorian; and in paſſing in ſilence over many actions which reflect the greateſt honor on the firſt huſband of Terentia, the rival of Cicero has diſgraced himſelf, and rendered his compoſitions leſs authentic. There are two orations or epiſtles to Cæſar, concerning the regulation of the ſtate, attributed to him, as alſo an oration againſt Cicero, whoſe authenticity ſome of the moderns have diſputed. The beſt editions of Salluſt, are thoſe of Haverkamp, 2 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1742; and of Edinburgh, 12mo. 1755. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Suet. de Gram. in Cæſ.—Martial 14, ep. 191.——A nephew of the hiſtorian, by whom he was adopted. He imitated the moderation of Mæcenas, and remained ſatisfied with the dignity of a Roman knight, when he could have made himſelf powerful by the favors of Auguſtus and Tiberius. He was very effeminate and luxurious. Horace dedicated 2, od. 2, to him. Tacit. Ann. 1.—Plin. 34, c.—— Secundus Promotus, a native of Gaul, very intimate with the emperor Julian. He is remarkable for his integrity, and the ſoundneſs of his counſels. Julian made him preſect of Gaul. There is alſo another Salluſt, called Secundus, whom ſome have improperly confounded with Promotus. Secundus was alſo one of Julian's favorites, and was made by him preſect of the eaſt. He conciliated the good graces of the Romans by the purity of his morals, his fondneſs for diſcipline, and his religious principles. After the death of the emperor Jovian, he was univerſally named by the officers of the Roman empire to ſucceed on the imperial throne; but he refuſed this great though dangerous honor, and pleaded infirmities of body and old age. The Romans wiſhed upon this to inveſt his ſon with the imperial purple, but Secundus oppoſed it, and obſerved that he was too young to ſupport the dignity.——A preſect of Rome in the reign of Valentinian.—— An officer in Britain.

SALMĂCIS, a fountain of Caria, near Halicarnaſſus, which rendered effeminate all thoſe who drank of its waters. It was there that Hermaphroditus changed his ſex, though he ſtill retained the characteriſtics of his own. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 285. l. 15, v. 319.—Hygin. fab. 271.

SALMANTICA, a town of Spain, now Salamanca.

SALMŌNE, a town of Elis in Peloponneſus, with a fountain, from which the Enipeus takes its ſource, and falls into the Alpheus, about 40 ſtadia from Olympia, which on account of that is called Salmonis. Ovid. 3. amor. el. 6, v. 43.——A promontory at the eaſt of Crete. Dionyſ. 5.

SALMONEUS, a king of Elis, ſon of Æolus and Enarete, who married Alcidice, by whom he had Tyro. He wiſhed to be called a god, and to receive divine honors from his ſubjects; therefore, to imitate the thunder, he uſed to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darted burning torches on every ſide, as if to imitate the lightening. This impiety provoked Jupiter.. Salmoneus was ſtruck with a thunderbolt, and placed in the infernal regions near his brother Siſyphus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 235.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 60.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 585.

SALMŌNIS, a name given to Olympia. Vid. Salmone.

SALMUS, (untis,) a town of Aſia near the Red Sea, where Alexander ſaw a theatrical repreſentation. Diod. 17.

SALMYDESSUS, a bay on the Euxine ſea.

SALO, now Xalon, a river in Spain, falling into the Iberus. Mart. 10, ep. 20.

SALODURUM, now Soleure, a town of the Helvetii.

SALŌME, a queen of Judæa. This name was common to ſome of the princeſſes in the family of Herod, &c.

SALON, a country of Bithynia.

SĂLŌNA, or SALŌNÆ, a town of Dalmatia, about 10 miles diſtant from the coaſt of the Adriatic. It was the native place of the emperor Dioclefian, and he retired there to enjoy peace and tranquillity, after he had abdicated the imperial purple, and built a ſtately palace, the ruins of which were ſtill ſeen in the 16th century. A ſmall village of the ſame name preſerves the traces of its fallen grandeur. Near is Spalatro. Lucan. 4, v. 404.—Cæſ. bell. civ. 9 —Mela. 2, c. 3.

SALONĪNA, a celebrated matron who married the emperor Gallienus, and diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her private as well as public virtues. She was the patroneſs of all the fine arts, and to her clemency, mildneſs, and benevolence, Rome was indebted ſome time for her peace and proſperity. She accompanied her huſband in ſome of his expeditions, and often called him him away from the purſuits of pleaſure to make war againſt the enemies of Rome. She was put to death by the hands of the conſpirators, who alſo aſſaſſinated her huſband and family, about the year 268 of the Chriſtian era.

SALONĪNUS, a ſon of Aſinius Pollio. He received his name from the conqueſt of Salonæ by his father. Some ſuppoſe that he is the hero of Virgil's fourth eclogue, in which the return of the golden age is ſo warmly and beautifully anticipated.

SALONĪNUS, P. Licinius Cornelius, a ſon of Gallienus, by Salonina, ſent into Gaul, there to be taught the art of war. He remained there ſome time, till the uſurper Poſthumius aroſe, and proclaimed himſelf emperor. Saloninus was upon this delivered up to his enemy, and put to death in the 10th year of his age.

SALONIUS, a friend of Cato the cenſor. The daughter of Cenſorius married Salonius in his old age. Plut.——A tribune and centurion of the Roman army hated by the populace for his ſtrictneſs.

SALPIS, a colony of Etruria, whoſe inhabitants are called Salpinates. Liv. 5, c. 31.

SALSUM, a river in Spain. Cæſ.

SALVIAN, one of the fathers of the 5th century, of whoſe works the beſt edition, is the 12mo. Paris 1684.

SALVIDIĒNUS, an officer in the army of Auguſtus. He was betrayed by Antony, and put to death.——A Latin writer in the age of the emperor Probus.

SALVIUS, a flute player ſaluted king by the rebellious ſlaves of Sicily in the age of Marius. He maintained for ſome time war againſt the Romans.——A nephew of the emperor Otho.——A friend of Pompey.——A man put to death by Domitian.——A freedman of Atticus. Cic. ad Div. 9, c. 11.——Another of the ſon of Hortenſius. Id.

SALYES, a people of Gaul on the Rhone. Liv. 5, c. 34 & 35. l. 21, c. 26.

SAMĂRA, a river of Gaul, now called the Somme.

SAMARIA, a city and country of Paleſtine, famous in ſacred hiſtory. The inhabitants, called Samaritans, were compoſed of Heathens and rebellious Jews, and on having a temple built there after the form of that of Jeruſalem, a laſting enmity aroſe between the people of Judæa and of Samaria, ſo that no intercourſe took place between the two countries, and the name of Samaritan became a word of reproach, and as if it were a curſe.

SAMAROBRIVA, a town of Gaul, now Amiens in Picardy.

SAMBŪLOS, a mountain near Meſopotamia, where Hercules was worſhipped. Tacit. A. 12, c. 13.

SAMBUS, an Indian king defeated by Alexander. Diod. 17.——A river of India.

SAME, or SAMOS, a ſmall iſland in the Ionian ſea near Ithaca, called alſo Cephallenia. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 271.

SAMIA, a daughter of the river Mæander. Pauſ. 7, c. 4.——A ſirname of Juno, becauſe ſhe was worſhipped at Samos.

SAMNĪTÆ, or AMNITÆ, a people of Gaul.

SAMNĪTES, a people of Italy, who inhabited the country ſituate between Picenum, Campania, Apulia, and antient Latium. They diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their implacable hatred againſt the Romans, in the firſt ages of that empire, till they were at laſt totally extirpated, B. C. 272, after a war of 71 years. Their chief town was called Samnium or Samnis. Liv. 7, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 16, &c. l. 3, c. 18.—Strab. 5.—Lucan. 2.—Eutrop. 2.

SAMNIUM, a town and port of Italy inhabited by the Samnites. Vid. Samnites.

SAMOCHONITES, a ſmall lake of Paleſtine.

SAMONIUM, a promontory of Crete.

SAMOS, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, on the coaſt of Aſia Minor, from which it is divided by a narrow ſtreight, with a capital of the ſame name, built B. C. 986. It is about 87 miles in circumference, and is famous for the birth of Pythagoras. It has been antiently called Parthenia, Anthemuſa, Stephane, Melamphyllus, Anthemus, Cypariſſia, and Dryuſa. It was firſt in the poſſeſſion of the Leleges, and afterwards of the Ionians. The people of Samos were at firſt governed by kings, and afterwards the form of their government became democratical and oligarchical. Samos was in its moſt floriſhing ſituation under Polycrates, who had made himſelf abſolute there. The Samians aſſiſted the Grecks againſt the Perſians when Xerxes invaded Europe, and were reduced under the power of Athens, after a revolt, by Pericles, B. C. 441. They were afterwards ſubdued by Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and were reſtored to their antient liberty by Auguſtus. Under Veſpaſian, Samos became a Roman province. Juno was held in the greateſt veneration there, her temple was uncommonly magnificent, and it was even ſaid that the goddeſs had been born there, on the banks of the Imbraſus. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 7, c. 2 & 4.—Plut. in Par.—Plin. 5, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 20.—Thucyd.——The iſlands of Samothrace and Cephallenia were alſo known by the name of Samos.

SAMOSĂTA,

SAMOSĂTA, a town of Syria, near the Euphrates, below mount Taurus, where Lucian was born.

SAMOTHRĀCE, or SAMOTHRĀCIA, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, oppoſite the mouth of the Hebrus, on the coaſt of Thrace, from which it is diſtant about 32 miles. It was known by the ancient names of Leucoſia, Melitis, Electria, Leucania, and Dardania. It was afterwards called Samos, and diſtinguiſhed from the Samos which lies on the coaſt of Ionia, by the epithet of Thracian, or by the name of Samothrace. It is about 38 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or only 20 according to modern travellers. The origin of the firſt inhabitants of Samothrace is unknown. Some, however, ſuppoſe that they were Thracians, and that the place was afterwards peopled by the colonies of the Pelaſgians, Samians, and Phœnicians. Samothrace is famous for a deluge which inundated the country, and reached the very top of the higheſt mountains. This inundation, which happened before the age of the Argonauts, was owing to the ſudden overflow of the waters of the Euxine, which the ancients conſidered merely as a lake. The Samothracians were very religious; and as all myſteries were ſuppoſed to have taken their origin there, the iſland received the ſirname of ſacred, and was a ſafe and inviolable aſylum to all fugitives and criminals. The iſland was originally governed by kings, but afterwards the government became democratical. It enjoyed all its rights and immunities under the Romans till the reign of Veſpaſian, who reduced it with the reſt of the iſlands in the Ægean into the form of a province. Plin. 412.—Strab. 10.—Herodot. 7, c. 108, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 208.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 7, c. 4.

SAMUS, a ſon of Ancæus and Samia, grandſon of Neptune. Pauſ. 7, c. 4.

SANA, a town of mount Athos, near which Xerxes began to make a channel to convey the ſea.

SANAOS, a town of Phrygia. Strab.

SANCHONIĂTHON, a Phœnician hiſtorian born at Berytus, or, according to others, at Tyre. He floriſhed a few years before the Trojan war, and wrote, in the language of his country, an hiſtory in nine books, in which he amply treated of the theology and antiquities of Phœnicia, and the neighbouring places. It was compiled from the various records found in cities and the annals which were uſually kept in the temples of the gods among the antients. This hiſtory was tranſlated into Greek by Philo, a native of Byblus, who lived in the reign of the emperor Adrian. Some few fragments of this Greek tranſlation are extant. Some however ſuppoſe them to be ſpurious, while others contend that they are true and authentic.

SANCUS, SANGUS, or SANCTUS, a deity of the Sabines introduced among the gods of Rome under the name of Dius Fidius. According to ſome, Sancus was father to Sabus, or Sabinus, the firſt king of the Sabines. Ital. 8, v. 421.—Varro de L. L. 4.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 213.

SANDACE, a ſiſter of Xerxes.

SANDALIOTIS, a name given to Sardinia from its reſemblance to a ſandal. Plin. 3, c. 7.

SANDALIUM, a ſmall iſland of the Ægean, near Leſbos.——A port of Piſidia. Strab.

SANDANIS, a Lydian who adviſed Crœſus not to make war againſt the Perſians.

SANDANUS, a river of Thrace, near Pallene.

SANDROCOTTUS, an Indian of a mean origin. His impertinence to Alexander was the beginning of his greatneſs; the conqueror ordered him to be ſeized, but Sandrocottus fled away, and at laſt down overwhelmed with fatigue. As he ſlept on the ground a lion came to him and gently licked the ſweat from his face. This uncommon tameneſs of the animal appeared ſupernatural to Sandrocottus, and raiſed his ambition. He aſpired to the monarchy, and after the death of Alexander he made himſelf maſter of a part of the country which was in the hands of Seleucus. Juſtin. 15, c. 4.

SANE, a town of Macedonia.

SANGĂLA, a town of India deſtroyed by Alexander. Arrian. 5.

SANGĂRIUS, or SANGĂRIS, a river of Phrygia, riſing in mount Dindymus and falling into the Euxine. The daughter of the Sangarius became pregnant of Attes only from gathering the boughs of an almond tree on the banks of the river. Hecuba, according to ſome, was daughter of this river. Some of the poets call it Sagaris. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 10.—Claudian. in Eutrop. 2.—Pauſ. 7.

SANGUINIUS, a man condemned for ill language, &c. Tacit. An. 6, c. 7.

SANNYRION, a tragic poet of Athens. He compoſed many dramatical pieces, one of which was called Io, and another Danae. Athen. 9.

SANTŎNES, & SANTŎNÆ, now Saintonge, a people with a town of the ſame name in Gaul. Lucan. 1, v. 422.—Martial. 3, ep. 96.

SAON, an hiſtorian. Dion. Hal.——A man man who first discovered the oracle of Trophonius.

Sapirene, an island of the Arabic gulph. Plin. 6, c. 29.

Sapis, now Savio, a river of Gaul Cispadana, falling into the Adriatic. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

Sapor, a king of Persia who succeeded his father Artaxerxes about the 238th year of the Christian era. Naturally fierce and ambitious, Sapor wished to encrease his paternal dominions by conquest; and as the indolence of the emperors of Rome seemed favorable to his views, he laid waste the provinces of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia; and he might have become master of all Asia, if Odenatus had not stopped his progress. If Gordian attempted to repel him, his efforts were weak, and Philip, who succeeded him on the imperial throne, bought the peace of Sapor with money. Valerian, who was afterwards invested with the purple, marched against the Persian monarch, but he was defeated and taken prisoner. Odenatus no sooner heard that the Roman emperor was a captive in the hands of Sapor, than he attempted to release him by force of arms. The forces of Persia were cut to pieces, the wives and the treasures of the monarch fell into the hands of the conqueror, and Odenatus penetrated, with little opposition, into the very heart of the kingdom. Sapor, soon after this defeat, was assassinated by his subjects, A. D. 273, after a reign of 32 years. He was succeeded by his son called Hormisdas. Marcellin, &c.——The 2d of that name succeeded his father Hormisdas on the throne of Persia. He was as great as his ancestor of the same name; and by undertaking a war against the Romans, he attempted to enlarge his dominions, and to add the provinces on the west of the Euphrates to his empire. His victories alarmed the Roman emperors, and Julian would have perhaps seized him in the capital of his dominions, if he had not received a mortal wound. Jovian, who succeeded Julian, made peace with Sapor; but the monarch, always restless and indefatigable, renewed hostilities, invaded Armenia, and defeated the emperor Valens. Sapor died A. D. 380, after a reign of 70 years, in which he had often been the sport of fortune. He was succeeded by Artaxerxes, and Artaxerxes by Sapor the third, a prince who died after a reign of five years, A. D. 389, in the age of Theodosius the Great. Marcellin, &c.

Sappho, or Sapho, celebrated for her beauty, her poetical talents, and her amorous disposition, was born in the island of Lesbos, about 600 years before Christ. Her father's name, according to Herodotus, was Scamandronymus, or, according to others, Symon, or Semus, or Etarchus, and her mother's name was Cleis. Her tender passions were so violent, that some have represented her attachment with three of her female companions, Telesiphe, Athis, and Megara, as criminal, and, on that account, have given her the firname of Tribas. She conceived such a passion for Phaon, a youth of Mitylene, that upon his refusal to gratify her desires, she threw herself into the sea from mount Leucas. She had composed nine books in lyric verses, besides epigrams, elegies, &c. Of all these compositions, nothing now remains but two fragments, whose uncommon sweetness and elegance show how meritoriously the praises of the antients have been bestowed upon a poetess who for the sublimity of her genius was called the tenth Muse. Her compositions were all extant in the age of Horace. The Lesbians were so sensible of the merit of Sappho, that after her death they paid her divine honors, and raised her temples and altars, and stamped their money with her image. The poetess has been censured for writing with that licentiousness and freedom which so much disgraced her character as a woman. The Sapphic verse has been called after her name. *Ovid. Saptine, a daughter of Darius, the last king of Persia, offered in marriage to Alexander.

Saracene, part of Arabia Petræa, the country of the Saracens who embraced the religion of Mahomet.

Saracori, a people who go to war riding on asses. Ælian. V. H. 12.

Sarangæ, a people near Caucasus. Plin. 6, c. 16.

Saranges, a river of India, falling into the Hydraotes, and thence into the Indus.

Sarapāni, a people of Colchis. Strab.

Sarapus, a firname of Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece.

Saraspades, a son of Phraates king of Parthia, sent as an hostage to Augustus, &c. Strab.

Saravus, now the Soar, a river of Belgium falling into the Moselle.

Sardanapālus, the 40th and last king of Assyria, celebrated for his luxury and voluptuousness. The greatest part of his time time was ſpent in the company of his eunuchs, and the monarch generally appeared in the midſt of his concubines diſguiſed in the habit of a female, and ſpinning wool for his amuſement. This effeminacy irritated his officers; Beleſis and Arſaces conſpired againſt him, and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. Sardanapalus quitted his voluptuouſneſs for a while, and appeared at the head of his armies. The rebels were defeated in three ſucceſſive battles; but at laſt Sardanapalus was beaten and beſieged in the city of Ninus for two years. When he deſpaired of ſucceſs, he burned himſelf in his palace, with his eunuchs, concubines, and all his treaſures, and the empire of Aſſyria was divided among the conſpirators. This famous event happened B. C. 820, according to Euſebius; though Juſtin and others, with leſs probability, place it 80 years earlier. Sardanapalus was made a god after death. Herodot. 2, c. 150.—Diod. 2.—Strab. 14.—Cic. Tuſc. 5, c. 35.

SARDI, the inhabitants of Sardinia. Vid. Sardinia.

SARDES. Vid. Sardis.

SARDĬNIA, the greateſt iſland in the Mediterranean after Sicily, is ſituate between Italy and Africa, at the ſouth of Corſica. It was originally called Sandaliotis or Ichnuſa, from its reſembling the human foot, (ΙΧΝΟΣ) and it received the name of Sardinia from Sardus, a ſon of Hercules, who ſettled there with a colony which he had brought with him from Libya. Other colonies, under Ariſtæus, Norax, and Iolas, alſo ſettled there. The Carthaginians were long maſters of it, and were diſpoſſeſſed by the Romans in the Punic wars, B. C. 231. Some call it, with Sicily, one of the granaries of Rome. The air was very unwholeſome though the ſoil was fertile. Neither wolves nor ſerpents are found in Sardinia, nor any poiſonous herb, except one, which, when eaten, contracts the nerves, and is attended with a paroxyſm of laughter, the forerunner of death, hence riſus Sardonicus, or Sardous. *Cic. SARDICA, a town of Thrace.

SARDIS, or SARDES, now Sart, a town of Aſia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Lydia, ſituate at the foot of mount Tmolus, on the banks of the Pactolus. It is celebrated for the many ſieges it ſuſtained againſt the Cimmerians, Perſians, Medes, Macedonians, Ionians, and Athenians, and for the battle in which, B. C. 262, Antiochus Soter was defeated by Eumenes, king of Pergamus. It was deſtroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who ordered it to be rebuilt. It fell into the hands of Cyrus, B. C. 548, and was burnt by the Athenians, B. C. 504, which became the cauſe of the invaſion of Attica by Darius. Plut. in Alex.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 137, 152, &c.—Strab. 13.—Herodot. 1, c. 7, &c.

SARDONES, the people of Rouſſilon in France, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Plin. 3, c. 4.

SARDUS, a ſon of Hercules, who led a colony to Sardinia, and gave it his name.

SAREPHTA, a town of Phœnicia between Tyre and Sidon, now Sarfand.

SARIASTER, a ſon of Tigranes, king of Armenia, who conſpired againſt his father, &c. Val. Max. 9, c. 11.

SARIPHI, mountains at the eaſt of the Caſpian.

SARMĂTIA, an extenſive country at the north of Europe and Aſia, divided into European and Aſiatic. The European was bounded by the ocean on the north, Germany and the Viſtula on the weſt, the Jazygæ on the ſouth, and Tanais on the eaſt. The Aſiatic was bounded by Hyrcania, the Tanais, and the Euxine ſea. The former contained the modern kingdoms of Ruſſia, Poland, Lithuania, and Little Tartary; and the latter, Great Tartary, Circaſſia, and the neighbouring country. The Sarmatians were a ſavage uncivilized nation, often confounded with the Scythians, naturally warlike, and famous for painting their bodies to appear more terrible in the field of battle. They were well known for their lewdneſs, and they paſſed among the Greeks and Latins by the name of Barbarians. In the time of the emperors they became very powerful, they diſturbed the peace of Rome by their frequent incurſions; till at laſt, encreaſed by the ſavage hordes of Scythia, under the barbarous names of Huns, Vandals, Goths, Alans, &c. they ſucceſsfully invaded and ruined the empire in the 3d and 4th centuries of the Chriſtian era. They generally lived on the mountains without any habitation, except their chariots, whence they have been called Hamaxobii; they lived upon plunder, and fed upon milk mixed with the blood of horſes. Strab. 7, &c.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 2.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 1, &c.—Juv. 2.—*Ovid. SARMATĬCUM MARE, a name given to the Euxine ſea, becauſe on the coaſt of Sarmatia. Ovid. 4, ex Pont. ep. 10, v. 38.

SARMENTUS, a ſcurrilous perſon, mentioned by Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 56.

SARNIUS,

SARNUS, a river of Aſia, near Hyrcania.

SARNUS, a river of Picenum, dividing it from Campania, and falling into the Tuſcan ſea. Stat. 1, Sylv. 2, v. 265.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 738.—Strab. 5.

SARON, a king of Trœzene, unuſually fond of hunting. He was drowned in the ſea, where he had ſwum for ſome miles in purſuit of a ſtag. He was made a ſea god by Neptune, and divine honors were paid to him by the Trœzenians. It was cuſtomary for ſailors to offer him ſacrifices before they embarked. That part of the ſea where he was drowned, was called Saronicus ſinus, on the coaſt of Achaia near the Iſthmus of Corinth. Saron built a temple to Juno at Trœzene, and inſtituted feſtivals to her honor, called from himſelf Saronia. Pauſ. 2, c. 30.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Strab. 8.

SARONĬCUS SINUS, now the gulph of Engia, a bay of the Ægean ſea, lying at the ſouth of Attica, and on the north of the Peloponneſus. The entrance into it is between the promontory of Sunium and that of Scylla. Some ſuppoſe that this part of the ſea received its name from Saron, who was drowned there, or from a ſmall river which diſcharged itſelf on the coaſt, or from a ſmall harbour of the ſame name. The Saronic bay is about 62 miles in circumference, 23 miles in its broadeſt, and 25 in its longeſt part, according to modern calculation.

SARPĒDON, a ſon of Jupiter by Europa, the daughter of Agenor. He baniſhed himſelf from Crete, after he had in vain attempted to make himſelf king in preference to his elder brother Minos, and he retired to Caria, where he built the town of Miletus. He went to the Trojan war to aſſiſt Priam againſt the Greeks, where he was attended by his friend and companion Glaucus. He was at laſt killed by Patroclus, after he had made a great ſlaughter of the enemy. According to ſome mythologiſts, the brother of king Minos, and the prince who aſſiſted Priam, were two different perſons. This laſt was king of Lycia, and ſon of Jupiter, by Laodamia, the daughter of Bellerophon, and lived about a hundred years after the age of the ſon of Europa. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 12.—Homer. Il. 16.——A ſon of Neptune killed by Hercules.——A learned preceptor of Cato of Utica. Plut. in Cat.——A town of Cilicia, famous for a temple ſacred to Apollo and Diana.——Alſo a promontory of the ſame name in Cilicia, beyond which Antiochus was not permitted to ſail by a treaty of peace which he had made with the Romans. Liv. 38, c. 38.—Mela. 1, c. 13.——A promontory of Thrace.——A Syrian general who floriſhed B. C. 143.

SARRA, a town of Phœnicia, the ſame as Tyre. It receives this name from a ſmall ſhell-fiſh of the ſame name, which was found in the neighbourhood, and with whoſe blood garments were dyed. Hence came the epithet of ſarranus, ſo often applied to Tyrian colors, as well as to the inhabitants of the colonies of the Tyrians, particularly Carthage. Sil. 6, v. 662. l. 15, v. 205.—Virg. G. 2, v. 506.

SARRASTES, a people of Campania on the Sarnus, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 738.

SARRON, a king of the Celtæ, ſo famous for his learning, that from him philoſophers were called Sarronidæ. Diod. 6, c. 9.

SARS, a town of Spain, near cape Finiſterre.

SATUREIUM, or SATUREUM, a town of Calabria, near Tarentum, with famous paſtures and horſes, whence the epithet of ſatureianus in Horat. 1, Sat. 6.

SATUREIUS, one of Domitian's murderers.

SATURNĀLIA, feſtivals in honor of Saturn, celebrated the 16th or the 17th, or, according to others, the 18th of December. They were inſtituted long before the foundation of Rome, in commemoration of the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden reign of Saturn. Some however ſuppoſe, that the Saturnalia were firſt obſerved at Rome in the reign of Tullus Hoſtilius, after a victory obtained over the Sabines; while others ſupport, that Janus firſt inſtituted them in gratitude to Saturn, from whom he had learnt agriculture. Others ſuppoſe, that they were firſt celebrated in the year of Rome 257, after a victory obtained over the Latins by the dictator Poſthumius. The Saturnalia were originally celebrated only for one day, but afterwards the ſolemnity continued for 3, 4, 5, and at laſt for 7 days. The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which univerſally prevailed. The ſlaves were permitted to ridicule their maſters, and to ſpeak with freedom upon every ſubject. It was uſual for friends to make preſents one to another, all animoſity ceaſed, no criminals were executed, ſchools were ſhut, war was never declared, but all was mirth, riot, and debauchery. In the ſacrifices the prieſts made their offerings with their heads uncovered, a cuſtom which was never obſerved at other feſtivals. Senec. ep. 18.—Cato de R. R.—Sueton. in Veſp. 19.—Cic. ad Attic. &c.

SATURNIA, a name given to Italy, becauſe Saturn had reigned there during the golden age. Virg. G. 2, v. 173.——A name given to Juno, as being the daughter of Saturn. Virg. G. 2, v. 173, Æn. 3, v. 380.——An antient town of Italy, ſuppoſed to be built by Saturn, on the Tarpeian rock. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 358.——A colony of Etruria. Liv. 39, c. 55.

SATURNĪNUS, P. Sempronius, a general of Valerian, proclaimed emperor in Egypt by his troops after he had rendered himſelf celebrated by his victories over the barbarians. His integrity, his complaiſance and affability, had gained him the affection of the people, but his fondneſs of antient diſcipline provoked his ſoldiers, who wantonly murdered him in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 262.——Sextus Julius, a Gaul, intimate with Aurelian. The emperor eſteemed him greatly, not only for his private virtues, but for his abilities as a general, and for the victories which he had obtained in different parts of the empire. He was ſaluted emperor at Alexandria, and compelled by the clamorous army to accept of the purple, which he rejected with diſdain and horror. Probus, who was then emperor, marched his forces againſt him, and beſieged him in Apamea, where he deſtroyed himſelf when unable to make head againſt his powerful adverſary.—— Appuleius, a tribune of the people, who raiſed a ſedition at Rome, intimidated the ſenate, and tyrannized for three years. Meeting at laſt with oppoſition, he ſeized the capitol, but being induced by the hopes of a reconciliation to truſt himſelf amidſt the people, he was ſuddenly torn to pieces. His ſedition has received the name of Appuleiana in the Roman annals. Flor.—— Lucius, a ſeditious tribune, who ſupported the oppreſſion of Marius. He was at laſt put to death on account of his tumultuous diſpoſition. Plut.—— An officer in the court of Theodoſius, murdered for obeying the emperor's orders, &c.——Pompeius, a writer in the reign of Trajan. He was greatly eſteemed by Pliny, who ſpeaks of him with great warmth and approbation, as an hiſtorian, a poet, and an orator. Pliny always conſulted the opinion of Saturninus before he publiſhed his compoſitions.——Sentius, a friend of Auguſtus and Tiberius. He ſucceeded Agrippa in the government of the provinces of Syria and Phœnicia. —— Vitellius, an officer among the friends of the emperor Otho.

SATURNIUS, a name given to Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune, as being the ſons of Saturn.

SĀTURNUS, a ſon of Cœlus, or Uranus, by Terra, called alſo Titea, Thea, or Titheia. He was naturally artful, and by means of his mother, he revenged himſelf on his father, whoſe cruelty to his children had provoked the anger of Thea. The mother armed her ſon with a ſcythe, which was fabricated with the metals drawn from her bowels, and as Cœlus was going to unite himſelf to Thea, Saturn mutilated him, and for ever prevented him from encreaſing the number of his children, whom he treated with unkindneſs, and confined in the infernal regions. After this the ſons of Cœlus were reſtored to liberty, and Saturn obtained his father's kingdom by the conſent of his brother, provided he did not bring up any male children. Purſuant to this agreement, Saturn always devoured his ſons as ſoon as born, becauſe, as ſome obſerve, he dreaded from them a retaliation of his unkindneſs to his father, till his wife Rhea, unwilling to ſee her children periſh, concealed from her huſband the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, and inſtead of the children, ſhe gave him large ſtones, which he immediately ſwallowed without perceiving the deceit. Titan was ſome time after informed that Saturn had concealed his male children, therefore he made war againſt him, dethroned and impriſoned him with Rhea; and Jupiter, who was ſecretly educated in Crete, was no ſooner grown up, than he flew to deliver his father, and to replace him on his throne. Saturn, unmindful of his ſon's kindneſs, conſpired againſt him, when he heard that he raiſed cabals againſt him, but Jupiter baniſhed him from his throne, and the father fled for ſafety into Italy, where the country retained the name of Latium, as being the place of his concealment (latet). Janus, who was then king of Italy, received Saturn with marks of attention, he made him his partner on the throne; and the king of heaven employed himſelf in civilizing the barbarous manners of the people of Italy, and in teaching them agriculture and the uſeful and liberal arts. His reign there was ſo mild and popular, ſo beneficent and virtuous, that mankind have called it the golden age, to intimate the happineſs and tranquillity which the earth then enjoyed. Saturn was father of Chiron the centaur by Philyra, whom he had changed into a mare, to avoid the importunities of Rhea. The worſhip of Saturn was not ſo ſolemn or ſo univerſal as that of Jupiter. It was uſual to offer human victims on his altars, but this barbarous cuſtom was aboliſhed by Hercules, who ſubſtituted ſmall images of clay. In the ſacrifices of Saturn, the prieſt always performed the ceremony with his head uncovered, which was unuſual at other ſolemnities. The god is generally repreſented as an old man bent through age and infirmity. He holds a ſcythe in his right hand, with a ſerpent which bites its own tail, which is an emblem of time and of the revolution of the year. In his left hand he holds a child, which he raiſes up as if inſtantly to devour it. Tatius, king of the Sabines, firſt built a temple to Saturn on the Capitoline hill, a ſecond was afterwards added by Tullus Hoſtilius, and a third by the firſt conſuls. On his ſtatues were generally hung fetters in commemoration of the chains he had worn when impriſoned by Jupiter. From this circumſtance, all ſlaves that obtained their liberty, generally dedicated their fetters to him. During the celebration of the Saturnalia, the chains were taken from the ſtatues to intimate the freedom and the independence which mankind enjoyed during the golden age. One of his temples at Rome was appropriated for the public treaſury, and it was there alſo that the names of foreign ambaſſadors were enrolled. Heſiod. Theog. —Apolloд. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. SATŬRUM, a town of Calabria, where ſtuffs of all kinds were dyed in different colors with great ſucceſs. Virg. G. 2, v. 197.

SĂTŸRI, demigods of the country, whoſe origin is unknown. They are repreſented like men, but with the feet and the legs of goats, ſhort horns on the head, and the whole body covered with thick hair. They chiefly attended upon Bacchus, and rendered themſelves known in his orgies by their riot and laſciviouſneſs. The firſt fruits of every thing were generally offered to them. The Romans promiſcuouſly called them Fauni, Panes, and Sylvani. It is ſaid that a Satyr was brought to Sylla, as that general returned from Theſſaly. The monſter had been ſurpriſed aſleep in a cave; but his voice was inarticulate when brought into the preſence of the Roman general, and Sylla was ſo diſguſted with it, that he ordered it to be inſtantly removed. This monſter anſwered in every degree the deſcription which the poets and painters have given of the Satyrs. Pauſ. 1, c. 23.—Plut. in Syll.—Virg. Ecl. 5, v. 13.—Ovid. Heroid. 4, v. 171.

SCAMANDER, or SCAMANDROS, a celebrated river of Troas, riſing at the eaſt of mount Ida, and falling into the ſea below Sigæum. It receives the Simois in its courſe, and towards its mouth it is very muddy, and flows through marſhes. This river, according to Homer, was called Xanthus by the gods, and Scamander by men. The waters of the Scamander had the ſingular property of giving a beautiful color to the hair or the wool of ſuch animals as bathed in them; and from this circumſtance the three goddeſſes, Minerva, Juno, and Venus, bathed there before they appeared before Paris, to obtain the golden apple. It was uſual among all the virgins of Troas to bathe in the Scamander, when they were arrived to nubile years, and to offer to the god their virginity in theſe words, Λαβε μευ, Σκαμανδρε, την παρθενιαν. The god of the Scamander had a regular prieſt, and ſacrifices offered to him. Some ſuppoſe that the river received its name from Scamander, the ſon of Corybas. *Ælian. SCATINIA LEX de pudicitiâ, by C. Scatinius Aricinus, the tribune, was enacted againſt thoſe who kept catamites, and ſuch as proſtituted themſelves to any vile or unnatural ſervice. The penalty was originally a fine, but it was afterwards made a capital crime under Auguſtus. It is ſometimes called Scantinia from a certain Scantinius upon whom it was firſt executed.

SCAURUS, (M. Æmilius) a Roman con-

ſul, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence at the bar, and by his ſucceſſes in Spain, in the capacity of commander. He was ſent againſt Jugurtha, and ſome time after accuſed of ſuffering himſelf to be bribed by the Numidian prince. Scaurus conquered the Ligurians, and in his cenſorſhip he built the Milvian bridge at Rome, and began to pave the road, which from him was called the Æmylian. He was originally very poor. He wrote ſome books, and among theſe an hiſtory of his own life, all now loſt. His ſon, of the ſame name, made himſelf known by the large theatre he built during his edileſhip. This theatre, which could contain 30,000 ſpectators, was ſupported by 360 columns of marble, 38 feet in height, and adorned with 3000 brazen ſtatues. This celebrated edifice, according to Pliny, proved more fatal to the manners and the ſimplicity of the Romans, than the proſcriptions and wars of Sylla had done to the inhabitants of the city. Scaurus married Murcia. Cic. in Brut.—Val. Max. 4, c. 4.—Plin. 34, c. 7. l. 36, c. 2.——A Roman of conſular dignity. When the Cimbri invaded Italy, the ſon of Scaurus behaved with great cowardice, upon which the father ſternly ordered him never to appear again in the field of battle. Scipio, a celebrated family at Rome who obtained the greateſt honors in the republic. The name ſeems to be derived from Scipio, which ſignifies a ſtick, becauſe one of the family had conducted his blind father, and had been to him as a ſtick. The Scipio's were a branch of the Cornelian family. The moſt illuſtrious were—P. Corn. a man made maſter of horſe by Camillus, &c.——A Roman dictator.——L. Cornel. a conſul A. U. C. 454, who defeated the Etrurians near Volaterra.——Another conſul A. U. C. 493.——Cn. ſirnamed Aſina, was conſul A. U. C. 492 & 498. He was conquered in his firſt conſulſhip in a naval battle, and loſt 17 ſhips. The following year he took Aleria, in Corſica, and defeated Hanno, the Carthaginian general, in Sardinia. He alſo took 200 of the enemy's ſhips, and the city of Panormum, in Sicily. He was father to Publius and Cneus Scipio. Publius, in the beginning of the ſecond Punic war, was ſent with an army to Spain to oppoſe Annibal; but when he heard that his enemy had paſſed over into Italy, he attempted by his quick marches and ſecret evolutions to ſtop his progreſs. He was conquered by Annibal near the Ticinus, where he nearly loſt his life, had not his ſon, who was afterwards ſirnamed Africanus, courageouſly defended him. He again paſſed into Spain, where he obtained ſome memorable victories over the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants of the country. His brother Cneus ſhared the ſupreme command with him, but their great confidence proved their ruin. They ſeparated their armies, and ſoon after Publius was furiouſly attacked by the two Aſdrubals and Mago, who commanded the Carthaginian armies. The forces of Publius were too few to reſiſt with ſucceſs the three Carthaginian generals. The Romans were cut to pieces, and their commander was left on the field of battle. No ſooner had the enemy obtained this victory than they immediately marched to meet Cneus Scipio, whom the revolt of 30,000 Celtiberians had weakened and alarmed. The general, who was already apprized of his brother's death, ſecured an eminence, where he was ſoon ſurrounded on all ſides. After deſperate acts of valor he was left among the ſlain, or, according to ſome, he fled into a tower, where he was burnt with ſome of his friends by the victorious enemy. Liv. 21, &c.—Polyb. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 6, &c.—Eutrop. 3, c. 8, &c.——Publius Cornelius, ſirnamed Africanus, was ſon of Publius Scipio, who was killed in Spain. He firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Ticinus, where he ſaved his father's life by deeds of unexampled valor and boldneſs. The battle of Cannæ, which proved ſo fatal to the Roman arms, inſtead of diſheartening Scipio, raiſed his expectations, and he no ſooner heard that ſome of his deſperate countrymen wiſhed to abandon Italy, and to fly from the inſolence of the conqueror, than with his ſword in his hand, and by his firmneſs and example, he obliged them to ſwear eternal fidelity to Rome, and to put to immediate death the firſt man who attempted to retire from his country. In his 21ſt year, Scipio was made an edile, an honorable office which was never given but to ſuch as had reached their 27th year. Some time after, the Romans were alarmed by the intelligence that the commanders of their forces in Spain, Publius and Cneus Scipio, had been ſlaughtered, and immediately young Scipio was appointed to avenge the death of his father, and of his uncle, and to vindicate the military honor of the republic. It was ſoon known how able he was to be at the head of an army; the various nations of Spain were conquered, and in four years the Carthaginians were baniſhed from that part of the continent, the whole province became tributary to Rome; New Carthage ſubmitted in one day, and in a battle 54,000 of the enemy were left dead on the field. After theſe ſignal victories, Scipio was recalled to Rome, which ſtill trembled at the continual alarms of Annibal, who was at her gates. The conqueror of the Carthaginians in Spain was looked upon as a proper general to encounter Annibal in Italy; but Scipio oppoſed the meaſures which his countrymen wiſhed to purſue, and he declared in the ſenate, that if Annibal was to be conquered, he muſt be conquered in Africa. Theſe bold meaſures were immediately adopted, though oppoſed by the eloquence, age, and experience of the great Fabius, and Scipio was impowered to conduct the war on the coaſts of Africa. With the dignity of conſul he embarked for Carthage. Succeſs attended his arms, his conqueſts were here as rapid as in Spain; the Carthaginian armies were routed, the camp of the crafty Aſdrubal was ſet on fire during the night, and his troops totally defeated in a drawn battle. Theſe repeated loſſes alarmed Carthage; Annibal, who was victorious at the gates of Rome, was inſtantly recalled to defend the walls of his country, and the two greateſt generals of the age met each other in the field. Terms of accommodation were propoſed; but in the parley which the two commanders had together, nothing ſatisfactory was offered, and while the one enlarged on the viciſſitudes of human affairs, the other wiſhed to dictate like a conqueror, and recommended the deciſion of the controverſy to the ſword. This celebrated battle was fought near Zama, and both generals diſplayed their military knowledge in drawing up their armies and in chuſing their ground. Their courage and intrepidity were not leſs conſpicuous in charging the enemy; a thouſand acts of valor were performed on both ſides, and though the Carthaginians fought in their own defence, and the Romans for fame and glory, yet the conqueror of Italy was vanquiſhed. About 20,000 Carthaginians were ſlain, and the ſame number made priſoners of war, B. C. 202. Only 2,000 of the Romans were killed. This battle was deciſive; the Carthaginians ſued for peace, which Scipio at laſt granted on the moſt ſevere and humiliating terms. The conqueror after this returned to Rome, where he was received with the moſt unbounded applauſe, honored with a triumph, and dignified with the appellation of Africanus. Here he enjoyed for ſome time the tranquillity and the honors which his exploits merited, but in him alſo, as in other great men, fortune ſhewed herſelf inconſtant. Scipio offended the populace in wiſhing to diſtinguiſh the ſenators from the reſt of the people at the public exhibitions, and when he canvaſſed for the conſulſhip for two of his friends, he had the mortification to ſee his application ſlighted, and the honors which he claimed, beſtowed on a man of no character, and recommended by neither abilities nor meritorious actions. He retired from Rome no longer to be a ſpectator of the ingratitude of his countrymen, and in the capacity of lieutenant he accompanied his brother againſt Antiochus, king of Syria. In this expedition his arms were attended with uſual ſucceſs, and the Aſiatic monarch ſubmitted to the conditions which the conquerors dictated. At his return to Rome, Africanus found the malevolence of his enemies ſtill unabated. Cato, his inveterate rival, raiſed ſeditions againſt him, and the Petilii, two tribunes of the people, accuſed the conqueror of Annibal of extortion in the provinces of Aſia, and of living in an indolent and luxurious manner. Scipio condeſcended to anſwer to the accuſation of his calumniators; the firſt day was ſpent in hearing the different charges, but when he again appeared on the ſecond day of his trial, the accuſed interrupted his judges, and exclaimed, Tribunes and fellow citizens, on this day, this very day, did I conquer Annibal and the Carthaginians, come therefore with me, Romans; let us go to the capitol, and there return our thanks to the immortal gods for the victories which have attended our arms. Theſe words had the deſired effect, the tribes, and all the aſſembly followed Scipio, the court was deſerted, and the tribunes were left alone in the ſeat of judgment. Yet when this memorable day was paſt and forgotten, Africanus was a third time ſummoned to appear; but he had fled before the impending ſtorm, and retired to his country-houſe at Liternum. The accuſation was therefore ſtopped, and the accuſers ſilenced, when one of the tribunes, formerly diſtinguiſhed for his malevolence againſt Scipio, roſe to defend him, and declared in the aſſembly, that it reflected the higheſt diſgrace on the Roman people, that the conqueror of Annibal ſhould become the ſport of the populace, and be expoſed to the malice and envy of diſappointed ambition. Some time after Scipio died in the place of his retreat, about 184 years before Chriſt, in the 48th year of his age; and ſo great an averſion did he expreſs, as he expired, for the depravity of the Romans, and the ingratitude of their ſenators, that he ordered his bones not to be conveyed to Rome. They were accordingly inhumated at Liternum, where his wife Æmilia, the daughter of Paulus Æmilius, who fell at the battle of Cannæ, raiſed a mauſoleum on his tomb, and placed upon it his ſtatue, with that of the poet Ennius, who had been the companion of his peace and of his retirement. If Scipio was robbed during his life time of the honors which belonged to him as conqueror of Africa, he was not forgotten when dead. The Romans viewed his character with reverence; with raptures they read of his warlike actions, and Africanus was regarded in the following ages as a pattern of virtue, of innocence, courage, and liberality. As a general, the fame and the greatneſs of his conqueſts explain his character, and indeed we hear that Annibal declared himſelf inferior to no general that ever lived except Alexander the Great, and Pyrrhus king of Epirus; and when Scipio aſked him what rank he would claim if he had conquered him, the Carthaginian general anſwered, If I had conquered you, Scipio, I would call myſelf greater than the conqueror of Darius, and the ally of the Tarentines. As an inſtance of Scipio's continence, antient authors have faithfully recorded that the conqueror of Spain refuſed to ſee a beautiful princeſs that had fallen into his hands after the taking of New Carthage, and that he not only reſtored her inviolate to her parents, but alſo added immenſe preſents for the perſon to whom ſhe was betrothed. It was to the artful complaiſance of Africanus, that the Romans owed their alliance with Maſiniſſa, king of Numidia, and alſo that with king Scyphax. The friendſhip of

Scipio and Lælius is well known, Polyb. 6.—Plut.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Cic. in Brut. &c. —Eutrop.——Lucius Cornelius, firnamed Aſiaticus, accompanied his brother Africanus in his expeditions in Spain and Africa. He was rewarded with the conſulſhip, A. U. C. 562, for his ſervices to the ſtate, and he was empowered to attack Antiochus, king of Syria, who had declared war againſt the Romans. Lucius was accompanied in this campaign by his brother Africanus; and by his own valor, and the advice of the conqueror of Annibal, he ſoon routed the enemy, and in a battle near the city of Sardes he killed 50,000 foot and 4000 horſe. Peace was ſoon after ſettled by the ſubmiſſion of Antiochus, and the conqueror, at his return home, obtained a triumph, and the ſirname of Aſiaticus. He did not, however, long enjoy his proſperity; Cato, after the death of Africanus, turned his fury againſt Aſiaticus, and the two Petilii his devoted favorites, preſented a petition to the people, in which they prayed that an enquiry might be made to know what money had been received from Antiochus and from his allies. The petition was inſtantly received, and Aſiaticus, charged to have ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by Antiochus, was ſummoned to appear before the tribunal of Terentius Culeo, who was on this occaſion created prætor. The judge, who was an inveterate enemy to the family of the Scipio's, ſoon found Aſiaticus, with his two lieutenants and his quæſtor, guilty of having received, the firſt 6,000 pounds weight of gold, and 480 pounds weight of ſilver, and the others nearly an equal ſum, from the monarch, againſt whom, in the name of the Roman people, they were enjoined to make war. Immediately they were condemned to pay large fines; but while the others gave ſecurity, Scipio declared that he had accounted to the public for all the money which he had brought from Aſia, and therefore that he was innocent. For this obſtinacy Scipio was dragged to priſon, but his couſin Naſica pleaded his cauſe before the people, and the prætor inſtantly ordered the goods of the priſoner to be ſeized and confiſcated. The ſentence was executed, but the effects of Scipio were inſufficient to pay the fine, and it was the greateſt juſtification of his innocence, that whatever was found in his houſe, had never been in the poſſeſſion of Antiochus or his ſubjects. This, however, did not totally liberate him, he was reduced to poverty, and refuſed to accept the offers of his friends and of his clients. Some time after he was appointed to ſettle the diſputes between Eumenes and Seleucus, and at his return, the Romans, aſhamed of their ſeverity towards him, rewarded his merit with ſuch uncommon liberality, that Aſiaticus was enabled to celebrate games in honor of his victory over Antiochus, for ten ſucceſſive days, at his own expence. Liv. 38, c. 55, &c.—Eutrop. 4.——Naſica was ſon of Cneus Scipio, and couſin to Scipio Africanus. He was refuſed the conſulſhip, though ſupported by the intereſt and the fame of the conqueror of Annibal; but he afterwards obtained it, and in that honorable office conquered the Boii, and gained a triumph. He was alſo ſucceſsful in an expedition which he undertook in Spain. When the ſtatue of Cybele was brought to Rome from Phrygia, the Roman ſenate delegated one of their body who was the moſt remarkable for the purity of his manners and the innocence of his life, to go and meet the goddeſs in the harbour of Oſtia. Naſica was the object of their choice, and as ſuch he was enjoined to bring the ſtatue of the goddeſs to Rome with the greateſt pomp and ſolemnity. Naſica alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the active part he took in confuting the accuſations laid againſt the two Scipio's, Africanus and Aſiaticus. There was alſo another of the ſame name who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his enmity againſt the Gracchi, to whom he was nearly related. Patere. 2, c. 1, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Liv. 29, c. 14, &c.——Publ. Æmilianus, ſon of Paulus the conqueror of Perſeus, was adopted by the ſon of Scipio Africanus. He received the ſame ſirname as his grandfather, and was called Africanus the younger, on account of his victories over Carthage. Æmilianus firſt appeared in the Roman armies under his father, and afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a legionary tribune in the Spaniſh provinces, where he killed a Spaniard of gigantic ſtature, and obtained a mural crown at the ſiege of Intercatia. He paſſed into Africa to demand a reinforcement from king Maſiniſſa, the ally of Rome, and he was the ſpectator of a long and bloody battle which was fought between that monarch and the Carthaginians, and which ſoon produced the third Punic war. Some time after Æmilianus was made edile, and next appointed conſul, though under the age required for that important office. The ſirname which he had received from his grandfather, he was doomed lawfully to claim as his own. He was empowered to finiſh the war with Carthage, and as he was permitted by the ſenate to chuſe his colleague, he took with him his friend Lælius, whoſe father of the ſame name had formerly enjoyed the confidence and ſhared the victories of the firſt Africanus. The ſiege of Carthage was already begun, but the operations of the Romans were not continued with vigor. Scipio had no ſooner appeared before the walls of the enemy than every communication with the land was cut off, and that they might not have the command of the ſea, a ſtupendous mole was thrown acroſs the harbour with immenſe labor and expence. This, which might have diſheartened the moſt active enemy, rendered the Carthaginians more eager in the cauſe of freedom and independence; all the inhabitants, without diſtinction of rank, age, or ſex, employed themſelves without ceſſation to dig another harbour, and to build and equip another fleet. In a ſhort time, in ſpite of the vigilance and activity of Æmilianus, the Romans were aſtoniſhed to ſee another harbour formed, and 50 gallies ſuddenly iſſuing under ſail, ready for the engagement. This unexpected fleet, by immediately attacking the Roman ſhips, might have gained the victory, but the delay of the Carthaginians proved fatal to their cauſe, and the enemy had ſufficient time to prepare themſelves. Scipio ſoon got the poſſeſſion of a ſmall eminence in the harbour, and by the ſucceſs of his ſubſequent operations he broke open one of the gates of the city and entered the ſtreets, where he made his way by fire and ſword. The ſurrender of above 50,000 men was followed by the reduction of the citadel, and the total ſubmiſſion of Carthage, B. C. 147. The captive city was ſet on fire, and though Scipio was obliged to demoliſh its very walls to obey the orders of the Romans, yet he wept bitterly over the melancholy and tragical ſcene; and in bewailing the miſeries of Carthage, he expreſſed his fears leſt Rome, in her turn, in ſome future age, ſhould exhibit ſuch a dreadful conflagration. The return of Æmilianus to Rome was that of another conqueror of Annibal, and like him he was honored with a magnificent triumph, and received the ſirname of Africanus. He was not long left in the enjoyment of his glory before he was called to obtain freſh honors. He was choſen conſul a ſecond time, and appointed to finiſh the war which the Romans had hitherto carried on without ſucceſs or vigorous exertions againſt Numantia. The fall of Numantia was more noble than that of the capital of Africa, and the conqueror of Carthage obtained the victory only when the enemies had been conſumed by famine, or by ſelf deſtruction, B. C. 133. From his conqueſts in Spain, Æmilianus was honored with a ſecond triumph, and with the ſirname of Numantinus. Yet his popularity was ſhort, and by telling the people that the murder of their favorite, his brother-in-law, Gracchus, was lawful, ſince he was turbulent and inimical to the peace of the republic, Scipio incurred the diſpleaſure of the tribunes, and was received with hiſſes. His authority, for a moment, quelled their ſedition, when he reproached them of their cowardice, and exclaimed, Factious wretches, do you think that your clamors can intimidate me; me whom the fury of your enemies never daunted? Is this the gratitude that you owe to my father Paulus who conquered Macedonia, and to me? Without my family you were ſlaves. Is this the reſpect you owe to your deliverers? Is this your affection? This firmneſs ſilenced the murmurs of the aſſembly, and ſome time after Scipio retired from the clamors of Rome to Caieta, where, with his friend Lælius, he paſſed the reſt of his time in innocent pleaſures and amuſement, in diverſions which had pleaſed them when children; and the two greateſt men that ruled the ſtate were often ſeen on the ſea ſhore picking up light-pebbles, and throwing them on the ſmooth ſurface of the waters. Though fond of retirement and literary eaſe, yet Scipio often intereſted himſelf in the affairs of the ſtate. His enemies accuſed him of aſpiring to the dictatorſhip, and the clamors were moſt loud againſt him, when he had oppoſed the Sempronian law, and declared himſelf the patron of the inhabitants of the provinces of Italy. This active part of Scipio was ſeen with pleaſure by the friends of the republic, and not only the ſenate, but alſo the citizens, the Latins, and neighbouring ſtates, conducted their illuſtrious friend and patron to his houſe. It ſeemed almoſt the univerſal wiſh that the troubles might be quieted by the election of Scipio to the dictatorſhip, and many preſumed that that honor would be on the morrow conferred upon him. In this, however, the expectations of Rome were fruſtrated, Scipio was found dead in his bed to the aſtoniſhment of the world; and thoſe who enquired for the cauſes of this ſudden death, perceived violent marks on his neck, and concluded that he had been ſtrangled, B. C. 128. This aſſaſſination, as it was then generally believed, was committed by the triumvirs, Papirius Carbo, C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, who ſupported the Sempronian law, and by his wife Sempronia, who is charged with introducing the murderers into his room. No enquiries were made after the authors of his death; Gracchus was the favorite of the mob, and the only atonement which the populace made for the death of Scipio was to attend his funeral, and to ſhow their concern by their cries and loud lamentations. The ſecond Africanus has often been compared to the firſt of that name; they ſeemed to be equally great, and equally meritorious, and the Romans were unable able to diſtinguiſh which of the two was entitled to a greater ſhare of their regard and admiration. Æmilianus, like his grandfather, was fond of literature, and he ſaved from the flames of Carthage many valuable compoſitions, written by Phœnician and Punic authors. In the midſt of his greatneſs he died poor, and his nephew Q. Fabius Maximus, who inherited his eſtate, ſcarce found in his houſe thirty-two pounds weight of ſilver, and two and a half of gold. His liberality to his brother and to his ſiſters deſerves the greateſt commendations, and indeed no higher encomium can be paſſed upon his character, private as well as public, than the words of his rival Metellus, who told his ſons, at the death of Scipio, to go and attend the funeral of the greateſt man that ever lived or ſhould live in Rome. Liv. 44, &c.—*Cic. de Senect. Like his father Scipio, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his fondneſs for literature, and his valor in the Roman armies. ——Metellus, the father-in-law of Pompey, appointed commander in Macedonia. He was preſent at the battle of Pharſalia, and afterwards retired to Africa with Cato. He was defeated by Cæſar at Thapſus. Plut.——Salutio, a mean perſon in Cæſar's army in Africa. The general appointed him his chief commander, either to ridicule him, or becauſe there was an antient oracle that declared that the Scipios would ever be victorious in Africa. Plut.——L. Cornelius, a conſul who oppoſed Sylla. He was at laſt deſerted by his army, and proſcribed.——The commander of a cohort in the reign of Vitellius.

Scira, an annual ſolemnity obſerved at Athens in honor of Minerva, or, according to others, of Ceres and Proſerpine. It received its name either from Sciras, a ſmall town of Attica, or from a native of Eleuſis called Scirus.

Sciradium, a promontory of Attica on the Saronicus ſinus.

Sciras, a name of Ægina. Minerva was alſo called Sciras. Strab. 9.

Sciressa, a mountain of Arcadia. Plin. 4, c. 5.

Sciron, a celebrated thief in Attica, who plundered the inhabitants of the country, and threw them down from the higheſt rocks into the ſea, after he had obliged them to wait upon him and to waſh his feet. Theſeus attacked him, and treated him as he treated travellers. According to Ovid, the earth, as well as the ſea, refuſed to receive the bones of Sciron, which remained for ſome time ſuſpended in the air, till they were changed into large rocks called Scironia Saxa, ſituate between Megara and Corinth. There was a road near them, which bore the name of Sciron, naturally ſmall and narrow, but afterwards enlarged by the emperor Adrian. Some ſuppoſe that Ino threw herſelf into the ſea from one of theſe rocks. Sciron had married the daughter of Cychreus a king of Salamis. He was brother-in-law to Telamon the ſon of Æacus. Ovid. 7, Met. v. 444. Heroid. 2, v. 69.—Strab. 9.—Mela 2, c. 13.—Plin. 2, c. 47.—Senec. N. Q. 5, c. 17.

Scirus, a village of Arcadia, of which the inhabitants are called Scirítæ.——A plain and river of Attica near Megara. Pauſ. 1, c. 36.

Sciſſis, a town of Spain. Liv. 21, c. 60.

Scodra, a town of Illyricum, where Gentius reſided. Liv. 43, c. 20.

Scombrus, a mountain of Thrace near Rhodope.

Scopas, an architect and ſculptor of Epheſus, for ſome time employed in making the mauſoleum which Artemiſia raiſed to her huſband, and which was reckoned one of the ſeven wonders of the world. One of his ſtatues of Venus was among the antiquities with which Rome was adorned. Scopas lived about 430 years before Chriſt. Pauſ. 1, c. 43, &c.—Horat. 4, Od. 8.—Vitr. 9, c. 9.——An Ætolian who raiſed ſome forces to aſſiſt Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, againſt his enemies Antiochus and his allies. He afterwards conſpired againſt the Egyptian monarch, and was put to death, B. C. 196. ——An ambaſſador to the court of the emperor Domitian.

Scopium, a town of Theſſaly.

Scordisci and Scordiscæ, a people of Pannonia and Thrace, well known during the reign of the Roman emperors for their barbarity and uncivilized manners. They were fond of drinking human blood, and they generally ſacrificed their captive enemies to their gods. Liv. 41, c. 19.—Strab. 7.—Flor. 3, c. 4.

Scoti, the antient inhabitants of Scotland, mentioned as different from the Picts. Claudian. de Hon. 3 conſ. v. 54.

Scotinus, a ſirname of Heraclitus. Strab. 15.

Scotussa, a town of Theſſaly deſtroyed by Alexander of Pheræ. Liv. 28, c. 5 & 7.

7. l. 36, c. 14.——Another in Macedonia. Plin. 4, c. 10.

Scribonia, a daughter of Scribonius, who married Auguſtus after he had divorced Claudia. He had by her a daughter, the celebrated Julia. Scribonia was ſometime after repudiated, that Auguſtus might marry Livia. She had been married twice before ſhe became the wife of the emperor. Sueton. in Aug. 62.——A woman who married Craſſus.

Scribonianus, a man in the age of Nero. Some of his friends wiſhed him to be competitor for the imperial purple againſt Veſpaſian, which he declined. Tacit. H. 4, c. 39.——There were alſo two brothers of that name who did nothing without each other's conſent.. Id. 4, c. 41.

Scribonius, a man who made himſelf maſter of the kingdom of Boſphorus.——A phyſician in the age of Auguſtus and Tiberius.——A man who wrote annals, A. D. 22. The beſt edition of Scribonius is that of Patav. 4to. 1655.——A friend of Pompey, &c.

Scultenna, a river of Gaul Ciſpadana, falling into the Po, now called Panaro. Liv. 41, c. 12 & 18.—Plin. 3, c. 16.

Scylacēum, a town of the Brutii, built by an Athenian colony. As Virgil has applied the epithet Navifragum to Scylaceum, ſome ſuppoſe that either the poet was miſtaken in his knowledge of the place, becauſe there are no apparent dangers to navigation there, or that he confounds this place with a promontory of the ſame name on the Tuſcan ſea. Servius explains this paſſage by ſuppoſing that the houſes of the place were originally built with the ſhipwrecked veſſels of Ulyſſes' fleet, (a moſt puerile explanation!) Virg. Æn. 3. v. 553.—Strab. 6.

Scylax, a geographer and mathematician of Caria, in the age of Darius, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, about 550 years before Chriſt. He was commiſſioned by Darius to make diſcoveries in the eaſt, and after a journey of 30 months he viſited Egypt. Some ſuppoſe that he was the firſt who invented geographical tables. The lateſt edition of the Periplus of Scylax, is that of Gronovius, 4to. L. Bat. 1697.—Herodot. 4, c. 44.—Strab.——A river of Cappadocia.

Scylla, a daughter of Niſus, king of Megara, who became enamoured of Minos, as that monarch beſieged her father's capital. To make him ſenſible of her paſſion, ſhe informed him that ſhe would deliver Megara into his hands, if he promiſed to marry her. Minos conſented, and as the proſperity of Megara depended on a golden hair, which was on the head of Niſus, Scylla cut it off as her father was aſleep, and from that moment the ſallies of the Megarçans were unſucceſsful, and the enemy eaſily became maſter of the place. Scylla was diſappointed in her expectations, and Minos treated her with ſuch contempt and ridicule, that ſhe threw herſelf from a tower into the ſea, or, according to other accounts, ſhe was changed into a lark by the gods, and her father into a hawk. Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 393.—Pauſ. 2, c. 34.—Propert. 3, el. 19, v. 21.—Hygin. fab. 198.—Virg. G. 1, v. 405, &c.——A daughter of Typhon, or, as ſome ſay, of Phorcys, who was greatly loved by Glaucus, one of the deities of the ſea. Scylla ſcorned the addreſſes of Glaucus, and the god, to render her more propitious, applied to Circe, whoſe knowledge of herbs and incantations was univerſally admired. Circe no ſooner ſaw him than ſhe became enamoured of him, and inſtead of giving him the required aſſiſtance, ſhe attempted to make him forget Scylla, but in vain. To puniſh her rival, Circe poured the juice of ſome poiſonous herbs into the waters of the fountain where Scylla bathed, and no ſooner had the nymph touched the place, than ſhe found every part of her body below the waiſt, changed into frightful monſters like dogs, which never ceaſed barking. The reſt of her body aſſumed an equally hideous form. She found herſelf ſupported by twelve feet, and ſhe had ſix different heads, each with three rows of teeth. This ſudden metamorphoſis ſo terrified her, that ſhe threw herſelf into that part of the ſea which ſeparates the coaſt of Italy and Sicily, where ſhe was changed into rocks, which continued to bear her name, and which were univerſally deemed by the antients as very dangerous to ſailors, as well as the whirlpool of Charybdis on the coaſt of Sicily. During a tempeſt the waves are deſcribed by modern navigators as roaring dreadfully when driven into the rough and uneven cavities of the rock. Homer. Od. 12, v. 85.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 66, &c.—Pauſ. 2, c. 34.—Hygin. fab. 199. Some authors, as Propert. 4, el. 4, v. 39, & Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 74, with Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 500, have confounded the daughter of Typhon with the daughter of Niſus. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 424, &c.——A ſhip in the fleet of Æneas, commanded by Cloanthus, &c. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 122.

Scyllæum, a promontory of Peloponneſus on the coaſt of Argolis.——A promontory of the Brutii in Italy, ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Scylaceum, near which was the famous whirlpool Scylla, from which the name is derived.

Scyllias, a celebrated ſwimmer who enriched himſelf by diving after the goods which which had been ſhipwrecked in the Perſian ſhips near Pelium. It is ſaid that he could dive 80 ſtadia under the water. Herodot. 8, c. 8.

Scyllis, a ſtatuary of Crete before the age of Cyrus king of Perſia. Pauſ.—Plin. 36, c. 4.

Scylūrus, a monarch who left 80 ſons. He called them to his bed-ſide as he expired, and by enjoining them to break a bundle of ſticks tied together, and afterwards ſeparately, he convinced them, that when altogether firmly united, their power would be inſuperable, but if ever diſunited, they would fall an eaſy prey to their enemies. Plut. de garr.

Scyppium, a town in the neighbourhood of Colophon. Pauſ. 7, c. 3.

Scyras, a river of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 25.

Scyrias, a name applied to Deidamia as a native of Scyros. Ovid. A. 1, v. 682.

Scyros, a rocky and barren iſland in the Ægean, at the diſtance of about 28 miles north-eaſt from Eubœa, ſixty miles in circumference. It was originally in the poſſeſſion of the Pelaſgians and Carians. Achilles retired there not to go to the Trojan war, and became father of Neoptolemus by Deidamia, the daughter of king Lycomedes. Scyros was conquered by the Athenians under Cimon. Homer. Od. 10, v. 508.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 464. l. 13, v. 156.—Pauſ. 1, c. 7.—Strab. 9.

Scythæ, the inhabitants of Scythia. Vid. Scythia.

Scythes, or Scytha, a ſon of Jupiter by a daughter of Tellus. Half his body was that of a man, and the reſt that of a ſerpent. He became king of a country which he called Scythia. Diod. 2.——A ſon of Hercules and Echidna.

Scythia, a large country ſituate on the moſt northern parts of Europe and Aſia, from which circumſtance it is generally denominated European and Aſiatic. The moſt northern parts of Scythia were uninhabited on account of the extreme coldneſs of the climate. The more ſouthern in Aſia that were inhabited were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Scythia intra & extra Imaum, &c. The boundaries of Scythia were unknown to the antients, as no traveller had penetrated beyond the vaſt tracts of land which lay at the north, eaſt, and weſt. Scythia comprehended the modern kingdoms of Tartary, Ruſſia in Aſia, Siberia, Muſcovy, the Crimea, Poland, part of Hungary, Lithuania, the northern parts of Germany, Sweden, Norway, &c. The Scythians were divided into ſeveral nations or tribes, they had no cities, but continually changed their habitations. They inured themſelves to bear labor and fatigue; they deſpiſed money, and lived upon milk, and covered themſelves with the ſkins of their cattle. The virtues ſeemed to floriſh among them, and that philoſophy and moderation which other nations wiſhed to acquire by ſtudy, ſeemed natural to them. Some authors however repreſent them as a ſavage and barbarous people, who fed upon human fleſh, who drank the blood of their enemies, and uſed the ſkulls of travellers as veſſels in their ſacrifices to their gods. The Scythians made ſeveral irruptions upon the more ſouthern provinces of Aſia, eſpecially B. C. 624. when they remained in poſſeſſion of Aſia Minor for 28 years, and we find them at different periods extending their conqueſts in Europe, and penetrating as far as Egypt. Their government was monarchical, and the deference which they paid to their ſovereigns was unparalleled. When the king died, his body was carried through every province, where it was received in ſolemn proceſſion, and afterwards buried. In the firſt centuries after Chriſt they invaded the Roman empire with the Sarmatians. Vid. Sarmatia. Herodot. 1, c. 4, &c.—Strab. 7.—Diod. 2.—*Val. Segusio, a town of Piedmont on the Durias. Plin. 3, c. 17.

Ælius Sejānus, a native of Vulſinum in Tuſcany, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the court of Tiberius. His father's name was Seius Strabo, a Roman knight, commander of the pretorian guards. His mother was deſcended from the Junian family. Sejānus firſt gained the favors of Caius Cæſar, the grandſon of Auguſtus, but afterwards he attached himſelf to the intereſt and the views of Tiberius, who then ſat on the imperial throne. The emperor, who was naturally of a ſuſpicious temper, was free and open with Sejanus, and while he diſtruſted others, he communicated his greateſt ſecrets to this fawning favorite. Sejanus improved this confidence, and when he had found that he poſſeſſed the eſteem of Tiberius, he next endeavoured to become the favorite of the ſoldiers and the darling of the ſenate. As commander of the prætorian guards he was the ſecond man in Rome, and in that important office he made uſe of inſinuations and every mean artifice to make himſelf beloved and revered. His affability and condeſcenſion gained him the hearts of the common ſoldiers, and by appointing his own favorites and adherents to places of truſt and honor, all the officers and centurions of the army became devoted to his intereſt. The views of Sejanus in this were well known; yet to advance with more ſucceſs, he attempted to gain the affection of the ſenators. In this he met with no oppoſition. A man who has the diſpoſal of places of honor and dignity, and who has the command of the public money, cannot but be the favorite of thoſe who are in need of his aſſiſtance. It is even ſaid, that Sejanus gained to his views all the wives of the ſenators, by a private and moſt ſecret promiſe of marriage to each of them, whenever he had made himſelf independent and ſovereign of Rome. Yet however ſucceſsful with the beſt and nobleſt families in the empire, Sejanus had to combat numbers in the houſe of the emperor; but theſe ſeeming obſtacles were ſoon removed. All the children and grandchildren of Tiberius were ſacrificed to the ambition of the favorite under various pretences; and Druſus the ſon of the emperor, by ſtriking Sejanus, made his deſtruction ſure and inevitable. Livia, the wife of Druſus, was gained by Sejanus, and though the mother of many children, ſhe was prevailed upon to aſſiſt her adulterer in the murder of her huſband, and ſhe conſented to marry him when Druſus was dead. No ſooner was Druſus poiſoned, than Sejanus openly declared his wiſh to marry Livia. This was ſtrongly oppoſed by Tiberius; and the emperor by recommending Germanicus to the ſenators for his ſucceſſor, rendered Sejanus bold and determined. He was more urgent in his demands; and when he could not gain the conſent of the emperor, he perſuaded him to retire to ſolitude from the noiſe of Rome, and the troubles of the government. Tiberius, naturally fond of eaſe and luxury, yielded to his repreſentations, and retired to Campania, leaving Sejanus at the head of the empire. This was highly gratifying to the favorite, and he was now without a maſter. Prudence and moderation might have made him what he wiſhed to be, but Sejanus offended the whole empire when he declared that he was emperor of Rome, and Tiberius only the dependent prince of the iſland of Capreæ, where he had retired. Tiberius was upon this fully convinced of the deſigns of Sejanus, and when he had been informed that his favorite had had the meanneſs and audacity to ridicule him by introducing introducing him on the ſtage, the emperor ordered him to be accuſed before the ſenate. Sejanus was deſerted by all his pretended friends, as ſoon as by fortune; and the man who aſpired to the empire, and who called himſelf the favorite of the people, the darling of the prætorian guards, and the companion of Tiberius, was ſeized without reſiſtance, and the ſame day ſtrangled in priſon, A. D. 31. His remains were expoſed to the fury and inſolence of the populace, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber. His children and all his relations were involved in his ruin, and Tiberius ſacrificed to his reſentment and ſuſpicions, all thoſe who were even connected with Sejanus, or had ſhared his favors and enjoyed his confidence. Tacit. 3, Ann. &c.—Dio. 58.—Suet. in Tib.

Cn. Seius, a Roman who had a famous horſe of large ſize, and uncommon beauty. He was put to death by Antony, and it was obſerved, that whoever obtained poſſeſſion of his horſe, which was called Sejanus equus, became unfortunate, and loſt all his property, with every member of his family. Hence aroſe the proverb, ille homo habet Sejanum equum, applied to ſuch as were oppreſſed with misfortunes. Au. Gellius. 3, c. 9.

Seius Strabo, the father of Sejanus, was a Roman knight, and commander of the prætorian guards.

Selemnus, a river of Achaia. Pauſ. 7, c. 23. Vid. Selimnus.

Selēne, the wife of Antiochus king of Syria, put to death by Tigranes, king of Armenia. She was daughter of Phyſcon, king of Egypt, and had firſt married her brother Lathurus, according to the cuſtom of her country, and afterwards by deſire of her mother, her other brother Gryphus. At the death of Gryphus ſhe had married Antiochus, ſirnamed Euſebes, the ſon of Antiochus Cyzicenus, by whom ſhe had two ſons. According to Appian, ſhe firſt married the father, and after his death, his ſon Euſebes. Appian. Syr. &c.

Seleucēna, or Seleucis, a country of Syria, in Aſia. Vid. Seleucis.

Seleucīa, a town of Syria, on the ſea ſhore, generally called Pieria, to diſtinguiſh it from others of the ſame name. There were no leſs than eight other cities which were called Seleucia, and which had all received their name from Seleucus Nicator. They were all ſituate in the kingdom of Syria, in Cilicia, and near the Euphrates. Flor. 3, c. 11.—Plut. in Dem.—Mela. 1, c. 12.—Strab. 11 & 15.—Plin. 6, c. 26.—Alſo the reſidence of the Parthian kings. Cic. 8, fam. 14.

Seleucĭdæ, a ſirname given to thoſe monarchs who ſat on the throne of Syria, which was founded by Seleucus the ſon of Antiochus, from whom the word is derived. The era of the Seleucidæ begins with the taking of Babylon by Seleucus, B. C. 312, and ends at the conqueſt of Syria by Pompey, B. C. 65. The order in which theſe monarchs reigned, is ſhown in the account of Syria. Vid. Syria.

Seleucis, a diviſion of Syria, which received its name from Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian empire, after the death of Alexander the Great. It was alſo called Tetrapolis from the four cities it contained, called alſo ſiſter cities; Seleucia, called after Seleucus, Antioch called after his father, Laodicea after his mother, and Apamea after his wife. Strab. 16.

Seleucus, 1ſt, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, ſirnamed Nicator, or Victorious, was ſon of Antiochus. After the king's death, he received Babylon as his province; but his ambitious views, and his attempt to deſtroy Eumenes as he paſſed through his territories, rendered him ſo unpopular that he fled for ſafety to the court of his friend Ptolemy king of Egypt. He was ſoon after enabled to recover Babylon, which Antigonus had ſeized in his abſence, and he encreaſed his dominions by the immediate conqueſt of Media, and ſome of the neighbouring provinces. When he had ſtrengthened himſelf in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the reſt of the generals of Alexander, and aſſumed the title of independent monarch. He afterwards made war againſt Antigonus, with the united forces of Ptolemy, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus; and after this monarch had been conquered and ſlain, his territories were divided among his victorious enemies. When Seleucus became maſter of Syria, he built a city there, which he called Antioch, in honor of his father, and made it the capital of his dominions. He alſo made war againſt Demetrius and Lyſimachus, though he had originally married Stratonice, the daughter of the former, and had lived in the cloſeſt friendſhip with the latter. Seleucus was at laſt murdered by one of his ſervants called Ptolemy Ceraunus, a man on whom he beſtowed the greateſt favors, and whom he had diſtinguiſhed by acts of the moſt unbounded confidence. According to Arrian, Seleucus was the greateſt and moſt powerful of the princes who inherited the Macedonian empire after the death of Alexander. His benevolence has been commended; and it has been obſerved, that he conquered, not to enſlave nations, but to make them more happy. He founded no leſs than 34 cities in different parts of his empire, empire, which he peopled with Greek colonies, whoſe national induſtry, learning, religion, and ſpirit, were communicated to the indolent and luxurious inhabitants of Aſia. Seleucus was a great benefactor to the Greeks; he reſtored to the Athenians the library and the ſtatues which Xerxes had carried away from their city when he invaded Greece, and among them were thoſe of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. Seleucus was murdered 280 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 32d year of his reign, and the 78th, or according to others, the 73d year of his age, as he was going to conquer Macedonia, where he intended to finiſh his days in peace and tranquillity in that province where he was born. He was ſucceeded by Antiochus Soter. Juſtin. 13, c. 4 l. 15, c. 4. l. 16, c. 3, &c.—Plut. in Dem. —Plin. 6, c. 17.—Pauſ. 8, c. 51.—Joſeph. Ant. 12.——The 2d. ſirnamed Callinicus, ſucceeded his father Antiochus Theus on the throne of Syria. He attempted to make war againſt Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but his fleet was ſhipwrecked in a violent ſtorm, and his armies ſoon after conquered by his enemy. He was at laſt taken priſoner by Arſaces, an officer who made himſelf powerful by the diſſenſions which reigned in the houſe of the Seleucidæ, between the two brothers, Seleucus and Antiochus; and after he had been a priſoner for ſome time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horſe, B. C. 226, after a reign of 20 years. Seleucus had received the ſirname of Pogon, from his long beard, and that of Callinicus, ironically to expreſs his very unfortunate reign. He had married Laodice, the ſiſter of one of his generals, by whom he had two ſons, Seleucus and Antiochus, and a daughter whom he gave in marriage to Mithridates king of Pontus. Strab. 16.—Juſtin. 27.—Appian. de Syr.——The 3d, ſucceeded his father Seleucus 2d, on the throne of Syria, and received the ſirname of Ceraunus, by antiphraſis, as he was a very weak, timid, and irreſolute monarch. He was murdered by two of his officers after a reign of three years, B. C. 223, and his brother Antiochus, though only 15 years old, aſcended the throne, and rendered himſelf ſo celebrated that he acquired the name of the Great. Appian.——The 4th, ſucceeded his father Antiochus the Great, on the throne of Syria. He was ſurnamed Philopator, or according to Joſephus, Soter. His empire had been weakened by the Romans when he became monarch, and the yearly tribute of a thouſand talents to theſe victorious enemies, concurred in leſſening his power and conſequence among nations. Seleucus was poiſoned after a reign of 12 years, B. C. 175. His ſon Demetrius had been ſent to Rome, there to receive his education, and he became a prince of great abilities. Strab. 16.—Juſtin. 32.—Appian. ——The 5th, ſucceeded his father Demetrius Nicator on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age. He was put to death in the firſt year of his reign by Cleopatra his mother, who had alſo ſacrificed her huſband to her ambition. He is not reckoned by many hiſtorians in the number of the Syrian monarchs.——The 6th, one of the Seleucidæ, ſon of Antiochus Gryphus, killed his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, who wiſhed to obtain the crown of Syria. He was ſome time after baniſhed from his kingdom by Antiochus Pius, ſon of Cyzicenus, and fled to Cilicia, where he was burnt in a palace by the inhabitants, B. C. 93. Appian.—Joſeph.——A prince of Syria, to whom the Egyptians offered the crown of which they had robbed Auletes. Seleucus accepted it, but he ſoon diſguſted his ſubjects, and received the ſirname of Cybioſactes, or Scullion, for his meanneſs and avarice. He was at laſt murdered by Berenice, whom he had married. —— A ſervant of Cleopatra, the laſt queen of Egypt, who accuſed his miſtreſs before Octavianus, of having ſecreted part of her jewels and treaſures.——A mathematician intimate with Veſpaſian the Roman emperor. ——A part of the Alps.——A Roman conſul.——A celebrated ſinger. Juv. 10, v. 211.——A king of the Boſphorus, who died B. C. 429.

Selge, a town of Pamphylia, made a colony by the Lacedæmonians. Liv. 35. c. 13.—Strabo.

Selimnus, a ſhepherd of Achaia, who for ſome time enjoyed the favors of the nymph Argyra, without interruption. Argyra was at laſt diſguſted with her lover, and the ſhepherd died through melancholy, and was changed into a river of the ſame name. Argyra was alſo changed into a fountain, and was fond of mingling her waters with thoſe of the Selimnus. Pauſ. 7, c. 23.

Selīnuns, or Selīnus, (untis), a town on the ſouthern parts of Sicily, founded A. U. C. 127, by a colony from Megara. It received its name from σελινον, parſley, which grew there in abundance. The marks of its antient conſequence are viſible in the venerable ruins now found in its neighbourhood. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 705.—Pauſ. 6, c. 19.——A river of Elis in Peloponneſus. ——Another in Achaia.——Another in Sicily.——A river and town of Cilicia, where Trajan died. Liv. 33, c. 20.—Strab. 14.——Two ſmall rivers near Diana's temple temple at Epheſus. Plin. 5, c. 29.——A lake at the entrance of the Cayſter. Strab. 14.

SELLASIA, a town of Laconia where Cleomenes was defeated by the Achæans, B. C. 222. Scarce 200 of a body of 5000 Lacedæmonians ſurvived the battle. Plut.

SELLĒIS, a river of Peloponneſus falling into the Ionian ſea. Homer. Il.

SELLETÆ, a people of Thrace, near Mount Hæmus. Liv. 38, c. 40.

SELYMBRIA, a town of Thrace, on the Propontis. Liv. 33, c. 39.

SĔMĔLE, a daughter of Cadmus by Hermione, the daughter of Mars and Venus. She was tenderly beloved by Jupiter; but Juno, who was always jealous of her huſband's amours, and who hated the houſe of Cadmus, becauſe they were related to the goddeſs of beauty, determined to puniſh this ſucceſsful rival. She borrowed the girdle of Ate, which contained every wickedneſs, deceit, and perfidy, and in the form of Beroe, Semele's nurſe, ſhe viſited the houſe of Jupiter's miſtreſs. Semele liſtened with attention to the artful admonitions of the falſe Beroe, and was at laſt perſuaded to entreat her lover to come to her arms with the ſame majeſty as he approached Juno. This raſh requeſt was heard with horror by Jupiter; but as he had ſworn by the Styx to grant Semele whatever ſhe required, he came to her bed, attended by the clouds, the lightning, and thunderbolts. The mortal nature of Semele could not endure ſo much majeſty, and ſhe was inſtantly conſumed with fire. The child, however, of which ſhe was pregnant, was ſaved from the flames by Mercury, or according to others by Dirce, one of the nymphs of the Achelous, and Jupiter placed him in his thigh the reſt of the time which he ought to have been in his mother's womb. This child was called Bacchus, or Dionyſius. Semele immediately after death was honored with immortality under the name of Thyone. Some however ſuppoſe that ſhe remained in the infernal regions till Bacchus her ſon was permitted to bring her back. There were in the temple of Diana, at Trœzene, two altars raiſed to the infernal gods, one of which was over an aperture, through which, as Pauſanias reports, Bacchus returned from hell with his mother. Semele was particularly worſhipped at Braſiæ in Laconia, where, according to a certain tradition, ſhe had been driven by the winds with her ſon, after Cadmus had expoſed her on the ſea, on account of her incontinent amour with Jupiter. The mother of Bacchus, though ſhe received divine honors, had no temples; ſhe had a ſtatue in a temple of Ceres, at Thebes, in Bœotiâ. Pauſ. 3, c. 24. l. 9, c. 5.—Heſiod. Theog.—*Homer. SEMIGERMĀNI, a name given to the Helvetii, a people of Germany. Liv. 21, c. 38.

SEMIGUNTUS, a general of the Cheruſci, taken priſoner by Germanicus, &c. Strab. 7.

SĔMĪRĂMIS, a celebrated queen of Aſſyria, daughter of the goddeſs Derceto, by a young Aſſyrian. She was expoſed in a deſert, but her life was preſerved by doves for one whole year, till Simmas, one of the ſhepherds of Ninus, found her and brought her up as his own child. Semiramis, when grown up, married Menones, the governor of Nineveh, and accompanied him to the ſiege of Bactra, where, by her advice and prudent directions, ſhe haſtened the king's operations and took the city. Theſe eminent ſervices, but chiefly her uncommon beauty, endeared her to Ninus. The monarch aſked her of her huſband, and offered him inſtead, his daughter Soſana; but Menones, who tenderly loved Semiramis, refuſed, and when Ninus had added threats to entreaties, he hung himſelf. No ſooner was Menones dead than Semiramis, who was of an aſpiring ſoul, married Ninus, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Ninyas. Ninus was ſo fond of Semiramis, that at her requeſt he reſigned the crown to her, and commanded her to be proclaimed queen and ſole empreſs of Aſſyria. Of this however he had cauſe to repent: Semiramis put him to death, the better to eſtabliſh herſelf on the throne, and when ſhe had no enemies to fear at home, ſhe began to repair the capital of her empire, and by her means Babylon become the moſt ſuperb and magnificent city in the world. She viſited every part of her dominions, and left every where immortal monuments of her greatneſs and benevolence. To render the roads paſſable and communication eaſy, ſhe hollowed mountains and filled up vallies, and water was conveyed at a great expence by large and convenient aqueducts, to barren deſarts and unfruitful plains. She was not leſs diſtinguiſhed as a warrior, many of the neighbouring nations were conquered; and when Semiramis was once told as ſhe was dreſſing her hair, that Babylon had revolted, ſhe left her toilette with precipitation, and though only half dreſſed, ſhe refuſed to have the reſt of her head adorned before the ſedition was quelled, and tranquillity re-eſtabliſhed. Semiramis has been accuſed of licentiouſneſs, and ſome authors have obſerved, that ſhe regularly called the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt men in her army to her arms, and afterwards put them to death that they might not be living witneſſes of her incontinence. Her paſſion for her ſon was alſo unnatural, and it was this criminal propenſity which induced Ninyas to deſtroy his mother with his own hands. Some ſay that Semiramis was changed into a dove after death, and received immortal honors in Aſſyria. It is ſuppoſed that ſhe lived about 1965 years before the Chriſtian era, and that ſhe died in the 62d year of her age, and the 25th of her reign. Many fabulous reports have been propagated about Semiramis, and ſome have declared that for ſome time ſhe diſguiſed herſelf and paſſed for her ſon Ninyas. *Val. SEMNŎNES, a people of Italy on the borders of Umbria.——Of Germany on the Elbe and Oder.

SEMŌNES, inferior deities of Rome, that were not in the number of the 12 great gods. Among theſe were Faunus, the Satyrs, Priapus, Vertumnus, Janus, Pan, Silenus, and all ſuch illuſtrious heroes as had received divine honors after death. The word ſeems to be the ſame as ſemi homines, becauſe they were inferior to the ſupreme gods, and ſuperior to men.

SEMOSANCTUS, one of the gods of the Romans among the Indigetes, or ſuch as were born and educated in their country.

SEMPRONIA, a Roman matron, mother of the two Gracchi, celebrated for her learning, and her private as well as public virtues.——Alſo a ſiſter of the Gracchi, who is accuſed of having aſſiſted the triumvirs Carbo, Gracchus, and Flaccus, to murder her huſband, Scipio Africanus the younger. The name of Sempronia was common to the female deſcendants of the family of the Sempronii, Gracchi, and Scipios.

SEMPRŌNIA LEX de magiſtratibus, by C. Sempronius Gracchus, the tribune, A. U. C. 630, ordained that no perſon who had been legally deprived of a magiſtracy for miſdemeanors, ſhould be capable of bearing an office again. This law was afterwards repealed by the author.——Another, de civitate, by the ſame, A. U. C. 630. It ordained that no capital judgment ſhould be paſſed over a Roman citizen, without the concurrence and authority of the ſenate. There were alſo ſome other regulations included in this law.——Another, de comitiis, by the ſame, A. U. C. 635. It ordained that in giving their votes, the centuries ſhould be choſen by lot, and not give it according to the order of their claſſes.—— Another, de comitiis, by the ſame, the ſame year, which granted to the Latin allies of Rome, the privilege of giving their votes at elections, as if they were Roman citizens. ——Another, de provinciis, by the ſame, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the ſenators ſhould be permitted before the aſſembly of the conſular comitia, to determine as they pleaſed the particular provinces which ſhould be propoſed to the conſuls, to be divided by lot, and that the tribunes ſhould be deprived of the power of interpoſing againſt a decree of the ſenate.——Another, called Agraria prima, by T. Sempronius Gracchus the tribune, A. U. C. 620. It confirmed the lex agraria Licinia, and enacted that all ſuch as were in poſſeſſion of more lands than that law allowed, ſhould immediately reſign them, to be divided among the poorer citizens. Three commiſſioners were appointed to put this law into execution, and its conſequences were ſo violent, as it was directly made againſt the nobles and the ſenators, that it coſt the author his life.——Another, called Agraria altera, by the ſame. It required that all the ready money which was found in the treaſury of Attalus king of Pergamus, who had left the Romans his heirs, ſhould be divided among the poorer citizens of Rome, to ſupply them with all the various inſtruments requiſite in huſbandry, and that the lands of that monarch ſhould be farmed by the Roman cenſors, and the money drawn from thence ſhould be divided among the people.——Another, frumentaria, by C. Sempronius Gracchus. It required that a certain quantity of corn ſhould be diſtributed among the people, ſo much to every individual, for which it was required that they ſhould only pay the trifling ſum of a ſemiſſis and a triens.—— Another, de uſurâ, by M. Sempronius, the tribune, A. U. C. 560. It ordained that in lending money to the Latins and the allies of Rome, the Roman laws ſhould be obſerved as well as among the citizens.——Another, de judicibus, by the tribune C. Sempronius, A. U. C. 630. It required that the right of judging, which had been aſſigned to the Senatorian order by Romulus, ſhould be transferred from them to the Roman knights. ——Another, militaris, by the ſame, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the ſoldiers ſhould be cloathed at the public expence, without any diminution of their uſual pay. It alſo ordered that no perſon ſhould be obliged to ſerve in the army before the age of 17.

SEMPRŌNIUS (A. ATRATINUS,) a ſenator who oppoſed the Agrarian law, which was propoſed by the conſul Caſſius, ſoon after the election of the tribunes.——L. Atratinus, Atratinus, a conſul, A. U. C. 311. He was one of the firſt cenſors with his colleague in the conſulſhip, Papirius.——Caius, a conſul ſummoned before an aſſembly of the people, becauſe he had fought with ill ſucceſs againſt the Volſci.——Blæſus, a conſul who obtained a triumph for ſome victories gained in Sicily.——Sophus, a conſul againſt the Æqui. He alſo fought againſt the Picentes, and during the engagement there was a dreadful earthquake. The ſoldiers were terrified, but Sophus encouraged them, and obſerved that the earth trembled only for fear of changing its old maſters.——A man who propoſed a law that no perſon ſhould dedicate a temple or altar, without the previous approbation of the magiſtrates, A. U. C. 449. He repudiated his wife becauſe ſhe had gone to ſee a ſpectacle without his permiſſion or knowledge.——Rufus, a ſenator, baniſhed from the ſenate becauſe he had killed a crane to ſerve him as food.——Tuditanus, a man ſent againſt Sardinia by the Romans.——A legionary tribune, who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the ſoldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards conſul, and fought in the field againſt Annibal with great ſucceſs. He was killed in Spain.——Tiberius Longus, a Roman conſul defeated by the Carthaginians in an engagement which he had begun againſt the approbation of his colleague C. Scipio. He afterwards obtained victories over Hanno and the Gauls.——Tiberius Gracchus, a conſul who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was afterwards betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody reſiſtance againſt the enemy. Hannibal ſhewed great honor to his remains; a funeral pile was raiſed at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in ſolemn proceſſion.——Gracchus, a man who had debauched Julia. [Vid. Gracchus.]——An eunuch, made governor of Rome by Caracalla.——Denſus, a centurion of a pretorian cohort, who defended the perſon of Galba againſt the aſſaſſins. He was killed in the attempt.——The father of the Gracchi. [*Vid. Sĕnātus, the chief council of the ſtate among the Romans. The members of this body, called ſenators on account of their age, and patres on account of their authority, were of the greateſt conſequence in the republic. The ſenate was firſt inſtituted by Romulus, to govern the city, and to preſide over the affairs of ſtate during his abſence. This was continued by his ſucceſſors; but Tarquin the Second diſdained to conſult them, and by having his own council choſen from his favorites, and men who were totally devoted to his intereſt, he diminiſhed the authority and the conſequence of the ſenators, and ſlighted the concurrence of the people. The ſenators whom Romulus created were an hundred, to whom he afterwards added the ſame number when the Sabines had migrated to Rome. Tarquin the ancient made the ſenate conſiſt of 300, and this number remained fixed for a long time. After the expulſion of the laſt Tarquin, whoſe tyranny had thinned the patricians as well as the plebeians, 164 new ſenators were choſen to complete the 300; and as they were called conſcripts, the ſenate ever afterwards conſiſted of members who were denominated patres, and conſcripti. The number continued to fluctuate during the times of the republic, but gradually encreaſed to 700, and afterwards to 900 under Julius Cæſar, who filled the ſenate with men of every rank and order. Under Auguſtus the ſenators amounted to 1000, but this number was reduced to 300, which being the cauſe of complaints, induced the emperor to limit the number to 600. The place of a ſenator was always beſtowed upon merit; the monarchs had the privilege of chuſing the members, and after the expulſion of the Tarquins it was one of the rights of the conſuls, till the election of the cenſors, who from their office ſeemed moſt capable of making choice of men whoſe character was irreproachable, whoſe morals were pure, and relations honorable. Sometimes the aſſembly of the people elected ſenators, but it was only upon ſome extraordinary occaſions; there was alſo a dictator choſen to fill up the number of the ſenate, after the battle of Cannæ. Only particular families were admitted into the ſenate; and when the plebeians were permitted to ſhare the honors of the ſtate, it was then required that they ſhould be born of free citizens. It was alſo required that the candidates ſhould be knights before their admiſſion into the ſenate. They were to be above the age of 25, and to have previouſly paſſed through the inferior offices of quæſtor, tribune of the people, edile, pretor, and conſul. Some, however, ſuppoſe that the ſenators whom Romulus choſe were all old men; yet his ſucceſſors neglected this, and often men who were below the age of 25 were admitted by curteſy into the ſenate. The dignity of a ſenator could not be ſupported without the poſſeſſion of 80,000 ſeſterces, or about 700l. Engliſh money, and therefore ſuch as ſquandered away their money, and whoſe fortune was reduced below this ſum, were generally ſtruck out of the liſt of ſenators. This regulation was not made in the firſt ages of the republic, when the Romans boaſted of their poverty. The ſenators were not permitted to be of any trade or profeſſion. They were diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of the people by their dreſs; they wore the latiſlave, half boots of a black color, with a creſcent or ſilver buckle in the form of a C; but this laſt honor was confined only to the deſcendants of thoſe hundred ſenators who had been elected by Romulus, as the letter C ſeems to imply. They had the ſole right of feaſting publicly in the capitol in ceremonial habits; they ſat in curule chairs, and at the repreſentation of plays and public ſpectacles, they were honored with particular ſeats. Whenever they travelled abroad, even on their own buſineſs, they were maintained at the public expence, and always found proviſions for themſelves and their attendants ready prepared on the road; a privilege that was generally termed free legation. On public feſtivals they wore the prætexta, or long white robe with purple borders. The right of convocating the ſenate belonged only to the monarchs; and after the expulſion of the Tarquins, to the conſuls, the dictator, maſter of the horſe, governor of Rome, and tribunes of the people; but no magiſtrate could exerciſe this privilege except in the abſence of a ſuperior officer, the tribunes excepted. The time of meeting was generally three times a month on the calends, nones, and ides. Under Auguſtus they were not aſſembled on the nones. It was requiſite that the place where they aſſembled ſhould have been previouſly conſecrated by the augurs. This was generally in the temple of Concord, of Jupiter Capitolinus, Apollo, Caſtor and Pollux, &c. or in the Curiæ called Hoſtilia, Julia Pompeia, &c. When audience was given to foreign ambaſſadors, the ſenators aſſembled without the walls of the city, either in the temples of Bellona or of Apollo; and the ſame ceremony as to their meeting was alſo obſerved when they tranſacted buſineſs with their generals, as the ambaſſadors of foreign nations, and the commanders of armies, while in commiſſion, were not permitted to appear within the walls of the city. To render their decrees valid and authentic, a certain number of members was requiſite, and ſuch as were abſent without ſome proper cauſe, were always fined. In the reign of Auguſtus, 400 ſenators were requiſite to make a ſenate. Nothing was tranſacted before ſun-riſe, or after ſun-ſet. In their office the ſenators were the guardians of religion, they diſpoſed of the provinces as they pleaſed, they prorogued the aſſemblies of the people, they appointed thankſgivings, nominated their ambaſſadors, diſtributed the public money, and in ſhort, had the management of every thing political or civil in the republic, except the creating of magiſtrates, the enacting of laws, and the declarations of war or peace, which were confined to the aſſemblies of the people. Rank was always regarded in their meetings; the chief magiſtrates of the ſtate, ſuch as the conſuls, the pretors, and cenſors ſat firſt, after theſe the inferior magiſtrates, ſuch as the ediles and queſtors, and laſt of all, thoſe that then exerciſed no office in the ſtate. Their opinions were originally collected, each according to his age; but when the office of cenſor was inſtituted, the opinion of the princeps ſenatus, or the perſon whoſe name ſtood firſt on the cenſor's liſt, was firſt conſulted, and afterwards thoſe who were of conſular dignity, each in their reſpective order. In the age of Cicero, the conſuls elect were firſt conſulted; and in the age of Cæſar, he was permitted to ſpeak firſt till the end of the year, on whom the conſul had originally conferred that honor. Under the emperors the ſame rules were obſerved, but the conſuls were generally conſulted before all others. When any public matter was introduced into the ſenate, which was always called referre ad ſenatum, any ſenator whoſe opinion was aſked, was permitted to ſpeak upon it as long as he pleaſed, and on that account it was often uſual for the ſenators to protract their ſpeeches till it was too late to determine. When the queſtion was put, they paſſed to the ſide of that ſpeaker, whoſe opinion they approved, and a majority of votes was eaſily collected, without the trouble of counting the numbers. This mode of proceeding was called pedibus in alicujus ſententiam ire, and therefore on that account, the ſenators who had not the privilege of ſpeaking, but only the right of giving a ſilent vote, ſuch as bore ſome curule honors, and on that account were permitted to ſit in the ſenate, but not to deliberate, were denominated pedarii ſenatores. After the majority had been known, the matter was determined, and a ſenatus conſultum was immediately written by the clerks of the houſe, at the feet of the

the chief magiſtrates, and it was ſigned by all the principal members of the houſe. When there was not a ſufficient number of members to make a ſenate, the deciſion was called ſenatus autoritas, but it was of no conſequence if it did not afterwards paſs into a ſenatus conſultum. The tribunes of the people, by the word veto, could ſtop the debates, and the decrees of the aſſembled ſenate, as alſo any one who was of equal authority with him who had propoſed the matter. The ſenatus conſulta were left in the cuſtody of the conſuls, who could ſuppreſs or preſerve them; but about the year of Rome 304, they were always depoſited in the temple of Ceres, and afterwards in the treaſury, by the ediles of the people. The degradation of the ſenators was made by the cenſor, by omitting their names when he called over the liſt of the ſenate. This was called præterire. A ſenator could be again introduced into the ſenate if he could repair his character, or fortune, which had been the cauſes why the cenſor had lawfully called him unqualified, and had challenged his oppoſition. The meeting of the ſenate was often ſudden, except the particular times already mentioned, upon any emergency. After the death of J. Cæſar, they were not permitted to meet on the ides of March, which were called parricidium, becauſe on that day the dictator had been aſſanated. The ſons of ſenators, after they had put on the toga virilis, were permitted to come into the ſenate, but this was afterwards limited. [Vid. Papirius.] The rank and the authority of the ſenators, which were ſo conſpicuous in the firſt ages of the republic, and which cauſed the miniſter of Pyrrhus to declare, that the Roman ſenate was a venerable aſſembly of kings, dwindled into nothing under the emperors. Men of the loweſt characters were admitted into the ſenate; the emperors took pleaſure in robbing this illuſtrious body of their privileges and authority, and the ſenators themſelves, by their meanneſs and ſervility, contributed as much as the tyranny of the ſovereign to diminiſh their own conſequence; and by applauding the follies of a Nero, and the cruelties of a Domitian, they convinced the world that they no longer poſſeſſed ſufficient prudence or authority to be conſulted on matters of weight and importance. In the election of ſucceſſors to the imperial purple after Auguſtus, the approbation of the ſenate was conſulted, but it was only a matter of curteſy, and the concurrence of a body of men was little regarded who were without power, and under the controul of a mercenary army. The title of Clariſſimus was given to the ſenators, under the emperors, and indeed this was the only diſtinction they had in compenſation for the loſs of their independence. The ſenate was aboliſhed by Juſtinian, 13 centuries after its firſt inſtitution by Romulus.

SENNA, or SENA, a river of Umbria. Vid. Sena. Lucan. 2, v. 407.

SENĔCA, M. ANNÆUS, a native of Corduba in Spain, who married Helvia, a woman of Spain, by whom he had three ſons, Seneca the philoſopher, Annæus Novatus, and Annæus Mela, the father of the poet Lucan. Seneca made himſelf known by ſome declamations of which he made a collection from the moſt celebrated orators of the age, and from that circumſtance, and for diſtinction, he obtained the apellation of declamator. He left Corduba, and went to Rome, where he became a Roman knight. His ſon L. Annæus Seneca, who was born about ſix years before Chriſt, was early diſtinguiſhed by his extraordinary talents. He was taught eloquence by his father, and received leſſons in philoſophy from the beſt and moſt celebrated ſtoics of the age. As one of the followers of the Pythagorean doctrines, Seneca obſerved the moſt reſerved abſtinence, and in his meals never eat the fleſh of animals; but this he abandonned at the repreſentation of his father, when Tiberius threatened to puniſh ſome Jews and Egyptians, who abſtained from certain meats. In the character of a pleader, Seneca appeared with great advantage, but the fear of Caligula, who aſpired to the name of an eloquent ſpeaker, and who conſequently was jealous of his fame, deterred him from purſuing his favorite ſtudy, and he ſought a ſafer employment in canvaſſing for the honors and offices of the ſtate. He was made quæſtor, but the aſperſions which were thrown upon him on account of a ſhameful amour with Julia Livilla, removed him from Rome, and the emperor baniſhed him for ſome time into Corſica. During his baniſhment the philoſopher wrote ſome ſpirited epiſtles to his mother, remarkable for elegance of language and ſublimity; but he ſoon forgot his philoſophy, and diſgraced himſelf by his flatteries to the emperor, and in wiſhing to be recalled, even at the expence of his innocence and character. The diſgrace of Meſſalina at Rome, and the marriage of Agrippina with Claudius, proved favorable to Seneca, and after he had remained five years in Corſica, he was recalled by the empreſs to take care of the education of her ſon Nero, who was deſtined to ſucceed to the empire. In the honorable duty of preceptor, Seneca gained applauſe, and as long as Nero followed his advice, Rome enjoyed tranquillity, and believed herſelf ſafe and happy under the adminiſtration of the ſon of Agrippina. Some, however, are clamorous againſt the philoſopher, and obſerve that Seneca initiated his pupil in thoſe unnatural vices, and abominable indulgences, which diſgraced him as a monarch and as a man. This may be the language of malevolence, or the inſinuation of jealouſy. In the corrupted age of Nero, the preceptor had to withſtand the clamors of many wicked and profligate miniſters, and if he had been the favorite of the emperor, and ſhared his pleaſures, his debauchery and extravagance, Nero would not perhaps have been ſo anxious of deſtroying a man whoſe example, from vicious inclinations, he could not follow, and whoſe ſalutary precepts his licentious aſſociates forbad him to obey. Seneca was too well acquainted with the natural diſpoſition of Nero, to think himſelf ſecure; he had been accuſed of having amaſſed the moſt ample riches, and of having built ſumptuous houſes, and adorned beautiful gardens, during the four years in which he had attended Nero as a preceptor, and therefore he deſired his imperial pupil to accept of the riches, and the poſſeſſions which his attendance on his perſon had procured, and to permit him to retire to ſolitude and ſtudy. Nero refuſed with artful duplicity, and Seneca, to avoid further ſuſpicions, kept himſelf at home for ſome time as if laboring under a diſeaſe. In the conſpiracy of Piſo, which happened ſome time after, and in which ſome of the moſt noble of the Roman ſenators were concerned, Seneca's name was mentioned by Natalis, and Nero, who was glad of an opportunity of ſacrificing him to his ſecret jealouſy, ordered him to deſtroy himſelf. Seneca very probably was not acceſſary to the conſpiracy, and the only thing which could be produced againſt him as a crimination, was trivial and unſatisfactory. Piſo, as Natalis declared, had complained that he never ſaw Seneca, and the philoſopher had obſerved in anſwer, that it was not proper or conducive to their common intereſt, to ſee one another often. He further pleaded indiſpoſition, and ſaid that his own life depended upon the ſafety of Piſo's perſon. Seneca was at table with his wife Paulina and two of his friends, when the meſſenger from Nero arrived. He heard the words which commanded him to deſtroy himſelf, with philoſophical firmneſs, and even with joy, and obſerved, that ſuch a mandate might have long been expected from a man who had murdered his own mother, and aſſaſſinated all his friends. He wiſhed to diſpoſe of his poſſeſſions as he pleaſed, but this was refuſed, and when he heard this, he turned to his friends who were weeping at his melancholy fate, and told them, that ſince he could not leave them what he believed his own, he would leave them at leaſt his own life for an example, an innocent conduct which they might imitate, and by which they might acquire immortal fame. Againſt their tears and wailings he exclaimed with firmneſs, and aſked them whether they had not learnt better to withſtand the attacks of fortune, and the violence of tyranny? As for his wife, he attempted to calm her emotions, and when ſhe ſeemed reſolved to die with him, he ſaid he was glad to find his example followed with ſo much conſtancy. Their veins were opened at the ſame moment, but the life of Paulina was preſerved, and Nero, who was partial to her, ordered the blood to be ſtopped, and from that moment, according to ſome authors, the philoſopher's wife ſeemed to rejoice that ſhe could ſtill enjoy the comforts of life. Seneca's veins bled but ſlowly, and it has been obſerved, that the ſenſible and animated converſation of his dying moments was collected by his friends, and that it has been preſerved among his works. To haſten his death he drank a doſe of poiſon, but it had no effect, and therefore he ordered himſelf to be carried into a hot-bath, to accelerate the operation of the draught, and to make the blood flow more freely. This was attended with no better ſucceſs, and as the ſoldiers were clamorous, he was carried into a ſtove, and ſuffocated by the ſteam, on the 12th of April, in the 65th year of the Chriſtian era, in his 53d year. His body was burnt without pomp or funeral ceremony, according to his will, which he had made when he enjoyed the moſt unbounded favors of Nero. The compoſitions of Seneca are numerous, and chiefly on moral ſubjects. He is admired for his refined ſentiments and virtuous precepts. His ſtile is nervous, it abounds with ornament, and ſeems well ſuited to the taſte of the age in which he lived. The deſire of recommending himſelf and his writings to the world, obliged him too often to depreciate the merit of the antients, and to ſink into obſcurity. His treatiſes are de irâ, de conſolatione, de Providentiâ, de tranquillitate animi, de clementiâ, de ſapientis conſtantiâ, de otio ſapientis, de brevitate vitæ, de beneficiis, de vitâ beatâ, beſides his naturales quæſtiones, ludus in Claudium, moral letters, &c. There are alſo ſome tragedies aſcribed to Seneca. Quintilian ſuppoſes that the Medea is his compoſition, and, according to others, the Troas and the Hippolytus, were alſo written by him, and the Agamemnon, Hercules furens, Thyeſtes & Hercules in Oeta by his father Seneca the declaimer. The beſt editions of Seneca are thoſe of Antwerp, fol. 1615, and of Gronovius, 3 vols. Amſt. 1672; and thoſe of his tragedies, are that of Schroder's, 4to. Delph. 1728. and the 8vo. of Gronovius, L. Bat. 1682. Tacit. Ann. 12, &c.—Dio.—Sueton. in Ner, &c. —Quintil.

SENIA, a town of Liburnia, now Segna. Plin. 3, c. 21.

SENŎNES, an uncivilized nation of Gallia Tranſalpina, who left their native poſſeſſions, and under the conduct of Brennus invaded Italy, and pillaged Rome. They afterwards united with the Umbri, Latins, and Etrurians, to make war againſt the Romans, till they were totally deſtroyed by Dolabella. The chief of their towns in that part of Italy where they ſettled near Umbria, and which from them was called Senogallia, were Fanum Fortunæ, Sena, Piſaurum, and Ariminum. [*Vid. SENTINUM, a town of Umbria. Liv. 10, c. 27 & 30.

SENTIUS CN. a governor of Syria, under the emperors.——A governor of Macedonia.——Septimius, one of the ſoldiers of Pompey, who aſſiſted the Egyptians in murdering him.——A Roman emperor. Vid. Severus.——A writer in the reign of the emperor Alexander, of whoſe life he wrote an account in Latin, or, according to others, in Greek.

SEPIAS, a cape of Theſſaly now St. George.

SEPLASIA, a place of Capua, where ointments were ſold. Cic. Piſ. 7, & 11.

SEPTEM AQUÆ, a portion of the lake near Reate. Cic. 4. Att. 15.——Fratres, a mountain of Mauritania, now Gebel-Mouſa. Strab. 17.——Maria, the entrance of the ſeven mouths of the Po.

SEPTEMPEDA, a town of Picenum.

SEPTERION, a feſtival obſerved once in nine years at Delphi, in honor of Apollo. It was a repreſentation of the purſuit of Python by Apollo, and of the victory obtained by the god.

TIT. SEPTIMIUS, a Roman knight diſtinguiſhed by his poetical compoſitions both lyric and tragic. He was intimate with Auguſtus as well as Horace, who has addreſſed the 6 of his 2 lib. of Odes to him. ——A centurion put to death, &c. Tacit. A. 1, c. 32.

L. SEPTIMULEIUS, a friend of C. Gracchus. He ſuffered himſelf to be bribed by Opimius, and had the meanneſs to carry his friend's head fixed to a pole through the ſtreets of Rome.

SEQUINIUS, a native of Alba, who married one of his daughters to Curiatius of Alba, and the other to Horatius, a citizen of Rome. The two daughters were brought to bed on the ſame day, each of three male children.

SERAPIO, a ſirname given to one of the Scipios, becauſe he reſembled a ſwine herd of that name.——A Greek poet who floriſhed in the age of Trajan. He was intimate with Plutarch.——An Egyptian put to death by Achillas, when he came at the head of an embaſſy from Ptolemy, who was a priſoner in the hands of J. Cæſar. ——A painter. Plin. 35, c. 10.

SERĀPIS, one of the Egyptian deities, ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Oſiris. He had a magnificent temple at Memphis, another very rich at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worſhip of Serapis was introduced at Rome, by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A. D. 146, and the myſteries celebrated on the 6th of May, but with ſo much licentiouſneſs that the ſenate were ſoon after obliged to aboliſh it. Herodotus, who ſpeaks in a very circumſtantial manner of the deities, and of the religion of the Egyptians, makes no mention of the god Serapis. Apollodorus ſays it is the ſame as the bull Apis. Pauſ. 1, c. 18. l. 2, c. 34.—Tacit. Hiſt. 4, c. 83.—Strab. 17.—Martial. 9, ep. 30.

SERBŌNIS, a lake between Egypt and Paleſtine.

SERĒNA, a daughter of Theodoſius who married Stilicho. She was put to death, &c. Claudian.

Sereniānus, a favorite of Gallus, the brother of Julian. He was put to death.

Serēnus Samonicus, a phyſician in the age of the emperor Severus and Caracalla. There remains a poem of his compoſition on medicine, the laſt edition of which is that of 1706, in 8vo. Amſt.——Vibius, a governor of Spain accuſed of cruelty in the government of his province, and put to death by order of Tiberius.

Seres, a nation of Aſia, according to Ptolemy, between the Ganges and the eaſtern ocean. They were naturally of a meek diſpoſition. Silk, of which the fabrication was unknown to the antients, who imagined that the materials were collected from the leaves of trees, was brought to Rome from their country, and on that account it received the name of Sericum, and thence a garment or dreſs of ſilk is called ſerica veſtis. Heliogabalus, the Roman emperor, was the firſt who wore a ſilk dreſs, which at that time was ſold for its weight in gold. It afterwards became very cheap, and conſequently was the common dreſs among the Romans. Some ſuppoſe that the Seres are the ſame as the Chineſe. Ptol. 6, c. 16.—Horat. 1, od. 29, v. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 19. l. 10, v. 142 & 292.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 14, v. 6.—Virg. G. 2, v. 121.

Sergestus, a ſailor in the fleet of Æneas, from whom the family of the Sergii at Rome were deſcended. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 121.

Sergia, a Roman matron. She conſpired with others to poiſon their huſbands. The plot was diſcovered, and Sergia, with ſome of her accomplices, drank poiſon and died.

Sergius, one of the names of Catiline.——A military tribune at the ſiege of Veii. The family of the Sergii was patrician, and branched out into the ſeveral families of the Fidenates, Sili, Catilinæ, Nattæ, Ocellæ, and Planci.

Sergius and Sergiōlus, a deformed youth, greatly admired by the Roman ladies in Juvenal's age. Juv. 6, v. 105 & ſeq.

Serīphus, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, about 36 miles in circumference, according to Pliny only 12, very barren and uncultivated. The Romans generally ſent their criminals there in baniſhment, and it was there that Caſſius Severus the orator was exiled, and there he died. According to Ælian, the frogs of this iſland never croaked, but when they were removed from the iſland to another place, they were more noiſy and clamorous than others, hence the proverb of ſeriphia rana, applied to a man who neither ſpeaks nor ſings. This however is found to be a miſtake by modern travellers. It was on the coaſt of Seriphos that the cheſt was diſcovered in which Acriſius had expoſed his daughter Danae, and her ſon Perſeus. Strab. 10.—*Ælian. Sermyla, a town of Macedonia. Herodot. 7, c, 122.

Serrānus, a ſirname given to Cincinnatus, becauſe he was found ſowing his fields when told that he had been elected dictator. Some however ſuppoſe that Serranus was a different perſon from Cincinnatus. Plin. 18, c. 3.—Liv. 3, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844.——One of the auxiliaries of Turnus, killed in the night by Niſus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 335.——A poet of ſome merit in Domitian's reign. Juv. 7, v. 80.

Seron, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Serrheum, a fortified place of Thrace. Liv. 31, c. 16.

Quintus Sertorius, a Roman general born at Nurſia. His firſt campaign was under the great Marius, againſt the Teutones and Cimbri. He viſited the enemy's camp as a ſpy, and had the misfortune to loſe one eye in the firſt battle he fought. When Marius and Cinna entered Rome and ſlaughtered all their enemies, Sertorius accompanied them, but he expreſſed his ſorrow and concern at the melancholy death of ſo many of his countrymen. He afterwards fled for ſafety into Spain, when Sylla had proſcribed him, and in this diſtant province he behaved himſelf with ſo much addreſs and valor that he was looked upon as the prince of the country. The Luſitanians univerſally revered and loved him, and the Roman general did not ſhow himſelf leſs attentive to their intereſt, by eſtabliſhing public ſchools, and educating the children of the country in the polite arts, and the literature of Greece and Rome. He had eſtabliſhed a ſenate, over which he preſided with conſular authority, and the Romans, who followed his ſtandard, paid equal reverence to his perſon. They were experimentally convinced of his valor and magnanimity as a general, and the artful manner in which he impoſed upon the credulity of his adherents in the garb of religion, did not diminiſh his reputation. He pretended to hold commerce with heaven by means of a white hind which he had tamed with great ſucceſs, and which followed him every where, even in the field of battle. The ſucceſs of Sertorius in Spain, and his popularity among the natives, alarmed the Romans.

Romans. They ſent ſome troops to oppoſe him, but with little ſucceſs. Four armies were found inſufficient to cruſh or even hurt Sertorius; and Pompey and Metellus, who never engaged an enemy without obtaining the victory, were driven with diſhonor from the field. But the favorite of the Luſitanians was expoſed to the dangers which uſually attend greatneſs. Perpenna, one of his officers who was jealous of his fame, and tired of a ſuperior, conſpired againſt him. At a banquet the conſpirators began to open their intentions by ſpeaking with freedom and licentiouſneſs in the preſence of Sertorius, whoſe age and character had hitherto claimed deference from others. Perpenna overturned a glaſs of wine as a ſignal to the reſt of the conſpirators, and immediately Antonius, one of his officers, ſtabbed Sertorius, and the example was followed by all the reſt, 73 years before Chriſt. Sertorius has been commended for his love of juſtice and moderation. The flattering deſcription he heard of the Fortunate Iſlands when he paſſed into the weſt of Africa, almoſt tempted him to bid adieu to the world, and perhaps he would have retired from the noiſe of war, and the clamors of envy, to end his days in the boſom of a peaceful and ſolitary iſland, had not the ſtronger calls of ambition and the love of fame prevailed over the intruding reflections of a moment. It has been obſerved, that in his latter days Sertorius became indolent, and fond of luxury and wanton cruelty; yet we muſt confeſs, that in affability, clemency, complaiſance, generoſity, and military valor, he not only ſurpaſſed his contemporaries, but the reſt of the Romans. Plut. in vitâ.—Patere. 2, c. 30, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 21, &c.—Appian. de Civ.—Val. Max. 1, c. 2. l. 7, c. 3.

SERVÆUS, a man accuſed by Tiberius of being privy to the conſpiracy of Sejanus. Tacit. A. 6, c. 7.

SERVIĀNUS, a conſul in the reign of Adrian. He was a great favorite of the emperor Trajan.

SERVILIA, a ſiſter of Cato of Utica, greatly enamoured of J. Cæſar, though her brother was one of the moſt inveterate enemies of her lover. To convince Cæſar of her affection, ſhe ſent him a letter filled with the moſt tender expreſſions of regard for his perſon. The letter was delivered to Cæſar in the ſenate houſe, while they were debating about puniſhing the aſſociates of Catiline's conſpiracy; and when Cato ſaw it, he exclaimed that it was a letter from the conſpirators, and inſiſted immediately on its being made public. Upon this Cæſar gave it to Cato, and the ſtern ſenator had no ſooner read its contents, than he threw it back with the words of take it drunkard. From the intimacy which exiſted between Servilia and Cæſar, ſome have ſuppoſed that the dictator was the father of M. Brutus. Plut. in Cæſ.—C. Nep. in Attic. ——Another ſiſter of Cato, who married Silanus. Id.——A daughter of Thraſea, put to death by order of Nero, with her father. Her crime was the conſulting of magicians, only to know what would happen in her family.

SERVILIA LEX de pecuniis repetundis, by C. Servilius the prætor, A. U. C. 653. It puniſhed ſeverely ſuch as were guilty of peculation and extortion in the provinces. Its particulars are not preciſely known.—— Another, de judicibus, by Q. Servilius Cæpio, the conſul, A. U. C. 647. It divided the right of judging, between the ſenators and the equites, a privilege, which though originally belonging to the ſenators, had been taken from them and given to the equites.——Another, de civitate, by C. Servilius, ordained that if a Latin accuſed a Roman ſenator, ſo that he was condemned, the accuſer ſhould be honored with the name and the privileges of a Roman citizen. ——Another, agraria, by P. Servilius Rullus, the tribune, A. U. C. 690. It required the immediate ſale of certain houſes and lands which belonged to the people, for the purchaſe of others in a different part of Italy. It required that ten commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to ſee it carried into execution, but Cicero prevented its paſſing into a law by the three orations which he pronounced againſt it.

SERVILIĀNUS, a Roman conſul defeated by Viriathus, in Spain, &c.

SERVILIUS QUINTUS, a Roman who in his dictatorſhip defeated the Æqui.—— Publius, a conſul who ſupported the cauſe of the people againſt the nobles, and obtained a triumph in ſpite of the oppoſition of the ſenate, after defeating the Volſci. He afterwards changed his opinions, and very violently oppoſed the people, becauſe they had illiberally treated him.——A proconſul killed at the battle of Cannæ by Annibal.——Ahala, a maſter of horſe to the dictator Cincinnatus. When Mælius refuſed to appear before the dictator, to anſwer the accuſations which were brought againſt him on ſuſpicion of his aſpiring to tyranny, Ahala ſlew him in the midſt of the people, whoſe protection he claimed. Ahala was accuſed for this murder, and baniſhed, but this ſentence was afterwards repealed. He was raiſed to the dictatorſhip.——Marcus, a man who pleaded in favor of Paulus Æmilius, &c.——An augur proſecuted by Lucullus for his inatten-tion in his office. He was acquitted.——A prætor ordered by the ſenate to forbid Sylla to approach Rome. He was ridiculed and inſulted by the conqueror's ſoldiers.——A man appointed to guard the ſea-coaſt of Pontus, by Pompey.——Publius, a pro-conſul of Aſia during the age of Mithridates. He conquered Iſauria, for which ſervice he was ſirnamed Iſauricus, and rewarded with a triumph.——A Roman general who defeated an army of Etrurians.——An informer in the court of Tiberius.——A favorite of Auguſtus.——Geminus, a Roman conſul who oppoſed Annibal with ſucceſs.——Nonianus, a Latin hiſtorian who wrote an hiſtory of Rome in the reign of Nero. There were more than one writer of this name, as Pliny ſpeaks of a Servilius remarkable for his eloquence and learning; and Quintilian mentions another equally illuſtrious for his genius and literary merit.——Caſca, one of Cæſar's murderers.——The family of the Servilii was of patrician rank, and came to ſettle at Rome after the deſtruction of Alba, where they were promoted to the higheſt offices of the ſtate. To the ſeveral branches of this family were attached the different ſirnames of Ahala, Axilla, Priſcus, Cæpio, Structus, Geminus, Pulex, Vatia, Caſca, Fidenas, Longus, and Tucca.——Lacus, a lake near Rome. Cic. S. Roſ. 32.

Servius Tullius, the ſixth king of Rome, was ſon of Ocriſia, a ſlave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man ſlain in the defence of his country againſt the Romans. Ocriſia, was given by Tarquin to Tanaquil his wife, and ſhe brought up her ſon in the king's family, and added the name of Servius to that which he had inherited from his father to denote his ſlavery. Young Servius was educated in the palace of the monarch with great care, and though originally a ſlave, he raiſed himſelf ſo much to conſequence, that Tarquin gave him his daughter in marriage. His own private merit and virtues recommended him to notice not leſs than the royal favors, and Servius, become the favorite of the people and the darling of the ſoldiers, by his liberality and complaiſance, was eaſily raiſed to the throne on the death of his father-in-law. Rome had no reaſon to repent of her choice. Servius endeared himſelf ſtill more as a warrior and as a legiſlator. He defeated the Veientes and the Tuſcans, and by a proper act of policy he eſtabliſhed the cenſus, which told him that Rome contained about 84 thouſand inhabitants. He encreaſed the number of the tribes, he beautified and adorned the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Eſquilinus. He alſo divided the Roman people into tribes, and that he might not ſeem to neglect the worſhip of the gods, he built ſeveral temples to the goddeſs of fortune, to whom he deemed himſelf particularly indebted for obtaining the kingdom. He alſo built a temple to Diana on mount Aventine, and raiſed himſelf a palace on the hill Eſquilinus. Servius married his two daughters to the grandſons of his father-in-law; the elder to Tarquin, and the younger to Arunx. This union, as might be ſuppoſed, tended to enſure the peace of his family; but if ſuch were his expectations, he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Arunx, naturally fierce and impetuous, murdered her own huſband to unite herſelf to Tarquin, who had likewiſe aſſaſſinated his wife. Theſe bloody meaſures were no ſooner purſued than Servius was murdered by his own ſon-in-law, and his daughter Tullia ſhowed herſelf ſo inimical to filial gratitude and piety, that ſhe ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B. C. 534. His death was univerſally lamented, and the ſlaves annually celebrated a feſtival in his honor, in the temple of Diana, on mount Aventine, the day that he was murdered. Tarquinia his wife buried his remains privately, and died the following day. Liv. 1, c. 41.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 6.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 53.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Ovid. Gr.——A friend of Sylla, who applied for the conſulſhip to no purpoſe.——Cornelius, a conſul in the firſt ages of the republic, &c.——Sulpitius, an orator in the age of Cicero and Hortenſius. He was ſent as ambaſſador to M. Antony, and died before his return. Cicero obtained a ſtatue for him from the ſenate and the Roman people, which was raiſed in the Campus Martius. His works are loſt. Cic. in Brut. Phil. &c.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.——A deſpicable informer in the Auguſtan age. Horat. 2. Sat. 1, v. 47.——Honoratus Maurus, a learned grammarian in the age of young Theodoſius. He wrote Latin commentaries upon Virgil, ſtill extant.

Sesara, a daughter of Celeus, king of Eleuſis, ſiſter to Triptolemus.

Sesostris, a celebrated king of Egypt ſome ages before the Trojan war. His father ordered all the children in his dominions who were born on the ſame day with him to be publicly educated, and to paſs their youth in the company of his ſon. This ſucceeded in the higheſt degree, and Seſoſtris had the pleaſure to find himſelf ſurrounded rounded by a number of faithful miniſters and active warriors, whoſe education and intimacy with their prince rendered them inſeparably devoted to his intereſt. When Seſoſtris had ſucceeded on his father's throne, he became ambitious of military fame, and after he had divided his kingdom into 36 different diſtricts, he marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conqueſt of the world. Libya, Æthiopia, Arabia, with all the iſlands of the Red Sea, were conquered, and the victorious monarch marched through Aſia and penetrated farther into the eaſt than the conqueror of Darius. He alſo invaded Europe and ſubdued the Thracians; and that the fame of his conqueſts might long ſurvive him, he placed columns in the ſeveral provinces he had ſubdued; and many ages after, this pompous inſcription was read in many parts of Aſia, Seſoſtris, the king of kings, has conquered this territory by his arms. At his return home the monarch employed his time in encouraging the fine arts and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. He erected 100 temples to the gods for the victories he had obtained, and mounds of earth were heaped up in ſeveral parts of Egypt, where cities were built for the reception of the inhabitants during the inundations of the Nile. Some canals were alſo dug near Memphis to facilitate navigation and the communication of one province with another. In his old age Seſoſtris, grown infirm and blind, deſtroyed himſelf, after a reign of 44 years according to ſome. His mildneſs towards the conquered has been admired, while ſome have upbraided him for his cruelty and inſolence in cauſing his chariot to be drawn by ſome of the monarchs whom he had conquered. The age of Seſoſtris is ſo remote from every authentic record, that many have ſupported that the actions and conqueſts aſcribed to this monarch are uncertain and totally fabulous. Herodot. 2, c. 102, &c.—Diod. 1.—*Val. Setăbis, a town of Spain between Carthage and Saguntum. There was alſo a ſmall river of the ſame name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 16, v. 474.

Sethon, a prieſt of Vulcan, who made himſelf king of Egypt after the death of Anyſis. He was attacked by the Aſſyrians and delivered from this powerful enemy by an immenſe number of rats, which in one night gnawed their bow ſtrings and thongs, ſo that on the morrow their arms were found to be uſeleſs. From this wonderful circumſtance Sethon had a ſtatue which repreſented him with a rat in his hand, with the inſcription of, Whoever fixes his eyes upon me, let him be pious. Herodot. 2, c. 141.

Setia, a town of Latium above the Pontine marſhes, celebrated for its wines, which Auguſtus is ſaid to have preferred to all others. Plin. 14, c. 6.—Juv. 5, v. 34. Sat. 10, v. 27.—Martial. 13, ep. 112.

Sevĕra, Julia Aquilia, a Roman lady, whom the emperor Heliogabalus married. She was ſoon after repudiated, though poſſeſſed of all the charms of mind and body which could captivate the moſt virtuous.——Valeria, the wife of Valentinian, and the mother of Gratian, was well known for her avarice and ambition. The emperor, her huſband, repudiated her, and afterwards took her again. Her prudent advice at laſt enſured her ſon Gratian on the imperial throne.——The wife of Philip the Roman emperor.

Severiānus, a governor of Macedonia, father-in-law to the emperor Philip.——A general of the Roman armies in the reign of Valentinian, defeated by the Germans.——A ſon of the emperor Severus.

Sevērus, Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor born at Leptis in Africa, of a noble family. He gradually exerciſed all the offices of the ſtate, and recommended himſelf to the notice of the world by an ambitious mind, and a reſtleſs activity, that could, for the gratification of avarice, endure the moſt complicated hardſhips. After the murder of Pertinax, Severus reſolved to remove Didius Julianus who had bought the imperial purple when expoſed to ſale by the licentiouſneſs of the pretorians, and therefore he proclaimed himſelf emperor on the borders of Illyricum, where he was ſtationed againſt the barbarians. To ſupport himſelf in this bold meaſure, he

he took as his partner in the empire Albinus, who was at the head of the Roman forces in Britain, and immediately marched towards Rome, to cruſh Didius and all his partizans. He was received as he advanced through the country with univerſal acclamations, and Julianus himſelf was ſoon deſerted by his favorites, and aſſaſſinated by his own ſoldiers. The reception of Severus at Rome was ſufficient to gratify his pride; the ſtreets were ſtrewed with flowers, and the ſubmiſſive ſenate were ever ready to grant whatever honors or titles the conqueror claimed. In profeſſing that he had aſſumed the purple only to revenge the death of the virtuous Pertinax, Severus gained many adherents, and was enabled not only to diſarm, but to baniſh the pretorians, whoſe inſolence and avarice were become alarming not only to the citizens, but to the emperor. But while he was victorious at Rome, Severus did not forget that there was another competitor for the imperial purple. Peſcennius Niger was in the eaſt at the head of a powerful army, and with the name and enſigns of Auguſtus. Many obſtinate battles were fought between the troops and officers of the imperial rivals, till on the plains of Iſſus, which had been above five centuries before covered with the blood of the Perſian ſoldiers of Darius, Niger was totally ruined by the loſs of 20,000 men. The head of Niger was cut off, and ſent to the conqueror, who puniſhed in a moſt cruel manner all the partizans of his unfortunate rival. Severus afterwards pillaged Byzantium, which had ſhut her gates againſt him; and after he had conquered ſeveral nations in the eaſt, he returned to Rome, reſolved to deſtroy Albinus, with whom he had hitherto reluctantly ſhared the imperial power. He attempted to aſſaſſinate him by his emiſſaries; but when this had failed of ſucceſs, Severus had recourſe to arms, and the fate of the empire was again decided on the plains of Gaul. Albinus was defeated, and the conqueror was ſo elated with the recollection that he had now no longer a competitor for the purple, that he inſulted the dead body of his rival, and ordered it to be thrown into the Rhone, after he had ſuffered it to putrify before the door of his tent, and to be torn to pieces by his dogs. The family and the adherents of Albinus ſhared his fate; and the return of Severus to the capital exhibited the bloody triumphs of Marius and Sylla. The richeſt of the citizens were ſacrificed, and their money became the property of the emperor. The wicked Commodus received divine honors, and his murderers were puniſhed in the moſt wanton manner. Tired of the inactive life he led in Rome, Severus marched into the eaſt, with his two ſons Caracalla and Geta, and with uncommon ſucceſs made himſelf maſter of Seleucia, Babylon, and Cteſiphon, and advanced without oppoſition far into the Parthian territories. From Parthia the emperor marched towards the more ſouthern provinces of Aſia; after he had viſited the tomb of Pompey the Great, he entered Alexandria; and after he had granted a ſenate to that celebrated city, he viewed with the moſt criticiſing and inquiſitive curioſity the ſeveral monuments and ruins which that antient kingdom contains. The revolt of Britain recalled him from the eaſt. After he had reduced it under his power, he built a wall acroſs the northern parts of the iſland, to defend it againſt the frequent invaſions of the Caledonians. Hitherto ſucceſsful againſt his enemies, Severus now found the peace of his family diſturbed. Caracalla attempted to murder his father as he was concluding a treaty of peace with the Britons; and the emperor was ſo ſhocked at the undutifulneſs of his ſon, that on his return home he called him into his preſence, and after he had upbraided him for his ingratitude and perfidy, he offered him a drawn ſword, adding, If you are ſo ambitious of reigning alone, now imbrue your hands in the blood of your father, and let not the eyes of the world be witneſſes of your want of filial tenderneſs. If theſe words checked Caracalla, yet he did not ſhew himſelf concerned, and Severus worn out with infirmities which the gout and the uneaſineſs of his mind encreaſed, ſoon after died, exclaiming that he had been every thing man could wiſh, but that he was then nothing. Some ſay that he wiſhed to poiſon himſelf, but that when this was denied, he eat to great exceſs, and ſoon after expired at York on the 4th of February, in the 211th year of the Chriſtian era in the 66th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years 8 months and 3 days. Severus has been ſo much admired for his military talents, that ſome have called him the moſt warlike of the Roman emperors. As a monarch he was cruel, and it has been obſerved that he never did an act of humanity, or forgave a fault. In his diet he was temperate, and he always ſhowed himſelf an open enemy to pomp and ſplendor. He loved the appellation of a man of letters, and he even compoſed an hiſtory of his own reign, which ſome have praiſed for its correctneſs and veracity. However cruel Severus may appear in his puniſhments and in his revenge, many have endeavoured to exculpate him, and obſerved that there was need of ſeverity in an empire whoſe morals were ſo corrupted, and where no leſs than 2000 perſons were accuſed of adultery during the ſpace of 17 years. Of him, as of Auguſtus, ſome were fond to ſay, that it would have been better for the world, if he had never been born, or had never died. Dio.—Herodian.—Victor, &c.——Alexander, (Marcus Aurelius) a native of Phœnicia, adopted by Heliogabalus. His father's name was Geneſius Marcianus, and his mother's, Julia Mammæa, and he received the ſurname of Alexander, becauſe he was born in a temple ſacred to Alexander the Great. He was carefully educated, and his mother, by paying particular attention to his morals, and the character of his preceptors, preſerved him from thoſe infirmities, and that licentiouſneſs, which old age too often attributes to the depravity of youth. At the death of Heliogabalus, who had been jealous of his virtues, Alexander, though only in the 14th year of his age, was proclaimed emperor, and his nomination was approved by the univerſal ſhouts of the army, and the congratulations of the ſenate. He had not long been on the throne before the peace of the empire was diſturbed by the incurſions of the Perſians. Alexander marched into the eaſt without delay, and ſoon obtained a deciſive victory over the barbarians. At his return to Rome he was honored with a triumph, but the revolt of the Germans ſoon after called him away from the indolence of the capital. His expedition in Germany was attended with ſome ſucceſs, but the virtues and the amiable qualities of Alexander were forgotten in the ſtern and ſullen ſtrictneſs of the diſciplinarian. His ſoldiers, fond of repoſe, murmured againſt his ſeverity; their clamors were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, in the midſt of his camp, after a reign of 13 years and nine days, on the 18th of March, A. D. 235. His mother Mammæa ſhared his fate with all his friends; but this was no ſooner known than the ſoldiers puniſhed with immediate death all ſuch as had been concerned in the murder, except Maximinus. Alexander has been admired for his many virtues, and every hiſtorian, except Herodian, is bold to aſſert, that if he had lived, the Roman empire might ſoon have been freed from thoſe tumults and abuſes which continually diſturbed her peace, and kept the lives of her emperors and ſenators in perpetual alarms. His ſeverity in puniſhing offences was great, and ſuch as had robbed the public, were they even the moſt intimate friends of the emperor, were indiſcriminately ſacrificed to the tranquillity of the ſtate which they had violated. The great offices of the ſtate, which had before his reign been expoſed to ſale, and occupied by favorites, were now beſtowed upon merit, and Alexander could boaſt that all his officers were men of truſt and abilities. He was a patron of literature, and he dedicated the hours of relaxation to the ſtudy of the beſt Greek and Latin hiſtorians, orators, and poets; and in the public ſchools which his liberality and the deſire of encouraging learning had founded, he often heard with pleaſure and ſatisfaction the eloquent ſpeeches and declamations of his ſubjects. The provinces were well ſupplied with proviſions, and Rome was embelliſhed with many ſtately buildings and magnificent porticos. Alex. vit. — Herodian. — Zoſim. — Victor. ——Flavius Valerius, a native of Illyricum nominated Cæſar by Galerius. Sibæ, a people of India. Strabo.

Sibaris. Vid. Sybaris.

Sibīni, a people near the Suevi.

Siburtius, a ſatrap of Arachoſia, in the age of Alexander, &c.

Sibyllæ, certain women inſpired by heaven, who floriſhed in different parts of the world. Their number is unknown. Plato ſpeaks of one, others of two, Pliny of three, Ælian of four, and Varro of ten, an opinion which is univerſally adopted by the learned. Theſe ten Sibyls generally reſided in the following places, Perſia, Libya, Delphi, Cumæ in Italy, Erythræa, Samos, Cumæ in Æolia, Marpeſſa on the Helleſpont, Ancyra in Phrygia, and Tiburtis. The moſt celebrated of the Sibyls is that of Cumæ in Italy, whom ſome have called by the different names of Amalthæa, Demophile, Herophile, Daphne, Manto, Phemonoe, and Deiphobe. It is ſaid that Apollo became enamoured of her, and that to make her ſenſible of his paſſion, he offered to give her whatever ſhe ſhould aſk. The Sibyl demanded to live as many years as ſhe had grains of ſand in her hand, but unfortunately forgot to aſk for the enjoyment of the health, vigor, and bloom, of which ſhe was then in poſſeſſion. The god granted her her requeſt, but ſhe refuſed to gratify the paſſion of her lover, though he offered her perpetual youth and beauty. Some time after ſhe became old and decrepit, her form decayed, melancholy paleneſs and haggard looks ſucceeded to bloom and chearfulneſs. She had already lived about 700 years when Æneas came to Italy, and as ſome have imagined, ſhe had three centuries more to live before her years were as numerous as the grains of ſand which ſhe had in her hand. She gave Æneas inſtructions how to find his father in the infernal regions, and even conducted him to the entrance of hell. It was uſual in the Sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves which ſhe placed at the entrance of her cave, and it required particular care in ſuch as conſulted her to take up theſe leaves before they were diſperſed by the wind, as their meaning then became incomprehenſible. According to the moſt authentic hiſtorians of the Roman republic, one of the Sibyls came to the palace of Tarquin the ſecond, with nine volumes, which ſhe offered to ſell for a very high price. The monarch diſregarded her, and ſhe immediately diſappeared, and ſoon after returned, when ſhe had burned three of the volumes. She aſked the ſame price for the remaining ſix books; and when Tarquin refuſed to buy them, ſhe burned three more, and ſtill perſiſted in demanding the ſame ſum of money for the three that were left. This extraordinary behaviour aſtoniſhed Tarquin; he bought the books, and the Sibyl inſtantly vaniſhed, and never after appeared to the world. Theſe books were preſerved with great care by the monarch, and called the Sibylline verſes. A college of prieſts was appointed to have the care of them; and ſuch reverence did the Romans entertain for theſe prophetic books, that they were conſulted with the greateſt ſolemnity, and only when the ſtate ſeemed to be in danger. When the capitol was burnt in the troubles of Sylla, Sylla, the Sibylline verſes, which were depoſited there, periſhed in the conflagration; and to repair the loſs which the republic ſeemed to have ſuſtained, commiſſioners were immediately ſent to different parts of Greece, to collect whatever verſes could be found of the inſpired writings of the Sibyls. The fate of theſe Sibylline verſes, which were collected after the conflagration of the capitol, is unknown. There are now many Sibylline verſes extant, but they are univerſally reckoned ſpurious; and it is evident that they were compoſed in the ſecond century, by ſome of the followers of Chriſtianity, who wiſhed to convince the heathens of their error, by aſſiſting the cauſe of truth with the arms of pious artifice. The word Sibyl ſeems to be derived from σιος, Æolice for Διος Jovis, and βουλη conſilium. Plut. in Phæd.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 35.—Pauſ. 10, c. 12, &c.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. SICA, a man who ſhewed much attention to Cicero in his baniſhment. Some ſuppoſe that he is the ſame as the Vibius Siculus mentioned by Plutarch in Cic.—Cic. ad Attic. 8, ep. 12, ad div. 14, ep. 4, 15.

SICAMBRI, or SYGAMBRI, a people of Germany, conquered by the Romans. They revolted under Auguſtus, who marched againſt them, but did not totally reduce them. Druſus conquered them, and they were carried away from their native country to inhabit ſome of the more weſterly provinces of Gaul. Dio. 54.—Strab. 4.—Horat. 4. Od. 2, v. 36. Od. 14, v. 51.—Tacit. 2, Ann. 26.

SICAMBRIA, the country of the Sicambri, formed the modern province of Guelderland. Claud. in Eutrop. 1, v. 383.

SICANI, a people of Spain, who left their native country and paſſed into Italy, and afterwards into Sicily, which they called Sicania. They inhabited the neighbourhood of mount Ætna, where they built ſome cities and villages. Some reckoned them the next inhabitants of the iſland after the Cyclops. They were afterwards driven from their antient poſſeſſions by the Siculi, and retired into the weſtern parts of the iſland. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Ovid. Met. 5 & 13.—Virg. Ecl. 10. Æn. 7, v. 795.—Diod. 5.—Horat. ep. 17, v. 32.

SICANIA and SICANIA, an antient name of Italy, which it received from the Sicani, or from Sicanus, their king, or from Sicanus, a ſmall river in Spain, in the territory where they lived, as ſome ſuppoſe. The name is alſo given to Sicily. Vid. Sicani.

SICCA, a town of Numidia. Sal. in Jug. 56.

SICELIS, (SICELIDES, plur.) an epithet applied to the inhabitants of Sicily. The Muſes are called Sicelides by Virgil, becauſe Theocritus was a native of Sicily, whom the Latin poet, as a writer of Bucolic poetry, profeſſed to imitate. Virg. Ec. 4.

SICHÆUS, called alſo Sicharbas and Acherbas, was a prieſt of the temple of Hercules in Phœnicia. His father's name was Pliſthenes. He married Eliſa, the daughter of Belus, and ſiſter of king Pygmalion, better known by the name of Dido. He was ſo extremely rich, that his brother-in-law murdered him to obtain his poſſeſſions. This murder Pygmalion concealed from his ſiſter Dido; and he amuſed her by telling her, that her huſband was gone upon an affair of importance, and that he would ſoon return. This would have perhaps ſucceeded had not the ſhades of Sichæus appeared to Dido, and related to her the cruelty of Pygmalion, and adviſed her to fly from Tyre, after ſhe had previouſly ſecured ſome treaſures, which, as he mentioned, were concealed in an obſcure and unknown place. According to Juſtin, Acerbas was the uncle of Dido. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.—Juſtin. 18, c. 4.

SICILIA, the largeſt and moſt celebrated iſland in the Mediterranean ſea, at the bottom of Italy. It was antiently called Sicania, Trinacria, and Triquetra. It is of a triangular form, and has three celebrated promontories, one looking towards Africa, called Lilybæum; Pachynum looking towards Greece; and Pelorum towards Italy. Sicily is about 600 miles in circumference, celebrated for its fertility, ſo much that it was called one of the granaries of Rome; and Pliny ſays that it rewards the huſbandman an hundred fold. Its moſt famous cities were Syracuſe, Meſſana, Leontini, Lilybæum, Agrigentum, Gela, Drepanum, Eryx, &c. The higheſt and moſt famous mountain in the iſland is Ætna, whoſe frequent eruptions are dangerous, and often fatal to the country and its inhabitants, from which circumſtance the antients ſuppoſed that the forges of Vulcan and the Cyclops were placed there. The poets feign that the Cyclops were the original inhabitants of this iſland, and that after them it came into the poſſeſſion of the Sicani, a people of Spain, and at laſt of the Siculi, a nation of Italy. [Vid. Siculi.] The plains of Enna are well known for their excellent honey, and, according to Diodorus, the hounds loſt their ſcent in hunting on account of the many odoriferous plants that profuſely perfumed the air. Ceres and Proſerpine were the chief deities of the place, and it was there, according to poetical tradition, that the latter was carried away by Pluto. The Phœnicians and Greeks ſettled ſome colonies there, and at laſt the Carthaginians became maſters of the whole iſland, till they were diſpoſſeſſed of it by the Romans in the Punic wars. Some authors ſuppoſe that Sicily was originally joined to the continent, and that it was ſeparated from Italy by an earthquake, and that the ſtreights of the Charybdis were formed. The inhabitants of Sicily were ſo fond of luxury, that Siculæ menſæ became proverbial. The rights of citizens of Rome were extended to them by M. Antony. Cic. 14. Att. 12. Verr. 2, c. 13.—Homer. Od. 9, &c.—Juſtin. 4, c. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 414, &c.—Ital. 14, v. 11, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 8, &c.——The iſland of Naxos, in the Ægean, was called Little Sicily, on account of its fruitfulneſs.

L. Sicinius Dentātus, a tribune of Rome, celebrated for his valor and the honors he obtained in the field of battle, during the period of 40 years, in which he was engaged in the Roman armies. He was preſent in 121 battles; he obtained 14 civic crowns; 3 mural crowns; 8 crowns of gold; 83 golden collars; 60 bracelets; 18 lances; 23 horſes with all their ornaments, and all as the reward of his uncommon ſervices. He could ſhow the ſcars of 45 wounds, which he had received all in the breaſt, particularly in oppoſing the Sabines when they took the capitol. The popularity of Sicinius became odious to Appius Claudius, who wiſhed to make himſelf abſolute at Rome, and therefore to remove him from the capitol, he ſent him to the army, by which, ſoon after his arrival, he was attacked and murdered. Of 100 men who were ordered to fall upon him, Sicinius killed 15, and wounded 30; and according to Dionyſius, the ſurviving number had recourſe to artifice to overpower him, by killing him with a ſhower of ſtones and darts thrown at a diſtance, about 405 years before the Chriſtian era. For this uncommon courage Sicinius has been called the Roman Achilles. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Dionyſ. 8.——Vellutus, one of the firſt tribunes in Rome. He raiſed cabals againſt Coriolanus, and was one of his accuſers. Plut. in Cor.——Sabinus, a Roman general who defeated the Volſci.

Sicĭnus, a man privately ſent by Themiſtocles to deceive Xerxes, and to adviſe him to attack the combined forces of the Greeks. He had been preceptor to Themiſtocles. Plut.——An iſland, &c.

Sicŏrus, now Segre, a river of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, riſing in the Pyrenæan mountains. It was near this river that J. Cæſar conquered Afranius and Petreius, the partizans of Pompey. Lucan. 4, v. 14, 130, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 3.

Sicŭli, a people of Italy, driven from their poſſeſſions by the Opici. They fled into Sicania, or Sicily, where they ſettled in the territories which the Sicani inhabited. They ſoon extended their borders, and after they had conquered their neighbours, the Sicani, they gave their name to the iſland. This, as ſome ſuppoſe, happened about 300 years before Greek colonies ſettled in the iſland, or about 1059 years before the Chriſtian era. Diod. 5.—Dionyſ. Hal.—Strab.

Sicŭlum fretum, the ſea which ſeparates Sicily from Italy, is 15 miles long, but in ſome places ſo narrow, that the barking of dogs can be heard from ſhore to ſhore. This ſtraight is ſuppoſed to have been formed by an earthquake, which ſeparated the iſland from the continent. Plin. 3, c. 8.

Sicyon, now Baſilico, a town of Peloponneſus, the capital of Sicyonia. It is celebrated as being the moſt antient kingdom of Greece, which began B. C. 2089, and ended B. C. 1088, under a ſucceſſion of monarchs of whom little is known, except the names. Ægialeus was the firſt king. Some ages after, Agamemnon made himſelf maſter of the place, and afterwards it fell into the hands of the Heraclidæ. It became very powerful in the time of the Achæan league, which it joined B. C. 251, at the perſuaſion of Aratus. The inhabitants of Sicyon are mentioned by ſome authors as diſſolute, and fond of luxury, hence the Sicyonian ſhoes, which were once very celebrated, were deemed marks of effeminacy. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Lucret. 1, v. 1118.—Liv. 32, c. 19. l. 33, c. 15.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Dem.—Pauſ. 2, c. 1, &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 54.—*Virg. Sicyonia, a province of Peloponneſus, on the bay of Corinth, of which Sicyon was the capital. It is the moſt eminent kingdom of Greece, and in its floriſhing ſituation not only its dependent ſtates, but alſo the whole Peloponneſus were called Sicyonia. The territory is ſaid to abound with corn, wine, and olives, and alſo with iron mines. It produced many celebrated men, particularly artiſts. Vid. Sicyon.

Sidicīnum, a town of Campania, called alſo Teanum. Vid. Teanum. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 727.

Sidon, an ancient city of Phœnicia, the capital of the country, with a famous harbour, now called Said. It is ſituate on the ſhores of the Mediterranean, at the diſtance of about 50 miles from Damaſcus, and 24 from Tyre. The people of Sidon are well known for their induſtry, their ſkill in arithmetic, in aſtronomy, and commercial affairs, and in ſea voyages. They however have the character of being very diſhoneſt. Their women were peculiarly happy in working embroidery. The invention of glaſs, of linen, and a beautiful purple dye, is attributed to them. The city of Sidon was taken by Ochus, king of Perſia, after the inhabitants had burnt themſelves and the city B. C. 351; but it was afterwards rebuilt by its inhabitants. Lucan. 3, v. 217. l. 10, v. 141.—Diod. 16.—Juſtin. 11. c. 10,—Plin. 36, c. 26.—Homer. Od. 15, v. 411.—Mela. 1, c. 12.

Sigæum, or Sigēum, now cape Ineibiſari, a town of Troas, on a promontory of the ſame name, where the Scamander falls into the ſea, extending ſix miles along the ſhore. It was near Sigæum that the greateſt part of the battles between the Greeks and Trojans were fought, as Homer mentions, and there Achilles was buried. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312. l. 7, v. 294.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 71.—Lucan. 9, v. 962.—Mela. 1, c. 18.—Strab. 13.—Dictyſ. Cret. 5, c. 12.

Signia, an antient town of Latium, whoſe inhabitants were called Signini. The wine of Signia was uſed by the antients for medicinal purpoſes. Martial. 13, ep. 116. ——A mountain of Phrygia. Plin. 5, c. 29.

Sigovessus, a prince among the Celtæ, in the reign of Tarquin. Liv. 5, c. 34.

Sigŷni, Sigunæ, or Sigynnæ, a nation of European Scythia, beyond the Danube. Herodot. 5, c. 9.

Sila, or Syla, a large wood in the country of the Brutii near the Apennines, abounding with much pitch. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 715.

Silāna Julia, a woman at the court of Nero, remarkable for her licentiouſneſs and impurities. She had married C. Julius, by whom ſhe was divorced.

D. Silānus, a ſon of T. Manlius Torquatus, accuſed of extortion in the management of the province of Macedonia. The father himſelf deſired to hear the complaints laid againſt his ſon, and after he had ſpent two days in examining the charges of the Macedonians, he pronounced on the third day his ſon guilty of extortion, and unworthy to be called a citizen of Rome. He alſo baniſhed him from his preſence, and ſo ſtruck was the ſon at the ſeverity of his father, that he hanged himſelf on the following night. Liv. 54.—Cic. de Finib.—Val. Max. 5, c. 8.——C. Junius, a conſul under Tiberius, accuſed of extortion, and baniſhed to the iſland of Cytheræa. Tacit.——Marcus, a lieutenant of Cæſar's armies in Gaul.——The father-in-law of Caligula. Suet. Cal. 22.——A proprætor in Spain, who routed the Carthaginian forces there, while Annibal was in Italy.——Turpilius, a lieutenant of Metellus againſt Jugurtha. He was accuſed by Marius, though totally innocent, and condemned by the malice of his judges. ——Torquatus, a man put to death by Nero.——Lucius, a man betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius. Nero took Octavia away from him, and on the day of her nuptials, Silanus killed himſelf. ——An augur in the army of the 10,000 Greeks, at their return from Cunaxa.

Sĭlărus, a river of Picenum, riſing in the Apennine mountains, and falling into the Tyrrhene ſea. Its waters, as it is reported, petrified all leaves that fell into it. Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 146.—Plin. 2, c. 103.—Silv. 2, v. 582.

Silēni, a people on the banks of the Indus. Plin. 6, c. 20.

Silēnus, a demi-god, who became the nurſe, the preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. He was, as ſome ſuppoſe, ſon of Pan, or according to others of Mercury, or of Terra. Malea in Leſbos was the place of his birth. After death he received ceived divine honors, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally repreſented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an aſs, crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated. He was once found by ſome peaſants in Phrygia, after he had loſt his way and could not follow Bacchus, and he was carried to king Midas, who received him with great attention. He detained him for ten days, and afterwards reſtored him to Bacchus, for which he was rewarded with the power of turning into gold whatever he touched. Some authors aſſert, that Silenus was a philoſopher, who accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition, and aſſiſted him by the ſoundneſs of his counſels. From this circumſtance, therefore, he is often introduced ſpeaking with all the gravity of a philoſopher concerning the formation of the world, and the nature of things. The Fauns in general, and the Satyrs are often called Sileni. Pauſ. 3, c. 25.—Philoſt.—Ovid. Met. 4.—Hygin. fab. 191.—Diod. 3, &c.—Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 48.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 18.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 13.——A Carthaginian hiſtorian who wrote an account of the affairs of his country in the Greek language.——An hiſtorian who wrote an account of Sicily.

SILICENSE, a river of Spain.

SILIS, a river of Venetia in Italy. Plin. 3, c. 18.

C. SILIUS ITALĬCUS, a Latin poet, who was originally at the bar, where he for ſome time diſtinguiſhed himſelf, till he retired from Rome more particularly to conſecrate his time to ſtudy. He was conſul the year that Nero was murdered. Pliny has obſerved, that when Trajan was inveſted with the imperial purple, Silius refuſed to come to Rome, and congratulate him like the reſt of his fellow citizens, a neglect which was never reſented by the emperor, or inſolently mentioned by the poet. Silius was in poſſeſſion of a houſe, where Cicero had lived, and another in which was the tomb of Virgil, and it has been juſtly remarked, that he looked upon no temple with greater reverence than upon the ſepulchre of the immortal poet, whoſe ſteps he followed, but whoſe fame he could not equal. The birth day of Virgil was yearly celebrated with unuſual pomp and ſolemnity by Silius; and for his partiality, not only to the memory, but to the compoſitions of the Mantuan poet, he has been called the ape of Virgil. Silius ſtarved himſelf when laboring under an impoſthume which his phyſicians were unable to remove, in the beginning of Trajan's reign, about the 75th year of his age. There remains a poem of Italicus, on the ſecond Punic war, greatly commended by Martial. The moderns have not been ſo favorable in their opinions concerning its merit. The poetry is weak and inelegant, yet the author deſerves to be commended for his purity, the authenticity of his narrations, and his intereſting deſcriptions. He has every where imitated Virgil, but with little ſucceſs. Silius was a great collector of antiquities. His ſon was honored with the conſulſhip during his life-time. The beſt editions of Italicus will be found to be Drakenborch's in 4to. Utr. 1717, and that of Cellarius, 8vo. Lipſ. 1695.—Mart. 11, ep. 49, &c.——Caius, a man of conſular dignity, greatly loved by Meſſalina for his comely appearance and elegant addreſs. Meſſalina obliged him to divorce his wife that ſhe might enjoy his company without intermiſſion. Silius was forced to comply, though with great reluctance, and he was at laſt put to death for the adulteries which the empreſs obliged him to commit. Tacit.—Suet.—Dio.——A tribune in Cæſar's legions in Gaul.——A commander in Germany, put to death by Sejanus. Tacit. A. 3 & 4.

SILPIA, a town of Spain. Liv. 28, c. 12.

SILVĀNUS, a rural deity, ſon of an Italian ſhepherd by a goat. From this circumſtance he is generally repreſented as half a man and half a goat. According to Virgil, he was ſon of Picus, or, as others report of Mars, or according to Plutarch, of Valeria Tuſculanaria, a young woman who introduced herſelf into her father's bed, and became pregnant by him. The worſhip of Silvanus was eſtabliſhed only in Italy, where, as ſome authors have imagined, he reigned in the age of Evander. This deity was ſometimes repreſented holding a cypreſs in his hand, becauſe he became enamoured of a beautiful youth called Cypariſſus, who was changed into a tree of the ſame name. Silvanus preſided over gardens and limits, and he is often confounded with the Fauns, Satyrs, and Silenus. Plut. in parall.—Virg. Ecl. 10. G. 1, v. 20. l. 2, v. 493.—Ælian. Anim. 6, c. 42.—Ovid. Met. 10.—Horat. ep. 2.—Dionyſ. Hal.——A man who murdered his wife Apronia, by throwing her down from one of the windows of his chambers.——One of thoſe who conſpired againſt Nero.——An officer of Conſtantius, who revolted and made himſelf emperor. He was aſſaſſinated by his ſoldiers.

SILVIUM, a town of Apulia, now Garigolione. Plin. 3, c. 11.——A town of Iſtria.

SILURES, the people of South Wales in Britain.

Simbrivius, or Simbruvius, a lake of Latium, formed by the Anio. Tacit. 14, An. 22.

Simena, a town of Lycia near Chimæra. Plin. 5, c. 27.

Simēthus, or Symēthus, a town and river of Sicily, in whose neighbourhood the gods Palici were born. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 584.

Simĭlæ, a grove at Rome, where the orgies of Bacchus were celebrated. Liv. 39, c. 12.

Similis, one of the courtiers of Trajan, who retired from Rome into the country to enjoy peace and solitary retirement.

Simmias, a philosopher of Thebes, who wrote dialogues.——A grammarian of Rhodes.——A Macedonian suspected of conspiracy against Alexander, on account of his intimacy with Philotas. Curt. 7, c. 1.

Simo, a comic character.

Sīmois (entis,) a river of Troas, which rises in mount Ida, and falls into the Xanthus. It is celebrated by Homer, and most of the antient poets, as in its neighbourhood were fought many battles during the Trojan war. It is found to be but a small rivulet by modern travellers, and even some have disputed its existence. Homer. Il.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 104. l. 3, v. 302, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 324.—Mela. 1, c. 18.

Simoisius, a Trojan prince, son of Anthemion, killed by Ajax. Homer. Il. 4, v. 473.

Simon, a currier at Athens, whom Socrates often visited on account of his great sagacity and genius. He collected all the information he could receive from the conversation of the philosopher, and afterwards published it with his own observations in 33 dialogues. He was the first of the disciples of Socrates who attempted to give an account of the opinions of his master concerning virtue, justice, poetry, music, honor, &c. These dialogues were extant in the age of the biographer Diogenes, who has preserved their title. Diog. 2, c. 14.——Another who wrote on rhetoric. Id.——A sculptor. Id.——The name of Simon was common among the Jews.

Sīmōnĭdes, a celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished 538 years B. C. His father's name was Leoprepis, or Theoprepis. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and dramatical pieces, esteemed for their elegance and sweetness, and composed also epic poems, one on Cambyses king of Persia, &c. Simonides was universally courted by the princes of Greece and Sicily, and according to one of the fables of Phædrus, he was such a favorite of the gods, that his life was miraculously preserved in an entertainment when the roof of the house fell upon all those who were feasting. He obtained a poetical prize in the 80th year of his age, and he lived to his 90th year. The people of Syracuse, who had hospitably honored him when alive, erected a magnificent monument to his memory. Simonides, according to some, added the four letters η, ω, ξ, ψ, to the alphabet of the Greeks. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. According to some, the grandson of the elegiac poet of Cos was also called Simonides. He flourished a few years before the Peloponnesian war, and was the author of some books of inventions, genealogies, &c. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Phædr. 4, fab. 21 & 24.—Horat. 2, Od. 1, v. 38.—Herodot. 5, c. 102.—Cic. de Horat. &c.—Arist.—*Pindar. Simplicius, a Greek commentator on Aristotle, whose works were all edited in the 16th century, and the latter part of the 15th, but without a Latin version.

Simus, a king of Arcadia after Phialus. Paus. 8, c. 5.

Simyra, a town of Phœnicia. Mela. 1, c. 12.

Sinæ, a people of India, called by Ptolemy the most eastern nation of the world.

Sindæ, islands in the Indian ocean, supposed to be the Nicabar islands.

Sindi, a people of European Scythia, on the Palus Mæotis. Flacc. 6, v. 86.

Singæi, a people on the confines of Macedonia and Thrace.

Singara, a city at the north of Mesopotamia, now Sinjar.

Singulis, a river of Spain falling into the Guadalquiver.

Singus, a town of Macedonia.

Sinis, a famous robber. Vid. Scinis.

Sinnaces, a Parthian of an illustrious family, who conspired against his prince, &c. Tacit. 6, Ann. c. 31.

Sinnăcha, a town of Mesopotamia, where Crassus was put to death by Surena.

Sinoe, a nymph of Arcadia who brought up Pan.

Sinon, a son of Sisyphus who accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, and there distinguished himself by his cunning and fraud, and his intimacy with Ulysses. When the Greeks had fabricated the famous wooden horse, Sinon went to Troy with his hands bound behind his back, and by the most solemn protestations, assured Priam, that the Greeks were gone from Asia, and that they had been ordered to ſacrifice one of their ſoldiers, to render the wind favorable to their return, and that becauſe the lot had fallen upon him, at the inſtigation of Ulyſſes, he had fled away from their camp, not to be cruelly immolated. Theſe falſe aſſertions were immediately credited by the Trojans, and Sinon adviſed Priam to bring into his city the wooden horſe which the Greeks had left behind them, and to conſecrate it to Minerva. His advice was followed, and Sinon in the night, to complete his perfidy, opened the ſide of the horſe, from which iſſued a number of armed Greeks, who ſurprized the Trojans, and pillaged their city. Dares Phryg.—Homer. Od. 8, v. 492. l. 11, v. 521.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 79, &c. —Pauſ. 10, c. 27.—Q. Smyrn. 12, &c.

SINŌPE, a daughter of the Aſopus by Methone. She was beloved by Apollo, who carried her away to the borders of the Euxine ſea, in Aſia Minor, where ſhe gave birth to a ſon called Syrus. Diod. 4.—— A ſea-port town of Aſia Minor, in Pontus, now Sinab, founded by a colony of Mileſians. It was long an independent ſtate, till Pharnaces, king of Pontus, ſeized it. It was the capital of Pontus, under Mithridates, and was the birth place of Diogenes, the cynic philoſopher. It received its name from Sinope, whom Apollo carried there. Ovid. Pont. 1, el. 3, v. 67. —Strab. 2, &c. 12.—Diod 4.—Mela. 1, c. 19.——The original name of Sinueſſa.

SINTICE, a diſtrict of Macedonia.

SINTII, a nation of Thracians, who inhabited Lemnos, when Vulcan fell there from heaven. Homer. Il. 1, v. 594.

SINUESSA, a town of Campania, originally called Sinope. It was celebrated for its hot-baths and mineral waters, which cured people of inſanity, and rendered women prolific. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 715.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Liv. 22, c. 13. —Mart. 6, ep. 42. l. 11, ep. 8.—Tacit. An. 12.

SION, one of the hills on which Jeruſalem was built.

SIPHNOS, now Sifano, one of the Cyclades, ſituate at the weſt of Paros, twenty miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or, according to modern travellers, 40. Siphnos had many excellent harbours, and produced great plenty of delicious fruit. The inhabitants were ſo depraved, that their licentiouſneſs became proverbial. They however behaved with ſpirit in the Perſian wars, and refuſed to give earth and water to the emiſſaries of Xerxes in token of ſubmiſſion. There were ſome gold mines in Siphnos, of which Apollo demanded the tenth part. When the inhabitants refuſed to continue to offer part of their gold to the god of Delphi, the iſland was inundated, and the mines diſappeared. The air is ſo wholeſome, that many of the natives live to their 120th year. Pauſ. 10, c. 11.—Herodot. 8, c. 46.—Mela. 1, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

SIPONTUM, SIPUS, or SEPUS, a maritime town of Apulia in Italy, founded by Diomedes, after his return from the Trojan war. Strab. 6.—Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

SIPŸLUM and SIPŸLUS, a town of Lydia with a mountain of the ſame name near the Meander, formerly called Ceraunius. The town was deſtroyed by an earthquake with 12 others in the neighbourhood, in the reign of Tiberius. Strab. 1 & 12.—Pauſ. 1, c. 20.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Homer. Il. 24. —Hygin. fab. 9.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47. ——One of Niobe's children, killed by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 6. fab. 6.

SIRBO, a lake between Egypt and Paleſtine now Sebaket Bardoil. Plin. 4, c. 13.

SĪRĒNES, ſea nymphs who charmed ſo much with their melodious voice, that all forgot their employments to liſten with more attention, and at laſt died for want of food. They were daughters of the Achelous, by the Muſe Calliope, or, according to others, by Melpomene or Terpſichore. They were three in number, called Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucoſia, or, according to others, Molpe, Aglaophonos, and Thelxiope, or Thelxione, and they uſually lived in a ſmall iſland near cape Pelorus in Sicily. Some authors ſuppoſe that they were monſters, who had the form of a woman above the waiſt, and the reſt of the body like that of a bird; or rather that the whole body was covered with feathers, and had the ſhape of a bird, except the head, which was that of a beautiful female. This monſtrous form they had received from Ceres, who wiſhed to puniſh them, becauſe they had not aſſiſted her daughter when carried away by Pluto. But according to Ovid, they were ſo diſconſolate at the rape of Proſerpine, that they prayed the gods to give them wings that they might ſeek her in the ſea as well as by land. The Sirens were informed by the oracle, that as ſoon as any perſons paſſed by them without ſuffering themſelves to be charmed by their ſongs, they ſhould periſh; and their melody had prevailed in calling the attention of all paſſengers, till Ulyſſes, informed of the power of their voice by Circe, ſtopped the ears of his companions with wax, and ordered himſelf to be tied to the maſt of his ſhip, and no attention to be paid to his commands commands, ſhould he wiſh to ſtay and liſten to the ſong. This was a ſalutary precaution. Ulyſſes made ſigns for his companions to ſtop, but they were diſregarded, and the fatal coaſt was paſſed with ſafety. Upon this artifice of Ulyſſes, the Sirens were ſo diſappointed, that they threw themſelves into the ſea and periſhed. Some authors ſay, that the Sirens challenged the Muſes to a trial of ſkill in ſinging, and that the latter proved victorious, and plucked the feathers from the wings of their adverſaries, with which they made themſelves crowns. The place where the Sirens deſtroyed themſelves, was afterwards called Sirenis, on the coaſt of Sicily. Virgil however, Æn. 5, v. 864, places the Sirenum Scopuli on the coaſt of Italy, near the iſland of Caprea. Some ſuppoſe that the Sirens were a number of laſcivious women in Sicily, who proſtituted themſelves to ſtrangers, and made them forget their purſuits while drowned in unlawful pleaſures. The Sirens are often repreſented holding, one a lyre, a ſecond a flute, and the third ſinging. Pauſ. 10, c. 6.—Homer. Od. 12, v. 167.—Strab. 6.—Ammian. 29, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 141.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 555, de art. am. 3, v. 311.—Ital. 12, v. 33.

Sirenūsæ, three ſmall rocky iſlands near the coaſt of Campania, where the Sirens were ſuppoſed to reſide.

Siris, a town of Magna Græcia, at the mouth of a river of the ſame name. There was a battle fought near it between Pyrrhus and the Romans. Dionyſ. Perieg. v. 221.—The Æthiopians gave that name to the Nile before its divided ſtreams united into one current. Plin. 5, c. 9.——A town of Pæonia in Thrace.

Sirius, or Canicŭla, the dog-ſtar, whoſe appearance, as the antients ſuppoſed, always cauſed great heat on the earth. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 141.

Sirmio, now Sermione, a peninſula in the lake Benacus, where Catullus had a villa. Carm. 29.

Sirmium, the capital of Pannonia at the confluence of the Savus and Bacuntius, very celebrated during the reign of the Roman emperors.

Sisamnes, a judge flead alive for his partiality, by order of Cambyſes. His ſkin was nailed on the bench of the other judges to incite them to act with candor and impartiality. Herodot. 5, c. 25.

Sisapho, a Corinthian who murdered his brother, becauſe he had put his children to death. Ovid. in Ib.

Sisapo, a town of Spain, famous for its vermillion mines, whoſe ſituation is not well aſcertained. Plin. 33, c. 7.—Cic. Phil. 2, c. 19.

Siscia, a town of Pannonia, now Siſſeg.

Sisenes, a Perſian deſerter who conſpired againſt Alexander, &c. Curt. 3, c. 7.

L. Sisenna, an antient hiſtorian among the Romans, 91 B. C. He wrote an account of the republic, of which Cicero ſpeaks with great warmth. Some fragments of his compoſitions are quoted by different authors. Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 443.—Cic. in Brut. 64 & 67.—Paterc. 2, c. 9.——Corn. a Roman, who on being reprimanded in the ſenate for the ill conduct and depraved manners of his wife, accuſed publicly Auguſtus of unlawful commerce with her. Dio. 54.——The family of the Cornelii and Apronii received the ſirname of Siſenna. They are accuſed of intemperate loquacity in the Auguſtan age, by Horat. 1, Sat. 7, v. 8.

Sisigambis, or Sisygambis, the mother of Darius the laſt king of Perſia. She was taken priſoner by Alexander the Great, at the battle of Iſſus, with the reſt of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with uncommon tenderneſs and attention; he ſaluted her as his own mother, and what he had ſternly denied to the petitions of his favorites and miniſters, he often granted to the interceſſion of Siſygambis. The regard of the queen for Alexander was uncommon, and indeed ſhe no ſooner heard that he was dead, than ſhe killed herſelf, unwilling to ſurvive the loſs of ſo generous an enemy; though ſhe had ſeen with leſs concern, the fall of her ſon's kingdom, the ruin of his ſubjects, and himſelf murdered by his ſervants. She had alſo loſt in one day, her huſband and 80 of her brothers, whom Ochus had aſſaſſinated to make himſelf maſter of the kingdom of Perſia. Curt. 4, c. 9. l. 10, c. 5.

Sisimithræ, a fortified place of Bactriana, 15 ſtadia high, 80 in circumference, and plain at the top. Alexander married Roxana there. Strab. 11.

Sisocostus, one of the friends of Alexander, entruſted with the care of the rock Aornus. Curt. 8, c. 11.

Sisyphus, a brother of Athamas and Salmoneus, ſon of Æolus and Enaretta, the moſt crafty prince of the heroic ages. He married Merope the daughter of Atlas, or according to others of Pandareus, by whom he had ſeveral children. He built Ephyre, called afterwards Corinth, and he debauched Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus, becauſe he had been told by an oracle that his children by his brother's daughter would avenge the injuries which he had ſuffered from the malevolence of Salmoneus. Tyro, however, as Hyginus ſays, deſtroyed the two ſons whom ſhe had had by her uncle.

It is reported that Siſyphus, miſtruſting Autolycus, who ſtole the neighbouring flocks, marked his bulls under the feet, and when they had been carried away by the diſhoneſty of his friend, he confounded and aſtoniſhed the thief by ſelecting from his numerous flocks thoſe bulls, which by the mark he knew to be his own. The artifice of Siſyphus was ſo pleaſing to Autolycus, who had now found one more cunning than himſelf, that he permitted him to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, whom a few days after he gave in marriage to Laertes of Ithaca. After his death, Siſyphus was condemned in hell, to roll to the top of a hill a large ſtone, which had no ſooner reached the ſummit than it fell back into the plain with impetuoſity, and rendered his puniſhment eternal. The cauſes of this rigorous ſentence are variouſly reported. Some attribute it to his continual depredations in the neighbouring country, and his cruelty in laying heaps of ſtones on thoſe whom he had plundered, and ſuffering them to expire in the moſt agonizing torments. Others, to the inſult offered to Pluto, in chaining Death in his palace and detaining her till Mars, at the requeſt of the king of hell, went to deliver her from confinement. Others ſuppoſe that Jupiter inflicted this puniſhment upon him becauſe he told Aſopus where his daughter Ægina had been carried away by her raviſher. The more followed opinion, however, is, that Siſyphus, on his death-bed, entreated his wife to leave his body unburied, and when he came into Pluto's kingdom, he received permiſſion of returning upon earth to puniſh this ſeeming negligence of his wife, but, however, on promiſe of immediately returning. But he was no ſooner out of the infernal regions, than he violated his engagements, and when he was at laſt brought back to hell by Mars, Pluto, to puniſh his want of fidelity and honor, condemned him to roll a huge ſtone to the top of a mountain. The inſtitution of the Pythian games is attributed by ſome to Siſyphus. To be of the blood of Siſyphus was deemed diſgraceful among the antients. Homer. Od. 11, v. 592. —Virg. Æn. 6, v. 616.—Ovid Met. 4, v. 459. Faſt. 4, v. 175. in Ibid. 191.—Pauſ. 2, &c.—Hygin. fab. 60.—Horat. 2, od. 14, v. 20.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.——A ſon of M. Sittace, a town of Aſſyria. Plin. 6, c. 27.

Smaragdus, a town of Egypt on the Arabian gulf, where emeralds (ſmaragdi) were dug. Strab. 16.

Smenus, a river of Laconia riſing in mount Taygetus. Pauſ. 3, c. 24.

Smerdis, a ſon of Cyrus, put to death by order of his brother Cambyſes. As his execution was not public, and as it was only known to one of the officers of the monarch, one of the Magi of Perſia, who was himſelf called Smerdis, and who greatly reſembled the deceaſed prince, declared himſelf king, at the death of Cambyſes. This uſurpation would not perhaps have been known, had not he taken too many precautions to conceal it. After he had reigned for ſix months with univerſal approbation, ſeven noblemen of Perſia conſpired to dethrone him, and when this had been executed with ſucceſs, they choſe one of their number to reign in the uſurper's place, B. Smintheus, one of the ſirnames of Apollo in Phrygia, where the inhabitants raiſed him a temple, becauſe he had deſtroyed a number of rats that infeſted the country. Theſe rats were called σμινθαι, in the language of Phrygia, whence the ſirname. There is another ſtory ſimilar to this related by the Greek ſcholiaſt of Homer. Il. 1, v. 39.—Strab. 13.—*Ovid. Smyrna, a celebrated ſea-port town of Ionia in Aſia Minor, built, as ſome ſuppoſe, by Tantalus, or, according to others, by the Æolians. It has been ſubject to many revo-revolutions, and been ſeverally in the poſſeſſion of the Æolians, Ionians, Lydians, and Macedonians. Alexander, or according to Strabo, Lyſimachus, rebuilt it 400 years after it had been deſtroyed by the Lydians. It was one of the richeſt and moſt powerful cities of Aſia, and became one of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy. The inhabitants were given much to luxury and indolence, but they were univerſally eſteemed for their valor and intrepidity when called to action. Marcus Aurelius repaired it after it had been deſtroyed by an earthquake, about the 180th year of the Chriſtian era. Smyrna ſtill continues to be a very commercial town. The river Meles flows near its walls. The inhabitants of Smyrna believed that Homer was born among them, and to confirm this opinion they ſhowed a place which bore the poet's name, and they had a braſs coin in circulation which was called Homerium. Some ſuppoſe that it was called Smyrna from an Amazon of the ſame name, who took poſſeſſion of it. Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.—Strab. 12 & 14.—Ital. 8, v. 595.—Pauſ. 5, c. 8.—Mela. 1, c. 17. ——A daughter of Thias, mother of Adonis.——An Amazon.——The name of a poem, which Cinna, a Latin poet, compoſed in nine years, and which was worthy of admiration, according to Catullus, 94.

SŌCRĂTES, the moſt celebrated philoſopher of all antiquity, was a native of Athens. His father Sophroniſcus was a ſtatuary, and his mother Phenarete was by profeſſion a midwife. For ſome time he followed the occupation of his father, and ſome have mentioned the ſtatues of the Graces, admired for their ſimplicity and elegance, as the work of his own hands. He was called away from this meaner employment, of which however he never bluſhed, by Crito, who admired his genius, and courted his friendſhip. Philoſophy ſoon became the ſtudy of Socrates, and under Archelaus and Anaxagoras he laid the foundation of that exemplary virtue which ſucceeding ages have ever loved and venerated. He appeared like the reſt of his countrymen in the field of battle; he fought with boldneſs and intrepidity, and to his courage two of his friends and diſciples, Xenophon and Alcibiades, owed the preſervation of their life. But the character of Socrates appears more conſpicuous as a philoſopher and moraliſt than as that of a warrior. He was fond of labor, he inured himſelf to ſuffer hardſhips, and he acquired that ſerenity of mind and firmneſs of countenance which the moſt alarming dangers could never deſtroy, or the moſt ſudden calamities alter. If he was poor, it was from choice, and not the effects of vanity, or the wiſh of appearing ſingular. He bore injuries with patience, and the inſults of malice or reſentment he not only treated with contempt, but even received with a mind that expreſſed ſome concern, and felt compaſſion for the depravity of human nature. So ſingular and ſo venerable a character was admired by the moſt enlightened of the Athenians. Socrates was attended by a number of illuſtrious pupils, whom he inſtructed by his exemplary life, as well as by his doctrines. He had no particular place where to deliver his lectures, but as the good of his countrymen, and the reformation of their corrupted morals, and not the aggregation of riches, was the object of his ſtudy, he was preſent every where, and drew the attention of his auditors either in the groves of Academus, the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Ilyſſus. He ſpoke with freedom on every ſubject, religious as well as civil, and had the courage to condemn the violence of his countrymen, and to withſtand the torrent of reſentment, by which the Athenian generals were capitally puniſhed for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginuſæ. This independence of ſpirit, and that viſible ſuperiority of mind and genius over the reſt of his countrymen, created many enemies to Socrates; but as his character was irreproachable, and his doctrines pure, and void of all obſcurity, the voice of malevolence was ſilent. Yet Ariſtophanes ſoon undertook, at the inſtigation of Melitus, in his comedy of the Clouds, to ridicule the venerable character of Socrates on the ſtage; and when once the way was open to calumny and defamation, the fickle and licentious populace paid no reverence to the philoſopher whom they had before regarded as a being of a ſuperior order. When this had ſucceeded, Melitus ſtood forth to criminate him, together with Anitus and Lycon, and the philoſopher was ſummoned before the tribunal of the five hundred. He was accuſed of corrupting the Athenian youth, of making innovations in the religion of the Greeks, and of ridiculing the many gods which the Athenians worſhipped; yet falſe as this might appear, the accuſers relied for the ſucceſs of their cauſe upon the perjury of falſe witneſſes, and the envy of the judges, whoſe ignorance would readily yield to miſrepreſentation, tion, and be influenced and guided by eloquence and artifice. In this their expectations were not fruſtrated, and while the judges expected ſubmiſſion from Socrates, and that meanneſs of behaviour and ſervility of defence which diſtinguiſhed criminals, the philoſopher perhaps accelerated his own fall by the firmneſs of his mind, and his uncomplying integrity. Lyſias, one of the moſt celebrated orators of the age, compoſed an oration in a labored and pathetic ſtile, which he offered to his friend to be pronounced as his defence in the preſence of his judges. Socrates read it, but after he had praiſed the eloquence and the animation of the whole, he rejected it, as neither manly nor expreſſive of fortitude, and, comparing it to Sicyonian ſhoes, which though fitting, were proofs of effeminacy, he obſerved, that a philoſopher ought to be conſpicuous for magnanimity and for firmneſs of ſoul. In his apology he ſpoke with great animation, and confeſſed that while others boaſted that they were acquainted with every thing, he himſelf knew nothing. The whole diſcourſe was full of ſimplicity and noble grandeur, the energetic language of offended innocence. He modeſtly ſaid, that what he poſſeſſed was applied for the ſervice of the Athenians; it was his wiſh to make his fellow-citizens happy, and it was a duty which he performed by the ſpecial command of the gods, whoſe authority, ſaid he emphatically, to his judges, I regard more than yours. Such language from a man who was accuſed of a capital crime, aſtoniſhed and irritated the judges. Socrates was condemned, but only by a majority of three voices; and when he was demanded, according to the ſpirit of the Athenian laws, to paſs ſentence on himſelf, and to mention the death he preferred, the philoſopher ſaid, For my attempts to teach the Athenian youth juſtice and moderation, and to render the reſt of my countrymen more happy, let me be maintained at the public expence the remaining years of my life in the Prytaneum, an honor, O Athenians, which I deſerve more than the victors of the Olympic games. They make their countrymen more happy in appearance, but I have made you ſo in reality. This exaſperated the judges in the higheſt degree, and he was condemned to drink hemlock. Upon this he addreſſed the court, and more particularly the judges who had decided in his favor, in a pathetic ſpeech. He told them that to die was a pleaſure, ſince he was going to hold converſe with the greateſt heroes of antiquity; he recommended to their paternal care his defenceleſs children, and as he returned to the priſon, he exclaimed: I go to die, you to live; but which is the beſt the divinity alone can know. The ſolemn celebration of the Delian feſtivals [Vid. Delia] prevented his execution for 30 days, and during that time he was confined in the priſon and loaded with irons. His friends, and particularly his diſciples, were his conſtant attendants; he diſcourſed with them upon different ſubjects with all his uſual chearfulneſs and ſerenity. He reproved them for their ſorrow, and when one of them was uncommonly grieved becauſe he was to ſuffer though innocent, the philoſopher replied, would you then have me die guilty? With this compoſure he ſpent his laſt days, he continued to be a preceptor till the moment of his death, and inſtructed his pupils on queſtions of the greateſt importance; he told them his opinions in ſupport of the immortality of the ſoul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent cuſtom of ſuicide. He diſregarded the interceſſion of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his eſcape out of priſon he refuſed it, and aſked with his uſual pleaſantry, where he could eſcape death; where, ſays he to Crito, who had bribed the gaoler, and made his eſcape certain, where ſhall I fly to avoid this irrevocable doom paſſed on all mankind? When the hour to drink the poiſon was come, the executioner preſented him the cup with tears in his eyes. Socrates received it with compoſure, and after he had made a libation to the gods, he drank it with an unaltered countenance, and a few moments after he expired. Such was the end of a man whom the uninfluenced anſwer of the oracle of Delphi had pronounced the wiſeſt of mankind. Socrates died about 400 years before Chriſt, in the 70th year of his age. He was no ſooner buried than the Athenians repented of their cruelty, his accuſers were univerſally deſpiſed and ſhunned, one ſuffered death, ſome were baniſhed, and others, with their own hands, put an end to the life, which their ſeverity to the beſt of the Athenians had rendered inſupportable. The actions, ſayings, and opinions of Socrates have been faithfully recorded by two of the moſt celebrated of his pupils Xenophon and Plato, and every thing which relates to the life and circumſtances of this great philoſopher is now minutely known. To his poverty, his innocence, and his example, the Greeks were particularly indebted for their greatneſs and ſplendor; and the learning which was univerſally diſſeminated by his pupils, gave the whole nation a conſciouſneſs of their ſuperiority over the reſt of the world, not only in the polite arts, but in the more laborious exerciſes, which their writings celebrated. The philoſophy of of Socrates forms an intereſting epoch in the hiſtory of the human mind. The ſon of Sophroniſcus derided the more abſtruſe enquiries and metaphyſical reſearches of his predeceſſors, and by firſt introducing moral philoſophy, he induced mankind to conſider themſelves, their paſſions, their opinions, their duties, actions, and faculties. From this it was ſaid, that the founder of the Socratic ſchool drew philoſophy down from heaven upon the earth. In his attendance upon religious worſhip, Socrates was himſelf an example, he believed the divine origin of dreams and omens, and publicly declared that he was accompanied by a dæmon or inviſible conductor [Vid. Dæmon] whoſe frequent interpoſition ſtopped him from the commiſſion of evil, and the guilt of miſconduct. This familiar ſpirit, however, according to ſome, was nothing more than a ſound judgment aſſiſted by prudence and long experience, which warned him at the approach of danger, and from a general ſpeculation of mankind could foreſee what ſucceſs would attend an enterprize, or what calamities would follow an ill managed adminiſtration. As a ſupporter of the immortality of the ſoul, he allowed the perfection of a ſupreme knowledge, from which he deduced the government of the univerſe. From the reſources of experience as well as nature and obſervation, he perceived the indiſcriminate diſpenſation of good and evil to mankind by the hand of heaven, and he was convinced that nothing but the moſt inconſiderate would incur the diſpleaſure of their creator to avoid poverty or ſickneſs, or gratify a ſenſual appetite, which muſt at the end harraſs their ſoul with remorſe and the conſciouſneſs of guilt. From this natural view of things, he perceived the relation of one nation with another, and how much the tranquillity of civil ſociety depended upon the proper diſcharge of theſe reſpective duties. The actions of men furniſhed materials alſo for his diſcourſe; to inſtruct them was his aim, and to render them happy was the ultimate object of his daily leſſons. From principles like theſe, which were inforced by the unparalleled example of an affectionate huſband, a tender parent, a warlike ſoldier, and a patriotic citizen in Socrates, ſoon after the celebrated ſects of the Platoniſts, the Peripatetics, the Academics, Cyrenaics, Stoics, &c. aroſe. Socrates never wrote for the public eye, yet many ſupport that the tragedies of his pupil Euripides were partly compoſed by him. He was naturally of a licentious diſpoſition, and a phyſiognomiſt obſerved, in looking in the face of the philoſopher, that his heart was the moſt depraved, immodeſt, and corrupted that ever was in the human breaſt. This nearly coſt the ſatyriſt his life, but Socrates upbraided his diſciples, who wiſhed to puniſh the phyſiognomiſt, and declared that his aſſertions were true, but that all his vicious propenſities had been duly corrected and curbed by means of reaſon. Socrates made a poetical verſion of Æſop's fables, while in priſon. Laert.—Xenoph.—Plato.—Pauſ. 1, c. 22.—Plut. de op. Phil. &c.—Cic. de orat. 1, c. 54.—Tuſc. 1, c. 41, &c.—*Val. Sol (the ſun) was an object of veneration among the antients. It was particularly worſhipped by the Perſians, under the name of Mithras. The Maſſagetæ ſacrificed horſes to the ſun on account of their ſwiftneſs. According to ſome of the ancient poets, Sol and Apollo were two different perſons. Apollo, however, and Phœbus and Sol, are univerſally ſuppoſed to be the ſame deity.

SOLON, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, was born at Salamis and educated at Athens. His father's name was Euphorion, or Execheſtides, one of the deſcendants of king Codrus, and by his mother's ſide he reckoned among his relations the celebrated Piſiſtratus. After he had devoted part of his time to philoſophical and political ſtudies, Solon travelled over the greateſt part of Greece; but at his return home he was diſtreſſed with the diſſenſions which were kindled among his countrymen. All fixed their eyes upon Solon as a deliverer, and he was unanimouſly elected archon and ſovereign legiſlator. He might have become abſolute, but he refuſed the dangerous office of king of Athens, and in the capacity of lawgiver he began to make a reform in every department. The complaints of the poorer citizens found redreſs, all debts were remitted, and no one was permitted to ſeize the perſon of his debtor if unable to make a reſtoration of his money. After he had made the moſt ſalutary regulations in the ſtate, and bound the Athenians by a ſolemn oath, that they would faithfully obſerve his laws for the ſpace of 100 years, Solon reſigned the office of legiſlator, and removed himſelf from Athens. He viſited Egypt, and in the court of Cræſus, king of Lydia, he convinced the monarch of the inſtability of fortune, and told him, when he wiſhed to know whether he was not the happieſt of mortals, that Tellus, an Athenian, who had always ſeen his country in a floriſhing ſtate, who had ſeen his children lead a virtuous life, and who had himſelf fallen in defence of his country, was more entitled to happineſs than the poſſeſſor of riches, and the maſter of empires. After ten year's abſence Solon returned to Athens, but he had the mortification to find the greateſt part of his regulations diſregarded by the factious ſpirit of his countrymen, and the uſurpation of Piſiſtratus. Not to be longer a ſpectator of the diviſions that reigned in his country, he retired to Cyprus, where he died at the court of king Philocyprus, in the 80th year of his age, 558 years before the Chriſtian era. The ſalutary conſequences of the laws of Solon can be diſcovered in the length of time they were in force in the republic of Athens. For above 400 years they floriſhed in full vigor, and Cicero, who was himſelf a witneſs of their benign influence, paſſes the higheſt encomiums upon the legiſlator, whoſe ſuperior wiſdom framed ſuch a code of regulations. It was the intention of Solon to protect the poorer citizens, and by dividing the whole body of the Athenians into four claſſes, three of which were permitted to diſcharge the moſt important offices and magiſtracies of the ſtate, and the laſt to give their opinion in the aſſemblies, but not have a ſhare in the diſtinctions and honors of their ſuperiors, the legiſlator gave the populace a privilege which, though at firſt ſmall and inconſiderable, ſoon rendered them maſters of the republic, and of all the affairs of government. He made a reformation in the Areopagus, he encreaſed the authority of the members, and permitted them yearly to enquire how every citizen maintained himſelf, and to puniſh ſuch as lived in idleneſs, and were not employed in ſome honorable and lucrative profeſſion. He alſo regulated the Prytaneum, and fixed the number of its judges to 400. The ſanguinary laws of Draco were all cancelled, except that againſt murder, and the puniſhment denounced againſt every offender was proportioned to his crime; but Solon made no law againſt parricide or ſacrilege. The former of theſe crimes, he ſaid, was too horrible to human nature for a man to be guilty of it, and the latter could never be committed, becauſe the hiſtory of Athens had never furniſhed a ſingle inſtance. Such as had died in the ſervice of their country, were buried with great pomp, and their family was maintained at the public expence; expence; but ſuch as had ſquandered away their eſtates, ſuch as refuſed to bear arms in defence of their country, or paid no attention to the infirmities and diſtreſs of their parents, were branded with infamy. The laws of marriage were newly regulated, it became an union of affection and tenderneſs, and no longer a mercenary contract. To ſpeak with ill language againſt the dead as well as the living, was made a crime, and the legiſlator wiſhed that the character of his fellow citizens ſhould be freed from the aſperſions of malevolence and envy. A perſon that had no children, was permitted to diſpoſe of his eſtates as he pleaſed, and the females were not allowed to be extravagant in their dreſs or expences. To be guilty of adultery was a capital crime, and the friend and aſſociate of lewdneſs and debauchery was never permitted to ſpeak in public, for, as the philoſopher obſerved, a man who has no ſhame, is not capable of being intruſted with the people. Theſe celebrated laws were engraved on ſeveral tables, and that they might be the better known and more familiar to the Athenians, they were written in verſe. The indignation which Solon expreſſed on ſeeing the tragical repreſentations of Theſpis, is well known, and he ſternly obſerved, that if falſehood and fiction were tolerated on the ſtage, they would ſoon find their way among the common occupations of men. According to Plutarch, Solon was reconciled to Piſiſtratus, but this ſeems to be falſe, as the legiſlator refuſed to live in a country where the privileges of his fellow citizens were trampled upon by the uſurpation of a tyrant. Vid. Lycurgus. Plut. in Sol.—Herodot. 1, c. 29.—Diog. 1.—Pauſ. 1, c. 40.—Cic.

Sŏphŏcles, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens, educated in the ſchool of Æſchylus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf not only as a poet, but alſo as a ſtateſman. He commanded the Athenian armies, and in ſeveral battles he ſhared the ſupreme command with Pericles, and exerciſed the office of archon with credit and honor. The firſt appearance of Sophocles as a poet, reflects great honor on his abilities. The Athenians had taken the iſland of Scyros, and to celebrate that memorable event, a yearly conteſt for tragedy was inſtituted. Sophocles on this occaſion obtained the prize over many competitors, in the number of whom was Æſchylus, his friend and his maſter. This ſucceſs contributed to encourage the poet, he wrote for the ſtage with applauſe, and obtained the poetical prize 20 different times. Sophocles was the rival of Euripides for public praiſe, they divided the applauſe of the populace, and while the former ſurpaſſed in the ſublime and majeſtic, the other was not inferior in the tender and pathetic. The Athenians were pleaſed with their contention, and as the theatre was at that time an object of importance and magnitude, and deemed an eſſential and moſt magnificent part of the religious worſhip, each had his admirers and adherents; but the two poets, captivated at laſt by popular applauſe, gave way to jealouſy and rivalſhip. Of 120 tragedies which Sophocles compoſed, only ſeven are extant; Ajax, Electra, Œdipus the tyrant, Antigone, the Trachiniæ, Philoctetes, and Œdipus at Colonos. The ingratitude of the children of Sophocles is well known. They wiſhed to become immediate mediate maſters of their father's poſſeſſions, and therefore tired of his long life, they accuſed him before the Areopagus of inſanity. The only defence the poet made was to read his tragedy of Œdipus at Colonos, which he had lately finiſhed, and then he aſked his judges, whether the author of ſuch a performance could be taxed with inſanity? The father upon this was acquitted, and the children returned home covered with ſhame and confuſion. Sophocles died in the 91ſt year of his age, 406 years before Chriſt, through exceſs of joy, as ſome authors report, of having obtained a poetical prize at the Olympic games. Athenæus has accuſed Sophocles of licentiouſneſs and debauchery, particularly when he commanded the armies of Athens. The beſt editions of Sophocles are thoſe of Capperonier, 2 vols. 4to. Sophonisba, a daughter of Aſdrubal the Carthaginian, celebrated for her beauty. She married Scyphax, a prince of Numidia, and when her huſband was conquered by the Romans and Maſiniſſa, ſhe fell a captive into the hands of the enemy. Maſiniſſa became enamoured of her, and married her. This behaviour diſpleaſed the Romans, and Scipio, who at that time had the command of the armies of the republic in Africa, rebuked the monarch ſeverely, and deſired him to part with Sophoniſba. This was an arduous taſk for Maſiniſſa, yet he dreaded the Romans. He entered Sophoniſba's tent with tears in his eyes, and told her that as he could not deliver her from captivity and the jealouſy of the Romans, he recommended her as the ſtrongeſt pledge of his love and affection for her perſon, to die like the daughter of Aſdrubal. Sophoniſba obeyed, and drank with unuſual compoſure and ſerenity, the cup of poiſon which Maſiniſſa ſent to her, about 203 years before Chriſt. Liv. 30, c. 12, &c.—Salluſt. de Jug.—Juſtin.

Sotădes, an athlete.——A Greek poet of Thrace. He wrote verses against Philadelphus Ptolemy, for which he was thrown into the sea in a cage of lead. He was called Cinædus, not only because he was addicted to the abominable crime which the surname indicates, but because he wrote a poem in commendation of it. Some suppose, that instead of the word Socraticos in the 2d satyr, verse the 10th, of Juvenal, the word Sotadicos should be inserted, as the poet Sotades, and not the philosopher Socrates, deserved the appellation of Cinædus. Obscene verses were generally called Sotadea carmina from him. They could be turned and read different ways without losing their measure or sense, such as the following, which can be read backwards:

Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor.
Si bene te tua laus taxat, sua laute tenebis.
Sole medere pede, ede, perede melos.

Soter, a surname of the first Ptolemy.——It was also common to other monarchs.

Spartăcus, a king of Pontus.——Another, king of Bosphorus, who died B. C. 433. His son and successor of the same name died B. C. 407.——Another, who died 284 B. C.——A Thracian shepherd celebrated for his abilities and the victories he obtained over the Romans. Being one of the gladiators who were kept at Capua in the house of Lentullus, he escaped from the place of his confinement with 30 of his companions, and took up arms against the Romans. He soon found himself with 10,000 men equally resolute with himself, and though at first obliged to hide himself in the woods and solitary retreats of Campania, he soon laid waste the country; and when his followers were encreased by additional numbers, and better disciplined, and more completely armed, he attacked the Roman Roman generals in the field of battle. Two conſuls and other officers were defeated with much loſs; and Spartacus, ſuperior in counſel and abilities, appeared more terrible, though often deſerted by his fickle attendants. Craſſus was ſent againſt him, but this celebrated general at firſt deſpaired of ſucceſs. A bloody battle was fought, in which, at laſt, the gladiators were defeated. Spartacus behaved with great valor; when wounded in the leg, he fought on his knees, covering himſelf with his buckler in one hand, and uſing his ſword with the other; and when at laſt he fell, he fell upon a heap of Romans, whom he had ſacrificed to his fury, B. C. 71. In this battle no leſs than 40,000 of the rebels were ſlain, and the war totally finiſhed. Flor. 3, c. 20.—Liv. 95.—Eutrop. 6, c. 2.—Plut. in Craſſ.—Patere. 2, c. 30.—Appian.

He came to Sparta in the age of Agis and Cleomenes, and opened a ſchool there. Plut. in Ag.—Diod.

Sphinx, a monſter which had the head and breaſts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a ſerpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and an human voice. It ſprang from the union of Orthos with the Chimæra, or of Typhon with Echidna. The Sphinx had been ſent into the neighbourhood of Thebes by Juno, who wiſhed to puniſh the family of Cadmus, which ſhe perſecuted with immortal hatred, and it laid this part of Bœotia under continual alarms by propoſing enigmas, and devouring the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midſt of their conſternation the Thebans were told by the oracle, that the Sphinx would deſtroy herſelf as ſoon as one of the enigmas ſhe propoſed was explained. In this enigma ſhe wiſhed to know what animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening. Upon this Creon, king of Thebes, promiſed his crown and his ſiſter Jocaſta in marriage to him who could deliver his country from the monſter by a ſucceſsful explanation of the enigma. It was at laſt happily explained by Œdipus, who obſerved that man walked on his hands and feet when young or in the morning of life, at the noon of life he walked erect, and in the evening of his days he ſupported his infirmities upon a ſtick. [Vid. Œdipus.] The Sphinx no ſooner heard this explanation than ſhe daſhed her head againſt a rock, and immediately expired. Some mythologiſts wiſh to unriddle the fabulous traditions about the Sphinx, by the ſuppoſition that one of the daughters of Cadmus, or Laius, infeſted the country of Thebes by her continual depredations, becauſe ſhe had been refuſed a part of her father's poſſeſſions. The lion's paw expreſſed, as they obſerve, STATILIA, a woman who lived to a great age, as mentioned by Seneca, ep. 77.——Another. Vid. Messalina.

STATILIUS, a young Roman celebrated for his courage and constancy. He was an inveterate enemy to Cæsar, and when Cato murdered murdered himſelf, he attempted to follow his example, but was prevented by his friends. The conſpirators againſt Cæſar wiſhed him to be in the number, but the anſwer which he gave diſpleaſed Brutus. He was at laſt killed by the army of the triumvirs. Plut. —— Lucius, one of the friends of Catiline. He joined in his conſpiracy, and was put to death Cic. Cat. 2. ——A young general in the war which the Latins undertook againſt the Romans. He was killed, with 25,000 of his troops.—— A general who fought againſt Antony.—— Taurus, a pro-conſul of Africa. He was accuſed of conſulting magicians, upon which he put himſelf to death. Tacit. A. 12, c. 59.

STATĪNÆ, iſlands on the coaſt of Campania, raiſed from the ſea by an earthquake. Plin. 2, c. 88.

STATĪRA, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander. The conqueror had formerly refuſed her, but when ſhe had fallen into his hands at Iſſus, the nuptials were celebrated with uncommon ſplendor. No leſs than 9000 perſons attended, to each of whom Alexander gave a golden cup, to be offered to the gods. Statira had no children by Alexander. She was cruelly put to death by Roxana, after the conqueror's death. Juſtin. 12, c. 12.——A ſiſter of Darius, the laſt king of Perſia. She alſo became his wife, according to the manners of the Perſians. She died after an abortion, in Alexander's camp, where ſhe was detained as priſoner. She was buried with great pomp by the conqueror. Plut. in Alex.——A wife of Artaxerxes Memnon, poiſoned, by her mother-in-law, queen Paryſatis. Plut. in Art.——A ſiſter of Mithridates the Great. Plut.

STATIUS, (Cæcilius,) a comic poet in the age of Ennius. He was a native of Gaul, and originally a ſlave. His latinity was bad, yet he acquired great reputation by his comedies. He died a little after Ennius. Cic. de ſen.——Annæus, a phyſician, the friend of the philoſopher Seneca. Tacit. A. 15, c. 64.——P. Papinius, a poet born at Naples, in the reign of the emperor Domitian. His father's name was Statius of Epirus, and his mother's Agelina. Statius has made himſelf known by two epic poems, the Thebais in 12 books, and the Achilleis in two books, which remained unfiniſhed on account of his premature death. There are beſides other pieces compoſed on ſeveral ſubjects, which are extant, and well known under the name of Sylvæ, divided into four books. The two epic poems of Statius are dedicated to Domitian, whom the poet ranks among the gods. They were univerſally admired in his age at Rome, but the taſte of the times was corrupted, though ſome of the moderns have called them inferior to no Latin compoſition except Virgil's. The ſtile of Statius is bombaſtic and affected, he often forgets the poet to become the declaimer and the hiſtorian. In his Sylvæ, which were written generally extempore, are many beautiful expreſſions and ſtrokes of genius. Statius, as ſome ſuppoſe, was poor, and he was obliged to maintain himſelf by writing for the ſtage. None of his dramatic pieces are extant. Martial has ſatyrized him, and what Juvenal has written in his praiſe, ſome have interpreted as an illiberal reflection upon him. Statius died about the 100th year of the Chriſtian era. The beſt editions of his works are that of Barthius, 2 vols. 4to. Cyg. 1664, and that of the Variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1671; and of the Thebais, ſeparate, that of Warrington, 2 vols. 12mo. 1778.——Domitius, a tribune in the age of Nero, deprived of his office when Piſo's conſpiracy was diſcovered. Tacit. A. 15, c. 17.——A general of the Samnites.——An officer of the prætorian guards, who conſpired againſt Nero.

STASICRĂTES, a ſtatuary and architect in the wars of Alexander, who offered to make a ſtatue of mount Athos, which was rejected by the conqueror, &c.

STATOR, a ſirname of Jupiter, given him by Romulus, becauſe he ſtopped (ſiſto) the flight of the Romans in a battle againſt the Sabines. The conqueror erected him a temple under that name. Liv. 1, c. 12.

STELLATIS, a field remarkable for its fertility, in Campania. Cic. Ag. 1, c. 70. —Sueton. Cæſ. 20.

STELLIO, a youth turned into an elf by Ceres, becauſe he derided the goddeſs. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 445.

STENOBŒA. Vid. Sthenobœa.

STENOCRĂTES, an Athenian, who conſpired to murder the commander of the garriſon which Demetrius had placed in the citadel, &c. Polyæn. 5.

STENTOR, one of the Greeks who went to the Trojan war. His voice alone was louder than that of 50 men together. Homer. Il. 5, v. 784.—Juv. 13, v. 112.

STENTORIS LACUS, a lake near Enos in Thrace. Herodot. 7, c. 58.

STEPHĂNUS, a muſician of Media, upon whoſe body Alexander made an experiment in burning a certain ſort of bitumen called napththe. Strab. 16.—Plut. in Alex.—— A Greek writer of Byzantium, known for his dictionary giving an account of the towns and places of the antient world, of which the beſt beſt edition is that of Gronovius, 2 vols. fol. L. Bat. 1694.

Sterŏpe, one of the Pleiades, daughters of Atlas. She married Œnomaus, king of Piſæ, by whom ſhe had Hippodamia, &c. ——A daughter of Parthaon, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the mother of the Sirens.—— A daughter of Cepheus.——A daughter of Pleuron,——of Acaſtus,——of Danaus, ——of Cebrion.

Sterŏpes, one of the Cyclops. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Stesichŏrus, a lyric Greek poet of Himera, in Sicily. He was originally called Tiſias, and obtained the name of Steſichorus, from the alterations he made in muſic and dancing. His compoſitions were written in the Doric dialect, and compriſed in 26 books, all now loſt except a few fragments. Some ſay he loſt his eye-ſight for writing invectives againſt Helen, and that he received it only upon making a recantation of what he had ſaid. He was the firſt inventor of that fable of the horſe and the ſtag, which Horace and ſome other poets have imitated, and this he wrote to prevent his countrymen from making an alliance with Phalaris. According to ſome, he was the firſt who wrote an epithalamium. He floriſhed 556 B. C. and died at Catana, in the 85th year of his age.—Iſocrat. in Hel. —Ariſtot. rhet.—Strab. 3.—Lucian in Macr.—Cic. in Verr. 2, c. 35.—Plut. de Muſ.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Pauſ. 3, c. 19. l. 10, c. 26.

Stertinius, a ſtoic philoſopher, ridiculed by Horace, 2 Sat. 3. He wrote in Latin verſe 220 books on the philoſophy of the ſtoics.

Stesagŏras, a brother of Miltiades. Vid. Miltiades.

Stesilēa, a beautiful woman of Athens, &c.

Stesilēus, a beautiful youth of Cos, loved by Themiſtocles and Ariſtides, and the cauſe of jealouſy and diſſenſion between theſe celebrated men. Plut. in Cim.

Stesimbrŏtus, an hiſtorian very inconſiſtent in his narrations. He wrote an account of Cimon's exploits. Plut. in Cim. ——A ſon of Epaminondas put to death by his father, becauſe he had fought the enemy without his orders, &c. Plut.——A muſician of Thaſos.

Stheně̆le, a daughter of Acaſtus, wife to Menœtius. Apollod. 3, c. 13.——A daughter of Danaus, by Memphis. Id. 2, c. 1.

Sthenĕlus, a king of Mycenæ, ſon of Perſeus and Andromeda. He married Nicippe the daughter of Pelops, by whom he had two daughters, and a ſon called Euryſtheus, who was born, by Juno's influence, two months before the natural time, that he might obtain a ſuperiority over Hercules, as being older. Sthenelus made war againſt Amphitryon, who had killed Electryon and ſeized his kingdom. He fought with ſucceſs, and took his enemy priſoner, whom he tranſmitted to Euryſtheus. Homer. Il. 19, v. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.——One of the ſons of Ægyptus by Tyria.——A ſon of Capaneus. He was one of the Epigoni, and of the ſuitors of Helen. He went to the Trojan war, and was one of thoſe who were ſhut up in the wooden horſe, according to Virgil. Pauſ. 2, c. 18.—Virg. Æn. 2 & 10.——A ſon of Androgeus the ſon of Minos. Hercules made him king of Thrace. Apollod. 2, c. 5.——A king of Argos, who ſucceeded his father Crotopus. Pauſ. 2, c. 16.——A ſon of Actor, who accompanied Hercules in his expedition againſt the Amazons. He was killed by one of theſe females.——A ſon of Melas, killed by Tydeus. Apollod. 1, c. 8.

Stheno, one of the three Gorgons.

Sthenobœa, a daughter of Jobates, king of Lycia, who married Prœtus, king of Argos. She became enamoured of Bellerophon, who had taken refuge at her huſband's court, after the murder of his brother, and when he refuſed to gratify her criminal paſſion, ſhe accuſed him before Prœtus of attempts upon her virtue. Homer. Il. 6, v. 162.—Hygin. fab. 57.——Many mythologiſts call her Antæa.

Stilbe or Stilbia, a daughter of Peneus by Creuſa, who became mother of Centaurus and Lapithus, by Apollo. Diod. 4.

Stĭlĭcho, a general of the emperor Theodoſius the Great. He behaved with much courage, but under the emperor Honorius he ſhowed himſelf turbulent and diſaffected. As being of barbarian extraction, he wiſhed to ſee the Roman provinces laid deſolate by his countrymen, but in this he was diſappointed. Honorius diſcovered his intrigues, and ordered him to be beheaded, about the year of Chriſt 408. His family were involved in his ruin. Claudian has been loud in his praiſes, and Zoſimus Hiſt. 5, denies the truth of the charges laid againſt him.

Stilpo, a celebrated philoſopher of Megara, who floriſhed 336 years before Chriſt, and was greatly eſteemed by Ptolemy Soter. He was naturally addicted to riot and debauchery, but he reformed his manners when he opened a ſchool at Megara. He was univerſally reſpected, his ſchool was frequented, and Demetrius, when he plundered dered Megara, ordered the house of the philosopher to be left safe and unmolested. It is said that he intoxicated himself when ready to die, to alleviate the terrors of death. He was one of the chiefs of the Stoics. Plut. in Dem.—Diog. 2.—Seneca de Const.

STIMĬCON, a shepherd's name in Virgil's 5th eclogue.

STIPHĬLUS, one of the Lapithæ, killed in the house of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12.

STOBÆUS, a Greek writer who flourished A. D. 405. His work is valuable for the precious relics of ancient literature he has preserved. The best edition is that of Aurel. Allob. fol. 1609.

STOBI, a town of Pœonia in Macedonia. Liv. 33, c. 19. l. 40, 21.

STŒCHĂDES, five small islands in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Gaul, now the Hieres, near Marseilles. Lucan. 3, v. 516.—Strab. 4.

STŒNI, a people living among the Alps. Liv. ep. 62.

STOĬCI, a celebrated sect of philosophers founded by Zeno of Citium. They received their name from the portico, στοα, where the philosopher delivered his lectures. They preferred virtue to every thing else, and whatever was opposite to it, they looked upon as the greatest of evils. They required, as well as the disciples of Epicurus, an absolute command over the passions, and they supported that man alone, in the present state of his existence, could attain perfection and felicity. They encouraged suicide, and believed that the doctrine of future punishments and rewards was unnecessary to excite or intimidate their followers. Vid. Zeno.

STRABO, a name among the Romans, given to such as were naturally deformed. Pompey's father was distinguished by that name.——A native of Amasia, on the borders of Cappadocia, who flourished in the age of Augustus and Tiberius. He first studied under Xenarchus, the peripatetic, and afterwards warmly embraced the tenets of the Stoics. Of all his compositions nothing remains but his geography, divided into 17 books, a work justly celebrated for its elegance, purity, the erudition and universal knowledge of the author. It contains an account, in Greek, of the most celebrated places of the world, the origin, the manners, religion, prejudices, and government of nations; the foundation of cities, and the accurate history of each separate province. Strabo travelled over great part of the world in quest of information, and to examine with the most critical enquiry, not only the situation of the places, but also the manners of the inhabitants, whose history he meant to write. In the two first books the author wishes to shew the necessity of geography; in the 3d he gives a description of Spain; in the 4th of Gaul and the British isles. The 5th and 6th contain an account of Italy and the neighbouring islands; the 7th, which is mutilated at the end, gives a full description of Germany, and the country of the Getæ, Illyricum, Taurica Chersonesus, and Epirus. The affairs of Greece and the adjacent islands are separately treated in the 8th, 9th, and 10th; and in the four next, Asia within mount Taurus; and in the 15th and 16th, Asia without Taurus, India, Persia, Syria, and Arabia; the last book gives an account of Egypt, Æthiopia, Carthage, and other places of Africa. Among the books of Strabo which have been lost, were historical commentaries. This celebrated geographer died A. D. 25. The best editions of his geography are those of Casaubon, fol. Paris, 1620; of Amst. 2 vols. fol. 1707. ——A Sicilian, so clear sighted that he could distinguish objects at the distance of 130 miles, with the same ease as if they had been near.

STRATARCHAS, the grandfather of the geographer Strabo. His father's name was Dorylaus. Strab. 10.

STRATO, or STRATON, a king of the island Aradus, received into alliance by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 1.——A king of Sidon, dependent upon Darius. Alexander deposed him, because he refused to surrender. Curt. ib.——A philosopher of Lampsacus, disciple and successor in the school of Theophrastus, about 289 years before the Christian era. He applied himself with uncommon industry to the study of nature, and was surnamed Physicus, and after the most mature investigations, he supported that nature was inanimate, and that there was no god but nature. He was appointed preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who not only revered his abilities and learning, but also rewarded his labors with unbounded liberality. He wrote different treatises, all now lost. Diog. 5.—Cic. Acad. 1, c. 9. l. 4, c. 38, &c.——A physician.——A peripatetic philosopher.——A native of Epirus, very intimate with Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar. He killed his friend at his own request.——A rich Orchomenian who destroyed himself because he could not obtain in marriage a young woman of Haliartus. Plut.——A Greek historian, who wrote the life of some of the Macedonian kings.——An athlete of Achaia, twice crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 7, c. 23.

STRATOS, a city of Æolia. Liv. 36, c. 11. l. 38, c. 4.——Of Acarnania.

STRONGŸLE, now Strombolo, one of the iſlands called Æolides in the Tyrrhene ſea, near the coaſt of Sicily. It has a volcano, 10 miles in circumference, which throws up flames continually, and of which the crater is on the ſide of the mountain. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.

STROPHĂDES, two iſlands in the Ionian ſea, on the weſtern coaſts of the Peloponneſus. They were antiently called Plotæ, and received the name of Strophades from στρέφω, verto, becauſe Zethes and Calais, the ſons of Boreas, returned from thence by order of Jupiter, after they had driven the Harpyies there from the tables of Phineus. The fleet of Æneas ſtopped near the Strophades. The largeſt of theſe two iſlands is not above five miles in circumference. Hygin. fab. 19.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 709.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 210.—Strab. 8.

STROPHIUS, a ſon of Criſus, king of Phocis. He married a ſiſter of Agamemnon, called Anaxibia, or Aſtyochia, or, according to others, Cyndragora, by whom he had Pylades, celebrated for his friendſhip with Oreſtes. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemneſtra and Ægyſthus, the king of Phocis, educated at his own houſe with the greateſt care, his nephew, whom Electra had ſecretly removed from the dagger of his mother, and her adulterer. Oreſtes was enabled by means of Strophius to revenge the death of his father. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Hygin. fab. 1, 17.——A ſon of Pylades by Electra the ſiſter of Oreſtes.

STRUTHOPHĂGI, a people of Æthiopia, who feed on ſparrows, as their name ſignifies.

STRUTHUS, a general of Artaxerxes againſt the Lacedæmonians, B. C. 393.

STRYMA, a town of Thrace, founded by a Thaſian colony. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

STRYMNO, a daughter of the Scamander, who married Laomedon. Apollod. 3, c. 12.

STRYMON, a river which ſeparates Thrace from Macedonia, and falls into a part of the Ægean ſea, which has been called Strymonicus ſinus. A number of cranes, as the poets ſay, reſorted on its banks in the ſummer time. Its eels were excellent. Mela. 2, c. 2.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 120. l. 4, v. 508. Æn. 10, v. 265.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 251.

STYMPHALIA, or STYMPHĀLIS, a part of Macedonia. Liv. 45, c. 30.——A ſirname of Diana.

STYMPHĀLUS, a king of Arcadia, ſon of Elatus and Laodice. He made war againſt Pelops, and was killed in a truce. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Pauſ. 8, c. 4.——A town, river, lake, and fountain of Arcadia, which receives its name from king Stymphalus. The neighbourhood of the lake Stymphalus was infeſted by a number of voracious birds, which fed upon human fleſh, and which were called Stymphalides. They were at laſt deſtroyed by Hercules, with the aſſiſtance of Minerva. Some have confounded them with the Harpyies, while others pretend that they never exiſted but in the imagination of the poets. Pauſanias however, ſupports, that there were carnivorous birds like the Stymphalides, in Arabia. Pauſ. 8, c. 4.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 298.——A lofty mountain of Peloponneſus in Arcadia.

STYRA, a town of Eubœa.

STŸRUS, a king of Albania, to whom Æetes promiſed his daughter Medea in marriage, to obtain his aſſiſtance againſt the Argonauts. Flacc. 3, v. 497. l. 8, v. 358.

Styx, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married Pallas, by whom she had three daughters, Victory, Strength, and Valor. Hesiod. Theog. 363 & 384.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.——A celebrated river of hell, round which it flows nine times. According to some writers the Styx was a small river of Nonacris in Arcadia, whose waters were so cold and venemous, that they proved fatal to such as tasted them. Among others, Alexander the Great is mentioned as a victim to their fatal poison, in consequence of drinking them. They even consumed iron, and broke all vessels. The wonderful properties of this water suggested the idea, that it was a river of hell, especially, when it disappeared in the earth a little below its fountain head. The gods held the waters of the Styx in such veneration, that they always swore by them; an oath which was inviolable. If any of the gods had perjured themselves, Jupiter obliged them to drink the waters of the Styx, which lulled them for one whole year into a senseless stupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambrosia and the nectar of the gods, and after the expiration of the years of their punishment, they were restored to the assembly of the deities, and to all their original privileges. It is said that this veneration was shewn to the Styx, because it received its name from the nymph Styx, who with her three daughters assisted Jupiter in his war against the Titans. Hesiod. Theog. v. 384, 775.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 513.—Herodot. 6, c. 74.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 323, 439, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 29, &c.—Lucan. 6, v. 378, &c.—Paus. 8, c. 17 & 18.—Curt. 10, c. 10.

Suetonius, C. Paulinus, the first Roman general who crossed mount Atlas with an army, of which expedition he wrote an account. He presided over Britain as governor for about 20 years, and was afterwards made consul. He forsook the interest of Otho, and attached himself to Vitellius.——C. Tranquillus, a Latin historian, son of a Roman knight of the same name. He was favored by Adrian, and became his secretary, but he was afterwards banished from the court for want of attention and respect to the empress Sabina. In his retirement Suetonius enjoyed the friendship and correspondence of Pliny the younger, and dedicated his time to study. He wrote an history of the Roman kings, divided into three books; a catalogue of all the illustrious men of Rome, a book on the games and spectacles of the Greeks, &c. which are all now lost. The only one of his compositions extant is the lives of the twelve first Cæsars, and some fragments of his catalogue of celebrated grammarians. Suetonius, in his lives, is praised for his impartiality and correctness. His expressions, however, are often too indelicate, and it has been justly observed, that while he exposed the deformities of the Cæsars, he wrote with all the licentiousness and extravagance with which they lived. The best editions of Suetonius are that of Pitiscus, 4to. 2 vols. Leovard. 1714; that of Oudendorp, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1751; and that of Ernesti, 8vo. Lipsi. 1775. Plin. 1, ep. 18. l. 5, ep. 11, &c.

SULPITIA, a daughter of Paterculus, who married Fulvius Flaccus. She was ſo famous for her chaſtity, that ſhe conſecrated a temple to Venus Verticordia, a goddeſs who was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue. Plin. 7, c. 35.——A poeteſs in the age of Domitian, againſt whom ſhe wrote a poem, becauſe he had baniſhed the philoſophers from Rome. This compoſition is ſtill extant. She had alſo written a poem on conjugal affection, commended by Martial, ep. 35, now loſt.——A daughter of Serv. Sulpitius, mentioned in the 4th book of elegies, falſely attributed to Tibullus.

SULPITIA LEX, militaris, by C. Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665, inveſted Marius with the full power of the war againſt Mithridates, of which Sylla was to be deprived.——Another, de ſenatu, by Servius Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It required that no ſenator ſhould owe more than 2000 drachmæ.——Another, de civitate, by P. Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It ordered that the new citizens who compoſed the eight tribes lately created, ſhould be divided among the 35 old tribes, as a greater honor.——Another called alſo Sempronia de religione, by P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Sempronius Sophus, conſuls, A. U. C. 449. It forbad any perſon to conſecrate a temple or altar without the permiſſion of the ſenate and the majority of the tribunes.——Another to empower the Romans to make war againſt Philip of Macedonia.

SULPITIUS, or SULPICIUS, an illuſtrious family at Rome, of whom the moſt celebrated are——Peticus, a man choſen dictator againſt the Gauls. His troops mutinied when firſt he took the field, but ſoon after he engaged the enemy and totally defeated them. Liv. 7.——Severrio, a conſul who gained a victory over the Æqui. Id. 9, c. 45.——C. Paterculus, a conſul ſent againſt the Carthaginians. He conquered Sardinia and Corſica, and obtained a complete victory over the enemy's fleet. He was honored with a triumph at his return to Rome. Id. 17.——Spurius, one of the three commiſſioners whom the Romans ſent to collect the beſt laws which could be found in the different cities and republics of Greece. Id. 3, c. 10.——One of the firſt conſuls who received intelligence that a conſpiracy was formed in Rome to reſtore the Tarquins to power, &c.——A prieſt who died of the plague in the firſt ages of the republic at Rome.——P. Galba, a Roman conſul who ſignalized himſelf greatly during the war which his countrymen waged againſt the Achæans and the Macedonians.——Severus, a writer. Vid. Severus.——Publius, one of the aſſociates of Marius, well known for his intrigues and cruelty. He made ſome laws in favor of the allies of Rome, and he kept about 3000 young men in continual pay, whom he called his ante-ſenatorial band, and with theſe he had often the impertinence to attack the conſuls in the popular aſſemblies. He became at laſt ſo ſeditious, that he was proſcribed by Sylla's adherents, and immediately murdered. His head was fixed on a pole in the roſtrum, where he had often made many ſeditious ſpeeches in the capacity of tribune. Liv. 77.——A Roman conſul who fought againſt Pyrrhus and defeated him.——C. Longus, a Roman conſul, who defeated the Samnites, and killed 30,000 of their men. He obtained a triumph for this celebrated victory. He was afterwards made dictator to conduct a war againſt the Etrurians.——Rufus, a lieutenant of Cæſar in Gaul.——One of Meſſalina's favorites, put to death by Claudius ——P. Quirinus, a conſul in the age of Auguſtus.——Camerinus, a pro-conſul of Africa, under Nero, accuſed of cruelty, &c. Tacit. 13, An. 52.——Gallus, a celebrated aſtrologer in the age of Paulus. He accompanied the conſul in his expedition againſt Perſeus, and told the Roman army that the night before the day on which they were to give the enemy battle, there would be an eclipſe of the moon. This explanation encouraged the ſoldiers, which on the contrary would have intimidated them, if not previouſly acquainted with the cauſes of it. Sulpitius was univerſally regarded, and he was honored a few years after with the conſulſhip. Liv. 44, c. 37.—Plin. 2, c. 12.——Apollinaris, a grammarian in the age of the emperor M. Aurelius. He left ſome letters and a few grammatical obſervations now loſt. Cic.—Liv.—Plut.—Polyb.—Flor.—Eutrop.

SUMMĀNUS, a ſirname of Pluto, as prince of the dead, ſummus manium. He had a temple at Rome, and the Romans believed that the thunder-bolts of Jupiter were in his power during the night. Cic. de div. 1, c. 10.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 731.

SUNICI, a people of Germany on the ſhores of the Rhine. Tacit. H. 4, c. 66.

SUNIDES, a ſoothſayer in the army of Eumenes. Polyæn. 4.

SUNIUM, a promontory of Attica, about 45 miles diſtant from the Piræus. There was there a ſmall harbour, as alſo a town. Minerva had there a beautiful temple, whence ſhe was called Sunias. There are ſtill extant ſome ruins of this temple. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Strab. 9.—Pauſ. 1, c. 1.—Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 3. l. 13, ep. 10.

SUOVETAURILIA, a ſacrifice among the Romans, which conſiſted of the immolation of a ſow (ſus,) a ſheep (ovis), and a bull (taurus,) whence the name. It was generally obſerved every fifth year.

SUPĔRUM MARE, a name of the Adriatic ſea, becauſe it was ſituate above Italy. The name of Mare Inferum was applied for the oppoſite reaſons to the ſea below Italy. Cic. pro Cluent. &c.

SURA, ÆMYLIUS, a Latin writer, &c. V. Pat. 1, c. 6.——L. Licinius, a favorite of Trajan, honored with the conſulſhip. ——A writer in the age of the emperor Gallienus. He wrote an hiſtory of the reign of the emperor.——A city on the Euphrates.——Another in Iberia.——A river of Germany, whoſe waters fall into the Moſelle. Auſ. in Moſ.

SURĒNA, a powerful officer in the armies of Orodes king of Parthia. His family had the privilege of crowning the kings of Parthia. He was appointed to conduct the war againſt the Romans, and to protect the kingdom of Parthia againſt Craſſus, who wiſhed to conquer it. He defeated the Roman triumvir, and after he had drawn him perfidiouſly to a conference, he ordered his head to be cut off. He afterwards returned to Parthia, mimicking the triumphs of the Romans. Orodes ordered him to be put to death, B. C. 52. Surena has been admired for his valor, his ſagacity as a general, and his prudence and firmneſs in the execution of his plans; but his perfidy, his effeminate manners, and his laſciviouſneſs, have been deſervedly cenſured. Polyæn. 7.—Plut. in Craſſ.

SURIUM, a town at the ſouth of Colchis.

SURRENTUM, a town of Campania, on the bay of Naples, famous for the wine which was made in the neighbourhood. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 17, v. 52.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 710.—Mart. 13, ep. 110.

SURUS, one of the Ædui, who made war againſt Cæſar. Cæſ. G. 8, c. 45.

SUSA (orum,) now Suſter, a celebrated city of Aſia, the chief town of Suſiana, and the capital of the Perſian empire, built by Tithonus the father of Memnon. Cyrus took it. The walls of Suſa were above 120 ſtadia in circumference. The treaſures of the kings of Perſia were generally kept there, and the royal palace was built with white marble, and its pillars were covered with gold and precious ſtones. It was uſual with the kings of Perſia to ſpend the ſummer at Ecbatana, and the winter at Suſa, becauſe the climate was more warm there than at any other royal reſidence. It has been called Memnonia, or the palace of Memnon, becauſe that prince reigned there. Plin. 6, c. 26, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 49.—Strab. 15.—Xenoph. Cyr.—Propert. 2, el. 13.—Claudian.

SUSĂNA, a town of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis. Sil. 3, v. 384.

SUSARION, a Greek poet of Megara, who is ſuppoſed with Dolon to be the inventor of comedy, and to have firſt introduced it at Athens on a moveable ſtage, B. C. 562.

SUSIĀNA, or SUSIS, a country of Aſia, of which the capital was called Suſa, ſituate at the eaſt of Aſſyria. Lilies grow in great abundance in Suſiana, and it is from that plant that the province received its name, according to ſome, as Suſan is the name of a lily in Hebrew.

SUSIDÆ PYLÆ, narrow paſſes over mountains, from Suſiana into Perſia. Curt. 5, c. 3.

SUTHUL, a town of Numidia, where the king's treaſures were kept. Sall. Jug. 37.

SUTRIUM, a town of Etruria, about 24 miles north-weſt of Rome. Some ſuppoſe that the phraſe Ire Sutium, to act with diſpatch, ariſes from the celerity with which Camillus recovered the place, but Feſtus explains it differently. Plaut. Caſ. 3, 1, v. 10.—Liv. 26, c. 34.—Paterc. 1, c. 14.—Liv. 9, c. 32.

SYĂGRUS, an antient poet, the firſt who wrote on the Trojan war. He is called Sagaris, by Diogenes Laertius, who adds that he lived in Homer's age, of whom he was the rival. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 21.

SYBĂRIS, a river of Lucania in Italy, whoſe waters were ſaid to render men more ſtrong and robuſt. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 11. l. 31, c. 2.——There was a town of the ſame name, on its banks on the bay of Tarentum, which had been founded by a colony of Achæans. Sybaris became very powerful, and in its moſt floriſhing ſituation it had the command of 4 neighbouring nations, of 25 towns, and could ſend an army of three hundred thouſand men into the field. The walls of the city were ſaid to extend 6 miles and a half in circumference, and the ſuburbs covered the banks of the Crathis for the ſpace of 7 miles. In a more recent age, the inhabitants became ſo effeminate, that the word Sybarite became proverbial to intimate a man devoted to pleaſure. It made a long and vigorous reſiſtance againſt the neighbouring town of Crotona, till it was at laſt totally reduced by the diſciples of Pythagoras, B. C. 508. Sybaris was deſtroyed no leſs than five times, and always repaired. There was a ſmall town built in the neighbourhood about 444 years before the Chriſtian era, and called Thurium, from a ſmall fountain called Thuria, where it was built. Diod. 12.—Strab. 6.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 24.—Martial. 12, ep. 96.—Plut. in Pelop. &c.—Plin. 3, c. 10, &c.——A friend of Æneas killed by Turnus. *Virg. SYBOTA, a harbour of Epirus. Cic. 5, Att. 9.

SYBŎTAS, a king of the Meſſenians in the age of Lycurgus, the Spartan legiſlator. Pauſ. 4, c. 4.

SYCINNUS, a ſlave of Themiſtocles, ſent by his maſter to engage Xerxes to fight againſt the fleet of the Peloponneſians.

SYCURIUM, a town of Theſſaly at the foot of Oſſa. Liv. 42, c. 54.

SYĒDRA, a town of Cilicia.

SYĒNE, now Aſſuan, a town of Thebais, on the extremities of Egypt. Juvenal the poet was baniſhed there on pretence of commanding a prætorian cohort ſtationed in the neighbourhood. It was famous for its quarries of marble. Strab. 1 & 2.—Mela. 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 8.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, el. 5, v. 79. Met. 5, v. 74.

SYENESIUS, a Cilician who, with Labinetus of Babylon, concluded a peace between Alyattes, king of Lydia, and Cyaxares, king of Media, while both armies were terrified by a ſudden eclipſe of the ſun, B. C. 585. Herodot. 1, c. 74.

SYENNESIS, a ſatrap of Cilicia, when Cyrus made war againſt his brother Artaxerxes. He wiſhed to favor both the brothers by ſending one of his ſons in the army of Cyrus, and another to Artaxerxes.

SYLĒA, a daughter of Corinthus.

SYLEUM, a town of Pamphylia.

SYLEUS, a king of Aulis.

SYLLA, (L. Cornelius) a celebrated Roman of a noble family. The poverty of his early years was relieved by the liberality of the courtezan Nicopolis, who left him heir to a large fortune; and with the addition of the immenſe wealth of his mother-in-law, he ſoon appeared one of the moſt opulent of the Romans. He firſt entered the army under the great Marius, whom he accompanied in Numidia, in the capacity of queſtor. He rendered himſelf conſpicuous in military affairs; and Bocchus, one of the princes of Numidia, delivered Jugurtha into his hands for the Roman conſul. The riſing fame of Sylla gave umbrage to Marius, who was always jealous of an equal, as well as of a ſuperior; but the ill language which he might uſe, rather inflamed than extinguiſhed the ambition of Sylla. He left the conqueror of Jugurtha, and carried arms under Catulus. Some time after, he obtained the pretorſhip, and was appointed by the Roman ſenate to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia, againſt the views and intereſt of Mithridates, king of Pontus. This he eaſily effected, one battle left him victorious; and before he quitted the plains of Aſia, the Roman pretor had the ſatisfaction to receive in his camp the ambaſſadors of the king of Parthia, who wiſhed to make a treaty of alliance with the Romans. Sylla received them with haughtineſs, and behaved with ſuch arrogance, that one of them exclaimed, Surely this man is maſter of the world, or doomed to be ſuch! At his return to Rome, he was commiſſioned to finiſh the war with the Marſi, and when this was ſucceſsfully ended, he was rewarded with the conſulſhip, in the 50th year of his age. In this capacity he wiſhed to have the adminiſtration of the Mithridatic war; but he found an obſtinate adverſary in Marius, and he attained the ſummit of his wiſhes only when he had entered Rome ſword in hand. After he had ſlaughtered all his enemies, ſet a price upon the head of Marius, and put to death the tribune Sulpitius, who had continually oppoſed his views, he marched towards Aſia, and diſregarded the flames of diſcord which he left behind him unextinguiſhed. Mithridates was already maſter of the greateſt part of Greece; and Sylla, when he reached the coaſt of Peloponneſus, was delayed by the ſiege of Athens, and of the Piræus. His operations were carried on with vigor, and when he found his money fail, he made no ſcruple to take the riches of the temples of the gods, to bribe his ſoldiers and render them devoted to his ſervice. His boldneſs ſucceeded, the Piræus ſurrendered; and the conqueror, as if ſtruck with reverence at the beautiful porticoes where the philoſophic followers of Socrates and Plato had often diſputed, ſpared the city of Athens, which he had devoted to deſtruction, and forgave the living for the ſake of the dead. Two celebrated battles at Cheronæa and Orchomenos, rendered him maſter of Greece. He croſſed the Helleſpont, and attacked Mithridates in the very heart of his kingdom. The artful monarch, who well knew the valor and perſeverance of his adverſary, made propoſals of peace; and Sylla, whoſe intereſt at home was then decreaſing, did not heſitate to put an end to a war which had rendered him maſter of ſo much territory, and which enabled him to return to Rome like a conqueror, and to diſpute with his rival the ſovereignty of the republic with a victorious army. Muræna was left at the head of the Roman forces in Aſia, and Sylla haſtened to Italy. In the plains of Campania he was met by a few of his adherents, whom the ſucceſs of his rivals had baniſhed from the capital, and he was ſoon informed, that if he wiſhed to contend with Marius, he muſt encounter fifteen generals, followed by 25 well diſciplined legions. In theſe critical circumſtances he had recourſe to artifice, and while he propoſed terms of accommodation to his adverſaries, he ſecretly ſtrengthened himſelf, and ſaw with pleaſure his armies daily encreaſe, by the revolt of ſoldiers whom his bribes or promiſes had corrupted. Pompey, who afterwards merited the ſirname of Great, embraced his cauſe, and marched to his camp with three legions. Soon after he appeared in the field with advantage; the confidence of Marius decayed with his power, and Sylla entered Rome like a tyrant and a conqueror. The ſtreets were daily filled with dead bodies, and 7000 citizens, to whom the conqueror had promiſed pardon, were ſuddenly maſſacred in the circus. The ſenate, at that time aſſembled in the temple of Bellona, heard the ſhrieks of their dying countrymen; and when they enquired into the cauſe of it, Sylla coolly required, They are only a few rebels whom I have ordered to be chaſtiſed. If this had been the laſt and moſt diſmal ſcene, Rome might have been called happy; but it was only the beginning of her misfortunes, each ſucceeding day exhibited a greater number of ſlaughtered bodies, and when one of the ſenators had the boldneſs to aſk the tyrant when he meant to ſtop his cruelties, Sylla, with an air of unconcern, anſwered, that he had not yet determined, but that he would take it into his conſideration. The ſlaughter was continued, a liſt of ſuch as were proſcribed was daily ſtuck in the public ſtreets. The ſlave was rewarded to bring his maſter's head, and the ſon was not aſhamed to imbrue his hands in the blood of his father for money. No leſs than 4700 of the moſt powerful and opulent were ſlain, and Sylla wiſhed the Romans to forget his cruelties in aſpiring to the title of perpetual dictator. In this capacity he made new laws, abrogated ſuch as were inimical to his views, and changed every regulation where his ambition was obſtructed. After he had finiſhed whatever the moſt abſolute ſovereign may do, from his own will and authority, Sylla abdicated the dictatorial power, and retired to a ſolitary retreat at Puteoli, where he ſpent the reſt of his days, if not in literary eaſe and tranquillity, yet far from the noiſe of arms, in the midſt of riot and debauchery. The companions of his retirement were the moſt baſe and licentious of the populace, and Sylla took pleaſure ſtill to wallow in voluptuouſneſs, tho' on the verge of life, and covered with infirmities. His intemperance haſtened his end, his blood was corrupted, and an impoſthume was bred in his bowels. He at laſt died in the greateſt torments of the louſy diſeaſe, about 78 years before Chriſt, in the 60th year of his age; and it has been obſerved, that like Marius, on his death-bed, he wiſhed to drown the ſtings of conſcience and remorſe by continual intoxication. His funeral was very magnificent; his body was attended by the ſenate and the veſtal virgins, and hymns were ſung to celebrate his exploits and to honor his memory. A monument was erected in the field of Mars, on which appeared an inſcription written by himſelf, in which he ſaid, the good ſervices he had received from his friends, and the injuries

of his enemies, had been returned with unexampled uſury. The character of Sylla is that of an ambitious, diſſimulating, credulous, tyrannical, debauched, and reſolute commander. He was revengeful in the higheſt degree, and the ſirname of Felix, or the fortunate, which he aſſumed, ſhowed that he was more indebted to fortune than to valor for the great fame he had acquired. But in the midſt of all this, who cannot admire the moderation and philoſophy of a man, who when abſolute maſter of a republic, which he has procured by his cruelty and avarice, ſilently abdicates the ſovereign power, challenges a critical examination of his adminiſtration, and retires to live ſecurely in the midſt of thouſands whom he has injured and offended? The Romans were pleaſed and aſtoniſhed at his abdication; and when the inſolence of a young man had been vented againſt the dictator, he calmly anſwered, This uſage may perhaps deter another to reſign his power to follow my example, if ever he becomes abſolute. Sylla has been commended for the patronage he gave to the arts and ſciences. He brought from Aſia the extenſive library of Apellicon, the Peripatetic philoſopher, in which were the works of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, and he himſelf compoſed 22 books of memoirs concerning himſelf. *Cic. in Verr. &c.—C. SYRACOSIA, festivals at Syracuse, celebrated during ten days, in which women were busily employed in offering sacrifices. ——Another yearly observed near the lake of Syracuse, where, as they supposed, Pluto had disappeared with Proserpine.

SYRACŪSÆ, a celebrated city of Sicily, founded about 732 years before the Christian era, by Archias, a Corinthian, and one of the Heraclidæ. In its flourishing state it extended 22½ English miles in circumference, and was divided into 4 districts, Ortygia, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis, to which some add a fifth division Epipolæ, a district little inhabited. These were of themselves separate cities, and were fortified with three citadels, and three-folded walls. Syracuse had two capacious harbours separated from one another by the island of Ortygia. The greatest harbour was above 5000 paces in circumference, and its entrance 500 paces wide. The people of Syracuse were very opulent and powerful, and though subject to tyrants, they were masters of vast possessions and dependent states. The city of Syracuse was well built, its houses were stately and magnificent; and it has been said, that it produced the best and most excellent of men when they were virtuous, but the most wicked and depraved when addicted to vicious pursuits. The women of Syracuse were not permitted to adorn themselves with gold, or wear costly garments, except such as prostituted themselves. Syracuse gave birth to Theocritus and Archimedes. It was under different governments; and after being freed from the tyranny of Thrasybulus, B. C. 446, it enjoyed security for 61 years, till the usurpation of the Dionysii, who were expelled by Timoleon, B. C. 343. In the age of the elder Dionysius, an army of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and 400 ships, were kept in constant pay. It fell into the hands of the Romans, under the consul Marcellus, after a siege of 3 years, B. C. 212. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 52 & 53.—Strab. 1 & 8.—*C. SYRIA, a large country of Asia, whose boundaries are not accurately ascertained by the antients. Syria, generally speaking, was bounded on the east by the Euphrates, north by mount Taurus, west by the Mediterranean, and south by Arabia. It was divided into several districts and provinces, among which were Phœnicia, Seleucis, Judæa or Palestine, Mesopotamia, Babylon, and Assyria. It was also called Assyria; and the words Syria and Assyria, though distinguished and defined by some authors were often used indifferently. Syria was subjected to the monarchs of Persia; but after the death of Alexander the Great, Seleucus, firnamed Nicator, who had received this province as his lot in the division of the Macedonian dominions, raised it into an empire, known in history by the name of the kingdom of Syria or Babylon, B. C. 312. Seleucus died after a reign of 32 years, and his successors, firnamed the Seleucidæ, ascended the throne in the following order: Antiochus, firnamed Soter, 280 B. C. Antiochus Theos, 261; Seleucus Callinicus, 246; Seleucus Ceraunus, 226; Antiochus the Great, 223; Seleucus Philopator, 187; Antiochus Epiphanes, 175; Antiochus Eupator, 164; Demetrius Soter, 162; Alexander Balas, 150; Demetrius Nicator, 146; Antiochus the Sixth, 144; Diodotus Tryphon, 143; Antiochus Sidetes, 139; Demetrius Nicator restored, 130; Alexander Zebina, 127, who was dethroned by Antiochus Grypus, 123; Antiochus Cyzicenus, 112, who takes part of Syria, which he calls Cœlesyria; Philip and Demetrius Eucerus, 93, and in Cœlesyria, Antiochus Pius; Aretas was king of Cœlesyria, 85; Tigranes, king of Armenia, 83; and Antiochus Asiaticus, 69, who was dethroned by Pompey, B. C. 65; in consequence of which, Syria became a Roman province. Herodot. 2, 3, & 7.—Apollon. 1, Arg.—Strab. 12 & 16.—C. Nep. in Dat.—Mela. 1, c. 2.—Ptol. 5, c. 6.—Curt. 6.—*Dionys. SYRIĂCUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean sea which is on the coast of Phœnicia and Syria.

SYRINX, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the river Ladon. Pan became enamoured of her, and attempted to offer her violence; but Syrinx escaped, and at her own request was changed by the gods into a reed called Syrinx by the Greeks. The god made himself a pipe with the reeds, into which his favorite nymph had been changed. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 691.

SYROPHŒNIX, the name of an inhabitant of the maritime coast of Syria. Juv. 8.

SYROS, one of the Cyclades in the Ægean sea, about 20 miles in circumference, very fruitful in wine and corn of all sorts. The

The inhabitants lived to a great old age, because the air was wholesome. Homer. Od. 15, v. 504.—Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7. ——A town of Caria. Pauſ. 3, c. 26.

SYRTES, two large ſand banks in the Mediterranean, on the coaſt of Africa, one of which was near Leptis, and the other near Carthage. As they often changed places, and were ſometimes very high or very low under the water, they were deemed moſt dangerous in navigation, and proved fatal to whatever ſhips touched upon them. From this circumſtance, therefore, the word has been uſed to denote any part of the ſea of which the navigation was attended with danger either from whirlpools or hidden rocks. Mela. 1, c. 7. l. 2, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 41.—Lucan. 9, v. 303.—Salluſt. in J.

SYRUS, an iſland. [Vid. Syros.]——A ſon of Apollo, by Sinope, the daughter of the Aſopus, who gave his name to Syria. Plut. in Luc.——A writer. Vid. Publius.

SYSIGAMBIS, the mother of Darius. Vid. Siſygambis.

SYSIMETHRES, a Perſian ſatrap, who had two children by his mother, an inceſtuous commerce tolerated by the laws of Perſia. He oppoſed Alexander with 2000 men, but ſoon ſurrendered. He was greatly honored by the conqueror. Curt. 8, c. 4.

SYSINAS, the elder ſon of Datames, who revolted from his father to Artaxerxes.

SYTHAS, a river of Peloponneſus, flowing through Sicyonia into the bay of Corinth. Pauſ. 2, c. 7.

TABÆ, a town of Piſidia. Liv. 38, c. 13.

TABELLARIÆ LEGES, laws made by ſuffrages delivered upon tablets (tabellæ) and not vivâ voce. There were four of theſe laws, the Gabinia lex A. U. C. 614. by Gabinius; the Caſſia, by Caſſius A. U. C. 616; the Papiria, by Carbo, A. U. C. 622, and the Cælia, by Cælius A. U. C. 646. Cic. de legg. 3, c. 16.

TABERNÆ NOVÆ, a ſtreet in Rome, where ſhops were built. Liv. 3, c. 48. ——Rhenanæ, a town of Germany on the confluence of the Felbach and the Rhine, now Rhin-Zabern.——Riguæ, now Bern-Caſtel, on the Moſelle.——Triboccorum, a town of Alſace in France, now Saverne.

TABOR, a mountain of Paleſtine.

TABRĂCA, a maritime town of Africa, near Hippo, made a Roman colony. The neighbouring foreſts abounded with monkeys. Juv. 10, v. 194.—Plin. 5, c. 3.—Mela. 1, c. 7.—Ital. 3, v. 256.

TABUDA, a river of Germany, now the Scheldt. Ptol.

TACAPE, a town of Africa.

TACATUA, a maritime town of Numidia.

TACFARĪNAS, a Numidian who commanded an army againſt the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had formerly ſerved in the Roman legions, but in the character of an enemy, he diſplayed the moſt inveterate hatred againſt his benefactor. After he had ſeverally defeated the officers of Tiberius, he was at laſt routed and killed in the field of battle, fighting with uncommon fury, by Dolabella. Tacit. Ann. 2, &c.

TACHAMPSO, an iſland in the Nile, near Thebais. The Egyptians held one half of this iſland, and the reſt was in the hands of the Æthiopians. Herodot. 2.

TACHOS or TACHUS, a king of Egypt, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, againſt whom he ſuſtained a long war. He was aſſiſted by the Greeks, but his confidence in Ageſilaus, king of Lacedæmon, proved fatal to him. Chabrias, the Athenian, had been entruſted with the fleet of the Egyptian monarch, and Ageſilaus was left with the command of the mercenary army. The Lacedæmonian diſregarded his engagements, and by joining with Nectanebus, who had revolted from Tachus, he ruined the affairs of the monarch, and obliged him to ſave his life by flight. Some obſerve that Ageſilaus acted with that duplicity to avenge himſelf upon Tachus, who had inſolently ridiculed his ſhort and deformed ſtature. The expectations of Tachus had been raiſed by the fame of Ageſilaus; but when he ſaw the lame monarch, he repeated on the occaſion the fable of the mountain which brought forth a mouſe, upon which Ageſilaus replied with aſperity, that though he called him a mouſe, yet he ſoon ſhould find him to be a lion. C. Nep. in Ageſ.

TACINA, a river of the Brutii.

TACĬTUS, (C. Cornelius) a celebrated Latin

Latin hiſtorian, born in the reign of Nero. His father was a Roman knight, who had been appointed governor of Belgic Gaul. The native genius, and the riſing talents of Tacitus, were beheld with rapture by the emperor Veſpaſian, and as he wiſhed to protect and patronize merit, he raiſed the young hiſtorian to places of truſt and honor. The ſucceeding emperors were not leſs partial to Tacitus, and Domitian ſeemed to forget his cruelties, when virtue and innocence claimed his patronage. Tacitus was honored with the conſulſhip, and he gave proofs of his eloquence at the bar, by ſupporting the cauſe of the injured Africans againſt the proconſul Marius Priſcus, and in cauſing him to be condemned for his avarice and extortion. The friendly intercourſe of Pliny and Tacitus has often been admired, and many have obſerved, that the familiarity of theſe two great men, aroſe from ſimilar principles, and a perfect conformity of manners and opinions. Yet Tacitus was as much the friend of a republican government, as Pliny was an admirer of the imperial power, and of the ſhort lived virtues of his patron Trajan. Pliny gained the heart of his adherents by affability, and all the elegant graces which became the courtier and the favorite, while Tacitus conciliated the eſteem of the world by his virtuous conduct, which prudence and love of honor ever guided. The friendſhip of Tacitus and of Pliny almoſt became proverbial, and one was ſcarce mentioned without the other, as the following inſtance may indicate. At the exhibition of the ſpectacles in the circus, Tacitus held a long converſation on different ſubjects with a Roman knight, with whom he was unacquainted; and when the knight aſked him whether he was a native of Italy, the hiſtorian told him that he was not unknown to him, and that for their diſtant acquaintance, he was indebted to literature. Then you are, replied the knight, either Tacitus or Pliny. The time of Tacitus was not employed in trivial purſuits, the orator might have been now forgotten if the hiſtorian had not floriſhed. Tacitus wrote a treatiſe on the manners of the Germans, a compoſition admired for the fidelity and exactneſs with which it is executed, though ſome have declared that the hiſtorian delineated manners and cuſtoms with which he was not acquainted, and which never exiſted. His life of Cn. Julius Agricola, whoſe daughter he had married, is celebrated for its purity, elegance, and the many excellent inſtructions and important truths which it relates. His hiſtory of the Roman emperors is imperfect; of the 28 years of which it treated, that is from the 69th to the 96th year of the Chriſtian era, nothing remains but the year 69th, and part of the 70th. His annals were the moſt extenſive and complete of his works. The hiſtory of the reign of Tiberius, Caius, Claudius and Nero was treated with accuracy, and attention, yet we are to lament the loſs of the hiſtory of the reign of Caius, and the beginning of that of Claudius. Tacitus had reſerved for his old age, the hiſtory of the reign of Nerva and Trajan, and he alſo propoſed to give to the world an account of the intereſting adminiſtration of Auguſtus; but theſe important ſubjects never employed the pen of the hiſtorian, and as ſome of the antients obſerve, the only compoſitions of Tacitus were contained in 30 books, of which we have now left only 16 of his annals, and five of his hiſtory. The ſtile of Tacitus has always been admired for peculiar beauties; the thoughts are great, there is ſublimity, force, weight and energy, every thing is treated with preciſion and dignity, yet many have called him obſcure, becauſe he was fond of expreſſing his ideas in few words. This was the fruit of experience and judgment, the hiſtory appears copious and diffuſe, while the annals, which were written in his old age, are leſs flowing, as to ſtile, more conciſe, and more heavily labored. His Latin is remarkable for being pure and claſſical; and though a writer in the decline of the Roman empire, he has not uſed obſolete words, antiquated phraſes, or barbarous expreſſions, but with him every thing is ſanctioned by the authority of the writers of the Auguſtan age. In his biographical ſketches he diſplays an uncommon knowledge of human nature, he paints every ſcene with a maſterly hand, and gives each object its proper ſize and becoming colors. Affairs of importance are treated with dignity, the ſecret cauſes of events and revolutions are inveſtigated from their primeval ſource, and the hiſtorian every where ſhows his reader that he was a friend of public liberty and national independence, a lover of truth, and of the general good and welfare of mankind, and an inveterate enemy to oppreſſion, and to a tyrannical government. The hiſtory of the reign of Tiberius is his maſter-piece, the deep policy, the diſſimulation and various intrigues of this celebrated prince, are painted with all the fidelity of the hiſtorian, and Tacitus boaſted in ſaying, that he neither would flatter the follies, or maliciouſly or partially repreſent the extravagance of the ſeveral characters he delineated. Candor and impartiality were his ſtandard, and his claim to theſe eſſential qualifications of an hiſtorian have never been diſputed. It is ſaid, that the emperor Tacitus, who boaſted in being one of the deſcendants of the hiſtorian, ordered the works of his anceſtor to be placed in all public libraries, braries, and directed that ten copies well aſcertained for accuracy and exactneſs, ſhould be yearly written, that ſo great and ſo valuable a work might not be loſt. Some eccleſiaſtical writers have exclaimed againſt Tacitus for the partial manner in which he ſpeaks of the Jews and Chriſtians; but it ſhould be remembered, that he ſpoke the language of the Romans, and that the peculiarities of the Chriſtians could not but draw upon them the odium and the ridicule of the Pagans, and the imputation of ſuperſtition. Among the many excellent editions of Tacitus, theſe may paſs for the beſt; that of Rome, fol. 1515; that in 8vo. 2 vols. L. Bat. 1673; that in uſum Delphini 4 vols. 4to. Paris, 1682; that of Lipſ. 2 vols. 8vo. 1714; of Gronovius, 2 vols. 4to. 1721; that of Brotier, 7 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1776; that of Erneſti, 2 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1777; and Barbou's, 3 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1760.——M. Claudius, a Roman elected emperor by the ſenate, after the death of Aurelian. He would have refuſed this important and dangerous office, but the preſſing ſolicitations of the ſenate prevailed, and in the 70th year of his age, he complied with the wiſhes of his countrymen, and accepted the purple. The time of his adminiſtration was very popular, the good of the people was his care, and as a pattern of moderation, economy, temperance, regularity, and impartiality, Tacitus found no equal. He aboliſhed the ſeveral brothels which under the preceding reigns had filled Rome with licentiouſneſs and obſcenity; and by ordering all the public baths to be ſhut at ſun-ſet, he prevented the commiſſion of many irregularities, which the darkneſs of the night had hitherto ſanctioned. The ſenators under Tacitus ſeemed to have recovered their antient dignity, and long loſt privileges. They were not only the counſellors of the emperor, but they even ſeemed to be his maſters; and when Florianus, the brother-in-law of Tacitus, was refuſed the conſulſhip, the emperor ſaid, that the ſenate, no doubt, could fix upon a more deſerving object. As a warrior, Tacitus is inferior to few of the Romans, and during a ſhort reign of about ſix months, he not only repelled the barbarians who had invaded the territories of Rome in Aſia, but he prepared to make war againſt the Perſians and Scythians. He died in Cilicia as he was on his expedition, of a violent diſtemper, or, according to ſome, he was deſtroyed by the ſecret dagger of an aſſaſſin, on the 13th of April, in the 276th year of the Chriſtian era. Tacitus has been commended for his love of learning, and it has been obſerved, that he never paſſed a day without conſecrating ſome part of his time to reading or writing. He has been accuſed of ſuperſtition, and authors have recorded, that he never ſtudied on the ſecond day of each month, a day which he deemed inauſpicious and unlucky. Tacit. vitâ.--Zoſim.

TADER, a river of Spain, near New Carthage.

TÆDIA, a proſtitute at Rome, &c. Juv. 2, v. 49.

TÆNĂRUS, now Matapan, a promontory of Laconia, the moſt ſouthern point of Europe, where Neptune had a temple. There was there a large and deep cavern, whence iſſued a black and unwholeſome vapor, from which circumſtance the poets have imagined that it was one of the entrances of hell, through which Hercules dragged Cerberus from the infernal regions. This fabulous tradition ariſes, according to Pauſanias, from the continual reſort of a large ſerpent near the cavern of Tænarus, whoſe bite was mortal. This ſerpent, as the geographer obſerves, was at laſt killed by Hercules, and carried to Euryſtheus. The town of Tænarus was at the diſtance of about 40 ſtadia from the promontory, and was famous for marble of a beautiful green color. The town, as well as the promontory, received its name from Tænarus, a ſon of Neptune. There were ſome feſtivals celebrated there called Tænaria, in honor of Neptune, ſirnamed Tænarius. *Homer. It was founded by Pœmandros, a ſon of Chæreſilaus, the ſon of Jaſius, who married Tanagra, the daughter of Æolus; or, according to ſome, of the Aſopus. Corinna was a native of Tanagra. Strab. 9.—Pauſ. 9, c. 20 & 22.—Ælian. V. H. 13, v. 25.

TANĂGRUS, or TANĂGER, now Negro, a river of Lucania in Italy, remarkable for its caſcades, and the beautiful meanders of its ſtreams, through a fine picturesque country. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.

TANAIS, an eunuch, freed man to Mæcenas. Horat. 1, Sat. 1, v. 105.——A river of Scythia, now the Don, which divides Europe from Aſia, and falls into the Palus Mæotis after a rapid courſe, and after it has received the additional ſtreams of many ſmall rivulets. A town at its mouth bore the ſame name. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 11 & 16.—Curt. 6, c. 2.—Lucan. 3, 8, &c.——A deity among the Perſians and Armenians, who patronized ſlaves; ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Venus. The daughters of the nobleſt of the Perſians and Armenians proſtituted themſelves in honor of this deity, and were received with greater regard and affection by their ſuitors. Artaxerxes, the ſon of Darius, was the firſt who raiſed ſtatues to Tanais. Strab. 11.

TANĂQUIL, called alſo Caia Cæcilia, was the wife of Tarquin the 5th king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, where ſhe married Lucumon, better known by the name of Tarquin, which he aſſumed after he had come to Rome at the repreſentation of his wife, whoſe knowledge of augury promiſed him ſomething uncommon. Her expectations were not fruſtrated; her huſband was raiſed to the throne, and ſhe ſhared with him the honors of royalty. After the murder of Tarquin, Tanaquil raiſed her ſon-in-law Servius Tullius to the throne, and enſured him the ſucceſſion. She diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her liberality; and the Romans in ſucceeding ages had ſuch a veneration for her character, that the embroidery ſhe had made, her girdle, as alſo the robe of her ſon-in-law, which ſhe had worked with her own hands, were preſerved with the greateſt ſanctity. Juvenal beſtows the appellation of Tanaquil on all ſuch women as were imperious, and had the command of their huſbands. Liv. 1, c. 34, &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 3, c. 59.—Flor. 1, c. 5 & 8.—Ital. 13, v. 818.

TANTĂLUS, a king of Lydia, ſon of Jupiter, by a nymph called Pluto. He was father of Niobe, Pelops, &c. by Dione, one of the Atlantides, called by ſome Euryanaſſa.

Tantalus

Tantalus is repreſented by the poets as puniſhed in hell, with an inſatiable thirſt, and placed up to the chin in the midſt of a pool of water, which, however, flows away as ſoon as he attempts to taſte it. There hangs alſo above his head, a bough, richly loaded with delicious fruit; which, as ſoon as he attempts to ſeize, is carried away from his reach by a ſudden blaſt of wind. According to ſome mythologiſts, his puniſhment is to ſit under a huge ſtone hung at ſome diſtance over his head, and as it ſeems every moment ready to fall, he is kept under continual alarms and never ceaſing fears. The cauſes of this eternal puniſhment are variouſly explained. Some declare that it was inflicted upon him becauſe he ſtole a favorite dog, which Jupiter had entruſted to his care to keep his temple in Crete. Others ſay that he ſtole away the nectar and ambroſia from the tables of the gods, when he was admitted into the aſſemblies of heaven, and that he gave it to mortals on earth. Others ſupport, that this proceeds from his cruelty and impiety in killing his ſon Pelops, and in ſerving his limbs as food before the gods, whoſe divinity and power he wiſhed to try, when they had ſtopped at his houſe as they paſſed over Phrygia. There are alſo others who impute it to his laſciviouſneſs in carrying away Ganymedes to gratify the moſt unnatural of paſſions. Pindar. Olymp. 1.—Homer. Od. 11, v. 581.—*Cic. TANUSIUS GERMINUS, a Latin hiſtorian intimate with Cicero. Seneca.

TĂPHIÆ, iſlands in the Ionian ſea, between Achaia and Leucadia. They were alſo called Teleboides. They received theſe names from Taphius and Telebous, the ſons of Neptune who reigned there. The Taphians made war againſt Electryon king of Mycenæ, and killed all his ſons; upon which the monarch promiſed his kingdom and his daughter in marriage to whoever could avenge the death of his children upon the Taphians. Amphytrion did it with ſucceſs, and obtained the promiſed reward. The Taphians were expert ſailors, but too fond of plunder and piratical excurſions. Homer. Od. 1, v. 181 & 419. l. 15, v. 426.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

TAPHIUS, a ſon of Neptune by Hippothoe the daughter of Neſtor. He was king of the Taphiæ, to which he gave his name. Strab. 10.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.

TARCHONDIMŎTUS, a prince of Cilicia. Lucan. 11, v. 219.

TARENTUM, TARENTUS, or TARAS, a town of Calabria, ſituate on a bay of the ſame name, near the mouth of the river Galeſus. It was founded, or rather repaired, by a Lacedæmonian colony, about 707 years before Chriſt, under the conduct of Phalanthus. Long independent, it maintained its ſuperiority over 13 tributary cities; and could once arm 100,000 foot, and 3,000 horſe. The people of Tarentum were very indolent, and as they were eaſily ſupplied with all neceſſaries as well as luxuries from Greece, they gave themſelves up to voluptuouſneſs, ſo that the delights of Tarentum became proverbial. The war which they ſupported againſt the Romans, with the aſſiſtance of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, and which has been called the Taren- time war, is greatly celebrated in history. This war, which had been undertaken B. C. 281, by the Romans to avenge the insults the Tarentines had offered to their ships when near their harbours, was terminated after ten years; 30,000 prisoners were taken, and Tarentum became subject to Rome. The government of Tarentum was democratical; there were, however, some monarchs who reigned there. It was for some time the residence of Pythagoras, who inspired the citizens with the love of virtue, and rendered them superior to their neighbours in the cabinet as well as in the field of battle. The large, beautiful, and capacious harbour of Tarentum is greatly commended by antient historians. Tarentum, now called Tarento, is inhabited by about 18,000 souls, who still maintain the character of their forefathers in idleness and effeminacy, and live chiefly by fishing. Flor. 1, c. 18.—*Val. TARNÆ, a town mentioned by Homer, Il. 5.——A fountain of Lydia, near Tmolus. Strab.——A river of Aquitania.

TARPA, (Spurius Mætius,) a critic at Rome in the age of Augustus. He was appointed with four others in the temple of Apollo, to examine the merit of every poetical composition, which was to be deposited in the temple of the Muses. In this office he acted with great impartiality, though many taxed him with want of candor. All the pieces that were represented on the Roman stage had previously received his approbation. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 38.

TARPEIA, the daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel of Rome, promised to open the gates of the city to the Sabines, provided they gave her their gold bracelets, or, as she expressed it, what they carried on their left hands. Tatius, the king of the Sabines, consented, and as he entered the gates, to punish her perfidy, he threw not only his bracelet but his shield upon Tarpeia. His followers imitated his example, and Tarpeia was crushed under the weight of the bracelets and shields of the Sabine army. She was buried in the capitol, which from her has been called the Tarpeian rock, and there afterwards many of the Roman malefactors were thrown down a deep precipice. Plut. in Rom.—*Ovid. TARQUINII, now Turchina, a town of Etruria, built by Tarchon, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. Tarquinius Priscus was educated there, and he made it a Roman colony when he ascended the throne. Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 95.—Liv. 1, c. 34. l. 27, c. 4.

TARQUINIA, a daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, who married Servius Tullius. When her husband was murdered by Tarquinius Superbus, she privately conveyed away his body by night, and buried it. This preyed upon her mind, and the following night she died. Some have attributed her death to excess of grief, or suicide, while others, perhaps more justly, have suspected Tullia, the wife of young Tarquin, with the murder.——A vestal virgin, who, as some suppose, gave the Roman people a large piece of land, which was afterwards called the Campus Martius.

TARQUINIUS PRISCUS, the 5th king of Rome, was son of Demaratus, a native of Greece. His first name was Lucumon, but this he changed when by the advice of his wife Tanaquil, he had come to Rome. He called himself Lucius, and assumed the surname of Tarquinius, because born in the town of Tarquinii in Etruria. At Rome he distinguished himself so much by his liberality and engaging manners, that Ancus Martius, the reigning monarch, nominated him at his death, the guardian of his children. This was insufficient to gratify the ambition of Tarquin; the princes were young, and an artful oration delivered to the people immediately transferred the crown of the deceased monarch on the head of Lucumon. The people had every reason to be satisfied with their choice, Tarquin reigned with moderation and popularity. He increased the number of the senate, and made himself himself friends by electing 100 new senators from the plebeians, whom he distinguished by the appellation of Patres minorum gentium, from those of the patrician body, who were called Patres majorum gentium. The glory of the Roman arms, which was supported with so much dignity by the former monarchs, was not neglected in this reign, and Tarquin showed that he possessed vigor and military prudence in the victories which he obtained over the united forces of the Latins and Sabines, and in the conquest of the 12 nations of Etruria. He repaired, in the time of peace, the walls of the capital, the public places were adorned with elegant buildings and useful ornaments, and many centuries after, such as were spectators of the stately mansions and golden palaces of Nero, viewed with more admiration and greater pleasure the more simple, though not less magnificent, edifices of Tarquin. He laid the foundations of the capitol, and to the industry and the public spirit of this monarch, the Romans were indebted for their aqueducts and subterraneous sewers, which supplied the city with fresh and wholesome water, and removed all the filth and ordure, which in a great capital too often breed pestilence and diseases. Tarquin was the first who introduced among the Romans the custom to canvass for offices of trust and honor; he distinguished the monarch, the senators, and other inferior magistrates with particular robes and ornaments, with ivory chairs at spectacles, and the hatchets carried before the public magistrates, were by his order surrounded with bundles of sticks, to strike more terror, and to be viewed with greater reverence. Tarquin was assassinated by the two sons of his predecessor, in the 80th year of his age, 38 of which he had sat on the throne, 578 years before Christ. Dionys. Hal. 3, c. 59.—Val. Max. 1. c. 4. l. 3, c. 2.—Flor. 1, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 817.——The second Tarquin, surnamed Superbus, from his pride and insolence, was grandson of Tarquinius Priscus. He ascended the throne of Rome after his father-in-law Servius Tullius, and was the seventh and last king of Rome. He married Tullia, the daughter of Tullius, and it was at her instigation that he murdered his father-in-law, and seized the kingdom. The crown which he had obtained with violence, he endeavoured to keep by a continuation of tyranny. Unlike his royal predecessors, he paid no regard to the decisions of the senate, or the approbation of the public assemblies, and by wishing to disregard both, he incurred the jealousy of the one and the odium of the other. The public treasury was soon exhausted by the continual extravagance of Tarqnin, and to silence the murmurs of his subjects, he resolved to call their attention to war. He was successful in his military operations, the neighbouring cities submitted; but while the siege of Ardea was continued, the wantonness of the son of Tarquin at Rome, for ever stopped the progress of his arms; and the Romans, whom a series of barbarity and oppression had hitherto provoked, no sooner saw the virtuous Lucretia stab herself, not to survive the loss of her honor, [Vid. Lucretia] than the whole city and camp arose with indignation against the monarch. The gates of Rome were shut against him, and Tarquin was for ever banished from his throne, in the year of Rome 244. Unable to find support from even one of his subjects, Tarquin retired among the Etrurians, who attempted in vain to replace him on his throne. The republican government was established at Rome, and all Italy refused any longer to support the cause of an exiled monarch against a nation, who heard the name of Tarquin, of king, and tyrant, mentioned with equal horror and indignation. Tarquin died in the 90th year of his age, about 14 years after his expulsion from Rome. He had reigned about 25 years. Though Tarquin appeared so odious among the Romans his reign was not without its share of glory. His conquests were numerous; to beautify the buildings and porticos at Rome was his wish, and with great magnificence and care he finished the capitol, which his predecessor of the same name had begun. He also bought the Sibylline books which the Romans consulted with such religious solemnity. [Vid. Sibyllæ.] Cic. pro Rab. &c.—Liv. 1, c. 46, &c.—Dionys. Æn. 6, v. 817.—Eutrop.—— (Collatinus) one of the relations of Tarquin the proud, who married Lucretia. [Vid. Collatanus.]—— Sextius, the eldest of the sons of Tarquin the proud, rendered himself well known by a variety of adventures. When his father besieged Gabii, young Tarquin publicly declared that he was at variance with the monarch, and the report was the more easily believed when he came before Gabii with his body all mangled and bloody with stripes. This was an agreement between the father and the son, and Tarquin had no sooner declared that this proceeded from the tyranny and oppression of his father, than the people of Gabii entrusted him with the command of their armies, fully convinced that Rome could never have a more inveterate inveterate enemy. When he had thus ſucceeded, he diſpatched a private meſſenger to his father, but the monarch gave no anſwer to be returned to his ſon. Sextius enquired more particularly about his father, and when he heard from the meſſenger that when the meſſage was delivered, Tarquin cut off with a ſtick the talleſt poppies in his garden, the ſon followed the example by putting to death the moſt noble and powerful citizens of Gabii. The town ſoon fell into the hands of the Romans. The violence which ſome time after Tarquinius offered to Lucretia, was the cauſe of his father's exile, and the total expulſion of his family from Rome. [Vid. Lucretia.] Sextius was at laſt killed, bravely fighting in a battle during the war which the Latins ſuſtained againſt Rome in the attempt of re-eſtabliſhing the Tarquins on their throne. *Ovid. TARSUS, now Taraſſo, a town of Cilicia, on the Cydnus, founded by Triptolemus and a colony of Argives, or, as others ſay, by Sardanapalus, or by Perſeus. Tarſus was celebrated for the great men it produced. It was once the rival of Alexandria and Athens in literature and the ſtudy of the polite arts. The people of Tarſus wiſhed to ingratiate themſelves into the favor of J. Cæſar by giving the name of Juliopolis to their city, but it was ſoon loſt. Lucan. 3, v. 225.—Mela. 1, c. 13.—Strab. 14.

TARTĂRUS, (pl. a, orum,) one of the regions of hell, where, according to the antients, the moſt impious and guilty among mankind were puniſhed. It was ſurrounded with a brazen wall, and its entrance was continually hidden from the ſight by a cloud of darkneſs, which is repreſented three times more gloomy than the obſcureſt night. According to Heſiod it was a ſeparate priſon, at a greater diſtance from the earth than the earth is from the heavens. Virgil ſays, that it was ſurrounded by three impenetrable walls, and by the impetuous and burning ſtreams of the river Phlegethon. The entrance is by a large and loſty tower, whoſe gates are ſupported by columns of adamant, which neither gods nor men can open. In Tartarus, according to Virgil, were puniſhed ſuch as had been diſobedient to their parents, traitors, adulterers, faithleſs miniſters, and ſuch as had undertaken unjuſt and cruel wars, or had betrayed their friends for the ſake of money. It was alſo the place where Ixion, Tityus, the Danaides, Tantalus, Siſyphus, &c. were puniſhed, according to Ovid. Heſiod. Theog. v. 720.—Sil. 13, v. 591.—Virg. Æn. 6.—Homer. Od. 11.—*Ovid. TATIENSES, a name given to one of the tribes of the Roman people by Romulus, in honor of Tatius, king of the Sabines. The Tatienſes, who were partly the antient ſubjects of the king of the Sabines, lived on mount Capitolinus and Quirinalis.

TĀTIUS, (Titus) king of Cures among the Sabines, made war againſt the Romans after the rape of the Sabines. The gates of the city were betrayed into his hands by Tarpeia, and the army of the Sabines advanced as far as the Roman forum, where a bloody battle was fought. The cries of the Sabine virgins at laſt ſtopped the fury of the combatants, and an agreement was made between the two nations. Tatius conſented to leave his antient poſſeſſions, and with his ſubjects, the inhabitants of Cures, to come and live in Rome. He ſhared the royal authority with Romulus, and lived in the greateſt union. He was murdered about ſix years after at Lanuvium, B. C. 742, for an act of cruelty to the ambaſſadors of the Laurentes. This was done by order of his royal colleague, according to ſome authors. Liv. 1, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Rom.—Cic. pro Balb.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 804.—Flor. 1, c. 1.

TAURUS, the largeſt mountain of Aſia, as to extent. One of its extremities is in Caria, and it extends not only as far as the moſt eaſtern extremities of Aſia, but it alſo branches in ſeveral parts, and runs far into the north. Mount Taurus was known by ſeveral names, particularly in different countries. In Cilicia, where it reaches as far as the Euphrates, it was called Taurus. It was known by the name of Amanus from the bay of Iſſus as far as the Euphrates; of Antitaurus from the weſtern boundaries of Cilicia up to Armenia; of Montes Matieni in the country of the Leucoſyrians; of Mons Moſchicus at the ſouth of the river Phaſis; of Amaranta at the north of the Phaſis; of Caucaſus between the Hyrcanian and Euxine ſea; of Hyrcanii Montes near Hyrcania; of Imaus in the more eaſtern parts of Aſia. The word Taurus was more properly confined to the mountains that ſeparate Phrygia and Pamphylia from Cilicia. The ſeveral paſſes which were opened in the mountain were called Pylæ, and hence frequent mention is made in antient authors of the Armenian Pylæ, Cilician Pylæ, &c. Mela. 1. c. 15. l. 3, c. 7 & 8.—Plin. 5, c. 27.——A mountain in Germany. *Tacit. TĔLĂMON, a king of the iſland of Salamis, mis, ſon of Æacus and Endeis. He was brother to Peleus and father to Teucer and Ajax, who on that account is often called Telamonius heros. He fled from Megara, his native country, after he had accidentally murdered his brother Phocus in playing with the quoit, and he ſailed to the iſland of Salamis, where he ſoon after married Glauce, the daughter of Cychreus, the king of the place. At the death of his father-in-law, who had no male iſſue, Telamon became king of Salamis. He accompanied Jaſon in his expedition to Colchis, and was arm-bearer to Hercules, when that hero took Laomedon priſoner, and deſtroyed Troy. Telamon was rewarded by Hercules for his ſervices with the hand of Heſione, whom the conqueror had obtained among the ſpoils of Troy, and with her he returned to Greece. He alſo married Peribœa, whom ſome call Eribœa. Ovid. Met. 13. v. 151.—Sophocl. in Aj.—Pindar. iſthm. 6.—Stat. Theb. 6.—Apollod. 1, 2, &c.—Pauſ. in Cor.—*Hygin. TELAMONIĂDES, a patronymic given to the deſcendants of Telamon.

TELCHĪNES, a people of Rhodes, ſaid to have been originally from Crete. They were the inventors of many uſeful arts, and according to Diodorus, paſſed for the ſons of the ſea. They were the firſt who raiſed ſtatues to the gods. They had the power of changing themſelves into whatever ſhape they pleaſed, and according to Ovid they could poiſon and faſcinate all objects with their eyes, and cauſe rain and hail to fall at pleaſure. The Telchinians inſulted Venus, for which the goddeſs inſpired them with a ſudden fury, ſo that they committed the groſſeſt crimes, and offered violence even to their own mothers. Jupiter deſtroyed them all by a deluge. Diod.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 365, &c.

TELCHĪNIA, a ſirname of Minerva.——Alſo a ſirname of Juno in Rhodes, where ſhe had a ſtatue at Ialyſus raiſed by the Telchinians, who ſettled there.——Alſo an antient name of Crete, as the place from whence the Telchines of Rhodes were deſcended. Stat. 4. Sylv. 6, v. 47.

TELEBOIDES, iſlands oppoſite Leucadia. Plin. 4, c. 12.

TELĔCLES, or TELĔCLUS, a Lacedæmonian king, of the family of the Ægidæ, who reigned 40 years, B. C. 813. Herodot. 7, c. 205.—Pauſ. 3, c. 2.——A philoſopher, diſciple of Lacidas, B. C. 214.——A Mileſian.

TELECLĪDES, an Athenian comic poet in the age of Pericles.

TĔLĔGŎNUS, a ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe, born in the iſland of Ææa, where he was educated. When arrived to the years of manhood, he went to Ithaca to make himſelf known to his father, but he was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt, and being deſtitute of proviſions, he plundered ſome of the inhabitants of the iſland. Ulyſſes and Telemachus came to defend the property of their ſubjects againſt this unknown invader; a quarrel aroſe, and Telegonus killed his father without knowing who he was. He afterwards returned to his native country, and according to Hyginus he carried thither his father's body, where it was buried. Telemachus and Penelope alſo accompanied him in his return, and ſoon after the nuptials of Telegonus with Penelope were celebrated by order of Minerva. Penelope had by Telegonus a ſon called Italus, who gave his name to Italy. Telegonus founded Tuſculum in Italy, and according to ſome he left one daughter called Mamilia, from whom the patrician family of the Mamilii at Rome were deſcended. Horat. 3, od. 29, v. 8.—Ovid. Faſt. 3 & 4. Triſt. 1, el. 1.—Plut. in Par.—Hygin. fab. 127.—Diod. 7.——A ſon of Proteus killed by Hercules. Apollod.——A king of Egypt who married Io after ſhe had been reſtored to her original form by Jupiter. Id.

TĔLĔMĂCHUS, a ſon of Ulyſſes and Penelope. He was ſtill in the cradle when his father went with the reſt of the Greeks to the Trojan war. At the end of this celebrated war, Telemachus, anxious to ſee his father, went to ſeek him, and as the place of his reſidence, and the cauſe of his long abſence were then unknown, he viſited the court of Menelaus and Neſtor to obtain information. He afterwards returned to Ithaca, where the ſuitors of his mother Penelope had conſpired to murder him, but he avoided their ſnares, and by means of Minerva, he diſcovered his father, who had arrived in the iſland two days before him, and was then in the houſe of Eumæus. With this faithful ſervant and Ulyſſes, Telemachus concerted how to deliver his mother from the importunities of her ſuitors, and it was effected with ſucceſs. After the death of his father, Telemachus went to the iſland of Ææa, where he married Circe, or according to others Caſſiphone, the daughter of Circe, by whom he had a ſon called Latinus. He ſome time after had the misfortune to kill his mother-in-law Circe, and fled to Italy, where he founded Cluſium. Telemachus was accompanied in his viſit to Neſtor and Menelaus by the goddeſs of wiſdom, under the form of Mentor. It is ſaid, that when a child, Telemachus fell into the ſea, and that a dolphin brought him ſafe to ſhore, after he had remained ſome time under water. From this circumſtance Ulyſſes had the figure of a dolphin engraved on the ſeal which he wore on his ring. Hygin. fab. 95 & 125.—Ovid. Heroid. 1, v. 98.—Horat. 1, ep. 7, v. 41.—Homer. Od. 2, &c.—Lycophr. in Caſſ.

Telĕmus, a Cyclops who was acquainted with futurity. He foretold to Polyphemus all the evils which he ſome time after ſuffered from Ulyſſes. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 771.

Telephassa, the mother of Cadmus, Phœnix, and Cilix, by Agenor. She died in Thrace, as ſhe was ſeeking her daughter Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away. Apollod. 3, c. 1 & 4.

Telĕphus, a king of Myſia, ſon of Hercules and Auge, the daughter of Aleus. He was expoſed as ſoon as born on mount Parthenius, but his life was preſerved by a goat, and by ſome ſhepherds. According to Apollodorus he was expoſed, not on a mountain, but in the temple of Minerva, at Tega, or according to a tradition mentioned by Pauſanias, he was left to the mercy of the waves with his mother, by the cruelty of Aleus, and carried by the winds to the mouth of the Caycus, where he was found by Teuthras, king of the country, who married, or rather adopted as his daughter, Auge, and educated her ſon. Some, however, ſuppoſe that Auge fled to Teuthras to avoid the anger of her father, on account of her amour with Hercules. Yet others declare that Aleus gave her to Nauplius to be ſeverely puniſhed for her incontinence, and that Nauplius, unwilling to injure her, ſent her to Teuthras, king of Bithynia, by whom ſhe was adopted. Telephus, according to the more received opinions, was ignorant of his origin, and he was ordered by the oracle, if he wiſhed to know his parents, to go to Myſia. Obedient to this injunction, he came to Myſia, where Teuthras offered him his crown, and his adopted daughter Auge in marriage, if he would deliver his country from the hoſtilities of Idas, the ſon of Aphareus. Telephus readily complied, and at the head of the Myſians he ſoon routed the enemy, and received the promiſed reward. As he was going to unite himſelf to Auge, the ſudden appearance of an enormous ſerpent ſeparated the two lovers; Auge implored the aſſiſtance of Hercules, and was ſoon informed by the god that Telephus was her own ſon. When this was known, the nuptials were not celebrated, and Telephus ſome time after married one of the daughters of king Priam. As one of the ſons of the Trojan monarch, Telephus prepared to aſſiſt Priam againſt the Greeks, and with heroic valor he attacked them when they had landed on his coaſts. The carnage was great, and Telephus was victorious, had not Bacchus, who protected the Greeks, ſuddenly raiſed a vine from the earth, which entangled the feet of the monarch, and laid him flat on the ground. Achilles immediately ruſhed upon him, and wounded him ſo ſeverely, that he was carried away from the battle. The wound was mortal, and Telephus was informed by the oracle, that he alone who had inflicted it, could totally cure it. Upon this applications were made to Achilles, but in vain; the hero obſerved that he was no phyſician, till Ulyſſes, who knew that Troy could not be taken without the aſſiſtance of one of the ſons of Hercules, and who wiſhed to make Telephus the friend of the Greeks, perſuaded Achilles to obey the directions of the oracle. Achilles conſented, and as the weapon which had given the wound could alone cure it, the hero ſcraped the ruſt from the point of his ſpear, and, by applying it to the ſore, gave it immediate relief. It is ſaid that Telephus ſhowed himſelf ſo grateful to the Greeks, that he accompanied them to the Trojan war, and fought with them againſt his father-in-law. Hygin. fab. 101.—Pauſ. 8, c. 48.—Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—*Ælian. TEMNES, a king of Sidon.

TEMNOS, a town of Æolia, at the mouth of the Hermus. Herodot. 1, c. 49.—Cic. Flacc. 18.

TEMPE, (plur.) a valley in Theſſaly, between mount Olympus at the north, and Oſſa at the ſouth, through which the river Peneus flows into the Ægean. The poets have deſcribed it as the moſt delightful ſpot on the earth, with continually cool ſhades, and verdant walks, which the warbling of birds rendered more pleaſant and romantic. Tempe extended about five miles in length, but varied in the dimenſions of its breadth ſo as to be in ſome places ſcarce one acre and a half wide. All vallies that are pleaſant, either for their ſituation or the mildneſs of their climate, are called Tempe by the poets. Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Diod. 4.—Dionyſ. Perieg. 219.—*Ælian. V. TENDEBA, a town of Caria. Liv. 33, c. 18.

TENEA, a part of Corinth. Mela. 2, c. 3.

TENEDIA SECURIS. Vid. Tenes.

TĔNĔDOS, a ſmall and fertile iſland of the Ægean ſea, oppoſite Troy, at the diſtance of about 12 miles from Sigæum, and 56 miles north from Leſbos. It was antiently called Leucophrys, till Tenes, the ſon of Cycnus, ſettled there and built a town, which he called Tenedos, from which the whole iſland received its name. It became famous during the Trojan war, as it was there that the Greeks concealed themſelves the more effectually to make the Trojans believe that they were returned home, without finiſhing the ſiege. Homer. Od. 3, v. 59.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 540. l. 12, v. 109.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

TENES, a ſon of Cycnus and Proclea. He was expoſed on the ſea on the coaſt of Troas, by his father, who credulouſly believed his wife Philonome, who had fallen in love with Cycnus, and accuſed him of attempts upon her virtue, when he refuſed to gratify her paſſion. Tenes arrived ſafe in Leucophrys, which he called Tenedos, and of which he became the ſovereign. Some time after, Cycnus diſcovered the guilt of his wife Philonome, and as he wiſhed to be reconciled to his ſon whom he had ſo groſsly injured, he went to Tenedos. But when he had tied his ſhip to the ſhore, Tenes cut off the cable with a hatchet, and ſuffered his father's ſhip to be toſſed about in the ſea. From this circumſtance the hatchet of Tenes is become proverbial to intimate a reſentment that cannot be pacified. Some, however, ſuppoſe that the proverb aroſe from the ſeverity of a law made by a king of Tenedos againſt adultery, by which the guilty were both put to death with a hatchet. The hatchet of Tenes was carefully preſerved at Tenedos, and afterwards depoſited in the temple of Delphi, where it was ſtill ſeen in the age of Pauſanias. Tenes, as ſome ſuppoſe, was killed by Achilles, as he defended his country againſt the Greeks, and he received divine honors after death. His ſtatue was carried away by Verres. Strab. 13.—Pauſ 10, c. 14.——A general of 3000 mercenary Greeks ſent by the Egyptians to aſſiſt the Phœnicians. Diod. 16.

TENNES, a king of Sidon, who when his country was beſieged by the Perſians, burnt himſelf and the city together, B. C. 351.

TENNUM, a town of Æolia.

TENOS, a ſmall iſland in the Ægean, near Andros, called Ophiuſſa, and alſo Hydruſſa, from the number of its fountains. It was very mountainous, but it produced excellent wines, univerſally eſteemed by the antients. Tenos was about 15 miles in extent. The capital was alſo called Tenos. Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 469.

TENTŸRA, (plur.) and Tentyris, a ſmall town of Egypt, on the Nile, whoſe inhabitants were at enmity with the crocodiles, and made war againſt thoſe who paid them adoration. Seneca. N. Q. 4, c. 2.—Strab. 17.—Juv. 15.—Plin. 25, c. 8.

TENTŸRA, (melius Tempyra), a place of Thrace, oppoſite Samothrace. Ovid. Triſt. 1, el. 9, v. 21.

TEOS, or TEIOS, now Sigagik, a maritime town on the coaſt of Ionia in Aſia Minor, oppoſite Samos. It was one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy, and gave birth to Anacreon and Hecatæus, who is by ſome deemed a native of Miletus. According to Pliny, Teos was an iſland. Auguſtus repaired Teos, whence he is often called the founder of it in ancient medals. Strab. 14.—Mela. 1, c. 17.—Pauſ. 7, c. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 5.—Horat. 1, Od. 17, v. 18.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

TERĒDON, a town on the Arabian gulf. Dio. Per. 982.

TERENTIA, the wife of Cicero. She became came mother of M. Cicero, and of a daughter called Tulliola. Cicero repudiated her, becauſe ſhe had been faithleſs to his bed, when he was baniſhed in Aſia. Terentia married Salluſt, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Meſſala Corvinus. She lived to her 103d, or according to Pliny to her 117th year. Plut. in Cic.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Cic. ad Attic. 11, ep. 16, &c.——The wife of Scipio Africanus.——The wife of Mecænas, with whom it was ſaid that Auguſtus carried on an intrigue.

TERENTIA LEX, called alſo Caſſia, frumentaria, by M. Terentius Varro Lucullus, and C. Caſſius, A. U. C. 680. It ordered that the ſame price ſhould be given for all corn bought in the provinces, to hinder the exactions of the quæſtors.——Another by Terentius the tribune, A. U. C. 291, to elect five perſons to define the power of the conſuls, leſt they ſhould abuſe the public confidence by violence or rapine.

TERENTIĀNUS, a Roman, to whom Longinus dedicated his treatiſe on the ſublime.——Maurus, a writer who floriſhed A. D. 240. The laſt edition of his treatiſe de literis, ſyllabis, & metris Horatii, is by Mycillus, Francof. 8vo 1584. Martial. 1, ep. 70.

TERENTIUS PUBLIUS, a native of Africa, celebrated for the comedies he wrote. He was ſold as a ſlave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman ſenator, who educated him with great care, and manumitted him for the brilliancy of his genius. He bore the name of his maſter and benefactor, and was called Terentius. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Greek comedy with uncommon aſſiduity, and merited the friendſhip and patronage of the learned and powerful. Scipio, the elder Africanus, and his friend Lælius, have been ſuſpected, on account of their intimacy, of aſſiſting the poet in the compoſition of his comedies; and the fine language, the pure expreſſions, and delicate ſentiments with which the plays of Terence abound, ſeem perhaps to favor the ſuppoſition. Terence was in the 25th year of his age, when his firſt play appeared on the Roman ſtage. All his compoſitions were received with great applauſe; but when the words were repeated, the plaudits were reiterated' and the audience, though compoſed of foreigners, conquered nations, allies, and citizens of Rome, were unanimous in applauding the poet, who ſpoke with ſuch elegance and ſimplicity, the language of nature, and ſupported the native independence of man. The talents of Terence were employed rather in tranſlation than in the effuſions of originality. It is ſaid that he tranſlated 108 of the comedies of the poet Menander, ſix of which only are extant, his Andria, Eunuch, Heautontimorumenos, Adelphi, Phormio and Hecyra. Terence is admired for the purity of his language, and the artleſs elegance and ſimplicity of his diction, and for a continued delicacy of ſentiment. There is more originality in Plautus, more vivacity in the intrigues, and more ſurprize in the cataſtrophes of his plays; but Terence will ever be admired for his taſte, his expreſſions, and his faithful pictures of nature and manners, and the becoming dignity of his ſeveral characters. Quintilian, who candidly acknowledges the deficiencies of the Roman comedy, declares that Terence was the moſt elegant and refined of all the comedians whoſe writings appeared on the ſtage. The time and the manner of his death are unknown. He left Rome in the 35th year of his age, and never after appeared there. Some ſuppoſe that he was drowned in a ſtorm as he returned from Greece, about 159 years before Chriſt, though others imagine he died in Arcadia or Leucadia, and that his death was accelerated by the loſs of his property, and particularly of his plays, which periſhed in a ſhipwreck. The beſt editions of Terence are thoſe of Weſterhovius, 2 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1726; of Edinb. 12mo. 1758; of Cambridge, 4to, 1723; Hawkey's, 12mo. Dublin, 1745; and that of Zeunius. 8vo. TEUCER, a king of Phrygia, ſon of the Scamander by Idea. According to ſome authors, he was the firſt who introduced among his ſubjects the worſhip of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. The country where he reigned was from him called Teucria, and his ſubjects Teucri. His daughter Batea married Dardanus, a Samothracian prince, who ſucceeded him in the government of Teucria. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 108.——A ſon of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Heſione the daughter of Laomedon. He was one of Helen's ſuitors, and accordingly accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, where he ſignalized himſelf by his valor and intrepidity. It is ſaid that his father refuſed to receive him into his kingdom, becauſe he had left the death of his brother Ajax unrevenged. This ſeverity of the father did not diſhearten the ſon; he left Salamis, and retired to Cyprus, where, with the aſſiſtance of Belus king of Sidon he built a town, which he called Salamis, after his native country. He attempted to no purpoſe to recover the iſland of Salamis after his father's death. He built a temple to Jupiter in Cyprus, on which a man was annually ſacrificed till the reign of the Antonines. Some ſuppoſe that Teucer did not return to Cyprus, but that, according to a leſs received opinion, he went to ſettle in Spain, where new Carthage was afterwards built, and thence into Galatia. Homer. Il. 8, v. 281.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 623.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Juſtin. 44, c. 3.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.——One of the ſervants of Phalaris of Agrigentum.

Thalăme, a town of Messenia, famous for a temple and oracle of Pasiphae. Plut. in Agid.

Thalassius, a beautiful young Roman in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines, one of these virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her ravisher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed as he carried her away, that it was for Thalassius. The name of Thalassius was no sooner mentioned, than all were eager to preserve so beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with so much happiness, that it was ever after usual at Rome to make use of the word Thalassius at nuptials, and to wish those that were married the felicity of Thalassius. He is supposed by some to be the same as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.—Liv. 1, c. 9.

Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, born at Miletus in Ionia. He was descended from Cadmus: his father's name was Examius, and his mother's Cleobula. Like the rest of the antients, he travelled in quest of knowledge, and for some time resided in Crete, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Under the priests of Memphis he was taught geometry, astronomy, and philosophy, and enabled to measure with exactness the vast height and extent of a pyramid, merely by its shadow. His discoveries in astronomy were great and ingenious; he was the first who calculated with accuracy a solar eclipse. He discovered the solstices and equinoxes, he divided the heavens into five zones, and recommended the division of the year into 365 days, which was universally adopted by the Egyptian philosophy. Like Homer, he looked upon water as the principle of every thing. He was the founder of the Ionic sect, which distinguished itself for its deep and abstruse speculations under the successors and pupils of the Milesian philosopher, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus the master of Socrates. Thales was never married; and when his mother pressed him to chuse a wife, he said he was too young. The same exhortations were afterwards repeated, but the philosopher eluded them by observing, that he was then too old to enter the matrimonial state. He died in the 96th year of his age, about 548 years before the Christian era. His compositions on philosophical subjects are lost. Herodot. 1, c. 7. —Plato.—Diog. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. &c. ——A lyric poet of Crete, intimate with Lycurgus. THAMUDA, a part of Arabia Felix.

THAMYRAS, or THAMYRIS, a celebrated musician of Thrace. His father's name was Philammon, and his mother's Argiope. He became enamoured of the Muses, and challenged them to a trial of skill. His challenge was accepted, and it was mutually agreed, that the conquered should be totally at the disposal of his victorious adversary. He was conquered, and the Muses deprived him of his eye-sight and his melodious voice, and broke his lyre. His poetical compositions are lost. Some accused him of having first introduced into the world the unnatural vice of which Sotades is accused. Homer. Il. 2, v. 594. l. 5, v. 599.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 7, v. 62. Art. Am. 3, v. 399.—Pauf. 4, c. 33.

THASIUS, or THRASIUS, a famous soothsayer of Cyprus, who told Busiris, king of Egypt, that to stop a dreadful plague which afflicted his country, he must offer a foreigner to Jupiter. Upon this the tyrant ordered him to be seized and sacrificed to the god, as he was not a native of Egypt. Ovid. de art. am. 1, v. 649.——A surname of Hercules, who was worshipped at Thasos.

THASOS, or THASUS, a small island in the Ægean, on the coast of Thrace, opposite the mouth of the Nestus, antiently known by the name of Æria, Odonis, Æthria, Acte, Ogygia, Chryse, and Ceresis It received that of Thasos from Thasus the son of Agenor, who settled there when he despaired of finding his sister Europa. It was about 40 miles in circumference, and so uncommonly fruitful, that the fertility of Thasos became proverbial. Its wine was universally esteemed, and its marble quarries were also in great repute, as well as its mines of gold and silver. The capital of the island was also called Thasos. Liv. 33, c. 30 & 35.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Pauf. 5. c. 25.—Ælian. V. H. 4, &c.—Virg. G. 2, v. 91.—C. Nep. Cim. 2.

THEBA, or THEBE, a town of Cilicia. Vid. Thebæ.

THEBÆ, (arum,) a celebrated city, the capital of Bœotia, ſituate on the banks of the river Iſmenus. The manner of its foundation is not preciſely known. Cadmus is ſuppoſed to have firſt begun to found it by building the citadel Cadmea. It was afterwards finiſhed by Amphion and Zethus, but according to Varro, it owed its origin to Ogyges. The government of Thebes was monarchical, and many of the ſovereigns are celebrated for their misfortunes, ſuch as Laius, Œdipus, Polynices, Eteocles, &c. The war which Thebes ſupported againſt the Argives, is famous as well as that of the Epigoni. The Thebans were looked upon as an indolent and ſluggiſh nation, and the words of Theban pig, became proverbial to expreſs a man remarkable for ſtupidity and inattention. This however was not literally true; under Epaminondas, the Thebans, though before dependent, became maſters of Greece, and every thing was done according to their will and pleaſure. When Alexander invaded Greece, he ordered Thebes to be totally demoliſhed, becauſe it had revolted againſt him, except the houſe where the poet Pindar had been born and educated. In this dreadful period 6000 of its inhabitants were ſlain, and 30,000 ſold for ſlaves. Thebes was afterwards repaired by Caſſander, the ſon of Antipater, but it never roſe to its original conſequence, and Strabo, in his age, mentions it merely as an inconſiderable village. The monarchical government was aboliſhed there at the death of Xanthus, about 1190 years before Chriſt, and Thebes became a republic. It received its name from Thebe the daughter of Aſopus, to whom the founder Amphion was nearly related. Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Pauſ. 2, c. 6. l. 9, c. 5. Strab. 9.—*Plut. in Pel. He floriſhed in the Auguſtan age. Plin. 29, c. 1.—Juv. 10.——One of the generals of Antiochus the Great. He was born at Cyprus. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

THEMISTA, or THEMISTIS, a goddeſs, the ſame as Themis.

THEMISTIUS, a celebrated philoſopher of Paphlagonia in the age of Conſtantius, greatly eſteemed by the Roman emperors, and called Euphrades, the fine ſpeaker, from his eloquent and commanding delivery. He was made a Roman ſenator, and always diſtinguiſhed for his liberality and munificence. His ſchool was greatly frequented. He wrote, when young, ſome commentaries on Ariſtotle, fragments of which are ſtill extant, and 33 of his orations. He profeſſed himſelf to be an enemy to flattery, and though he often deviates from this general rule in his addreſſes to the emperors, yet he ſtrongly recommends humanity, wiſdom, and clemency. The beſt edition of Themiſtius, is that of Harduin, fol. Paris, 1684.

THEMISTO, daughter of Hypſeus, was the third wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, by whom ſhe had four ſons, called Ptous, Leucon, Schœneus, and Erythroes. She endeavoured to kill the children of Ino, her huſband's ſecond wife, but ſhe killed her own by means of Ino, who lived in her houſe in the diſguiſe of a ſervant maid, and to whom ſhe entruſted her bloody intentions. Pauſ. 9, c. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.——A woman mentioned by Polyænus.——The mother of the poet Homer, according to a tradition mentioned by Pauſanias 10, c. 24.

THEMISTŎCLES, a celebrated general, born at Athens. His father's name was Neocles, and his mother's Euterpe, or Abrotonum, a native of Halicarnaſſus, or of Thrace, or Acarnania. The beginning of his youth was marked by vices ſo flagrant, and an inclination ſo incorrigible, that his father diſinherited him. This, which might have diſheartened others, roufed the ambition of Themiſtocles, and the protection which he was denied at home he ſought in courting the favors of the populace, and in ſharing the adminiſtration of public affairs. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Themiſtocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was entruſted to his care. While the Lacedæmonians under Leonidas were oppoſing the Perſians at Thermopylæ, the naval operations of Themiſtocles, and the combined fleet of the Peloponneſians were directed to deſtroy the armament of Xerxes, and to ruin his maritime power. The obſtinate wiſh of the generals to command the Grecian fleet, might have proved fatal to the intereſt of the allies, had not Themiſtocles freely relinquiſhed his pretenſions, and by nominating his rival Eurybiades maſter of the expedition, ſhown the world that his ambition could ſtoop when his country demanded his aſſiſtance. The Perſian fleet was diſtreſſed at Artemiſium by a violent ſtorm, and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but a deciſive battle had never been fought, if Themiſtocles had not uſed threats and entreaties, and even called religion to his aid, and the favorable anſwers of the oracle to ſecond his meaſures. The Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make head by ſea againſt an enemy whom they ſaw victorious by land, plundering their cities, and deſtroying all by fire and ſword; but before they were diſperſed, perſed, Themiſtocles ſent intelligence of their intentions to the Perſian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet in the bay of Salamis, prevented their eſcape, and while he wiſhed to cruſh them all at one blow, he obliged them to fight for their ſafety, as well as for the honor of their country. This battle, which was fought near the iſland of Salamis, B. C. 480, was deciſive, the Greeks obtained the victory, and Themiſtocles the honor of having deſtroyed the formidable navy of Xerxes. Further to enſure the peace of his country, Themiſtocles informed the Aſiatic monarch, that the Greeks had conſpired to cut the bridge which he had built acroſs the Helleſpont, and to prevent his retreat into Aſia. This met with equal ſucceſs, Xerxes haſtened away from Greece, and while he believed, on the words of Themiſtocles, that his return would be diſputed, he left his forces without a general, and his fleets an eaſy conqueſt to the victorious Greeks. Theſe ſignal ſervices to his country, endeared Themiſtocles to the Athenians, and he was univerſally called the moſt warlike and moſt courageous of all the Greeks who fought againſt the Perſians. He was received with the moſt diſtinguiſhing honors, and by his prudent adminiſtration, Athens was ſoon fortified with ſtrong walls, her Pireus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the miſtreſs of Greece. Yet in the midſt of that glory, the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the diſpleaſure of his countrymen, which had proved ſo fatal to many of his illuſtrious predeceſſors. He was baniſhed from the city, and after he had ſought in vain a ſafe retreat among the republics of Greece, and the barbarians of Thrace, he threw himſelf into the arms of a monarch, whoſe fleets he had defeated, and whoſe father he had ruined. Artaxerxes, the ſucceſſor of Xerxes, received the illuſtrious Athenian with kindneſs; and though he had formerly ſet a price upon his head, yet he made him one of his greateſt favorites, and beſtowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine and meat. Such kindneſſes from a monarch, from whom he perhaps expected the moſt hoſtile treatment, did not alter the ſentiments of Themiſtocles. He ſtill remembered that Athens gave him birth, and according to ſome writers, the wiſh of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war againſt Greece, at the requeſt of Artaxerxes, obliged him to deſtroy himſelf by drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain, and while ſome affirm that he poiſoned himſelf, others declare that he fell a prey to a violent diſtemper in the city of Magneſia, where he had fixed his reſidence, while in the dominions of the Perſian monarch. His bones were conveyed to Attica, and honored with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who began to repent too late of their cruelty to the ſaviour of his country. Themiſtocles died in the 65th year of his age, about 449 years before the Chriſtian era. He has been admired as a man naturally courageous, of a diſpoſition fond of activity, ambitious of glory and enterprize. Bleſſed with a provident and diſcerning mind, he ſeemed to riſe ſuperior to misfortunes, and in the midſt of adverſity, poſſeſſed of reſources which could enable him to regain his ſplendor, and even to command fortune. *Plut. & C. THEOCLYMĔNUS, a ſoothſayer of Argolis, deſcended from Melampus. His father's name was Theſtor. He foretold the ſpeedy return of Ulyſſes to Penelope, and Telemachus. Homer. Od. 15, v. 225, &c.—Hygin. fab. 128.

THEŎCRĬTUS, a Greek poet who floriſhed at Syracuſe in Sicily, 282 B. C. His father's name was Praxagoras, and his mother's Philina. He lived in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whoſe praiſes he ſang, and whoſe favors he enjoyed. Theocritus diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his poetical compoſitions, of which 30 idyllia and ſome epigrams are extant, written in the Doric dialect, and admired for their beauty, elegance and ſimplicity. Virgil, in his eclogues, has imitated and often copied him. Theocritus has been blamed for the many indelicate and obſcene expreſſions which he uſes; and while he introduces ſhepherds and peaſants with all the ruſticity and ignorance of nature, he often diſguiſes their character by making them ſpeak on high and exalted ſubjects. It is ſaid he wrote ſome invectives againſt Hiero king of Syracuſe, who ordered him to be ſtrangled. He alſo wrote a ludicrous poem called Syrinx, and placed his his verſes in ſuch order that they repreſented the pipe of the god Pan. The beſt editions of Theocritus are Warton's, 2 vols. 4to. Oxon, 1770; that of Heinſius, 8vo. Oxon, 1699; that of Valkenaer, 8vo. L. Bat. 1781; and that of Reiſke, 2 vols, 4to. Lipſ. 1760. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Laert. 5.——A Greek hiſtorian of Chios, who wrote an account of Libya. Plut.

THEODOSIOPŎLIS, a town of Armenia, built by Theodoſius, &c.

THEODOSIUS FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor ſirnamed Magnus, from the greatneſs of his exploits. He was inveſted with the imperial purple by Gratian, and appointed over Thrace and the eaſtern provinces, which had been in the poſſeſſion of Valentinian. The firſt years of his reign were marked by different conqueſts over the barbarians. The Goths were defeated in Thrace, and 4000 of their chariots, with an immenſe number of priſoners of both ſexes were the reward of the victory. This glorious campaign intimidated the inveterate enemies of Rome; they ſued for peace, and treaties of alliance were made with diſtant nations, who wiſhed to gain the favors and the friendſhip of a prince whoſe military virtues were ſo conſpicuous. Some conſpiracies were formed againſt the emperor, but Theodoſius totally diſregarded them; and while he puniſhed his competitors for the imperial purple, he thought himſelf ſufficiently ſecure in the love and the affection of his ſubjects. His reception at Rome was that of a conqueror; he triumphed over the barbarians, and reſtored peace in every part of the empire. He died of a dropſy at Milan, in the 60th year of his age, after a reign of 16 years, the 17th of January, A. D. 395. His body was conveyed to Conſtantinople, and buried by his ſon Arcadius, in the tomb of Conſtantine. Theodoſius was the laſt of the emperors who was the ſole maſter of the whole Roman empire. He left three children, Arcadius and Honorius who ſucceeded him, and Pulcheria. Theodoſius has been commended by antient writers as a prince bleſſed with every virtue, and debaſed by no vicious propenſity. Though maſter of the world he was a ſtranger to that pride and and arrogance which too often disgrace the monarch; he was affable in his behaviour, benevolent and compassionate, and it was his wish to treat his subjects as himself was treated when a private man, and a dependant. Men of merit were promoted to places of trust and honor, and the emperor was fond of patronizing the cause of virtue and learning. His zeal as a follower of Christianity has been applauded by all the ecclesiastical writers, and it was the wish of Theodosius to support the revealed religion, as much by his example, meekness, and Christian charity, as by his edicts and ecclesiastical institutions. His want of clemency, however, in one instance, was too openly betrayed, and when the people of Thessalonica had unmeaningly, perhaps, killed one of his officers, the emperor ordered his soldiers to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and no less than 6000 persons, without distinction of rank, age, or sex, were cruelly butchered in that town in the space of three hours. This violence irritated the ecclesiastics, and Theodosius was compelled by St. Ambrose to do open penance in the church, and publicly to make atonement for an act of barbarity which had excluded him from the bosom of the church and the communion of the faithful. In his private character Theodosius was an example of soberness and temperance, his palace displayed becoming grandeur, but still with moderation. He never indulged luxury or countenanced superfluities. He was fond of bodily exercise, and never gave himself up to pleasure and enervating enjoyments. The laws and regulations which he introduced in the Roman empire, were of the most salutary nature. Socrat. 5, &c.—Zosim. 4, &c.—Ambros. Augustin. Claudian. &c.——The 2d, succeeded his father Arcadius as emperor of the western Roman empire, though only in the 8th year of his age. He was governed by his sister Pulcheria, and by his ministers and eunuchs, in whose hands was the disposal of the offices of state, and all places of trust and honor. He married Eudoxia, the daughter of a philosopher called Leontius, a woman remarkable for her virtues and piety. The territories of Theodosius were invaded by the Persians, but the emperor soon appeared at the head of a numerous force, and the two hostile armies met on the frontiers of the empire. The consternation was universal on both sides; without even a battle, the Persians fled, and no less than 100,000 were lost in the waters of the Euphrates. Theodosius raised the siege of Nisibis, where his operations failed of success, and he averted the fury of the Huns and Vandals by bribes and promises. He died on the 29th of July, in the 49th year of his age, A. D. 450, leaving only one daughter Licinia Eudoxia, whom he had married to the emperor Valentinian 3d. The carelessness and inattention of Theodosius to public affairs is well known. He signed all the papers that were brought to him without even opening them or reading them, till his sister apprised him of his negligence, and rendered him more careful and diligent, by making him sign a paper, in which he delivered into her hands Eudoxia his wife as a slave, and menial servant. The laws and regulations which were promulgated under him, and selected from the most useful and salutary institutions of his imperial predecessors, have been called the Theodosian code. Theodosius was a warm advocate for the Christian religion, but he has been blamed for his partial attachment to those who opposed the orthodox faith. Sozom.—Socrates, &c.——A lover of Antonina the wife of Belisarius.——A mathematician of Tripoli, who flourished 75 B. C. His treatise called Sphærica, is best edited by Hunt, 8vo. Oxon 1707.——A Roman general, father of Theodosius the great; he died A. D. 376.

Theodotian, an interpreter, in the reign of Commodus.

Theodŏtus, an admiral of the Rhodians, sent by his countrymen to make a treaty with the Romans.——A native of Chios, who advised Ptolemy to murder Pompey. He carried the head of the unfortunate Roman to Cæsar. He was at last put to death by Brutus. Plut. in Brut.——A Syracusan, accused of a conspiracy against Hieronymus the tyrant of Syracuse.——A governor of Bactriana in the age of Antiochus, who revolted and made himself king, B. C. 250.——A friend of the emperor Julian.——A Phœnician historian.——One of the generals of Alexander.

Theognētes, a Greek tragic poet.

Theognis, a Greek poet of Megara, who flourished about 549 years before Christ. He wrote several poems, of which only few sentences are now extant, quoted by Plato, and other Greek historians and philosophers, and intended as precepts for the conduct of human life. The morals of the poet have been censured as neither decorous nor chaste. The best edition of Theognis, is that of Blackwall, 12mo. London 1706.——There was also a tragic poet of the same name, whose compositions were so lifeless and inanimated, that they procured him the name of Chion or snow.

Theomnestus, a rival of Nicias in the admiadminiſtration of public affairs at Athens. Strab. 14.——A ſtatuary of Sardinia. Pauſ. 6, c. 15.——An Athenian philoſopher among the followers of Plato's doctrines. He had Brutus, Cæſar's murderer, among his pupils.——A painter. Plin. 35.

THEON, a philoſopher, who uſed frequently to walk in his ſleep.——An aſtronomer of Smyrna, in the reign of Adrian.——A painter of Samos. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 44.——Another philoſopher. Diog.——An infamous reviler. Horat. 1, ep. 19.

THEOPE, one of the daughters of Leos.

THEOPHĂNE, a daughter of Biſaltus, whom Neptune changed into a ſheep, to remove her from her numerous ſuitors, and conveyed to the iſland Crumiſſa. The god afterwards aſſumed the ſhape of a ram, and under this transformation he had by the nymph a ram with a golden fleece, which carried Phryxus to Colchis. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 177.—Hygin. fab. 188.

THEOPHĂNES, a Greek hiſtorian, born at Mitylene. He was very intimate with Pompey, and from his friendſhip with the Roman general, his countrymen derived many advantages. After the battle of Pharſalia, he adviſed Pompey to retire to the court of Egypt. Cic. pro Arch. &c.—Paterc.—Plut. in Cic. & Pomp.——His ſon M. Pompeius Theophanes was made governor of Aſia, and enjoyed the intimacy of Tiberius.——The only edition of Theophanes, the Byzantine hiſtorian, is at Paris, fol. 1649.

THEOPHANIA, feſtivals celebrated at Delphi in honor of Apollo.

THEOPHĬLUS, a comic poet of Athens.——A governor of Syria in the age of Julian.——A friend of Piſo.——A phyſician, whoſe treatiſe de Urinis is beſt edited by Guidotius, L. Bat. 1728, and another by Morell, 8vo. Paris 1556.——One of the Greek fathers, whoſe work ad Autolycum is beſt edited in 12mo. by Wolf, Hamb. 1724.——The name of Theophilus is common among the primitive Chriſtians.

THEOPHRASTUS, a native of Ereſus, in Leſbos, ſon of a fuller. He ſtudied under Plato, and afterwards under Ariſtotle, whoſe friendſhip he gained, and whoſe warmeſt commendations he deſerved. His original name was Tyrtamus, but this the philoſopher made him exchange for that of Euphraſtus, to intimate his excellence in ſpeaking, and afterwards for that of Theophraſtus, which he deemed ſtill more expreſſive of his eloquence, the brilliancy of his genius, and the elegance of his language. After the death of Socrates, when the malevolence of the Athenians drove all the philoſopher's friends from the city, Theophraſtus ſucceeded Ariſtotle in the Lyceum, and rendered himſelf ſo conſpicuous that in a ſhort time the number of his auditors was encreaſed to two thouſand. Not only his countrymen courted his applauſe, but kings and princes were deſirous of his friendſhip; and Caſſander and Ptolemy, two of the moſt powerful of the ſucceſſors of Alexander, regarded him with more than uſual partiality. Theophraſtus compoſed many books, and Diogenes has enumerated the titles of above 200 treatiſes, which he wrote with great elegance and copiouſneſs. Some of theſe are ſtill extant, among which are his hiſtory of ſtones, his treatiſe on plants, on the winds, on the ſigns of fair weather, &c. and his Characters, an excellent moral treatiſe, which was begun in the 99th year of his age. He died loaded with years and infirmities in the 107th year of his age, B. C. 288, lamenting the ſhortneſs of life, and complaining of the partiality of nature in granting longevity to the crow and to the ſtag, but not to man. To his care we are indebted for the works of Ariſtotle, which the dying philoſopher entruſted to him. The beſt edition of Theophraſtus is that of Heinſius, fol. L. Bat. 1613; and of his Characters, that of Needham, 8vo. Cantab. 1712, and that of Fiſcher, 8vo. Coburg, 1763. *Cic. THEOPOLĔMUS, a man who, with his brother Hiero, plundered Apollo's temple at Delphi, and fled away for fear of being puniſhed. Cic. in Verr. 5.

THEOPŎLIS, a name given to Antioch becauſe the Chriſtians firſt received their name there.

THEOPOMPUS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ, who ſucceeded his father Nicander, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the many new regulations he introduced. He created the Ephori, and died after a long and peaceful reign, B. C. 723. While he ſat on the throne the Spartans made war againſt Meſſenia. Plut. in Lyc.—Pauſ. 3, c. 7.——A famous Greek hiſtorian of Chios, diſciple of Iſocrates, who floriſhed B. C. 354. All his compoſitions are loſt, except a few fragments quoted by antient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus, as an hiſtorian, yet he is ſeverely cenſured for his ſatirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his maſter was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for compoſing the beſt funeral oration in honor of Mauſolus. His father's name was Damaſiſtratus. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Plut. in Lyſ.—C. Nep. 7.—Pauſ. 6, c. 18.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——An Athenian, who attempted to deliver his countrymen from the tyranny of Demetrius. Polyæn. 5.——A comic poet in the age of Menander. He wrote 24 plays, all loſt.——A ſon of Demaratus, who obtained ſeveral crowns at the Olympic games. Pauſ. 6, c. 10.——An orator and hiſtorian of Cnidus, very intimate with J. Cæſar. Strab. 14.——A Spartan general, killed at the battle of Tegyra.——A philoſopher of Cheronæa, in the reign of the emperor Philip.

THEOPHYLACTUS SIMOCATTA, a Byzantine hiſtorian, whoſe works were edited fol. Paris, 1647.——One of the Greek fathers, who floriſhed, A. D. 1070. His works were edited at Venice, 4 vols. 1754 to 1763.

THERA, a daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Hygin. fab. 69.——One of the Sporades in the Ægean ſea, antiently called Calliſta, now Santorin. It was firſt inhabited by the Phœnicians, who were left there under Membliares by Cadmus, when he went in queſt of his ſiſter Europa. It was called Thera by Theras, the ſon of Auteſion, who ſettled there with a colony from Lacedæmon. Pauſ. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 4.—Strab. 8.——A town of Caria.

THERAMBUS, a town near Pallene. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

THERAMĔNES, an Athenian philoſopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agnon. He was one of the 30 tyrants at Athens, but he had no ſhare in the cruelties and oppreſſion which diſgraced their adminiſtration. He was accuſed by Critias, one of his colleagues, becauſe he oppoſed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence, and the friendly interceſſion of the philoſopher Socrates. He drank the poiſon with great compoſure, and poured ſome of it on the ground, with the ſarcaſtical exclamation of, This is to the health of Critias. This happened about 404 years before the Chriſtian æra. Theramenes, on account of the ficklenes of his diſpoſition, has been called Cothurnus, a part of the dreſs uſed both by men and women. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Alcib. &c.—C. Nep.

THERAPNE, or TERAPNE, a town of Laconia, at the weſt of the Eurotas, where Apollo had a temple called Phœbeum. It was at a very ſhort diſtance from Lacedæmon, and indeed ſome authors have confounded it with the capital of Laconia. It received its name from Therapne, a daughter of Lelex. Caſtor and Pollux were born there, and on that account they are ſometimes called Therapnæi fratres. Pauſ. 3, c. 14.—*Ovid. THER-THERMOPŸLÆ, a ſmall paſs leading from Theſſaly into Locris and Phocis. It has a large ridge of mountains on the weſt, and the ſea on the eaſt, with deep and dangerous marſhes, being in the narroweſt part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylæ receives its name from the hot baths which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there, B. C. 480, on the 7th of Auguſt, between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 300 Spartans reſiſted for three ſucceſſive days repeatedly the attacks of the moſt brave and courageous of the Perſian army, which according to ſome hiſtorians amounted to five millions. There was alſo another battle fought there between the Romans and Antiochus, king of Syria. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 36, c. 15.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—*Plut. in. THERSIPPUS, a ſon of Agrius, who drove Œneus from the throne of Calydon.——A man who carried a letter from Alexander to Darius. Curt.——An Athenian author who died 954 B. C.

THERSĪTES, an officer the moſt deformed and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow ſoldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulyſſes. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fiſt, becauſe he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 13, v. 15.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 2, 212, &c.

THESEIDÆ, a patronymic given to the Athenians from Theſeus, one of their kings. Virg. G. 2, v. 383.

THESEIS, a poem written by Codrus, containing an account of the life and actions of Theſeus, and now loſt. Juv. 1, v. 2.

THESEUS, king of Athens, and ſon of Ægeus, by Æthra the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the moſt celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Trœzene in the houſe of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the ſon of the king of Athens, he paſſed for the ſon of Neptune. When he came to years of maturity, he was ſent by his mother to his father, and a ſword was given him, by which he might make himſelf known to Ægeus in a private manner. [Vid. Ægeus.] His journey to Athens was not acroſs the ſea, as it was uſual with travellers, but Theſeus determined to ſignalize himſelf in going by land, and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Trœzene to Athens was infeſted with robbers and wild beaſts, and rendered impaſſable; but theſe obſtacles were eaſily removed by the courageous ſon of Ægeus. He deſtroyed Corynetes, Synnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procuſtes, and the celebrated Phæa. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial, Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as ſhe knew that her influence would fall to the ground if Theſeus was received in his father's houſe, ſhe attempted to deſtroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himſelf to give the cup of poiſon to this unknown ſtranger at a feaſt, but the ſight of his ſword on the ſide of Theſeus, reminded him of his amours with Æthra. He knew him to be his ſon, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illuſtrious ſtranger who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the ſon of their monarch. The Pallantides, who expected to ſucceed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he apparently had no children, attempted to aſſaſſinate Theſeus, but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theſeus. The labor ſeemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the ſtreets of Athens, he ſacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this, Theſeus went to Crete among the ſeven choſen youths whom the Athenians yearly ſent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wiſh to deliver his country from ſo dreadful a tribute, engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was ſucceſsful, by means of Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had eſcaped from the labyrinth with a clue of thread, and killed the Minotaur, [Vid. Minotaurus,] he ſailed from Crete with the ſix boys and ſeven maidens, whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the iſland of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanneſs to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his ſafety. The rejoicings which his return might have occaſioned at Athens, were interrupted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himſelf into the ſea, when he ſaw his ſon's ſhip return with black ſails, which was the ſignal of ill-ſucceſs. [Vid. Ægeus.] His aſcenſion on his father's throne was univerſally applauded, B. C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildneſs, and Theſeus made new regulations, and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was encreaſed by the liberality of the monarch, religious worſhip was attended with more than uſual ſolemnity, a court was inſtituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theſeus made the government democratical, while he reſerved for himſelf, only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, made his alliance courted; but Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ, alone wiſhed to gain his friendſhip, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theſeus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, ſtruck at the ſight of each other, ruſhed between their two armies to embrace one another in the moſt cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the moſt ſincere and admired friendſhip which has become proverbial. Theſeus was preſent at the nuptials of his friend, and he was the moſt eager and courageous of the Lapithæ, in the defence of Hippodamia, and her female attendants, againſt the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had loſt Hippodamia, he agreed with Theſeus, whoſe wife was alſo dead, to carry away ſome of the daughters of the gods. Their firſt attempt was upon Helen, the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they caſt lots, and ſhe became the property of Theſeus. The Athenian monarch entruſted her to the care of his mother Æthra, at Aphidnæ, till ſhe was of nubile years, but the reſentment of Caſtor and Pollux, ſoon obliged him to reſtore her ſafe into their hands. Helen, before ſhe reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theſeus, but this tradition, confirmed by ſome antient mythologiſts, is confuted by others, who affirm, that ſhe was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epiſtles, ſaying, Excepto redii paſſa timore nihil. Some time after Theſeus aſſiſted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both deſcended into the infernal regions to carry away Proſerpine. Pluto, apprized of their intentions, ſtopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theſeus was tied to a huge ſtone, on which he had ſat to reſt himſelf. Virgil repreſents him in this eternal ſtate of puniſhment, repeating to the ſhades in Tartarus, the words of Diſcite juſtitiam moniti, & non temnere divos. Apollodorus however, and others declare, that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to ſteal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the ſtone, but with ſuch violence, that his ſkin was left behind. The ſame aſſiſtance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favor of Hercules, and the conſent of the infernal deities, not, however, without ſuffering the moſt excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theſeus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mneſtheus, one of the deſcendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himſelf into the favors of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the abſent monarch. At his return Theſeus attempted to eject the uſurper, but to no purpoſe. The Athenians had forgotten his many ſervices, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes, king of the iſland of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the preſents of Mneſtheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of ſhewing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some ſuppoſe that Theſeus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was cruſhed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theſeus, after the death of Mneſtheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honors due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They alſo raiſed ſtatues and a temple, and feſtivals and games were publicly inſtituted to commemorate the actions of a hero, who had rendered ſuch ſervices to the people of Athens. Theſe feſtivals were ſtill celebrated with original ſolemnity in the age of Pauſanias and Plutarch, about about 1200 years after the death of Theſeus. The hiſtorians diſagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all ſuppoſe, that inſtead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wiſhed to ſeduce a daughter of Aidoneus, king of the Moloſſi. This daughter, as they ſay, bore the name of Proſerpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace was called Cerberus, and hence perhaps ariſes the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theſeus was confined in priſon, from whence he made his eſcape ſome time after, by the aſſiſtance of Hercules. Some authors place Theſeus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Moloſſi, in the time of Jaſon's expedition to Colchis. Plut. in vitâ.—Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 14 & 79.—Pauſ. 1, c. 2, &c.—*Ovid. THESĪDES, a patronymic, applied to the children of Theſeus, eſpecially Hippolytus. Ovid. Her. 4, v. 65.

THESMOPHŎRA, a ſirname of Ceres, as law giver, in whoſe honor feſtivals were inſtituted called Theſmophoria. The Theſmophoria were inſtituted by Triptolemus, or according to ſome by Orpheus, or the daughters of Danaus. The greateſt part of the Grecian cities, eſpecially Athens, obſerved them with great ſolemnity. The worſhippers were free born women, whoſe huſbands were obliged to defray the expences of the feſtival. They were aſſiſted by a prieſt called στεφανηφορος, becauſe he carried a crown on his head. There were alſo certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expence. The free born women were dreſſed in white robes to intimate their ſpotleſs innocence; they were charged to obſerve the ſtricteſt chaſtity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the ſolemnity, and on that account it was uſual for them to ſtrew their bed with agnus caſtus, fleabane, and all ſuch herbs as were ſuppoſed to have the power of expelling all venereal propenſities. They were alſo charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be obſerved with the greateſt ſigns of ſeriouſneſs and gravity, without any diſplay of wantonneſs or levity. It was however uſual to jeſt at one another, as the goddeſs Ceres had been made to ſmile by a merry expreſſion when ſhe was ſad and melancholy for the recent loſs of her daughter Proſerpine. Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyanepſion, the women went to Eleuſis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddeſs had invented were contained. On the 14th of the ſame month the feſtival began, on the 16th day a faſt was obſerved, and the women ſat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was uſual during the feſtival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proſerpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom ſome ſuppoſe to be the nurſe or favorite maid of the goddeſs of corn, or perhaps one of her ſirnames. There were ſome ſacrifices of a myſterious nature, and all perſons whoſe offence was ſmall were releaſed from confinement. Such as were initiated at the feſtivals of Eleuſis aſſiſted at the Theſmophoria. The place of high prieſt was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. *Ovid. THESMOTHĔTÆ, a name given to the laſt ſix Archons among the Athenians, becauſe they took particular care to enforce the laws, and to ſee juſtice impartially adminiſtered. They were at that time nine in number.

THESPIA, now Neocorio, a town of Bœotia, at the foot of mount Helicon, which received its name from Theſpia, the daughter of Aſopus, or from Theſpius. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Pauſ. 9, c. 26.—Strab. 9.

THESPIĂDÆ, the ſons of the Theſpiades. Vid. Theſpius.

THESPIĂDES, a name given to the 50 daughters of Theſpius. [Vid. Theſpius.—Alſo a ſirname of the nine muſes, becauſe they were held in great veneration in Theſpia.

THESPIS, a Greek poet of Attica, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Chriſt. His repreſentations were very ruſtic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary ſtage, where two actors, whoſe faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral ſongs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic repreſentations. Horat. art. P. 276.—Diog.

THESPIUS, a king of Theſpia, in Bœotia, ſon of Erechtheus, according to ſome authors. He was deſirous that his fifty daughters ſhould have children by Hercules, and therefore when that hero was at his court he permitted him to enjoy their company. This, which according to ſome was effected in one night, paſſes for the 13th and moſt arduous of the labors of Hercules, as the two following lines from the arcana arcaniſſima indicate:

Tertius hinc decimus labor eſt duriſſimus, unâ
Quinquaginta ſimul ſtupravit nocte puellas.

All the daughters of Theſpius brought male children into the world, and ſome of them twins, particularly Procris the eldeſt, and the youngeſt. Some ſuppoſe that one of the Theſpiades refuſed to admit Hercules to her arms, for which the hero condemned her to paſs all her life in continual celibacy, and to become the prieſteſs of a temple he had at Theſpia. The children of the Theſpiades, called Theſpiadæ, went to Sardinia, where they made a ſettlement with Iolaus, the friend of their father. Theſpius is often confounded by antient authors with Theſtius, though the latter lived in a different place, and, as king of Pleuron, ſent his ſons to the hunting of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Pauſ. 9, c. 26 & 27.—Plut.

THESPRŌTIA, a country of Epirus, at the weſt of Ambracia, bounded on the ſouth by the ſea. It is watered by the rivers Acheron and Cocytus, which the poets, after Homer, have called the ſtreams of hell. The oracle of Dodona was in Theſprotia. Homer. Od. 14, v. 315.—Strab. 7, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 17.—Lucan. 3, v. 179.

THESPRŌTUS, a ſon of Lycaon, king of Arcadia. Apollod. 3, c. 8.

THESSĂLIA, a country of Greece, whoſe boundaries have been different at different periods. Properly ſpeaking, Theſſaly was bounded on the ſouth by the ſouthern parts of Greece, or Grecia propria; eaſt, by the Ægean; north by Macedonia and Mygdonia; and weſt, by Illyricum and Epirus. It was generally divided into four ſeparate provinces, Theſſaliotis, Pelaſgiotis, Iſtiæotis, and Phthiotis, to which, ſome add Magneſia. It has been ſeverally called Æmonia, Pelaſgicum, Argos, Hellas, Argeia, Dryopis, Pelaſgia, Pyrrhæa, Æmathia, &c. The name of Theſſalia is derived from Theſſalus, one of its monarchs. Theſſaly is famous for a deluge which happened there in the age of Deucalion. Its mountains and cities are alſo celebrated, ſuch as Olympus, Pelion, Oſſa, Lariſſa, &c. The Argonauts were partly natives of Theſſaly. The inhabitants of the country paſſed for a treacherous nation, ſo that falſe money was called Theſſalian coin; and a perfidious action, a Theſſalian deceit. Theſſaly was governed by kings, till it became ſubject to the Macedonian monarchs. The cavalry was univerſally eſteemed, and the people were ſuperſtitious, and addicted to the ſtudy of magic and incantations. Theſſaly is now called Janna. Lucan. 6, v. 438, &c.—Dionyſ. 210.—Curt. 3, c. 2.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 1.—Pauſ. 4, c. 36. l. 10, c. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Juſtin. 7, c. 6.—Diod. 4.

THESSALIOTIS, a part of Theſſaly at the ſouth of the river Peneus.

THESSALONĪCA, an antient town of Macedonia, firſt called Therma, and Theſſalonica after Theſſalonica, the wife of Caſſander. According to ancient writers it was once very powerful, and it ſtill continues to be a place of note. Strab. 7.—Dionyſ.—Cic. in Piſ. c. 17.—Liv. 29, c. 17. l. 40, c. 4. l. 44, c. 10 & 45.—Mela. 2, c. 3.——A daughter of Philip, king of Macedonia, ſiſter to Alexander the Great. She married Caſſander, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Antipater, who put her to death. Pauſ. 8, c. 7.

THESSĂLUS, a ſon of Æmon——A ſon of Hercules and Calliope, daughter of Eurypilus. Theſſaly received its name from one of theſe.——A phyſician who invited Alexander to a feaſt at Babylon to give him poiſon.——A phyſician of Lydia, in the age of Nero. He gained the favors of the great and opulent of Rome, by the meanneſs and ſervility of his behaviour. He treated all phyſicians with contempt, and thought himſelf ſuperior to all his predeceſſors.——A ſon of Cimon, who accuſed Alcibiades becauſe he imitated the myſteries of Ceres.——A ſon of Piſiſtratus.——A player in the age of Alexander.

THESTĂLUS, a ſon of Hercules and Epicaſte. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

THESTE, a ſiſter of Dionyſius the elder, tyrant of Syracuſe. She married Philoxenus, and was greatly eſteemed by the Sicilians.

THESTIS, a fountain in the country of Cyrene.

THESTIUS, king of Pleuron, and a ſon of Parthaon, father to Toxeus, Plexippus, and Althæa.——A king of Theſpia. [Vid. Theſpius.]——The ſons of Theſtius called Theſtiadæ, were killed by Meleager at the chace of the Calydonian boar. Apollod. 1, c. 7.

THESTOR, a ſon of Idmon and Laothoe, father father to Calchas. From him Calchas is often called Theſtorides. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 19.—Stat. 1, Ach. v. 497.—Apollon. 1, v. 239.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 69.

THESTŸLIS, a country woman mentioned in Theocritus and Virgil.

THETIS, one of the ſea deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, often confounded with Tethys, her grand-mother. She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but when the gods were informed that the ſon ſhe ſhould bring forth muſt become greater than his father, their addreſſes were ſtopped, and Peleus, the ſon of Æacus, was permitted to ſolicit her hand. Thetis refuſed him, but the lover had the artifice to catch her when aſleep, and by binding her ſtrongly, he prevented her from eſcaping from his graſp, in aſſuming different forms. When Thetis found that ſhe could not elude the vigilance of her lover, ſhe conſented to marry him, though much againſt her inclination. Their nuptials were celebrated on mount Pelion, with great pomp; all the deities attended except the goddeſs of diſcord, who puniſhed the negligence of Peleus, by throwing into the midſt of the aſſembly a golden apple, to be given to the faireſt of all the goddeſſes. [Vid. Diſcordia.] Thetis became mother of ſeveral children by Peleus, but all theſe ſhe deſtroyed by fire in attempting to ſee whether they were immortal. Achilles muſt have ſhared the ſame fate, if Peleus had not ſnatched him from her hand as ſhe was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterwards rendered him invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which ſhe held him. As Thetis well knew the fate of her ſon, ſhe attempted to remove him from the Trojan war by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was uſeleſs, he went with the reſt of the Greeks. The mother, ſtill anxious for his preſervation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a ſuit of armour; but when it was done, ſhe refuſed the god the favors which ſhe had promiſed him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis iſſued out of the ſea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after ſhe had collected his aſhes in a golden urn, ſhe raiſed a monument to his memory, and inſtituted feſtivals in his honor. *Heſiod. THEUTIS, or TEUTHIS, a prince of a town of the ſame name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan war. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva attempted to pacify him he ſtruck the goddeſs and returned home. Some ſay that the goddeſs appeared to him and ſhowed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died ſoon after. Pauſ. 8, c. 28.

THOANTIUM, a place on the ſea coaſt at Rhodes.

THOAS, a king of Taurica Cherſoneſus, in the age of Oreſtes and Pylades. He would have immolated theſe two celebrated ſtrangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous cuſtoms of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. [*Vid. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhadamanthus. He was ſtill alive when the Lemnian women conſpired to kill all the males in the iſland, but his life was ſpared by his only daughter Hipſipyle, in whoſe favor he had reſigned the crown. Hipſipyle obliged her father to depart ſecretly from Lemnos, to eſcape from the fury of the women, and he arrived ſafe in a neighbouring iſland, which ſome call Chios, though many ſuppoſe that Thoas was aſſaſſinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologiſts confound the king of Lemnos with that of Cherſoneſus, and ſuppoſe that they were one and the ſame man. According to their opinion, Thoas was very young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Cherſoneſus, where he ſettled. Flac. 8, v. 208.—Hygin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid. in Ib. 384. Heroid. 6, v. 114.—*Stat. THRĀCIA, a large country of Europe, at the ſouth of Scythia, bounded by mount Hæmus. It had the Ægean ſea on the ſouth, on the weſt Macedonia and the river Strymon, and on the eaſt the Euxine ſea, the Propontis, and the Helleſpont. Its northern boundaries extended as far as the Iſter, according to Pliny and others. The Thracians were looked upon as a cruel and barbarous nation, they were naturally brave and warlike, addicted to drinking and venereal pleaſures, and they ſacrificed without the ſmalleſt humanity their enemies on the altars of their gods. Their government was originally monarchical, and divided among a number of independent princes. Thrace is barren, as to its ſoil. It received its name from Thrax, the ſon of Mars, the chief deity of the country. The firſt inhabitants lived upon plunder, and on the milk and fleſh of ſheep. It forms now the province of *Romania. Thrasybūlus, a famous general of Athens who began the expulſion of the 30 tyrants of his country, though he was only aſſiſted by 30 of his friends. His efforts were attended with ſucceſs, B. C. 401, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action was a crown made with two twigs of an olive branch; a proof of his own diſintereſtedneſs and of the virtue of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whoſe abilities and humanity were ſo conſpicuous, and Thraſybulus was ſent with a powerful fleet to recover their loſt power in the Ægean, and on the coaſt of Aſia. After he had gained many advantages, this great man was killed in his camp by the inhabitants of Aſpendus, whom his ſoldiers had plundered without his knowledge, B. C. 391. Diod. 14.—*C. Thryus, a town of Peloponneſus near Elis.

Thūcȳdĭdes, a celebrated Greek hiſtorian, born at Athens. His father's name was Olorus, and among his anceſtors he reckoned the great Miltiades. His youth was diſtinguiſhed by an eager deſire to excel in the vigorous exerciſes and gymnaſtic amuſements, which called the attention of his contemporaries, and when he had reached the years of manhood, he appeared in the Athenian armies. During the Peloponneſian war he was commiſſioned by his countrymen to relieve Amphipolis; but the quick march of Braſidas, the Lacedæmonian general, defeated his operations, and Thucydides, unſucceſsful in his expedition, was baniſhed from Athens. This happened in the eighth year of this celebrated war, and in the place of his baniſhment the general began to write an impartial hiſtory of the important events which had happened during his adminiſtration, and which ſtill continued to agitate the ſeveral ſtates of Greece. This famous hiſtory is continued only to the 21ſt year of the war, and the remaining part of the time till the demolition of the walls of Athens was deſcribed by the pen of Theopompus and Xenophon. Thucydides wrote in the Attic dialect, as poſſeſſed of more vigor, purity, elegance, and energy. He ſpared neither time nor money to procure authentic materials; and the Athenians, as well as their enemies, furniſhed him with many valuable communications, which contributed to throw great light light on the different tranſactions of the war. His hiſtory has been divided into eight books, the laſt of which is imperfect, and ſuppoſed to have been written by his daughter. The character of this intereſting hiſtory is well known, and the noble emulation of the writer will ever be admired, who ſhed tears when he heard Herodotus repeat his hiſtory of the Perſian wars at the public feſtivals of Greece. The hiſtorian of Halicarnaſſus, has often been compared with the ſon of Olorus, but each has his peculiar excellence. Sweetneſs of ſtyle, grace, and elegance of expreſſion, may be called the characteriſtics of the former, while Thucydides ſtands unequalled for the fire of his deſcriptions, the conciſeneſs, and at the ſame time, the ſtrong and energetic manner of his narratives. His relations are authentic, as he himſelf was intereſted in the events he mentions; his impartiality is indubitable, as he no where betrays the leaſt reſentment againſt his countrymen, and the factious partizans of Cleon, who had baniſhed him from Athens. Many have blamed the hiſtorian for the injudicious diſtribution of his ſubject, and while, for the ſake of accuracy, the whole is divided into ſummers and winters, the thread of the hiſtory is interrupted, the ſcene continually ſhifted; and the reader, unable to purſue events to the end, is tranſported from Aſia to Peloponneſus, or from the walls of Syracuſe to the coaſt of Corcyra. The animated harangues of Thucydides have been univerſally admired; he found a model in Herodotus, but he greatly ſurpaſſed the original, and ſucceeding hiſtorians have adopted, with ſucceſs, a peculiar mode of writing which introduces a general addreſſing himſelf to the paſſions and the feelings of his armies. The hiſtory of Thucydides was ſo admired, that Demoſthenes, to perfect himſelf as an orator, tranſcribed it eight different times, and read it with ſuch attention, that he could almoſt repeat it by heart. Thucydides died at Athens, where he had been recalled from his exile, in his 80th year, 391 years before Chriſt. The beſt editions of Thucydides are thoſe of Duker, fol. Amſt. 1731; of Glaſgow, 12mo. 8 vols. 1759; of Hudſon, fol. Oxon. 1696, and the 8vo. of Bipont. 1788. Cic. de orat. &c.—Diod. 12.—Dionyſ. Hal. de Thuc.—*Ælian. V. THYESTA, a ſiſter of Dionyſius, the tyrant of Syracuſe.

THYESTES, a ſon of Pelops and Hippodamia, and grandſon of Tantalus, debauched Ærope, the wife of his brother Atreus, becauſe he refuſed to take him as his colleague on the throne of Argos. This was no ſooner known, than Atreus divorced Ærope, and baniſhed Thyeſtes from his kingdom; but ſoon after, the more effectually to puniſh his infidelity, he expreſſed a wiſh to be reconciled to him, and recalled him to Argos. Thyeſtes was received by his brother at an elegant entertainment, but he was ſoon informed that he had been feeding upon the fleſh of one of his own children. This Atreus took care to communicate to him by ſhowing him the remains of his ſon's body. This action appeared ſo barbarous, that, according to the antient mythologiſts, the ſun changed his uſual courſe, not to be a ſpectator of ſo bloody a ſcene. Thyeſtes eſcaped from his brother, and fled to Epirus. Some time after he met his his daughter Pelopeia in a grove ſacred to Minerva, and he offered her violence without knowing who ſhe was. This inceſt, however, according to ſome, was intentionally committed by the father, as he had been told by an oracle, that the injuries he had received from Atreus would be avenged by a ſon born from himſelf and Pelopeia. The daughter, pregnant by her father, was ſeen by her uncle Atreus and married, and ſometime after ſhe brought into the world a ſon, whom ſhe expoſed in the woods. The life of the child was preſerved by goats; he was called Ægyſthus, and preſented to his mother, and educated in the family of Atreus. When grown to years of maturity, the mother gave her ſon Ægyſthus a ſword, which ſhe had taken from her unknown raviſher in the grove of Minerva, with hopes of diſcovering who he was. Meantime Atreus, intent to puniſh his brother, ſent Agamemnon and Menelaus to purſue him, and when at laſt they found him, he was dragged to Argos, and thrown into a cloſe priſon. Ægyſthus was ſent to murder Thyeſtes, but the father recollected the ſword, which was raiſed to ſtab him, and a few queſtions convinced him that his aſſaſſin was his own ſon. Pelopeia was preſent at this diſcovery, and when ſhe found that ſhe had committed inceſt with her father, ſhe aſked Ægyſthus to examine the ſword, and immediately plunged it into her own breaſt. Ægyſthus ruſhed from the priſon to Atreus, with the bloody weapon, and murdered him near an altar, as he wiſhed to offer thanks to the gods on the ſuppoſed death of Thyeſtes. At the death of Atreus, Thyeſtes was placed on his brother's throne by Ægyſthus, from which he was ſoon after driven by Agamemnon and Menelaus. He retired from Argos, and was baniſhed into the iſland of Cythera by Agamemnon, where he died. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Sophocl. in Ajac.—Hygin. fab. 86, &c.—Ovid. in Ib. 359.—Lucan. 1, v. 544. l. 7, v. 451.—Senec. in Thyeſt.

TIBĒRIUS, (Claudius Druſus Nero) a Roman emperor after the death of Auguſtus, deſcended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the populace with magnificent ſhows and fights of gladiators, and he gained ſome applauſe in the funeral oration which he pronounced over his father, though only nine years old. His firſt appearance in the Roman armies was under Auguſtus, in the war againſt the Cantabri, and afterwards in the capacity of general, he obtained victories in different parts of the empire, and was rewarded with a triumph. Yet, in the midſt of his glory, Tiberius fell under the diſpleaſure of Auguſtus, and retired to Rhodes, where he continued for ſeven years as an exile, till by the influence of his mother Livia with the emperor, he was recalled. His return to Rome was the more glorious; he had the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and ſeemed to divide the ſovereign power with Auguſtus. At the death of this celebrated emperor, Tiberius, who had been adopted, aſſumed the reins of government; and while with diſſimulation and affected modeſty he wiſhed to decline the dangerous office, he found time to try the fidelity of his friends, and to make the greateſt part of the Romans believe that he was inveſted with the purple, not from his own choice, but by the recommendation of Auguſtus, and the urgent entreaties of the Roman ſenate. The beginning of his reign ſeemed to promiſe tranquillity to the world; Tiberius was a watchful guardian of the public peace, he was the friend of juſtice, and never aſſumed the ſounding titles which muſt diſguſt a free nation, but he was ſatisfied to ſay of himſelf that he was the maſter of his ſlaves, the general of his ſoldiers, and the father of the citizens of Rome. That ſeeming moderation, however, which was but the fruit of the deepeſt policy, ſoon diſappeared, and Tiberius was viewed in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, to whoſe intrigues he was indebted for the purple, his cruelty to his wife Julia, and his tyrannical oppreſſion and murder of many noble ſenators, rendered him odious to the people, and ſuſpected even by his moſt intimate favorites. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany, but the tumults were ſilenced by the prudence of the generals and the fidelity of the officers, and the factious demagogues were abandoned to their condign puniſhment. This acted as a check upon Tiberius in Rome; he knew from thence, as his ſucceſſors experienced, that his power was precarious, and his very exiſtence in perpetual danger. He continued as he had begun, to pay the greateſt deference to the ſenate, all libels againſt him he diſregarded, and obſerved, that in a free city, the thoughts and the tongues of every man ſhoud be free. The taxes were gradually leſſened, and luxury reſtrained by the ſalutary regulations, as well as by the prevailing example and frugality of the emperor. While Rome exhibited a ſcene of peace and public tranquillity, the barbarians were ſeverally defeated on the borders of the empire, and Tiberius gained new honors, by the activity and valor of Germanicus and his other faithful lieutenants. Yet the triumphs of Germanicus were beheld with jealouſy. Tiberius dreaded his power, he was envious of his popularity, and the death of that celebrated general in Antioch was, as ſome ſuppoſe, accelerated by poiſon, and the ſecret reſent-

ment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent were ſacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was ſcarce in Rome one ſingle family that did not reproach Tiberius for the loſs of a brother, a father, or a huſband. He at laſt retired to the iſland of Capreæ, on the coaſt of Campania, where he buried himſelf in unlawful pleaſures. The care of the empire was entruſted to favorites, among whom Sejanus for a while ſhone with uncommon ſplendor. In his ſolitary retreat the emperor propoſed rewards to ſuch as invented new pleaſures, or could produce freſh luxuries. He forgot his age as well as his dignity, and diſgraced himſelf by the moſt unnatural vices and enormous indulgencies which can draw a bluſh, even upon the countenance of the moſt debauched and abandoned. While the emperor was loſt to himſelf and the world, the provinces were haraſſed on every ſide by the barbarians, and Tiberius found himſelf inſulted by thoſe enemies whom hitherto he had ſeen fall proſtrate at his feet with every mark of ſubmiſſive adulation. At laſt grown weak and helpleſs through infirmities, he thought of his approaching diſſolution; and as he well knew that Rome could not exiſt without a head, he nominated as his ſucceſſor, Caius Caligula. Many might enquire, why a youth naturally ſo vicious and abandoned as Caius was choſen to be the maſter of an extenſive empire; but Tiberius wiſhed his own cruelties to be forgotten in the barbarities which might be diſplayed in the reign of his ſucceſſor, whoſe natural propenſities he had well defined, in ſaying of Caligula that he bred a ſerpent for the Roman people, and a Phaeton for the reſt of the empire. Tiberius died at Miſenum the 16th of March, A. D. 37, in the 78th year of his age, after a reign of 22 years, ſix months, and 26 days. Caligula was accuſed of having haſtened his end by ſuffocating him. The joy was univerſal when his death was known; and the people of Rome, in the midſt of ſorrow, had a moment to rejoice, heedleſs of the calamities which awaited them in the ſucceeding reigns. The body of Tiberius was conveyed to Rome, and burnt with great ſolemnity. A funeral oration was pronounced by Caligula, who ſeemed to forget his benefactor while he expatiated on the praiſes of Auguſtus, Germanicus, and his own. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by hiſtorians, and his reign is the ſubject of the moſt perfect and elegant of all the compoſitions of Tacitus. When a private man, Tiberius was univerſally eſteemed; when he had no ſuperior, he was proud, arrogant, jealous, and revengeful. If he found his military operations conducted by a warlike general, he affected moderation and virtue; but when he got rid of the powerful influence of a favorite, he was tyrannical and diſſolute. If, as ſome obſerve, he had lived in the times of the Roman republic, he might have been as conſpicuous as his great anceſtors; but the ſovereign power lodged in his hands, rendered him vicious and oppreſſive. Yet, though he encouraged informers and favored flattery, he bluſhed at the mean ſervilities of the ſenate, and derided the adulation of his courtiers, who approached him, he ſaid, as if they approached a ſavage elephant. He was a patron of learning, he was an eloquent and ready ſpeaker, and dedicated ſome part of his time to ſtudy. He wrote a lyric poem, entitled, A Complaint on the Death of Lucius Cæſar, as alſo ſome Greek pieces in imitation of ſome of his favorite authors. He avoided all improper expreſſions, and all foreign words he totally wiſhed to baniſh from the Latin tongue. As inſtances of his humanity, it has been recorded that he was uncommonly liberal to the people of Aſia Minor, whoſe habitations had been deſtroyed by a violent earthquake, A. D. 17. One of his officers wiſhed him to encreaſe the taxes, No, ſaid Tiberius, a good ſhepherd muſt ſhear, not flay his ſheep. The ſenators wiſhed to call the month of November, in which he was born, by his name, in imitation of J. Cæſar and Auguſtus, in the months of July and Auguſt; but this he refuſed, ſaying, What will you do, conſcript fathers, if you have thirteen Cæſars? Like the reſt of the emperors, he received divine honors after death, and even during his life. It has been wittily obſerved by Seneca, that he never was intoxicated but once all his life, for he continued in a perpetual ſtate of intoxication from the time he gave himſelf to drinking till the laſt moment of his life. Sueton in vitâ. &c.—Tacit. Ann. 6, &c.—Dion. Caſſ.——A friend of Julius Cæſar, whom he accompanied in the war of Alexandria. Tiberius forgot the favors he had received from his friend; and when he was aſſaſſinated, he wiſhed all his murderers to be publicly rewarded.——One of the Gracchi. [Vid. Gracchus.]——Sempronius, a ſon of Druſus and Livia, the ſiſter of Germanicus, put to death by Caligula.——A ſon of Brutus, put to death by his father, becauſe he had conſpired with other young noblemen to reſtore Tarquin to his throne.——A Thracian made emperor of Rome in the latter ages of the empire.

TIBĒSIS, a river of Scythia, flowing from from mount Hæmus into the Iſter. Herodot. 4, c. 49.

TIBISCUS, now Teiſſe, a river of Dacia, with a town of the ſame name, now Temeſwar. It falls into the Danube.

TIBRIS. Vid. Tiberis.

TIBŬLA, a town of Sardinia, now Lango Sardo.

TIBULLUS (Aulus Albius) a Roman knight celebrated for his poetical compoſitions. He followed Meſſala Corvinus into the iſland of Corcyra, but he was ſoon diſſatisfied with the toils of war, and retired to Rome, where he gave himſelf up to literary eaſe and indolence. His firſt compoſition was to celebrate the virtues of his friend Meſſala, but his more favorite ſtudy was writing love verſes, in praiſe of his miſtreſſes Delia and Plautia, of Nemeſis and Neæra, and in theſe elegant effuſions he ſhowed himſelf the moſt correct of the Roman poets. He loſt his poſſeſſions when the ſoldiers of the triumvirate were rewarded with lands; but he might have recovered them, if he had condeſcended, like Virgil, to make his court to Auguſtus. Four books of elegies are the only remaining pieces of his compoſition. They are uncommonly elegant and beautiful, and poſſeſſed with ſo much grace and purity of ſentiment, that the writer is deſervedly ranked as the prince of elegiac poets. Tibullus was intimate with the literary men of his age, and he for ſome time had a poetical conteſt with Horace, in gaining the favors of an admired courtezan. Ovid has written a beautiful elegy on the death of his friend. The poems of Tibullus are generally publiſhed with thoſe of Propertius and Catullus, of which the beſt editions are, that of Vulpius, Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755; that of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754; and that by Heyne, 8vo. Lipſ. 1776. Ovid. 3, am. el. 9. Triſt. 2, v. 447. —Horat. 1, ep. 4. l. 1, od. 33, v. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

TIBUR, an antient town of the Sabines, about 20 miles north of Rome, built as ſome ſay by Tibur the ſon of Amphiaraus. It was watered by the Anio, and Hercules was the chief deity of the place. In the neighbourhood, the Romans on account of the ſalubrity of the air, had their ſeveral villas where they retired; and there alſo Horace had his favorite country ſeat, tho' ſome place it nine miles higher. Strab. 5. —Cic. 2, Orat. 65.—Suet. Cal. 21.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 630.—Horat. 3, od. 4, &c.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 61, &c.

L. TIBURTIUS, a centurion in Cæſar's army, wounded by Pompey's ſoldiers.

TIBURTUS, the founder of Tibur, often called Tiburtia Mœnia. He was one of the ſons of Amphiaraus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 670.

TICHIS, now Tech, a river of Spain, falling into the Mediterranean.

TICHIUS, a name given to the top of mount Œta. Liv. 36, c. 16.

TICĬDA, a poet who wrote epigrams, and praiſed his miſtreſs Metella under the fictitious name of Perilla. Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 433.

TICĪNUS, now Teſino, a river near Ticinum, a ſmall town of Italy, where the Romans were defeated by Annibal. The town of Ticinum was alſo called Pavia. The Ticinus falls into the Po. Strab. 5.—Ital. 4, v. 81.

TIDIUS, a man who joined Pompey, &c.

TIESSA, a river of Laconia, falling into the Eurotas. Pauſ. 3, c. 18.

TIFĀTA, a mountain of Campania, near Capua. Stat. Sylv. 4.

TIFERNUM, a name common to three towns of Italy. One of them for diſtinction's ſake, is called Metaurenſe, near the Metaurus in Umbria; the other, Tiberinum, on the Tiber; and the third, Samniticum, in the country of the Sabines. Liv. 10, c. 14.—Plin. 3, c. 14.—Plin. ſec. 4, ep. 1.

TIFERNUS, a mountain and river in the country of the Samnites. Plin. 3, c. 11. —Liv. 10, c. 30.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

TIGASIS, a ſon of Hercules.

TIGELLĪNUS, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conſpirators who had leagued againſt Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honors. He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and was ordered to deſtroy himſelf, 68 A. D. Tacit. H. 1, c. 72.—Plut.—Juv. 1.

TIGELLIUS, a native of Sardinia, who became the favorite of J. Cæſar, of Cleopatra, and Auguſtus, by his mimicry and facetiouſneſs. He was celebrated for the melody of his voice, yet he was of a mean and ungenerous diſpoſition, and of unpleaſing manners, as Horace, 1 Sat. 2, v. 3, and ſeq. inſinuates.

TIGRĀNES, a king of Armenia, who made himſelf maſter of Aſſyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, and by the advice of his father-in-law, he declared war againſt the Romans. He deſpiſed theſe diſtant enemies, and even ordered the head of the meſſenger to be cut off who firſt told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital. His pride, however, was ſoon abated, and though he ordered the Roman conſul Lucullus, to be brought brought alive into his preſence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was ſoon after defeated near mount Taurus. This totally diſheartened him, he refuſed to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even ſet a price upon his head. His mean ſubmiſſion to Pompey, the ſucceſſor of Lucullus in Aſia, and a bribe of 60,000 talents, inſured him on his throne, and he received a garriſon in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans. His ſecond ſon of the ſame name revolted againſt him, and attempted to dethrone him with the aſſiſtance of the king of Parthia, whoſe daughter he had married. This did not ſucceed, and the ſon had recourſe to the Romans, by whom he was put in poſſeſſion of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The ſon was afterwards ſent in chains to Rome for his inſolence to Pompey. Cic. pro Man.—Val. Max. 5, c. 1.—Paterc. 2, c. 33 & 37.—Juſtin. 40, c. 1 & 2.—Plut. in Luc. Pomp. &c.——A king of Armenia in the reign of Tiberius. He was put to death. Tacit. 6, Ann. c. 40.——One of the royal family of the Cappadocians, choſen by Tiberius to aſcend the throne of Armenia.——A general of the Medes.——A man appointed king of Armenia by Nero. Tacit. A. 14, c. 26.——A prince of Armenia in the age of Theodoſius.

TIGRANOCERTA, now Sered, the capital of Armenia, built by Tigranes, during the Mithridatic war, on a hill between the ſprings of the Tigris and mount Taurus. Lucullus, during the Mithridatic war, took it with difficulty, and found in it immenſe riches, and no leſs than 8000 talents in ready money. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 4.—Plin. 6, c. 9.

TIGRES, a river of Peloponneſus, called alſo Harpys, from a perſon of the ſame name drowned in it. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

TIGRIS, now Baſilenſa, a river of Aſia, riſing on mount Niphate in Armenia, and falling into the Perſian gulph. It is the eaſtern boundary of Meſopotamia. The Tigris now falls into the Euphrates, though in the age of Pliny the two ſeparate channels of theſe rivers could be eaſily traced. Plin. 6, c. 27.—Juſtin. 42, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 256.

TIGURĪNI, a warlike people among the Helvetii, now forming the modern cantons of Switz, Zurich, Schaffhauſen, and St. Gall. Their capital was Tigurum. Cæſ. bell. G.

TILATÆI, a people of Thrace. Thucyd. 2.

TILAVEMPTUS, a river of Italy falling into the Adriatic, at the weſt of Aquileia.

TILPHOSSIUS, a mountain of Bœotia.——Alſo a fountain at the tomb of Tireſias. Pauſ. Bœot. 33.

TILLIUS CIMBER. Vid. Tullius.

TILOX, a north-weſt cape of Corſica.

TILPHUSSUS, a mountain of Bœotia.

TIMACUS, a river of Mœſia falling into the Danube. The neighbouring people were called Timachi. Plin. 3, c. 26.

TIMÆA, the wife of Agis, king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades, by whom ſhe had a ſon. This child was rejected in the ſucceſſion to the throne, though Agis, on his death bed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag.

TIMÆUS, a friend of Alexander, who came to his aſſiſtance when he was alone ſurrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter. Curt. 9, c. 5.—— An hiſtorian of Sicily, who floriſhed about 262 B. C. and died in the 96th year of his age. His father's name was Andromachus. He was baniſhed from Sicily by Agathocles. His general hiſtory of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrrhus, were in general eſteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. All his compoſitions are loſt. Plut. in Nic. Cic. de Orat.—Diod. 5.—C. Nep.——A writer who publiſhed ſome treatiſes concerning antient philoſophers. Diog. in Emp.——A Pythagorean philoſopher, born at Locris. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempſychoſis, but in ſome parts of his ſyſtem of the world he differed from him. He wrote a treatiſe on the nature and the ſoul of the world, in the Doric dialect, ſtill extant. Plato in Tim.—Plut.——An Athenian in the age of Alcibiades. Plut.——A ſophiſt, who wrote a book called Lexicon vocum Platonicarum.

TIMAGĔNES, a Greek hiſtorian of Alexandria, 54 B. C. brought to Rome by Gabinius, and ſold as ſlave to the ſon of Sylla. His great abilities procured him his liberty, and gained the favors of the great, and of Auguſtus. The emperor diſcarded him for his impertinence; and Timagenes, to revenge himſelf on his patron, burnt the intereſting hiſtory which he had compoſed of his reign. Plut.—Horat. 1, ep. 19, v. 15.—Quintil.——An hiſtorian and rhetorician of Miletus.——A man who wrote an account of the life of Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 5.—— A general, killed at Cheronæa.

TIMAGŎRAS, an Athenian, capitally puniſhed for paying homage to Darius, according to the Perſian manner of kneeling on the ground, when he was ſent to Perſia as ambaſſador. Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Vid. Meles.

TIMANDRA,

TIMANDRA, a daughter of Leda, ſiſter to Helen. She married Echemus of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 5.——A miſtreſs of Alcibiades.

TIMANDRĬDES, a Spartan, celebrated for his virtues.

TIMANTHES, a painter of Sicyon, in the reign of Philip, the father of Alexander the great. In his celebrated painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated he repreſented all the attendants overwhelmed with grief; but his ſuperior genius, by covering the face of Agamemnon, left to the conception of the imagination the deep ſorrows of the father. He obtained a prize, for which the celebrated Parrhaſius was a competitor. This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his diſappointments could occaſion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Cic. de Orat.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 11.——An athlete of Cleone, who burnt himſelf when he perceived that his ſtrength began to fail. Pauſ. 6, c. 8.

TIMARCHUS, a philoſopher of Alexandria, intimate with Lamprocles, the diſciple of Socrates. Diog.——A rhetorician, who hung himſelf when accuſed of licentiouſneſs by Æſchines.——A Cretan, accuſed before Nero of oppreſſion. Tacit. A. 15, c. 20.——An officer in Ætolia, who burnt his ſhips to prevent the flight of his companions, and to enſure himſelf the victory. Polyæn. 5.——A king of Salamis.——A tyrant of Miletus, in the age of Antiochus, &c.

TIMASION, one of the leaders of the 10,000 Greeks, &c.

TIMASITHEUS, a prince of Lipara, who obliged a number of pirates to ſpare ſome Romans who were going to make an offering of the ſpoils of Veii to the god of Delphi. The Roman ſenate rewarded him very liberally, and 137 years after, when the Carthaginians were diſpoſſeſſed of Lipara, the ſame generoſity was nobly extended to his deſcendants in the iſland. Diod. 14.—Plut. in Cam.

TIMĀVUS, a broad river of Italy, riſing from a mountain, and after running a ſhort ſpace, falling by ſeven mouths, or according to ſome by only one, into the Adriatic ſea. There are at the mouth of the Timavus, ſmall iſlands with hot ſprings of water. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Virg. ecl. 8, v. 6, Æn. 1, v. 44 & 248.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

TIMESIUS, a native of Clazomenæ, who began to build Abdera. He was prevented by the Thracians, but honored as a hero at Abdera. Herodot. 1, c. 168.

TIMOCHĂRIS, an aſtronomer of Alexandria, 294 B. C. Vid. Ariſtillus.

TIMOCLĒA, a Theban lady, ſiſter to Theagenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's ſoldiers offered her violence, after which ſhe led her raviſher to a well, and while he believed that immenſe treaſures were concealed there, Timoclea threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbad his ſoldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

TIMOCRĂTES, a Greek philoſopher of uncommon auſterity.——A Syracuſan, who married Arete when Dion had been baniſhed into Greece by Dionyſius. He commanded the forces of the tyrant.

TIMOCREON, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnaſtic prizes at Olympia. He lived about 476 years before Chriſt, diſtinguiſhed for his voracity, and reſentment againſt Simonides and Themiſtocles. The following epitaph was written on his grave:

Multa bibens, & multa vorans, mala denique dicens
Multis, hic jaceo Timocreon Rhodius.

TIMODĒMUS, the father of Timoleon.

TIMOLĀUS, a Spartan, intimate with Philopœmen, &c.——A ſon of the celebrated Zenobia.——A general of Alexander, put to death by the Thebans.

TIMOLEON, a celebrated Corinthian, ſon of Timodemus and Demariſte. He was ſuch an enemy to tyranny, that he did not heſitate to murder his own brother Timophanes, when he attempted, againſt his repreſentations, to make himſelf abſolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleaſure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the moſt inveterate averſion for her ſon, and for ever baniſhed him from her ſight. This proved painful to Timoleon; a ſettled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refuſed to accept of any offices in the ſtate. When the Syracuſans, oppreſſed with the tyranny of Dionyſius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer, but all applications would have been diſregarded, if one of the magiſtrates had not awakened in him the ſenſe of natural liberty. Timoleon, ſays he, if you accept of the command of this expedition, we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer. This had due effect, and Timoleon ſailed for Syracuſe in ten ſhips, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppoſe him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance. Icetas, who had the poſſeſſion of the city, was defeated, and Dionyſius, who deſpaired of ſucceſs, gave himſelf up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This ſucceſs gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily, many cities which hitherto had looked upon him as an impoſtor, claimed his protection, and when he was at laſt maſter of Syracuſe by the total overthrow of Iceras, and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the ſeat of tyranny, and erected on the ſpot a common hall. Syracuſe was almoſt deſtitute of inhabitants, and at the ſolicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was ſent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houſes were ſold for a thouſand talents, which were appropriated to the uſe of the ſtate, and depoſited in the treaſury. When Syracuſe was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other ſtates of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced and baniſhed from the iſland. A code of ſalutary laws was framed for the Syracuſans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raiſe commotions in Sicily, were defeated, and peace was at laſt re-eſtabliſhed. The gratitude of the Sicilians was ſhewn every where to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applauſe in the public aſſemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuſe; his advice was conſulted on matters of importance, and his authority reſpected. He ridiculed the accuſations of malevolence, and when ſome informers had charged him with oppreſſion, he rebuked the Syracuſans who were going to put the accuſers to immediate death. A remarkable inſtance of his providential eſcape from the dagger of an aſſaſſin, has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a ſacrifice to the gods after a victory, two aſſaſſins, ſent by the enemies, approached his perſon in diſguiſe. The arm of one of the aſſaſſins was already lifted up, when he was ſuddenly ſtabbed by an unknown perſon, who made his eſcape from the camp. The other aſſaſſin, ſtruck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confeſſed, in the preſence of the army, the conſpiracy that had been formed againſt his life. The unknown aſſaſſin was mean time purſued, and when he was found, he declared, that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had ſtabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Enquiries were made, and his confeſſions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuſe about 337 years before the Chriſtian era. His body received an honorable burial, in a public place called from him Timoleonteum; but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret, than the inſtitution of feſtivals, and games yearly to be obſerved on the day of his death. C. Nep. & Plut. in vitâ.—Polyæn. 5.—Diod. 16.

TIMŌLUS. Vid. Tmolus.

TIMŌMĂCHUS, a painter of Byzantium in the age of Sylla and Marius. His paintings of Medea and Ajax were purchaſed for 80 talents by J. Cæſar, and depoſited in the temple of Venus at Rome. Plin. 35, c. 11.——A general of Athens, ſent to aſſiſt the Thebans. Xenoph.

TIMON, a native of Athens, called Miſanthrope, for his unconquerable averſion to mankind and all ſociety. He was fond of another Athenian, whoſe character was ſimilar to his own, and he ſaid that he had ſome partiality for Alcibiades, becauſe he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public aſſembly, and told his countrymen, that he had a fig-tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raiſe a building on the ſpot; he adviſed all ſuch as were inclined to deſtroy themſelves, to haſten and go and hang themſelves in his garden. Plut. in Alc. &c.—Lucian. in Tim.—Pauſ. 6, c. 12.——A Greek poet, ſon of Timarchus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote ſeveral dramatic pieces all now loſt, and died in the 90th year of his age. Diog.—Athen. 6 & 13.——An athlete of Elis. Pauſ. 6, c. 12.

TIMOPHĂNES, a Corinthian, brother to Timoleon. He attempted to make himſelf tyrant of his country, by means of the mercenary ſoldiers with whom he had fought againſt the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wiſhed to convince him of the impropriety of his meaſures, and when he found him unmoved, he cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated. Plut. & C. Nep. in Tim.—— A man of Mitylene, celebrated for his riches, &c.

TIMOTHEUS, a poet and muſician of Miletus. He was received with hiſſes the firſt time he exhibited as muſician in the aſſembly of the people, and further applications would have totally been abandoned, had not Euripides diſcovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profeſſion in which he afterwards gained ſo much applauſe. He received an immenſe ſum of money from the Epheſians, becauſe he had compoſed a poem in honor of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the great. There was alſo another muſician of Bœotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the muſician of Miletus. He was a great favorite of the conqueror of Darius. Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 15.—Pauſ. 3, c. 12.—Plut. de muſic. de fort. &c.——An Athenian general, ſon of Conon. He ſignalized himſelf by his valor and magnanimity, and ſhewed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He ſeized Corcyra, a obtained ſeveral victories over the The[illegible], but his ill ſucceſs in one of his expeditions diſguſted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the reſt of his noble predeceſſors, was fined a large ſum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was ſo diſintereſted, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own uſe, but after one of his expeditions, he filled the treaſury of Athens with 1200 talents. Some of the antients, to intimate his continual ſucceſſes, have repreſented him ſleeping by the ſide of Fortune, while the goddeſs drove cities into his net. Pauſ. 1, c. 29.—Plut. in Syll. &c.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 10 & 18. l. 3, c. 16.—C. Nep.——A Greek ſtatuary. Pauſ. 2, c. 32.——A tyrant of Heraclea, who murdered his father. Diod. 16.——A king of the Sapæi.

TIMOXĔNUS, a governor of Sicyon, who betrayed his truſt, &c. Polyæn.——A general of the Achæans.

TINGIS, now Tangier, a maritime town of Africa in Mauritania, built by the giant Antæus. Sertorius took it, and as the tomb of the founder was near the place, he cauſed it to be opened, and found in it a ſkeleton ſixty cubits long. This increaſed the veneration of the people for their founder. Plut. in Sert.—Mela. 1, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 1.—Sil. 3, v. 258.

TINIA, a river of Umbria, now Topino, falling into the Clitumnus. Strab. 5.—Sil. 8, v. 454.

TIPHA, a town of Bœotia, where Hercules had a temple. Ovid. ep. 6, v. 48.—Pauſ. 9, c. 32.

TIPHYS, the pilot of the ſhip of the Argonauts, was ſon of Hagnius, or, according to ſome, of Phorbas. He died before the Argonauts reached Colchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was choſen in his place. Orph.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Apollon.—Val. Flacc.—Pauſ. 9, c. 32.—Hygin. fab. 14 & 18.

TIPHYSA, a daughter of Theſtius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

TIRĔSIAS, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, ſon of Everus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which ſome authors have called as long as ſeven generations of men, others ſix, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Œdipus, and his ſons, ſat on the throne of Thebes. It is ſaid that in his youth he found two ſerpents in the act of copulation on mount Cyllene, and that when he had ſtruck them with a ſtick to ſeparate them, he found himſelf ſuddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again ſome ſerpents together in the ſame manner, and he recovered his original ſex, by ſtriking them a ſecond time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tireſias had married, and it was from thoſe reaſons, according to ſome of the antients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his deciſion, a diſpute in which the deities wiſhed to know, which of the ſexes received greater pleaſure from the connubial ſtate. Tireſias, who could ſpeak from actual experience, decided in favor of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleaſure which the female received, was ten times greater than that of the male. Juno, who ſupported a different opinion, and gave the ſuperiority to the male ſex, puniſhed Tireſias by depriving him of his eye-ſight. But this dreadful loſs was in ſome meaſure repaired by the humanity of Jupiter, who beſtowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live ſeven times more than the reſt of men. Theſe cauſes of the blindneſs of Tireſias, which are ſupported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus, and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callimachus, Propertius, &c. who declare that this was inflicted upon him as a puniſhment, becauſe he had ſeen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the ſeverity with which her ſon was treated; but the goddeſs, who well knew that this was the irrevocable puniſhment inflicted by Saturn on ſuch mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddeſs without her conſent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tireſias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a ſtaff which could conduct his ſteps with as much ſafety as if he had the uſe of his eye-ſight. During his life-time, Tireſias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban war, conſulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies ſometimes from the flight or the language of birds, in which he was aſſiſted by his daughter Manto, and ſometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity with myſtical ceremonies. He at laſt died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain, which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp by the Thebans on mount Tilphuſſus, and honored as a god. His oracle at Orchomenos was in univerſal eſteem. Homer repreſents Ulyſſes as going to the infernal regions to conſult Tireſias concerning his return to Ithaca. Apollod. 3, c. 6.—*Theocrit. TITÆA, the mother of the Titans. She is ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

TITAN, or TITĀNUS, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldeſt of the children of Cœlus; but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raiſed no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war againſt Saturn, and impriſoned him till he was replaced on his throne by his ſon Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a Chriſtian writer, who took it from the dramatic compoſitions of Ennius, now loſt. None of the antient mythologiſts, ſuch as Apollodorus, Heſiod, Hyginus, &c. have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian; to the ſun by Virgil and Ovid; and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 10.—Juv. 14, v. 35.—Diod. 5.—Pauſ. 2, c. 11.—Orpheus Hymn. 13.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 119.

TITĂNA, a town of Sicyonia in Peloponneſus. Titanus reigned there.——A man ſkilled in aſtronomy. Pauſ. 2, c. 11.

TITĀNES, a name given to the ſons of Cœlus and Terra. They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus ſix, and Heſiod 20, among whom are the Titanides. The moſt known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Cottus, and Briareus, to whom Horace adds, Typhoeus, Mimus, Porphyrion, Rhœtus, and Enceladus, who are by other mythologiſts reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic ſtature, and with proportionable ſtrength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitied their misfortunes, and armed them againſt their father. Saturn with a ſcythe cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himſelf to Terra, and threw them into the ſea, and from the froth ſprang a new deity, called Venus; as alſo Alecto, Tiſiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn ſucceeded his father, he married Rhea; but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed, by an oracle, that he ſhould be dethroned by them as a puniſhment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans againſt the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be obſerved, that the war of the Titans was againſt Saturn, and that of the giants againſt Jupiter. *Heſiod. TITĒNUS, a river of Colchis, falling into the Euxine ſea. Apollon. 4.

TITHENIDIA, a feſtival of Sparta, in which nurſes, τιθηναι, conveyed male infants entruſted to their charge, to the temple of Diana, where they ſacrificed young pigs. During the time of the ſolemnity, they generally danced and expoſed themſelves in ridiculous poſtures; there were alſo ſome entertainments given near the temple, where tents were erected. Each had a ſeparate portion allotted him, together with a ſmall loaf, a piece of new cheeſe, part of the entrails of the victim, and figs, beans, and green vetches, inſtead of ſweet meats.

TITHŌNUS, a ſon of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. He was ſo beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Æmathion. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddeſs granted it; but as he had forgotten to aſk the vigor, youth, and beauty, which he then enjoyed, he ſoon grew old, infirm, and decrepid; and as life became inſupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddeſs changed him into a cicada, or graſshopper. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 447, Æn. 4, v. 585. l. 8, v. 384.—Heſiod. Theog. 984.—Diod. 1.—*Ovid. Titormus, a ſhepherd of Ætolia, called another Hercules, on account of his prodigious ſtrength. He was ſtronger than his contemporary, Milo of Crotona, as he could lift on his ſhoulders a ſtone which the Crotonian moved but with difficulty. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 22.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.

Titurius, a friend of Julia Silana, who informed againſt Agrippina, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13.——A lieutenant of Cæſar in Gaul, killed by Ambiorix. Cæſ. bell. G. 5, c. 29, &c.

Titus Veſpaſianus, ſon of Veſpaſian and Flavia Domitilla, became known by his valor in the Roman armies, particularly at the ſiege of Jeruſalem. In the 79th year of the Chriſtian era, he was inveſted with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reaſon to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius, and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the houſe of Veſpaſian, Titus had been diſtinguiſhed for his extravagance and incontinence, his attendants were the moſt abandoned and diſſolute, and it ſeemed that he wiſhed to be ſuperior to the reſt of the world in the gratification of every impure deſire, and in every unnatural vice. From ſuch a private character which ſtill might be curbed by the authority and example of a father, what could be expected by tyranny and oppreſſion? Yet Titus became a model of virtue, and in an age and office in which others wiſh to gratify all their appetites, the emperor abandoned his uſual proſligacy, he forgot his debaucheries, and Berenice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardor, even to render himſelf deſpiſed by the Roman people, was diſmiſſed from his preſence. When raiſed to the throne, he thought himſelf bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty; and Titus is perhaps the only monarch who, when inveſted with uncontrolable power, bade adieu to thoſe vices, thoſe luxuries and indulgencies, which as a private man he never ceaſed to gratify. He was moderate in his entertainments, and though he often refuſed the donations which were due to ſovereignty, no emperor was ever more generous and more magnificent than Titus. All informers were baniſhed from his preſence, and even ſeverely puniſhed. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be poſtponed for years. The public edifices were repaired, and baths were erected for the convenience of the people. Spectacles were exhibited, and the Roman populace were gratified with the ſight of a naval combat in the ancient naumachia, and the ſudden appearance of 5000 wild beaſts brought into the circus for their amuſement. To do good to his ſubjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no ſervice, or granted no favor one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of My friends, I have loſt a day! A continual wiſh to be benevolent and kind, made him popular; and it will not be wondered, that he who could ſay that he had rather die himſelf, than be the cauſe of the deſtruction of one of his ſubjects, was called the love and delight of mankind. Two of the ſenators conſpired againſt his life, but the emperor diſregarded their attempts, he made them his friends by kindneſs, and like another Nerva, preſented them with a ſword to deſtroy him. During his reign, Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were deſtroyed by an eruption of Veſuvius, and the empire was viſited by a peſtilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity, the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conſpicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father, he alleviated their diſtreſſes by his liberal bounties, and as if they were but one family, he exerted himſelf for the good and preſervation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favors of a magnificent prince, Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's houſe, his indiſpoſition was increaſed by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modeſt ſubmiſſion complained of the ſeverity of fate which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A. D. 81, in the 41ſt year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and 20 days. The news of his death was received with lamentations; Rome was filled with tears, and all looked upon themſelves as deprived of the moſt benevolent of fathers. After him Domitian aſcended the throne, not without incurring the ſuſpicion of having haſtened his brother's end, by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of ſnow, where he expired. Domitian has alſo been accuſed of raiſing commotions, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother; but Titus diſregarded them, and forgave the offender. Some authors have reflected with ſeverity upon the cruelties which Titus exerciſed againſt the Jews, but though certainly a diſgrace to the benevolent features of his character, we muſt conſider him as an inſtrument in the hands of Providence, exerted for the puniſhment of a wicked and infatuated people. Joſeph. B. J. 7, c. 16, &c.—Suetonius.—Dio, &c.

TITUS Tatius, a king of the Sabines. Vid. Tatius.——Livius, a celebrated hiſtorian. Vid. Livius.——A ſon of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father, for conſpiring to reſtore the Tarquins.——A friend of Coriolanus.——A native of Crotona, engaged in Catiline's conſpiracy.

TĪTŸRUS, a ſhepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues, &c.——A large mountain of Crete.

TITYUS, a celebrated giant, ſon of Terra; or, according to others, of Jupiter, by Elara, the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of ſuch a prodigious ſize, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where ſhe had been concealed during her pregnancy to avoid the anger of Juno. Tityus attempted to offer violence to Latona, but the goddeſs delivered herſelf from his importunities, by calling to her aſſiſtance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a ſerpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as ſoon as devoured. It is ſaid that Tityus covered nine acres when ſtretched on the ground. He had a ſmall chapel with an altar in the iſland of Eubœa. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Pind. Pyth. 4.—*Homer. TRAGURIUM, a town of Dalmatia on the ſea.

TRAGUS, a river of Arcadia, falling into the Alpheus. Pauſ. 8, c. 33.

TRAJANOPŎLIS, a town of Thrace.——A name given to Selinus of Cilicia, where Trajan died.

TRAJĀNUS, (M. Ulpius Crinitus) a Roman emperor, born at Italica in Spain. His great virtues, and his private as well as public character, and his ſervices to the empire, both as an officer, a governor, and a conſul, recommended him to the notice of Nerva, who ſolemnly adopted him as his ſon; inveſted him during his life time with the imperial purple, and gave him the name of Cæſar and of Germanicus. A little time after Nerva died, and the election of Trajan to the vacant throne was confirmed by the unanimous rejoicings of the people, and the free concurrence of the armies on the confines of Germany, and the banks of the Danube. The noble and independent behaviour of Trajan evinced the propriety and goodneſs of Nerva's choice, and the attachment of the legions; and the new emperor ſeemed calculated to enſure peace and domeſtic tranquillity to the extenſive empire of Rome. All the actions of Trajan ſhewed a good and benevolent prince, whoſe virtues truly merited the encomiums which the pen of an elegant and courteous panegyriſt has paid. The barbarians continued quiet, and the hoſtilities which they generally diſplayed at the election of a new emperor whoſe military abilities they diſtruſted, were now few. Trajan however could not behold with ſatisfaction and unconcern, the inſolence of the Dacians, who claimed from the Roman people a tribute which the cowardice of Domitian had offered. The ſudden appearance of the emperor on the frontiers, awed the barbarians to peace; but Decebalus, their warlike monarch, ſoon began hoſtilities by violating the treaty. The emperor entered the enemy's country, by throwing a bridge acroſs the rapid ſtreams of the Danube, and a battle was fought in which the ſlaughter was ſo great, that in the Roman camp linen was wanted to dreſs the wounds of the ſoldiers. Trajan obtained the victory, and Decebalus deſpairing of ſucceſs, deſtroyed himſelf, and Dacia became a province of Rome. That the ardor of the Roman ſoldiers in defeating their enemies might not cool, an expedition was undertaken into the eaſt, and Parthia threatened with immediate war. Trajan paſſed through the ſubmiſſive kingdom of Armenia, and by his well-directed operations, made himſelf maſter of the provinces of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia. He extended his conqueſts in the eaſt, he obtained victories over unknown nations, and when on the extremities of India, he lamented that he poſſeſſed not the vigor and youth of an Alexander, that he might add unexplored provinces and kingdoms to the Roman empire. Theſe ſucceſſes in different parts of the world, gained applauſe, and the ſenators were profuſe in the honors they decreed to the conqueror. This however was but the blaze of tranſient glory. Trajan had no ſooner ſignified his intentions of returning to Italy, than the conquered barbarians appeared again in arms, and the Roman empire did not acquire one ſingle acre of territory from the conqueſts of her ſovereign in the eaſt. The return of the emperor towards Rome was haſtened by indiſpoſition, he ſtopped in Cilicia, and in the town of Selinus, which afterwards was called Trajanopolis, he was ſeized with a flux, and a few days after expired, in the beginning of Auguſt, A. D. 117, after a reign of 19 years, ſix months, and 15 days, in the 64th year of his age. He was ſucceeded on the throne by Adrian, whom the empreſs Plotina introduced to the Roman armies, as the adopted ſon of her huſband. The aſhes of Trajan were carried to Rome, and depoſited under the ſtately column which he had erected a few years before. Under this emperor the Romans enjoyed tranquillity, and for a moment ſuppoſed that their proſperity was complete under a good and virtuous ſovereign. Trajan was fond of popularity, and he merited it. The ſounding titles of Optimus, and the father of his country, were not unworthily beſtowed upon a prince who was equal to the greateſt generals of antiquity, and who to indicate his affability, and his wiſh to liſten to the juſt complaints of his ſubjects, diſtinguiſhed his palace by the inſcription of the public palace. Like other emperors he did not receive with an air of unconcern the homage of his friends, but roſe from his ſeat and went cordially to ſalute them. He refuſed the ſtatues which the flattery of favorites wiſhed to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation, that could pay adoration to cold inanimate pieces of marble. His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people, he appeared on foot, and ſhowed himſelf an enemy to parade, and an oſtentatious equipage. When in his camp, he expoſed himſelf to the fatigues of war, like the meaneſt ſoldier, and croſſed the moſt barren deſerts and extenſive plains on foot, and in his dreſs and food diſplayed all the ſimplicity which once gained the approbation of the Romans in their countryman Fabricius. All the oldeſt ſoldiers he knew by their own name, he converſed with them with great familiarity, and never retired to his tent before he had viſited the camp, and by a perſonal attendance convinced himſelf of the vigilance and the ſecurity of his army. As a friend he was not leſs diſtinguiſhed than as a general. He had a ſelect number of intimates, whom he viſited with freedom and openneſs, and at whoſe tables he partook many a moderate repaſt without form or ceremony. His confidence, however, in the good intentions of others, was perhaps carried to exceſs. His favorite Sura had once been accuſed of attempts upon his life, but Trajan diſregarded the informer, and as he was that ſame day invited to the houſe of the ſuppoſed conſpirator, he went thither early. To try farther the ſincerity of Sura, he ordered himſelf to be ſhaved by his barber, to have a medicinal application made to his eyes by the hand of his ſurgeon, and to bathe together with him. The public works of Trajan are alſo celebrated, he opened free and eaſy communications between the cities of his provinces, he planted many colonies, and furniſhed Rome with all the corn and provisions which could prevent a famine in the time of calamity. It was by his directions, that the architect Apollodorus built that celebrated column which is still to be seen at Rome, under the name of Trajan's column. The area on which it stands was made by the labors of men, and the height of the pillar proves that a large hill 144 feet high was removed at a great expence, A. D. 114, to commemorate the victories of the reigning prince. His persecutions of the Christians were stopped by the interference of the humane Pliny, but he was uncommonly severe upon the Jews, who had barbarously murdered 200,000 of his subjects, and even fed upon the flesh of the dead. His vices have been obscurely seen through a reign of continued splendor and popularity, yet he is accused of incontinence and many unnatural indulgences. He was too much addicted to drinking, and his wish to be stiled lord has been censured by those who admired the dissimulated moderation, and the modest claims of an Augustus. Plin. paneg. &c.—Dio. Cass. —Eutrop.—Ammian.—Spartian.—Joseph bell. J.—Victor.——The father of the emperor, who likewise bore the name of Trajan, was honored with the consulship, and a triumph, and the rank of a patrician by the emperor Vespasian.——A general of the emperor Valens.——A son of the emperor Decius.

TRIBALLI, a people of Thrace; or, according to ſome, of Lower Mœſia. They were conquered by Philip, the father of Alexander; and ſome ages after, they maintained a long war againſt the Roman emperors. Plin.

TRIBOCI, a people of Alſace in Gaul. Tacit. in Gem. 28.

TRIBULIUM, a town of Dalmatia.

TRIBŪNI PLEBIS, magiſtrates at Rome, created in the year U. C. 261, when the people after a quarrel with the ſenators had retired to Mons Sacer. The two firſt were C. Licinius, and L. Albinus, but their number was ſoon after raiſed to five, and 37 years after to 10, which remained fixed. Their office was annual, and as the firſt had been created on the 4th of the ides of December, that day was ever after choſen for the election. Their power, though at firſt ſmall, and granted by the patricians to appeaſe the momentary ſeditions of the populace, ſoon became formidable, and the ſenators repented too late of having conſented to elect magiſtrates, who not only preſerved the rights of the people, but could ſummon aſſemblies, propoſe laws, ſtop the conſultations of the ſenate, and even aboliſh their decrees by the word Veto. Their approbation was alſo neceſſary to confirm the ſenatûs conſulta, and this was done by affixing the letter T under it. If any irregularity happened in the ſtate, their power was almoſt abſolute; they criticized the conduct of all the public magiſtrates, and even dragged a conſul to priſon, if the meaſures he purſued were hoſtile to the peace of Rome. The dictator alone was their ſuperior, but when that magiſtrate was elected, the office of tribune was not, like that of all other inferior magiſtrates, aboliſhed while he continued at the head of the ſtate. The people paid them ſo much deference, that their perſon was held ſacred, and thence they were always called Sacroſancti. To ſtrike them was a capital crime, and to interrupt them while they ſpoke in the aſſemblies, called for the immediate interference of power. The marks by which they were diſtinguiſhed from other magiſtrates were not very conſpicuous. They wore no particular dreſs, only a beadle called viator marched before them. They never ſat in the ſenate, though ſome time after, their office entitled them to the rank of ſenators. Yet great as their power might appear, they received a heavy wound from their number, and as their conſultations and their reſolutions were of no effect if they were not all unanimous, the ſenate often took advantage of their avarice, and by gaining one of them by bribes, they, as it were, ſuſpended the authority of the reſt. The office of tribune of the people, though at firſt deemed mean and ſervile, was afterwards one of the firſt ſteps that led to more honorable employments, and as no patrician was permitted to canvaſs for the tribuneſhip, we find many that deſcended among the plebeians to exerciſe that important office. From the power with which they were at laſt inveſted by the activity, the intrigues, and continual applications of thoſe who were in office, they became almoſt abſolute in the ſtate, and it has been properly obſerved, that they cauſed far greater troubles than thoſe which they were at firſt created to ſilence. Sylla, when raiſed to the dictatorſhip, gave a fatal blow to the authority of the tribunes, and by one of his decrees, they were no longer permitted to harangue and inflame the people; they could make no laws; no appeal lay to their tribunal, and ſuch as had been tribunes, were not permitted to ſolicit for the other offices of the ſtate. This diſgrace however was but momentary, at the death of the tyrant the tribunes recovered their privileges by means of Cotta and Pompey the Great. The office of tribune remained in full force till the age of Auguſtus, who, to make himſelf more abſolute, and his perſon ſacred, conferred the power and office upon himſelf, whence he was called tribunitiâ poteſtate donatus. His ſucceſſors on the throne imitated his example, and as the emperor was the real and official tribune, bune, ſuch as were appointed to the office were merely nominal without power or privilege. Under Conſtantine the tribuneſhip was totally aboliſhed. The tribunes were never permitted to ſleep out of the city, except at the Feriæ Latinæ, when they went with other magiſtrates to offer ſacrifices upon a mountain near Alba. Their houſes were always open, and they received every complaint, and were ever ready to redreſs the wrongs of their conſtituents. Their authority was not extended beyond the walls of the city.——There were alſo other officers who bore the name of tribunes, ſuch as the tribuni militum or militares, who commanded a diviſion of the legions. They were empowered to decide all quarrels that might ariſe in the army, they took care of the camp, and gave the watch-word. There were only three at firſt choſen by Romulus, but the number was at laſt encreaſed to ſix in every legion. After the expulſion of the Tarquins, they were choſen by the conſuls, but afterwards the right of electing them was divided between the people and the conſul. They were generally of ſenatorian and equeſtrian families, and the former were called laticlavii, and the latter anguſticlavii from their peculiar dreſs. Thoſe that were choſen by the conſuls were called Rutuli, becauſe the right of the conſuls to elect them was confirmed by Rutulus, and thoſe elected by the people were called Comitiati, becauſe choſen in the comitia. They wore a golden ring, and were in office no longer than ſix months. When the conſuls were elected, it was uſual to chuſe 14 tribunes from the knights, who had ſerved five years in the army, and who were called juniores, and ten from the people who had been in ten campaigns, who were called ſeniores.—— There were alſo ſome officers called tribuni militum conſulari poteſtate, elected inſtead of conſuls, A. U. C. 310. They were only three originally, but the number was afterwards encreaſed to ſix, or more, according to the will and pleaſure of the people, and the emergencies of the ſtate. Part of them were plebeians, and the reſt of patrician families. When they had ſubſiſted for about 70 years, not without ſome interruption, the office was totally aboliſhed, as the plebeians were admitted to ſhare the conſulſhip, and the conſuls continued at the head of the ſtate till the end of the common wealth.——The tribuni cohortium prætorianarum, were entruſted with the perſon of the emperor, which they guarded and protected.——The tribuni ærarii were officers choſen from among the people, who kept the money which was to be applied to defray the expences of the army. The richeſt perſons were always choſen, as much money was requiſite for the pay of the ſoldiers. They were greatly diſtinguiſhed in the ſtate, and they ſhared with the ſenators and Roman knights the privileges of judging. They were aboliſhed by Julius Cæſar, but Auguſtus re-eſtabliſhed them, and created 200 more, to decide cauſes of ſmaller importance.——The tribuni celerum had the command of the guard which Romulus choſe for the ſafety of his perſon. They were 100 in number, diſtinguiſhed for their probity, their opulence, and their nobility.——The tribuni voluptatum were commiſſioned to take care of the amuſements which were prepared for the people, and that nothing might be wanting in the exhibitions. This office was alſo honorable.

TRĪPTŎLĔMUS, a ſon of Oceanus and Terra, or, according to ſome, of Trochilus, a prieſt of Argos. According to the more received opinion he was ſon of Celeus, king of Attica, by Neæra, whom ſome have called Metanira, Cothonea, Hyona, or Polymnia. He was born at Eleuſis in Attica, and was cured in his youth of a ſevere illneſs by the care of Ceres, who had been invited into the houſe of Celeus by the monarch's children, as ſhe travelled over the country in queſt of her daughter. To repay the kindneſs of Celeus, the goddeſs took particular notice of his ſon. She fed him with her own milk, and placed him on burning coals during the night, to deſtroy whatever particles of mortality he had received from his parents. The mother was aſtoniſhed at the uncommon growth of her ſon, and ſhe had the curioſity to watch Ceres. She diſturbed the goddeſs by a ſudden cry, when Triptolemus was laid on the burning aſhes, and as Ceres was therefore unable to make him immortal, ſhe taught him agriculture, and rendered him ſerviceable to mankind, by inſtructing him how to ſow corn, and make bread. She alſo gave him her chariot, which was drawn by two dragons, and in this celeſtial vehicle he travelled all over the earth, and diſtributed corn to all the inhabitants of the world. In Scythia the favorite of Ceres nearly loſt his life; but Lyncus, the king of the country, who had conſpired to murder him, was changed into a lynx. At his return to Eleuſis, Triptolemus reſtored Ceres her chariot, and eſtabliſhed feſtivals and myſteries in honor of the deity. He reigned for ſome time, and after death received divine honors. Some ſuppoſe that he accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition. Diod.—Hygin. fab. 147.—Pauſ. 2, c. 14. l. 8, c. 4.—Juſtin. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 1, c. 5.—Callim. in Cer. 22.—*Ovid. TRIVICUM, a town in the country of the Hirpini in Italy. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 79.

TRIUMVĪRI reipublicæ conſtituendæ, were three magiſtrates appointed equally to govern the Roman ſtate with abſolute power. Theſe officers gave a fatal blow to the expiring independence of the Roman people, and became celebrated for their different purſuits, their ambition, and their various fortunes. The firſt triumvirate, B. C. 60, was in the hands of J. Cæſar, Pompey, and Craſſus, who at the expiration of their office, kindled a civil war. The ſecond and laſt triumvirate, B. C. 43, was under Auguſtus, M. Antony, and Lepidus, and through them the Romans totally loſt their liberty. Auguſtus diſagreed with his colleagues, and after he had defeated them, he made himſelf abſolute in Rome. The triumvirate was in full force at Rome for the ſpace of about 12 years.——There were alſo officers who were called triumviri capitales, created A. U. C. 464. They took cognizance of murders and robberies, and every thing in which ſlaves were concerned. Criminals under ſentence of death were entruſted to their care, and they had them executed according to the commands of the prætors.——The triumviri nocturni watched over the ſafety of Rome in the night time, and in caſe of fire were ever ready to give orders, and to take the moſt effectual meaſures to extinguiſh it.——The triumviri agrarii had the care of colonies that were ſent to ſettle in different parts of the empire. They made a fair diviſion of the lands among the citizens, and exerciſed over the new colony all the power which was placed in the hands of the conſuls at Rome.——The triumviri monetales were maſters of the mint, and had the care of the coin, hence their office was generally intimated by the following letters often ſeen on antient coins and medals; IIIVIR. A. A. A. F. F. i. e. Triumviri auro, argento, ære flando, feriendo. Some ſuppoſe that they were created only in the age of Cicero, as thoſe who were employed before them, were called Denariorum flandorum curatores.——The triumviri valetudinis were choſen when Rome was viſited by a plague or ſome peſtiferous diſtemper, and they took particular care of the temples of health and virtue.——The triumviri ſenatûs legendi, were appointed to name thoſe that were moſt worthy to be made ſenators from among the plebeians. They were firſt choſen in the age of Auguſtus, as before, this privilege belonged to the kings, and afterwards devolved upon the conſuls, and the cenſors, A. U. C. 310.——The triumviri menſarii were choſen in the ſecond Punic war, to take care of the coin and prices of exchange.

TRIUMVIRORUM INSULA, a place on the Rhine which falls into the Po, where the triumvirs Antony, Lepidus, and Auguſtus, met to divide the Roman empire after the battle of Mutina. Dio. 46, c. 55.—Appian. Civ. 4.

TROĂDES, the inhabitants of Troas.

TROAS, a country of Phrygia in Aſia Minor, of which Troy was the capital. When Troas is taken for the whole kingdom of Priam, it may be ſaid to contain Myſia and Phrygia Minor; but if only applied to that part of the country where Troy was ſituated, its extent is confined within very narrow limits. Troas was antiently called Dardania. Vid. Troja.

TROCHOIS, a lake in the iſland of Delos, near which Apollo and Diana were born.

TROCMI, a people of Galatia. Liv. 38, c. 16.

TRŒZĒNE, a town of Argolis, in Peloponneſus, near the Saronicus Sinus, which received its name from Trœzen, the ſon of Pelops, who reigned there for ſome time. It is often called Theſeis, becauſe Theſeus was born there; and Poſidonia, becauſe Neptune was worſhipped there. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 81.—Pauſ. 2, c. 50.—Plut. in Theſ.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 566. l. 15, v. 296.——Another town at the ſouth of the Peloponneſus.

TROGILIÆ, three ſmall iſlands near Samos.

TROGLODȲTÆ, a people of Æthiopia, who dwelt in caves (τρωγλη ſpecus, δυμι ſubeo). They were all ſhepherds, and had their wives in common. Strab. 1.—Mela. 1, c. 4 & 8.

TROGUS POMPEIUS, a Latin hiſtorian, B. C. 41. His father was one of the friends and adherents of J. Cæſar. Trogus wrote an univerſal hiſtory of all the moſt important events that had happened from the beginning of the world to the age of Auguſtus, divided into 44 books. This hiſtory, which was greatly admired for its purity and elegance, was epitomized by Juſtin, and is ſtill extant. Some ſuppoſe that the epitome is the cauſe that the original of Trogus is loſt.

TROJA, a city, the capital of Troas, or according to others, a country of which Ilium

Ilium was the capital. It was built on a small eminence near mount Ida, and the promontory of Sigæum, at the distance of about four miles from the sea shore. Dardanus the first king of the country built it, and called it Dardania, and from Tros one of his successors it was called Troja, and from Ilus Ilion. Neptune is also said to have built, or more properly repaired, its walls, in the age of king Laomedon. This city has been celebrated by the poems of Homer and Virgil, and of all the wars which have been carried on among the antients, that of Troy is the most famous. The Trojan war was undertaken by the Greeks, to recover Helen, whom Paris the son of Priam king of Troy had carried away from the house of Menelaus. All Greece united to avenge the cause of Menelaus, and every prince furnished a certain number of ships and soldiers. According to Euripides, Virgil, and Lycophron, the armament of the Greeks amounted to 1000 ships. Homer mentions them as being 1186, and Thucydides supposes that they were 1200 in number. The number of men which these ships carried is unknown; yet as the largest contained about 120 men each, and the smallest 50, it may be supposed that no less than 100,000 men were engaged in this celebrated expedition. Agamemnon was chosen general of all these forces; but the princes and kings of Greece were admitted among his counsellors, and by them all the operations of the war were directed. The most celebrated of the Grecian princes that distinguished themselves in this war, were Achilles, Ajax, Menelaus, Ulysses, Diomedes, Protesilaus, Patroclus, Agamemnon, Nestor, Neoptolemus, &c. The Grecian army was opposed by a more numerous force. The king of Troy received assistance from the neighbouring princes in Asia Minor, and reckoned among his most active generals, Rhesus king of Thrace, and Memnon, who entered the field with 20,000 Assyrians and Æthiopians. Many of the adjacent cities were reduced and plundered before the Greeks approached the walls; but when the siege was begun, the enemies on both sides gave proofs of valor and intrepidity. The army of the Greeks, however, was visited by a plague, and the operations were not less retarded by the quarrel of Agamemnon and Achilles. The loss was great on both sides; the most valiant of the Trojans, and particularly of the sons of Priam, were slain in the field; and indeed, so great was the slaughter, that the rivers of the country are represented as filled with dead bodies and suits of armour. After the siege had been carried on for ten years, some of the Trojans, among whom were Æneas and Antenor, betrayed the city into the hands of the enemy, and Troy was reduced to ashes. The poets however, support, that the Greeks made themselves masters of the place by artifice. They secretly filled a large wooden horse with armed men, and led away their army from the plains, as if to return home. The Trojans brought the wooden horse into their city, and in the night the Greeks that were confined within the sides of the animal, rushed out and opened the gates to their companions, who had returned from the place of their concealment. The greatest part of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and the others carried away by the conquerors. This happened, according to the Arundelian marbles, about 1184 years before the Christian era, in the 3530th year of the Julian period, on the night between the 11th and 12th of June, 408 years before the first olympiad. Some time after, a new city was raised, about 30 stadia from the ruins of the old Troy; but though it bore the antient name, and received ample donations from Alexander the Great, when he visited it in his Asiatic expedition, yet it continued to be small, and in the age of Strabo it was nearly in ruins. It is said that J. Cæsar, who wished to pass for one of the descendants of Æneas, and consequently to be related to the Trojans, intended to make it the capital of the Roman empire, and to transport there the senate and the Roman people. The same apprehensions were entertained in the reign of Augustus, and according to some, an ode of Horace, Justum & tenacem propositi virum was written purposely to dissuade the emperor from putting into execution so wild a project. Vid. Paris, Æneas, Antenor, Agamemnon, Ilium, Laomedon, Menelaus, &c. Virg. Æn.—Homer.—Ovid.—Diod, &c.

TROJĀNI and TROJUGĔNÆ, the inhabitants of Troy.

TROJĀNI LUDI, games instituted by Æneas or his son Ascanius, to commemorate the death of Anchises, and celebrated in the circus at Rome. Boys of the best families, dressed in a neat manner, and accoutred with suitable arms and weapons, were permitted to enter the list. Sylla exhibited them in his dictatorship, and under Augustus they were observed with unusual pomp and solemnity. A mock fight on horse-back, or sometimes on foot, was exhibited. The leader of the party was called princeps juventutis, and was generally the son of a senator, or the heir apparent to the empire. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 602.

TRŌĬLUS,

TRŌĬLUS, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Achilles during the Trojan war. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Horat. 2, Od. 9, v. 16.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 474.

TROMENTĪNA, one of the Roman tribes. Liv. 6, c. 5.

TROPÆA, a town of the Brutii.——A ſtone monument on the Pyrenees, erected by Pompey.——Druſi, a town of Germany where Druſus died, and Tiberius was ſaluted emperor by the army.

TROPHONIUS, a celebrated architect, ſon of Erginus, king of Orchomenos in Bœotia. He built Apollo's temple at Delphi, with the aſſiſtance of his brother Agamedes, and when he demanded of the god a reward for his trouble, he was told by the prieſteſs to wait eight days, and to live during that time with all chearfulneſs and pleaſure. When the days were paſſed, Trophonius and his brother were found dead in their bed. According to Pauſanias, however, he was ſwallowed up alive in the earth: and when afterwards the country was viſited by a great drought, the Bœotians were directed to apply to Trophonius for relief, and to ſeek him at Lebadea, where he gave oracles in a cave. They diſcovered this cave by means of a ſwarm of bees, and Trophonius told them how to eaſe their misfortunes. From that time Trophonius was honored as a god, he paſſed for the ſon of Apollo, a chapel and a ſtatue were erected to him, and ſacrifices were offered to his divinity, when conſulted to give oracles. The cave of Trophonius became one of the moſt celebrated oracles of Greece. Many ceremonies were required, and the ſuppliant was obliged to make particular ſacrifices, to anoint his body with oil, and to bathe in the waters of certain rivers. He was to be clothed in a linen robe, and with a cake of honey in his hand, he was directed to deſcend into the cave by a narrow entrance, from whence he returned backwards, after he had received an anſwer. He was always pale and dejected at his return, and thence it became proverbial to ſay of a melancholy man, that he had conſulted the oracle of Trophonius. There were annually exhibited games in honor of Trophonius at Lebadea. Pauſ. 9, c. 37, &c.—Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 47.—Plut.—Plin. 34, c. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 45.

TROS, a ſon of Ericthonius, king of Troy, who married Callirhoe, the daughter of the Scamander, by whom he had Ilus, Aſſaracus, and Ganymedes. He made war againſt Tantalus, king of Phrygia, whom he accuſed of having ſtolen away the youngeſt of his ſons. The capital of Phrygia was called Troja from him, and the country itſelf Troas. Virg. 3, G. v. 36.—Homer. Il. 20, v. 219.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

TROSSŬLUM, a town of Etruria, which gave the name of Troſſuli to the Roman knights who had taken it without the aſſiſtance of foot ſoldiers. Plin. 32, c. 2.—Senec. ep. 86 & 87.—Perſ. 1, v. 82.

TULLA, one of Camilla's attendants in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 656.

TULLIA, a daughter of Servius Tullius, king of Rome. She married Tarquin the proud, after ſhe had murdered her firſt huſband Arunx, and conſented to ſee Tullius aſſaſſinated, that Tarquin might be raiſed to the throne. It is ſaid that ſhe ordered her chariot to be driven over the body of her aged father, which had been thrown all mangled and bloody in one of the ſtreets of Rome. She was afterwards baniſhed from Rome with her huſband. Ovid. in Ib. 363.——Another daughter of Servius Tullius, who married Tarquin the proud. She was murdered by her own huſband, that he might marry her ambitious ſiſter of the ſame name.——A daughter of Cicero. Vid. Tulliola.——A debauched woman. Juv. 6, v. 306.

TULLIA LEX, de ſenatu, by M. Tullius Cicero, A. U. C. 690, enacted that thoſe who had a libera legatio granted them by the ſenate, ſhould hold it no more than one year. Such ſenators as had a libera legatio, travelled through the provinces of the empire without any expence, as if they were employed in the affairs of the ſtate. ——Another de ambitu, by the ſame, the ſame year. It forbad any perſon, two years before he canvaſſed for an office, to exhibit a ſhow of gladiators, unleſs that caſe had devolved upon him by will. Senators guilty of the crime of ambitus, were puniſhed with the aquæ & ignis interdictio for ten years, and the penalty inflicted on the commons was more ſevere than that of the Calpurnian law.

TULLIĀNUM, a ſubterraneous priſon in Rome, built by Servius Tullius, and added to the other called Robur, where criminals were confined. Salluſt. in B. Catil.

TULLIŎLA, or TULLIA, a daughter of Cicero by Terentia. She married Caius Piſo, and afterwards Furius Craſſipes, and laſtly P. Corn. Dolabella. With this laſt huſband ſhe had every reaſon to be diſſatisfied. Dolabella was turbulent, and conſequently the cauſe of much grief to Tullia and her father. Tullia died in childbed, about 44 years before Chriſt. Cicero was ſo inconſolable on this occaſion, that ſome have accuſed him of an unnatural partiality for his daughter. According to a ridiculous ſtory which ſome of the moderns report, in the age of pope Paul 3d. a monument was diſcovered on the Appian road, with the ſuperſcription of Tulliolæ filiæ meæ. The body of a woman was found in it, which was reduced to aſhes as ſoon as touched; there was alſo a lamp burning, which was extinguiſhed as ſoon as the air gained admiſſion there; and which was ſuppoſed to have been lighted above 1500 years. Cic. —Plut. in Cic.

TULLIUS Cimber, the ſon of a freedman, roſe to great honors, and followed the intereſt of Pompey. He was reconciled to J. Cæſar, whom he murdered with Brutus. Plut.—— Cicero, a celebrated orator. Vid. Cicero. ——The ſon of the orator Cicero. Vid. Cicero.——Servius, a king of Rome. Vid. Servius.——Senecio, a man accuſed of conſpiracy againſt Nero with Piſo.——A friend of Otho.——One of the kings of Rome. Vid. Servius.

TULLUS HOSTILIUS, the 3d king of Rome after the death of Numa. He was of a warlike and active diſpoſition, and ſignalized himſelf by his expedition againſt the people of Alba, whom he conquered, and whoſe city he deſtroyed, after the famous battle of the Horatii and Curiatii. He afterwards carried his arms againſt the Latins and the neighbouring ſtates with ſucceſs, and enforced reverence for majeſty among his ſubjects. He died with all his family about 640 years before the Chriſtian era, after a reign of 32 years. The manner of his death is not preciſely known. Some ſuppoſe that he was killed by lightening, while he was performing ſome magical ceremonies in his own houſe; or, according to the more probable accounts of others, he was murdered by Ancus Martius, who ſet fire to the palace, to make it believed that the impiety of Tullus had been puniſhed by heaven. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionyſ. Hal.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 814. —Liv. 1, c. 22.—Plut.——A conſul, A. U. C. 686. Horat. 3, od. 8, v. 12.

TYCHIUS, a celebrated artiſt of Hyle in Bœotia, who made Hector's ſhield, which was covered with the hides of ſeven oxen. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 823.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 7, v. 220.

TYDE, a town of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis. Ital. 3, v. 367.

TYDEUS, a ſon of Œneus, king of Calydon. He fled from his country after the accidental murder of one of his friends, and found a ſafe aſylum in the court of Adraſtus, king of Argos, whoſe daughter Deiphyle he married. When Adraſtus wiſhed to replace his ſon-in-law Polynices on the throne of Thebes, Tydeus undertook to go and declare war againſt Eteocles, who uſurped the crown. The reception he met provoked his reſentment; he challenged Eteocles and his officers to ſingle combat, and defeated them. On his return to Argos, he ſlew 50 of the Thebans who had conſpired againſt his life, and laid in an ambuſh to ſurprize him; and only one of the number was permitted to return to Thebes, to bear the tidings of the fate of his companions. He was one of the ſeven chiefs of the army of Adraſtus, and during the Theban war he behaved with great courage. Many of the enemies expired under his blows, till he was at laſt wounded by Melanippus. Though the blow was fatal, Tydeus had the ſtrength to dart at his enemy, and to bring him to the ground, before he was carried away from the fight by his companions. At his own requeſt, the dead body of Melanippus was brought to him, and after he had ordered the head to be cut off, he began to tear out the brains with his teeth. The ſavage barbarity of Tydeus diſpleaſed Minerva, who was coming to bring him relief, and to make him immortal; and the goddeſs left him to his fate, and ſuffered him to die. He was buried at Argos, where his monument was ſtill to be ſeen in the age of Pauſanias. He was father to Diomedes. Some ſuppoſe that the cauſe of his flight to Argos, was the murder of the ſon of Melus, or according to others, of Alcathous his father's brother, or perhaps his own brother Olenius. Homer. Il. 4, v. 365, 387.—Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 6.—Æſchyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Pauſ. 9, c. 18.—Diod. 2.—Eurip. in Sup.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 479.—Ovid. in Ib. 350, &c.

A. A.* 2, v. 408.——A town of Colchis on the Phaſis. Plin.

TYNDĂRUS, a ſon of Œbalus and Gorgophone, or, according to ſome, of Perieres. He was king of Lacedæmon, and married the celebrated Leda, who bore him Timandra, Philonoe, &c. and alſo became mother of Pollux and Helen by Jupiter. Vid. Leda, Caſtor, Pollux, Clytemneſtra, &c.

TYNNĪCHUS, a general of Heraclea. Polyæn.

TYPHŒUS, or TYPHON, a famous giant, ſon of Tartarus and Terra, who had a hundred heads like thoſe of a ſerpent or a dragon. Flames of devouring fire were darted from his mouth and from his eyes, and he uttered horrid yells, like the diſſonant ſhrieks of different animals. He was no ſooner born, than, to avenge the death of his brothers the giants, he made war againſt heaven, and ſo frightened the gods, that they fled away and aſſumed different ſhapes. Jupiter became a ram, Mercury an ibis, Apollo a crow, Juno a cow, Bacchus a goat, Diana a cat, Venus a fiſh, &c. The father of the gods at laſt reſumed courage, and put Typhœus to flight with his thunderbolts, and cruſhed him under mount Ætna, in the iſland of Sicily, or according to ſome, under the iſland Inarime. Typhœus became father of Geryon, Cerberus, and Orthos, by his union with Echidna. Hygin. fab. 152 & 196.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 325.—Æſchyl. ſept. ante Theb.—Heſiod. Theog. 820.—Homer. Hym.—Herodot. 2, c. 156.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 716.

TYPHON, a giant whom Juno produced by ſtriking the earth. Some of the poets make him the ſame as the famous Typhœus. Vid. Typhœus.——A brother of Oſiris, who married Nepthys. He laid ſnares for his brother during his expedition, and murdered him. The death of Oſiris was avenged by his ſon Orus, and Typhon was put to death. (Vid. Oſiris.) He was reckoned among the Egyptians to be the cauſe of every evil, and on that account generally repreſented as a wolf and a crocodile. Plut. in Iſ. & Oſ.—Diod. 1.

TYRANNĪON, a grammarian of Pontus, intimate with Cicero. His original name was Theophraſtus, and he received that of Tyrannion, from his auſterity to his pupils. He was taken by Lucullus, and reſtored to his liberty by Muræna. He opened a ſchool in the houſe of his friend Cicero, and enjoyed his friendſhip. He was extremely fond of books, and collected a library of about 30,000 volumes. To his care and induſtry the world is indebted for the preſervation of Ariſtotle's works.——There was alſo one of his diſciples called Diocles, who bore his name. He was a native of Phœnicia, and was made priſoner in the war of Auguſtus and Antony. He was bought by Dymes, one of the emperor's favorites, and afterwards by Terentia, who gave him his liberty. He wrote 68 different volumes, in one of which he proved that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek; and another in which Homer's poems were corrected, &c.

TYRANNUS, a ſon of Pterelaus.

TYRAS, or TYRA, a river of European Sarmatia, falling into the Euxine ſea, between the Danube and the Boryſthenes, now called the Nieſter. Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 50.

TYRES, one of the companions of Æneas in his wars againſt Turnus. He was brother to Teuthras. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 403.

TYRIDATES, a rich man in the age of Alexander, &c. Curt.

TYRII, or TYRUS, a town of Magna Græcia.

TYRIOTES, an eunuch of Darius, who fled from Alexander's camp, to inform his master of the queen's death. Curt. 4, c. 10.

TYRO, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Salmoneus, king of Elis and Alcidice. She was treated with great severity by her mother-in-law Sidero, and at last removed from her father's house by her uncle Cretheus. She became enamoured of the Enipeus; and as she often walked on the banks of the river, Neptune assumed the shape of her favored lover, and gained her affections. She had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune, whom she exposed, to conceal her incontinence from the world. The children were preserved by shepherds, and when they had arrived to years of maturity, they avenged their mother's injuries by assassinating the cruel Sidero. Some time after her amour with Neptune, Tyro married her uncle Cretheus, by whom she had Amythaon, Pheres, and Æson. Tyro is often called Salmonis from her father. Homer. Od. 11, v. 234.—*Pyndar. TYROS, an island of Arabia.——A city of Phœnicia. Vid. Tyrus.

TYRRHEIDÆ, a patronymic given to the sons of Tyrrheus, who kept the flocks of Latinus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 484.

TYRRHĒNI, the inhabitants of Etruria. Vid. Etruria.

TYRRHĒNUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coast of Etruria. It is also called Inferum, as being at the bottom or south of Italy.

TYRRHĒNUS, a son of Atys king of Lydia, who came to Italy, where part of the country was called after him. Strab. 5.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 55.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.——A friend of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 612.

TYRRHEUS, a shepherd of king Latinus, whose stag being killed by the companions of Ascanius, was the first cause of war between Æneas and the inhabitants of Latium. Hence the word Tyrrheides. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 485.——An Egyptian general, B. C. 91.

TYRSIS, a place in the Balearides, supposed to be the palace of Saturn.

TYRTÆUS, a Greek elegiac poet, born in Attica, son of Archimbrotus. In the second Messenian war, the Lacedæmonians were directed by the oracle to apply to the Athenians for a general, if they wished to finish their expedition with success, and they received Tyrtæus. The poet, though ridiculed for his many deformities, and his ignorance of military affairs, animated the Lacedæmonians with martial songs, just as they wished to raise the siege of Ithome, and inspired them with so much courage, that they defeated the Messenians. For his services, he was made a citizen of Lacedæmon, and treated with great attention. Of the compositions of Tyrtæus, nothing is extant but the fragments of four or five elegies. He flourished about 684 B. C. Justin. 2, c. 5.—Strab. 8.—Aristot. Polit. 5, c. 7.—Horat. de Art. p. 402.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Paus. 4, c. 6, &c.

TYRUS, or TYROS, a very antient city of Phœnicia, built by the Sidonians, on a small island at the south of Sidon, about 200 stadia from the shore, and now called Sur. There were, properly speaking, two places of that name, the old Tyros, called Palætyros, on the sea-shore, and the other in the island, It was about 19 miles in circumference, including Palætyros, but without it about four miles. Tyre was destroyed by the princes of Assyria, and afterwards rebuilt. It maintained its independence till the age of Alexander, who took it with much difficulty, and only after he had joined the island to the continent by a mole, after a siege of seven months, on the 20th of August, B. C. 332. The Tyrians were naturally industrious; their city was the emporium of commerce, and they were deemed the inventors of scarlet and purple colors. They founded many cities in different parts of the world, such as Carthage, Gades, Leptis, Utica, &c. which on that account are often distinguished by the epithet Tyria. The buildings of Tyre were very splendid and magnificent; the walls were 150 feet high, with a proportionable breadth. Hercules was the chief deity of the place. It had two large and capacious harbours, and a powerful fleet; and was built, according to some writers, about 2760 years before the Christian era. Strab. 16.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela. 1, c. 12.—Curt. 4, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 6, 339, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 1, &c. Met. 5 & 10.—Lucan. 3, &c.

TYSIAS, a man celebrated by Cicero. Vid. Tisias.

VACATIONE (lex de) was enacted concerning the exemption from military ſervice, and contained this very remarkable clauſe, niſi bellum Gallicum exoriatur, in which caſe the prieſts themſelves were not exempted from ſervice. This can intimate how apprehenſive the Romans were of the Gauls, by whom their city had once been taken.

VACCA, a town of Numidia. Salluſt. Jug.——A river of Spain.

VACCÆI, a people at the north of Spain. Liv. 21, c. 5. l. 35, c. 7. l. 46, c. 47.

VACCUS, a general, &c. Liv. 8, c. 19.

VAGŪNA, a goddeſs at Rome, who preſided over repoſe and leiſure, as the word indicates (vacare). Her feſtivals were obſerved in the month of December. Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 307.—Horat. 1, ep. 10, v. 49.

VADIMŌNIS LACUS, a lake of Etruria, whoſe waters were ſulphureous. The Etrurians were defeated there by the Romans; and the Gauls by Dolabella. Liv. 9, c. 39.—Flor. 1, c. 13.—Plin. 8, ep. 20.

VAGĒNI, or VAGIENNI, a people of Liguria, at the ſources of the Po, whoſe capital was called Auguſta Vagiennorum. Sil. 8, v. 606.

VALA, (C. Numonius,) a friend of Horace, to whom the poet addreſſed 1 ep. 15.

VALĀLIS, a river of modern Holland, now called the Waal. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6.

VALENS (Flavius) a ſon of Gratian born in Pannonia. His brother Valentinian took him as his colleague on the throne, and appointed him over the eaſtern parts of the Roman empire. The bold meaſures and the threats of the rebel Procopius, frightened the new emperor; and if his friends had not intervened, he would have willingly reſigned all his pretenſions to the empire, which his brother had entruſted to his care. By perſeverance, however, Valens was enabled to deſtroy his rival, and to diſtinguiſh himſelf in his wars againſt the northern barbarians. But his lenity to theſe ſavage intruders proved fatal to the Roman power; and by permitting ſome of the Goths to ſettle in the provinces of Thrace, and to have free acceſs to every part of the country, Valens encouraged them to make depredations on his ſubjects, and to diſturb their tranquillity. His eyes were opened too late; he attempted to repel them, but he failed in the attempt. A bloody battle was fought, in which the barbarians obtained ſome advantage, and Valens was hurried away by the obſcurity of the night, and the affection of his ſoldiers for his perſon, into a lonely houſe, which the Goths ſet on fire. Valens, unable to make his eſcape, was burnt alive in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of 15 years, A. D. 378. He has been blamed for his ſuperſtition and cruelty, in putting to death all ſuch of his ſubjects whoſe name began by Theod, becauſe he had been informed by his favorite aſtrologers, that his crown would devolve upon the head of an officer whoſe name began with theſe letters. Valens did not poſſeſs any of the great qualities which diſtinguiſh a great and powerful monarch. He was illiterate, and of a diſpoſition naturally indolent and inactive. Yet though timorous in the higheſt degree, he was warlike; and though fond of eaſe, he was acquainted with the character of his officers, and preferred none but ſuch as poſſeſſed merit. He was a great friend of diſcipline, a pattern of chaſtity and temperance, and he ſhewed himſelf always ready to liſten to the juſt complaints of his ſubjects, though he gave an attentive ear to flattery and malevolent informations. Ammian. &c.——Valerius, a proconſul of Achaia, who proclaimed himſelf emperor of Rome, when Macrian, who had been inveſted with the purple in the eaſt, attempted to aſſaſſinate him. He reigned only ſix months, and was murdered by his ſoldiers, A. D. 261.——Fabius, a friend of Vitellius, whom he ſaluted emperor, in oppoſition to Otho. He was greatly honored by Vitellius, &c.——A general of the emperor Honorius.——The name of the ſecond Mercury mentioned by Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22.

VALENTIA, one of the antient names of Rome.——A town of Spain, a little below Saguntum, founded by J. Brutus, and for ſome time known by the name of Julia Colonia.——A town of Italy.——Another in Sardinia.

VALENTINIĀNUS 1ſt, a ſon of Gratian; raiſed to the imperial throne by his merit and valor. He kept the weſtern part of the empire for himſelf, and appointed over the eaſt his brother Valens. He gave the moſt convincing proof of his military valor in the victories which he obtained over the barbarians in the provinces of Gaul, the deſarts of Africa, or on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. The inſolence of the Quadi he puniſhed with great ſeverity; and when theſe deſperate and indigent barbarians had deprecated the conqueror's mercy, Valentinian treated them with contempt, and upbraided them with every mark of reſentment. While he ſpoke with ſuch warmth, he broke a blood veſſel, and fell lifeleſs on the ground. He was conveyed into his palace by his attendants, and ſoon after died, after ſuffering the greateſt agonies, violent fits, and contorſions of his limbs, on the 17th of November, A. D. 375. He was then in the 55th year of his age, and had reigned 12 years. He has been repreſented by ſome, as cruel and covetous in the higheſt degree. He was naturally of an iraſcible diſpoſition, and he gratified his pride in expreſſing a contempt for thoſe who were his equals in military abilities, or who ſhone for gracefulneſs or elegance of addreſs. Ammian.——About ſix days after the death of Valentinian, his ſecond ſon, Valentinian the ſecond, was proclaimed emperor, tho' only five years old. He ſucceeded his brother, Gratian, A. D. 383, but his youth ſeemed to favor diſſenſion, and the attempts and the uſurpations of rebels. He was robbed of his throne by Maximus, four years after the death of Gratian; and in this helpleſs ſituation he had recourſe to Theodoſius, who was then emperor of the eaſt. He was ſucceſsful in his applications; Maximus was conquered by Theodoſius, and Valentinian entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by his benefactor. He was ſome time after ſtrangled by one of his officers, a native of Gaul, called Arbogaſtes, in whom he had placed too much confidence, and from whom he expected more deference than the ambition of a barbarian could pay. Valentinian reigned nine years. This happened the 15th of May, A. D. 392, at Vienne, one of the modern towns of France. He has been commended for his many virtues, and the applauſe which the populace beſtowed upon him, was beſtowed upon real merit. He aboliſhed the greateſt part of the taxes; and becauſe his ſubjects complained that he was too fond of the amuſements of the circus, he ordered all ſuch feſtivals to be aboliſhed, and all the wild beaſts that were kept for the entertainment of the people to be ſlain. He was remarkable for his benevolence and clemency, not only to his friends, but even to ſuch as had conſpired againſt his life; and he uſed to ſay, that tyrants alone are ſuſpicious. He was fond of imitating the virtues and exemplary life of his friend and patron Theodoſius, and if he had lived longer, the Romans might have enjoyed peace and ſecurity.——Valentinian the third, was ſon of Conſtantius and Placidia, the daughter of Theodoſius the Great, and therefore, as related to the imperial family, he was ſaluted emperor in his youth, and publicly acknowledged as ſuch at Rome, the 3d of October, A. D. 423, about the 6th year of his age. He was at firſt governed by his mother, and the intrigues of his generals and courtiers; and when he came to years of diſcretion, he diſgraced himſelf by violence, oppreſſion, and incontinence. He was murdered in the midſt of Rome, A. D. 454, in the 36th year of his age, and 31ſt of his reign, by Petronius Maximus, to whoſe wife he had offered violence. The vices of Valentinian the third were conſpicuous; every paſſion he wiſhed to gratify at the expence of his honor, his health, and character; and as he lived without one ſingle act of benevolence or kindneſs, he died lamented by none, though pitied for his imprudence and vicious propenſities. He was the laſt of the family of Theodoſius.——A ſon of the emperor Gratian, who died when very young.

VALERIA, a ſiſter of Publicola, who adviſed the Roman matrons to go and deprecate the reſentment of Coriolanus. Plut. in Cor.——A daughter of Publicola, given as an hoſtage to Porſenna by the Romans. She fled from the enemy's country, and ſwam acroſs the Tiber.——A daughter of Meſſala, ſiſter to Hortenſius, who married Sylla.——The wife of the emperor Valentian.——The wife of the emperor Galerius, &c.——A road in Sicily, which led from Meſſana to Lilybæum.——A town of Spain. Plin. 3, c. 3.

VALERIA LEX, de provocatione, by P. Valerius Poplicola, the ſole conſul, A. U. C. 243. It permitted the appeal from a magiſtrate to the people, and forbad the magiſtrate to puniſh a citizen for making the appeal. It further made it a capital crime for a citizen to aſpire to the ſovereignty of Rome, or to exerciſe any office without the choice and approbation of the people. Val. Max. 4, c. 1.—Liv. 2, c. 8.—Dion. Hal. 4. ——Another, de debitoribus, by Valerius Flaccus. It required that all creditors ſhould diſcharge their debtors, on receiving a fourth part of the whole ſum.——Another by M. Valerius Corvinus, A. U. C. 453, which confirmed the firſt Valerian law, enacted by Poplicola.——Another, called alſo Horatia, by L. Valerius and M. Horatius the conſuls, A. U. C. 304. It revived the firſt Valerian law, which under the triumvirate had loſt its force.——Another, de magiſtratibus, by P. Valerius Poplicola, ſole conſul A. U. C. 243. It created two queſtors to take care of the public treaſure, which was for the future to be kept in the temple of Saturn. Plut. in Pop.—Liv. 2.

VALERIĀNUS, (Publius Licinius) a Roman, proclaimed emperor by the armies in Rhætia, A. D. 254. The virtues which ſhone in him when a private man, were loſt when he aſcended the throne. Formerly diſtinguiſhed for his temperance, moderation, and many virtues, which fixed the uninfluenced choice of all Rome upon him, Valerian inveſted with the purple diſplayed inability and meanneſs. He was cowardly in his operations, and though acquainted with war, and the patron of ſcience, he ſeldom acted with prudence, or favored men of true genius and merit. He took his ſon Gallienus as his colleague in the empire, and ſhowed the malevolence of his heart by perſecuting the Chriſtians whom he had for a while tolerated. He alſo made war againſt the Goths and Scythians; but in an expedition which he undertook againſt Sapor, king of Perſia, his arms were attended with ill ſucceſs. He was conquered in Meſopotamia, and when he wiſhed to have a private conference with Sapor, the conqueror ſeized his perſon, and carried him in triumph to his capital, where he expoſed him, and in all the cities of his empire, to the ridicule and inſolence of his ſubjects. When the Perſian monarch mounted on horſeback, Valerian ſerved as a footſtool, and the many other inſults which he ſuffered, excited indignation even among the courtiers of Sapor. The monarch at laſt ordered him to be flayed alive, and ſalt to be thrown over his mangled body, ſo that he died in the greateſt torments. His ſkin was tanned, and painted in red; and, that the ignominy of the Roman empire might be laſting, it was nailed in one of the temples of Perſia. Valerian died in the 71ſt year of his age, A. D. 260, after a reign of ſeven years. ——A grandſon of Valerian the emperor. He was put to death, when his father, the emperor Gallienus, was killed.——One of the generals of the uſurper Niger.——A worthy ſenator, put to death by Heliogabalus.

Valerius Publius, a celebrated Roman, ſurnamed Poplicola, for his popularity. He was very active in aſſiſting Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and he was the firſt that took an oath to ſupport the liberty and independence of his country. Though he had been refuſed the conſulſhip, and had retired with great diſſatisfaction from the direction of affairs, yet he regarded the public opinion, and when the jealouſy of the Romans inveighed againſt the towering appearance of his houſe, he acknowledged the reproof, and in making it lower, he ſhowed his wiſh to be on a level with his fellow-citizens, and not to erect what might be conſidered as a citadel for the oppreſſion of his country. He was afterwards honored with the conſulſhip, on the expulſion of Collatinus, and he triumphed over the Etrurians, after he had gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the ſons of Tarquin had fallen. Valerius died after he had been four times conſul, and enjoyed the popularity, and received the thanks and the gratitude, which a people redeemed from ſlavery and oppreſſion, uſually pay to their patrons and deliverers. He was ſo poor, that his body was buried at the public expence. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 3, c. 8, &c. ——Corvinus, a tribune of the ſoldiers under Camillus. When the Roman army were challenged by one of the Senones, remarkable for his ſtrength and ſtature, Valerius undertook to engage him, and obtained an eaſy victory, by means of a crow that aſſiſted him, and attacked the face of the Gaul, whence his ſirname of Corvinus. Valerius triumphed over the Etrurians, and the neighbouring ſtates that made war againſt Rome, and was ſix times honored with the conſulſhip. He died in the 100th year of his age, admired and regretted for many private and public virtues. Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Liv. 7, c. 27, &c.—Plut. in Mar.—Cic. in Cat. Antias, an hiſtorian often quoted, and particularly by Livy.——Flaccus, a conſul with Cato, whoſe friendſhip he honorably ſhared. He made war againſt the Inſubres and Boii, and killed 10,000 of the enemy.—— ——Marcus Corvinus Meſſala, a Roman, made conſul with Auguſtus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning as well as military virtues. He loſt his memory about two years before his death, and, according to ſome, he was even ignorant of his own name. Sueton. in Aug.—Cic. in Brut.——Soranus, a Latin poet, in the age of Julius Cæſar, put to death for betraying a ſecret. He acknowledged no god, but the ſoul of the univerſe.—— Maximus, a brother of Poplicola.——A Latin hiſtorian who carried arms under the ſons of Pompey. He dedicated his time to ſtudy, and wrote an account of all the moſt celebrated ſayings and actions of the Romans, and other illuſtrious perſons, which is ſtill extant, and divided into nine books. It is dedicated to Tiberius. Some have ſuppoſed that he lived after the age of Tiberius, from the want of purity and elegance, which ſo conſpicuouſly appear in his writings, unworthy of the correctneſs of the golden age of the Roman literature. The beſt editions of Valerius are thoſe of Torrenius, 4to. L. Bat. 1726, and of Vorſtius, 8vo. Berolin. 1672.——Marcus, a brother of Poplicola, who defeated the army of the Sabines in two battles. He was honored with a triumph, and the Romans, to ſhow their ſenſe of his great merit, built him a houſe on mount Palatine, at the public expence.——Potitus, a general who ſtirred up the people and army againſt the decemvirs, and Appius Claudius in particular. He was choſen conſul, and conquered the Volſci and Æqui.——Flaccus, a Roman, intimate with Cato the cenſor. He was conſul with him, and cut off an army of 10,000 Gauls in one battle. He was alſo choſen cenſor, and prince of the ſenate, &c. ——A Latin poet who floriſhed under Veſpaſian. He wrote a poem in eight books on the Argonautic expedition, but it remained unfiniſhed on account of his premature death. The Argonauts were there left on the ſea in their return home. Some critics have been laviſh in their praiſes upon Flaccus, and have called him the ſecond poet of Rome, after Virgil. His poetry, however, is deemed by ſome frigid and languiſhing, and his ſtile uncouth and inelegant. The beſt editions of Flaccus are thoſe of Burman, L. Bat. 1724, and 12mo. Utr. 1702.——Aſiaticus, a celebrated Roman, accuſed of having murdered one of the relations of the emperor Claudius. He was condemned by the intrigues of Meſſalina though innocent, and he opened his veins and bled to death. Tacit. Ann.——A friend of Vitellius.——Fabianus, a youth condemned under Nero, for counterfeiting the will of one of his friends, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 42.——Lævinus, a conſul, who fought againſt Pyrrhus during the Tarentine war. Vid. Lævinus.——Præconinus, a lieutenant of Cæſar's army in Gaul, ſlain in a ſkirmiſh.——Paulinus, a friend of Veſpaſian, &c.

VALERUS, a friend of Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 752.

VALGIUS RUFUS, a Roman poet in the Auguſtan age, celebrated for his writings. He was very intimate with Horace. Tibull. 3, el. 1, v. 180.—Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 82.

VANDALII, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. c. 3.

VANGIŎNES, a people of Germany. Their capital, Borbetomagus, is now called Worms. Lucan. 1, v. 431.—Cæſ. G. 1, c. 51.

VANNIA, a town of Italy, north of the Po, now called Civita.

VANNIUS, a king of the Suevi, baniſhed under Claudius, &c. Tacit. A. 12, c. 29.

VAPINEUM, a town of Gaul.

VARANES, a name common to ſome of the Perſian monarchs, in the age of the Roman emperors.

VARDÆI, a people of Dalmatia. Cic. fam. 5, ep. 9.

VARIA, a town of Latium.

VARIA LEX, de majeſtate, by the tribune L. Varius, A. U. C. 662. It ordained that all ſuch as had aſſiſted the confederates in their war againſt Rome, ſhould be publicly tried.——Another de civitate, by Q. Varius Hybrida. It puniſhed all ſuch as were ſuſpected of having aſſiſted or ſupported the people of Italy in their petition to become free citizens of Rome. Cic. pro Mil. 36, in Brut. 56, 88, &c.

VARĪNI, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Ger. 40.

VARISTI, a people of Germany.

VARIUS, a tragic poet, intimate with Horace and Virgil. He was one of thoſe whom Auguſtus appointed to reviſe Virgil's Æneid. Some fragments of his poetry are ſtill extant. Beſides tragedies, he wrote a panegyric on the emperor. Quintilian ſays, l. 10, that his Thyeſtes was equal to any compoſition of the Greek poets. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 40.——A man who raiſed his reputation by the power of his oratory. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 25.——One of the friends of Antony, ſurnamed Cotylon.——A man in the reign of Otho, puniſhed for his adulteries, &c.

VARRO, M. Terentius, a Roman conſul defeated at Cannæ, by Annibal. Vid. Terentius.——A Latin writer, celebrated for his great learning. He wrote no leſs than 500 different volumes which are all now loſt, except a treatiſe de re ruſticâ, and another de linguâ Latinâ, dedicated to the orator Cicero. He was Pompey's lieutenant in his piratical wars, and obtained a naval crown. In the civil wars he was taken by Cæſar, and proſcribed, but he eſcaped. He had been greatly commended by Cicero for his erudition, and St. Auguſtin ſays, that it cannot but be wondered how Varro, who read ſuch a number of books, could find time to compoſe ſo many volumes; and how he who compoſed ſo many volumes, could be at leiſure to peruſe ſuch a variety of books, and gain ſo much literary information. He died B. C. 28, in the 88th year of his age. The beſt edition of Varro is that of Dordrac, 8vo, 1619. Cic. in Acad. &c.—Quintil.——Attacinus, a native of Gaul, in the age of J. Cæſar. He tranſlated into Latin verſe the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, with great correctneſs and elegance. He alſo wrote a poem intitled de bello Sequanico, beſides epigrams and elegies. Some fragments of his poetry are ſtill extant. He failed in his attempt to write ſatire. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 46.—Ovid. Am. 1, v. 15.—Quint. 10, c. 1.

VARRŌNIS VILLA, now Vicovaro, was ſituate on the Anio, in the country of the Sabines. Cic. Phil. 2, ep. 41.

VARUS, (Quintilius) a Roman proconſul, deſcended from an illuſtrious family.

He was appointed governor of Syria and afterwards made commander of the armies in Germany. He was surprised by the enemy, under Arminius, a crafty and dissimulating chief, and his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that every thing was lost, he killed himself, A. D. 10, and his example was followed by some of his officers. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus at Rome, by one of the Barbarian chiefs, as also his body; and so great was the influence of this defeat upon the emperor, that he continued for whole months to show all the marks of dejection and of deep sorrow, often exclaiming, "O Varus, restore me my legions." The bodies of the slain were left in the field of battle, where they were found six years after by Germanicus, and buried with great pomp. Varus has been taxed with indolence and cowardice, and some have intimated, that if he had not trusted too much to the insinuations of the barbarian chiefs, he might have not only escaped ruin, but awed the Germans to their duty. His avarice was also conspicuous, he went poor to Syria, whence he returned loaded with riches. Horat. 1, Od. 24.—Paterc. 2, c. 117.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Virg. Ecl. 6.——A son of Varus, who married a daughter of Germanicus. Tacit. An. 4, c. 6.——The father and grandfather of Varus, who was killed in Germany, slew themselves with their own swords, the one after the battle of Philippi, and the other in the plains of Pharsalia.——Quintilius, a friend of Horace, and other great men in the Augustan age. He was a good judge of poetry, and a great critic, as Horace, Art. P. 438, seems to insinuate. The poet has addressed the 18th ode of his book to him, and in the 24th he mourns pathetically his death. Some suppose this Varus to be the person killed in Germany, while others believe him to be a man who devoted his time more to the muses than to war. ——Lucius, an epicurean philosopher, intimate with J. Cæsar. Some suppose that it was to him that Virgil inscribed his sixth eclogue. He is commended by Quintil. 6, c. 3, 78.——Alfrenus, a Roman, who though originally a shoe-maker, became consul, and distinguished himself by his abilities as an orator. He was buried at the public expence, an honor granted to few, and only to persons of merit. Horat. 1, Sat. 3.——Accius, one of the friends of Cato in Africa, &c.——A river which falls into the Mediterranean, to the west of Nice, after separating Liguria from Gallia Narbonensis. Lucan. 1, v. 404.

VASATES, a people of Gaul.

VASCŎNES, a people of Spain, on the Pyrenees. They were so reduced by a famine by Metellus, that they fed on human flesh. Plin. 3, c. 3.—Auson. 2, v. 100.—Juv. 15, v. 93.

VASIO, a town of Gaul in modern Provence. Cic. fam. 10, ep. 34.

VATICĀNUS, a hill at Rome, near the Tiber and the Janiculum, which produced wine of no great esteem. It was disregarded by the Romans on account of the unwholesomeness of the air, and the continual stench of the filth that was there, and of stagnated waters. Heliogabalus was the first who cleared it of all disagreeable nuisances. It is now admired for antient monuments and pillars, for a celebrated public library, and for the palace of the pope. Horat. 1, od. 20.

VĀTINIA LEX, de provinciis by the tribune P. Vatinius, A. U. C. 694. It appointed Cæsar governor of Gallia Cisalpina and Illyricum, for five years, without a decree of the senate, or the usual custom of casting lots. Some persons were also appointed to attend him as lieutenants without the interference of the senate. His army was to be paid out of the public treasury, and he was impowered to plant a Roman colony in the town of Novocomum in Gaul.——Another by P. Vatinius the tribune, A. U. C. 694, de repetundis, for the better management of the trial of those who were accused of extortion.

VATINIUS, an intimate friend of Cicero, once distinguished for his enmity to the orator. He hated the people of Rome for their great vices and corruption, whence excessive hatred became proverbial in the words Vatinianum odium. Catull. 14, v. 3. ——A shoe-maker, ridiculed for his great deformities, and the oddity of his character. He was one of Nero's favorites, and he surpassed the rest of the courtiers in flattery, and in the commission of every impious deed. Large cups, of no value, are called Vatiniana from him, because he used one which was both ill shaped and uncouth. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 34.—Juv.—Mart. 14, ep. 96.

VĂTIĒNUS, now Saterno, a river rising in the Alps and falling into the Po. Martial. 3, ep. 67.—Plin. 3, c. 16.

UBII, a people of Germany near the Rhine, transported across the river by Agrippa, who gave them the name of Agrippinenses, from his daughter Agrippina, who had been born in the country. Their chief town, Ubiorum oppidum, is now Cologne. Tacit. G. 28. An. 12, c. 27.—Plin. 4. c. 17.—Cæs. 4, c. 30.

UCĂLĔGON, a Trojan chief, praised for the soundness of his counsels and his

UCETIA, a town of Gaul.

UCUBIS, now Lucubi, a town of Spain. Hirtius.

UDINA, or VEDĬNUM, now Udino, a town of Italy.

VECTIS, the iſle of Wight, ſouth of Britain. Suet. Cl. 4.

VECTIUS, a rhetorician, &c. Juv. 7, v. 150.

VECTONES. Vid. Vettones.

VEDIUS POLLIO, a friend of Auguſtus, very cruel to his ſervants, &c. Vid. Pollio. ——Aquila, an officer at the battle of Bebriacum, &c. Tacit. H. 2, c. 44.

VEGETIUS, a Latin writer, who floriſhed B. C. 386. The beſt edition of his treatiſe de re militari, together with Modeſtus, is that of Paris, 4to. 1607.

VEGIA, an iſland on the coaſt of Dalmatia.

VEIA, a ſorcereſs, in the age of Horace, ep. 5, v. 29.

VEIANUS, a gladiator, in the age of Horace. 1, ep. 1, v. 4.

VEIENTES, the inhabitants of Veii. They were carried to Rome, where the tribe they compoſed was called Veientina. Vid. Veii.

VEIENTO, Fabr. a Roman, as arrogant as he was ſatirical. Nero baniſhed him for his libellous writings. Juv. 3, v. 185.

VEII, a powerful city of Etruria, at the diſtance of about 12 miles from Rome. It ſuſtained many long wars againſt the Romans, and was at laſt taken and deſtroyed by Camillus, after a ſiege of ten years. At the time of its deſtruction, Veii was larger and far more magnificent than the city of Rome. Its ſituation was ſo eligible, that the Romans, after the burning of the city by the Gauls, were long inclined to migrate there, and totally abandon their native home, and this would have been carried into execution if not oppoſed by the authority and eloquence of Camillus. Ovid. 2, Faſt. v. 195.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 44.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 143. —Liv. 5, c. 21, &c.

VEJŎVIS, or VEJUPĬTER, a deity of ill omen at Rome. He had a temple on the Capitoline hill. Some ſuppoſe that he was the ſame as Jupiter the infant, or in the cradle, becauſe he was repreſented without thunder, or a ſcepter, and had only by his ſide the goat Amalthæa, and the Cretan nymph who fed him when young. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 430.

VELABRUM, a marſhy piece of ground on the ſide of the Tiber, between the Aventine, Palatine, and Capitoline hills, which Auguſtus drained, and where he built houſes. The place was frequented as a market, where oil, cheeſe, and other commodities were expoſed to ſale. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 229.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 401.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 33.—Plaut. 3, c. 1, v. 29.

VELAUNI, a people of Gaul.

VELIA, a maritime town of Lucania, founded by a colony of Phoceans, about 600 years after the coming of Æneas into Italy. The port in its neighbourhood was called Velinus portus. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Cic. Phil. 10, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 366.——An eminence near the Roman forum, where Poplicola built himſelf a houſe. Liv. 2, c. 6.—Cic. 7, Att. 15.

VELICA, or VELLICA, a town of the Cantabri.

VELĪNA, a part of the city of Rome, adjoining mount Palatine. It was alſo one of the Roman tribes. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 52.—Cic. 4, ad Attic. ep. 15.

VELĪNUS, a lake in the country of the Sabines, formed by the ſtagnant waters of the Velinus, between ſome hills near Reate. The river Velinus riſes in the Appennines, and after it has formed the lake, it falls into the Nar, near Spoletium. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 517.

VELIOCASSI, a people of Gaul.

VELITERNA, or VELITRÆ, an antient town of Latium on the Appian road, 20 miles at the eaſt of Rome. The inhabitants were called Veliterni. It became a Roman colony. Liv. 8, c. 12, &c.—Sueton. in Aug.—Ital. 8, v. 378, &c.

VELLAUNODUNUM, a town of the Senones, now Beaune. Cæſ. 7, c. 11.

VELLEDA, a woman famous among the Germans, in the age of Veſpaſian, and worſhipped as a deity. Tacit. de Germ. 8.

VELLEIUS Paterculus, a Roman hiſtorian, deſcended from an equeſtrian family of Campania. He was at firſt a military tribune in the Roman armies, and for nine years ſerved under Tiberius in the various expeditions which he undertook in Gaul and Germany. Velleius wrote an epitome of the hiſtory of Greece, and of Rome, and of other nations of the moſt remote antiquity, but of this authentic compoſition there remain only fragments of the hiſtory of Greece and Rome from the conqueſt of Perſeus, by Paulus, to the 17th year of the reign of Tiberius, in two books. It is a judicious account of celebrated men, and illuſtrious cities, the hiſtorian is happy in his deſcriptions, his pictures are true, and his narrations narrations live'y and interreſting. The whole is candid and impartial, but only till the reign of the Cæſars, when the writer began to be influenced by the preſence of the emperor, or the power of his favorites. Paterculus is deſervedly cenſured for his invectives againſt Pompey, and his encomiums on the cruel Tiberius, and the unfortunate Sejanus. Some ſuppoſe that he was involved in the ruin of this diſappointed courtier, whom he had extolled as a pattern of virtue and morality. The beſt editions of Paterculus are thoſe of Ruhnkenius, 8vo. 2 vols. L. Bat. 1779; of Barbou, Paris, 12mo. 1777, and of Burman, 8vo. L. Bat. 1719.——Caius, the grandfather of the hiſtorian of that name, was one of the friends of Livia. He killed himſelf when old and unable to accompany Livia in her flight.

VELOCASSES, the people of Vexin, in Normandy. Cæſ. G. 2, c. 4.

VENĀFRUM, a town of Campania, abounding in olive trees. It became a Roman colony. It had been founded by Diomedes. Horat. 2, Od. 6. v. 16.—Martial. 13, ep. 98.—Juv. 5, v. 86.

VENEDI, a people of Germany, near the mouth of the Viſtula, or gulf of Dantzic. Tacit. de Germ. 46.—Plin. 4, c. 13.

VENELI, a people of Gallia Celtica.

VENĔTI, a people of Italy in Ciſalpine Gaul, near the mouths of the Po. They were deſcended from a nation of Paphlagonia, who ſettled there under Antenor, ſome time after the Trojan war. The Venetians, who have been long a powerful and commercial nation, were originally very poor, whence a writer in the age of the Roman emperors ſaid, that they had no other fence againſt the waves of the ſea than hurdles, no food but fiſh, no wealth beſides their fiſhing-boats, and no merchandize but ſalt. Strab. 4, &c.—Liv. 1, c. 1.—Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 2, c. 4.—Cæſ. bell. G. 3, c. 8.—Lucan. 4, v. 134.—Ital. 8, v. 605.——A nation of Gaul, at the ſouth of Armorica, on the weſtern coaſt, powerful by ſea. Their chief city is now called Vannes. Cæſ. 3, G. 8.

VENĔTIA, a part of Gaul, on the mouths of the Po. Vid. Veneti.

VENETUS PAULUS, a centurion who conſpired againſt Nero with Piſo, &c. Tacit. 15, Ann. c. 50.——A lake through which the Rhine paſſes, now Bodenſee, or Conſtance. Mela. 3, c. 2.

VĔNĪLIA, a nymph, ſiſter to Amata, and mother of Turnus, by Daunus. Amphitrite the ſea goddeſs is alſo called Venilia. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 76.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 334.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 10.

VENNONES, a people of the Rhætian Alps.

VENONIUS, an hiſtorian mentioned by Cic. ad Attic. 12, ep. 3, &c.

VENTA BELGARUM, a town of Britain, now Wincheſter.——Silurum, a town of Britain, now Caerwent, in Monmouthſhire. ——Icenorum, now Norwich.

VENTI. The antients, and eſpecially the Athenians, paid particular attention to the winds, and offered them ſacrifices as to deities, intent upon the deſtruction of mankind, by continually cauſing ſtorms, tempeſts, and earthquakes. The winds were repreſented in different attitudes and forms. The four principal winds were Eurus, the ſouth eaſt; who is repreſented as a young man flying with great impetuoſity, and often appearing in a playſome and wanton humor. Auſter, the ſouth wind, appeared generally as an old man with grey hair, a gloomy countenance, a head covered with clouds, a ſable veſture, and duſky wings. He is the diſpenſer of rain, and of all heavy ſhowers. Zephyrus is repreſented as the mildeſt of all the winds. He is young and gentle, and his lap is filled with vernal flowers. He married Flora the goddeſs, with whom he enjoyed the moſt perfect felicity. Boreas, or the north wind, appears always rough and ſhivering. He is the father of rain, ſnow, hail, and tempeſts, and is always repreſented ſurrounded with impenetrable clouds. Thoſe of inferior note were, Solanus, whoſe name is ſeldom mentioned. He appeared as a young man holding fruit in his lap, ſuch as peaches, oranges, &c. Africus, or ſouth-weſt, repreſented with black wings, and a melancholy countenance. Corus, or north-weſt, drives clouds of ſnow before him, and Aquilo, the north-eaſt, is equally dreadful in appearance. The winds, according to ſome mythologiſts, were confined in a large cave, of which Æolus had the management, and without this neceſſary precaution, they would have overturned the earth, and reduced every thing to its original chaos. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 57, &c.

VENTĬDIUS BASSUS, a native of Picenum, born of an obſcure family. When Aſculum was taken, he was carried before the triumphant chariot of Pompeius Strabo, hanging on his mother's breaſt. A bold, aſpiring ſoul, aided by the patronage of the family of Cæſar, raiſed him from the mean occupation of a chairman and muleteer to dignity in the ſtate. He diſplayed valor in the Roman armies, and gradually aroſe to the offices of tribune, prætor, high prieſt, and conſul. He made war againſt the Parthians, and conquered them in three great battles, B. C. 39. He was the firſt Roman ever honored with a triumph over Parthia, thia. He died greatly lamented by all the Roman people, and was buried at the public expence. Plut. in Anton.—Juv. 7, v. 199.——Cumanus a governor of Paleſtine, &c. Tacit. A. 13, c. 54.——Two brothers in the age of Pompey, who favored Carbo's intereſt, &c. Plut.

VENŬLEIUS, a writer in the age of the emperor Alexander.

VENŬLUS, one of the Latin elders ſent into Magna Græcia, to demand the aſſiſtance of Diomedes, &c. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 9.

VĔNUS, one of the moſt celebrated deities of the ancients. She was the goddeſs of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the miſtreſs of the graces and of pleaſures, and the patroneſs of courtezans. Some mythologiſts ſpeak of more than one Venus. Plato mentions two, Venus Urania, the daughter of Uranus, and Venus Popularia, the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. Cicero ſpeaks of four, a daughter of Cœlus and Light, one ſprung from the froth of the ſea, a third, daughter of Jupiter and the Nereid Dione, and a fourth born at Tyre, and the ſame as the Aſtarte of the Syrians. Of theſe however the Venus ſprung from the froth of the ſea, after the mutilated part of the body of Uranus had been thrown there by Saturn, is the moſt known, and of her in particular, ancient mythologiſts as well as painters, make mention. She aroſe from the ſea near the iſland of Cyprus, or according to Heſiod, of Cythera, whither ſhe was wafted by the zephyrs, and received on the ſea ſhore by the ſeaſons, daughters of Jupiter and Themis. She was ſoon after carried to heaven, where all the gods admired her beauty, and all the goddeſſes became jealous of her perſonal charms. Jupiter attempted to gain her affections and even wiſhed to offer her violence, but Venus refuſed, and the god, to puniſh her obſtinacy, gave her in marriage to his ugly and deformed ſon Vulcan. This marriage did not prevent the goddeſs of Love from gratifying her favorite paſſions, and ſhe defiled her huſband's bed, by her amours with the gods. Her intrigue with Mars is the moſt celebrated. She was caught in her lover's arms, and expoſed to the ridicule and laughter of all the gods. [Vid. Alectryon.] Venus became mother of Hermione, Cupid, and Anteros, by Mars; by Mercury, ſhe had Hermaphroditus; by Bacchus, Priapus; and by Neptune, Eryx. Her great partiality for Adonis, made her abandon the ſeats of Olympus, [Vid. Adonis] and her regard for Anchiſes, obliged her often to viſit the woods and ſolitary retreats of mount Ida. [Vid. Anchiſes. Æneas.] The power of Venus over the heart, was ſupported and aſſiſted by a celebrated girdle, called zone by the Greeks, and ceſtus by the Latins. This myſterious girdle gave beauty, grace, and elegance, when worn even by the moſt deformed; it excited love, and rekindled extinguiſhed flames. Juno herſelf was indebted to this powerful ornament, to gain the favors of Jupiter, and Venus, though herſelf poſſeſſed of every charm, no ſooner put on her ceſtus, than Vulcan, unable to reſiſt the influence of love, forgot all the intrigues and infidelities of his wife, and fabricated arms even for her illegitimate children. The conteſt of Venus for the golden apple of Diſcord is well known. She gained the prize over Pallas and Juno, [Vid. Paris, Diſcordia.] and rewarded her impartial judge with the hand of the faireſt woman in the world. The worſhip of Venus was univerſally eſtabliſhed; ſtatues and temples were erected to her in every kingdom, and the antients were fond of paying homage to a divinity who preſided over generation, and by whoſe influence alone, mankind exiſted. In her ſacrifices and in the feſtivals celebrated in her honor, too much licentiouſneſs prevailed, and public proſtitution was often part of the ceremony. Victims were ſeldom offered to her, or her altars ſtained with blood, though we find Aſpaſia making repeated ſacrifices. No pigs however, or male animals were deemed acceptable. The roſe, the myrtle, and the apple, were ſacred to Venus, and among birds the dove, the ſwan, and the ſparrow, were her favorites, and among fiſhes, thoſe called the aphya and the lycoſtomus. The goddeſs of beauty was repreſented among the antients in different forms. At Elis ſhe appeared ſeated on a goat, with one foot reſting on a tortoiſe. At Sparta and Cythera, ſhe was repreſented armed like Minerva, and ſometimes wearing chains on her feet. In the temple of Jupiter Olympius, ſhe was repreſented by Phidias, as riſing from the ſea, received by love, and crowned by the goddeſs of perſuaſion. At Cnidos her ſtatue made by Praxiteles, repreſented her naked, with one hand hiding what modeſty keeps concealed. Her ſtatue at Elephantis was the ſame, with only a naked Cupid by her ſide. In Sicyon ſhe held a poppy in one hand, and in the other an apple, while on her head ſhe had a crown, which terminated in a point, to intimate the pole. She is generally repreſented with her ſon Cupid, on a chariot drawn by doves doves, or at other times by ſwans or ſparrows. The ſirnames of the goddeſs are numerous, and only ſerve to ſhow how well eſtabliſhed her worſhip was all over the earth. She was called Cypria, becauſe particularly worſhipped in the iſland of Cyprus, and in that character ſhe was often repreſented with a beard, and the male parts of generation, with a ſceptre in her hand, and the body and dreſs of a female, whence ſhe is called duplex Amathuſia by Catullus. She received the name of Paphia, becauſe worſhipped at Paphos, where ſhe had a temple with an altar, on which rain never fell, though expoſed in the open air. Some of the antients called her Apoſtrophia or Epiſtrophia, as alſo Venus Urania, and Venus Pandemos. The firſt of theſe ſhe received as preſiding over wantonneſs and inceſtuous enjoyments; the ſecond becauſe ſhe patronized pure love, and chaſte and moderate gratifications; and the third becauſe ſhe favored the propenſities of the vulgar, and was fond of ſenſual pleaſures. The Cnidians raiſed her temples under the name of Venus Aereæa, of Doris, and of Euploea. In her temple under the name of Euploea, at Cnidos, was the moſt celebrated of her ſtatues, being the moſt perfect piece of Praxiteles. It was made with white marble, and appeared ſo engaging, and ſo much like life, that according to ſome hiſtorians, a youth of the place introd ced himſelf in the night into her temple, and attempted to gratify his paſſions on the lifeleſs image. Venus was alſo ſirnamed Cytheræa, becauſe ſhe was the chief deity of Cythera; Exopolis, becauſe her ſtatue was without the city at Athens; Philomeda, from her affection for the phallus; Philommeis, becauſe the queen of laughter; Teleſſigama, becauſe ſhe preſided over marriage; Coliada, Colotis, or Colias, becauſe, worſhipped on a promontory of the ſame name in Attica; Area, becauſe armed like Mars; Verticordia, becauſe ſhe could turn the hearts of women to cultivate chaſtity; Apaturia, becauſe ſhe deceived; Calva, becauſe ſhe was repreſented bald; Erycyna, becauſe worſhipped at Eryx; Etaira, becauſe the patroneſs of courtezans; Acidalia, becauſe of a fountain of Orchomenos; Baſilea, becauſe the queen of love; Myrtea, becauſe the myrtle was ſacred to her; Libertina, from her inclinations to gratify luſt; Mechanitis, in alluſion to the many artifices practiſed in love, &c. &c. As goddeſs of the ſea, becauſe, born in the boſom of the waters, Venus was called Pontia, Marina, Limneſia, Epipontia, Pelagia, Saligenia, Pontogenia, Aligena, Thalaſſia, &c. and as riſing from the ſea, the name of Anadyomene is applied to her, and rendered immortal by the celebrated painting of Apelles, which repreſented her as iſſuing from the boſom of the waves, and wringing her treſſes on her ſhoulder. Vid. Anadyomene. *Cic. de Nat. VENUS PYRENÆA, a town of Spain, near the borders of Gaul.

VENŬSIA, or VENŬSIUM, a town of Apulia, where Horace was born. Part of the Roman army fled thither after the defeat at Cannæ. The town, tho' in ruins, contains ſtill many pieces of antiquity, eſpecially a marble buſt preſerved in the great ſquare, and ſaid falſely to be an original repreſentation of Horace. Venuſia was on the confines of Lucania, whence the poet ſaid Lucanus an Apulus anceps. Strab. 5 & 6.—Horat. 2, Sat. 1, v. 35.—Liv. 22, c. 54.

VERAGRI, a people between the Alps and the Allobroges. Liv. 21, c. 38.—Cæſ. G. 3, c. 1.

VERANIA, the wife of Piſo Licinianus, whom Galba adopted.

VERANIUS, a governor of Britain under Nero. He ſucceeded Didius Gallus. Tacit. 14. Ann.

VERBANUS LACUS, now Majera, a lake of Italy, from which the Ticinus flows. It is in the modern duchy of Milan, and extends 50 miles in length from ſouth to north, and 5 or 6 in breadth. Strab. 4.

VERBIGENUS, a village in the country of the Celtæ.

VERBINUM, a town at the north of Gaul.

VERCELLÆ, a town on the borders of Inſubria, where Marius defeated the Cimbri. Plin. 3, c. 17.—Cic. fam. 11, ep. 19.—Sil. 8, v. 598.

VERGILIA, the wife of Coriolanus, &c.

VERGILIA, a town of Spain supposed to be Murcia.

VERGILIÆ, seven stars called also Pleiades. When they set, the antients began to sow their corn. They received their name from the spring quia vere oriantur. Propert. 1, el. 8, v. 18.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 44.

VERGINIUS, one of the officers of the Roman troops in Germany, who refused the absolute power which his soldiers offered to him. Tacit. 1, Hist. c. 8.——A rhetorician in the age of Nero, banished on account of his great fame. Id. An. 15, c. 71.

VERGIUM, a town of Spain.

VERGOBRETUS, one of the chiefs of the Ædui, in the age of Cæsar, &c. Cæs. G. 1, c. 16.

VERĬTAS, (truth,) was not only personified by the antients, but also made a deity, and called the daughter of Saturn and Virtue. She was represented like a young virgin, dressed in white apparel, with all the marks of youthful diffidence and modesty. Democritus used to say, that she hid herself at the bottom of a well, to intimate the difficulty with which she is found.

VERODOCTIUS, one of the Helvetii. Cæs. G. 1, c. 7.

VEROMANDUI, a people of Gaul, the modern Vermandois. The capital is now St. Quintin. Cæs. G. B. 2.

VĔRŌNA, a town of Venetia, on the Athesis, in Italy, founded, as some suppose, by Brennus, the leader of the Gauls. C. Nepos, Catullus, and Pliny the elder, were born there. It was adorned with a circus and an amphitheatre by the Roman emperors, and still preserves its ancient name. Plin. 9, c. 22.—Strab. 5.—Ovid. am. 3, el. 15, v. 7.

VERŌNES, a people of Hispania Tarraconensis. Sil. 3, v. 578.

VERREGĪNUM, a town in the country of the Volsci. Liv. 4, c. 1, &c.—Val. Max. 6, c. 5.

C. VERRES, a Roman who governed the province of Sicily as pretor. The oppression and rapine of which he was guilty while in office, so offended the Sicilians, that they brought an accusation against him before the Roman senate. Cicero undertook the cause of the Sicilians, and pronounced those celebrated orations which are still extant. Verres was defended by Hortensius, but as he despaired of the success of his defence, he left Rome without waiting for his sentence, and lived in great affluence in one of the provinces. He was at last killed by the soldiers of Antony the triumvir, about 26 years after his voluntary exile from the capital. Cic. in Ver.—Plin. 34, c. 2.

VERRITUS, a general of the Frisii in the age of Nero, &c. Tacit. ann 13, c. 54.

VERRIUS FLACCUS, a freedman and grammarian famous for his powers in instructing. He was appointed over the grand-children of Augustus, and also distinguished himself by his writings. Gell. 4, c. 5.—Suet. de Gram.

VERRIUS FLACCUS, a Latin critic, B. C. 4. whose works have been edited with Dacier's and Clerk's notes, 4to, Amst. 1699.

VERRŪGO, a town in the country of the Volsci. Liv. 4, c. 1.

VERTICO, one of the Nervii, who deserted to Cæsar's army, &c. Cæs. B. G. 5, c. 45.

VERTICORDIA, one of the surnames of Venus, the same as the Apostrophia of the Greeks, because her assistance was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman matrons, and teach them to follow virtue and modesty. Val. Max. 8.

VERTISCUS, one of the Rhemi, who commanded a troop of horse in Cæsar's army. Cæs. B. G. 8, c. 12.

VERTUMNUS, a deity among the Romans, who presided over the spring and over orchards. He endeavoured to gain the affections of the goddess Pomona; and to effect this, he assumed the shape and dress of a fisherman, of a soldier, a peasant, a reaper, &c. but all to no purpose, till under the form of an old woman, he prevailed upon his mistress and married her. He is generally represented as a young man crowned with flowers, covered up to the waist, and holding in his right hand fruit, and a crown of plenty in his left. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 642, &c.—Propert. 4, el. 2, v. 2.—Horat. 2, Sat. 7, v. 14.

VERULÆ, a town of the Hernici. Liv. 9, c. 42.

VERULĀNUS,

VERULĀNUS, a lieutenant under Corbulo, who drove away Tiridates from Media, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 26.

VERUS, (Lucius Ceionius Commodus,) a Roman emperor, ſon of Ælius and Domitia Lucilla. He was adopted in the 7th year of his age by M. Aurelius, at the requeſt of Adrian, and he married Lucilia the daughter of his adopted father, who alſo took him as his colleague on the throne. He was ſent by M. Aurelius to oppoſe the barbarians in the eaſt. His arms were attended with ſucceſs, and he obtained a victory over the Parthians. He was honored with a triumph at his return home, and ſoon after he marched with his imperial colleague againſt the Marcomanni in Germany. He died in this expedition of an apoplexy, in the 39th year of his age, after a reign of eight years, and ſome months. His body was brought back to Rome, and buried by M. Aurelius with great pomp and ſolemnity. Verus has been greatly cenſured for his debaucheries, which appeared more enormous and diſguſting, when compared to the temperance, meekneſs, and popularity of Aurelius. The example of his father did not influence him, and he often retired from the frugal and moderate repaſt of Aurelius, to the profuſe banquets of his own palace, where the night was ſpent in riot and debauchery, with the meaneſt of the populace, with ſtage dancers, buffoons, and laſcivious courtezans. At one entertainment alone, where there were no more than 12 gueſts, the emperor ſpent no leſs than ſix millions of ſeſterces, or about 32,200 l. ſterling. But it is to be obſerved, that whatever was moſt ſcarce and coſtly was there; the gueſts never drank twice out of the ſame cup; and whatever veſſels they had touched, they received as a preſent from the emperor when they left the palace. In his Parthian expedition, Verus did not check his vicious propenſities, for four years he left the care of the war to his officers, while he retired to the voluptuous retreats of Daphne, and the luxurious banquets of Antioch. His fondneſs for a horſe has been faithfully recorded. The animal had a ſtatue of gold, he was fed with almonds and raiſins by the hand of the emperor, he was clad in purple, and kept in the moſt ſplendid of the halls of the palace, and when dead, the emperor, to expreſs his ſorrow, raiſed him a magnificent monument on mount Vatican. Some have ſuſpected M. Aurelius of diſpatching Verus to rid the world of his debaucheries, and guilty actions, but this ſeems to be the report of malevolence.——L. Annæus, a ſon of the emperor Aurelius, who died in Paleſtine.——The father of the emperor Verus. He was adopted by the emperor Adrian, but like his ſon he diſgraced himſelf by his debaucheries and extravagance. He died before Adrian.

VESBIUS, or VESUBIUS. Vid. Veſuvius.

VESCIA, a town of Campania. Liv. 8, c. 11.

VESONNA, a town of Gaul, now Perigueux.

VESPACIÆ, a ſmall village of Umbria near Nurſia. Suet. Veſp. 1.

VESPASIĀNUS, Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor deſcended from an obſcure family at Reate. He was honored with the conſulſhip, not ſo much by the influence of the imperial courtiers, as by his own private merit and his public ſervices. He accompanied Nero into Greece, but he offended the prince by falling aſleep while he repeated one of his poetical compoſitions. This momentary reſentment of the emperor did not prevent Veſpaſian from being ſent to carry on a war againſt the Jews. His operations were crowned with ſucceſs; many of the cities of Paleſtine ſurrendered, and Veſpaſian began the ſiege of Jeruſalem. This was, however, atchieved by the hands of his ſon Titus, and the death of Vitellius and the affection of his ſoldiers, haſtened his riſe, and he was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria. The choice of the army was approved by every province of the empire; but Veſpaſian did not betray any ſigns of pride at ſo ſudden and ſo unexpected an exaltation, and though once employed in the mean office of a horſe doctor, he behaved, when inveſted with the imperial purple, with all the dignity and greatneſs which became a ſucceſſor of Auguſtus. In the beginning of his reign Veſpaſian attempted to reform the manners of the Romans, and he took away an appointment which he had a few days before granted to a young nobleman who approached him to return him thanks, all ſmelling of perfumes and covered with ointment, adding, I had rather you had

ſmelt of garlick. He repaired the public buildings, embelliſhed the city, and made the great roads more ſpacious and convenient. After he had reigned with great popularity for 10 years, Veſpaſian died with a pain in his bowels, A. D. 79, in the 70th year of his age. He was the firſt Roman emperor that died a natural death, and he was alſo the firſt who was ſucceeded by his own ſon on the throne. Veſpaſian has been admired for his great virtues. He was clement, he gave no ear to flattery, and for a long time refuſed the title of father of his country, which was often beſtowed upon the moſt worthleſs and tyrannical of the emperors. He deſpiſed informers, and rather than puniſh conſpirators, he rewarded them with great liberality. When the king of Parthia addreſſed him with the ſuperſcription of Arſaces king of kings to Flavius Veſpaſianus, the emperor was no way diſſatisfied with the pride and inſolence of the monarch, and anſwered him again in his own words; Flavius Veſpaſianus to Arſaces king of kings. To men of learning and merit, Veſpaſian was very liberal: one hundred thouſand ſeſterces were annually paid from the public treaſury to the different profeſſors that were appointed to encourage and promote the arts and ſciences. Yet in ſpite of this apparent generoſity ſome authors have taxed Veſpaſian with avarice. According to their accounts he loaded the provinces with new taxes, he bought commodities, that he might ſell them to a greater advantage, and even laid an impoſt upon urine, which gave occaſion to Titus to ridicule the meanneſs of his father. Veſpaſian, regardleſs of his ſon's obſervation, was ſatisfied to ſhew him the money that was raiſed from ſo productive a tax, aſking him at the ſame time whether it ſmelt offenſive? His miniſters were the moſt avaricious of his ſubjects, and the emperor uſed very properly to remark that he treated them as ſponges, by wetting them when dry, and ſqueezing them when they were wet. He has been accuſed of ſelling criminals their lives, and of condemning the moſt opulent to make himſelf maſter of their poſſeſſions. If, however, he was guilty of theſe meaner practices, they were all under the name of one of his concubines, who wiſhed to enrich herſelf by the avarice and credulity of the emperor. Sueton. in vitâ.—Tacit. hiſt. 4.

VESSA, a town of Sicily.

VESTA, a goddeſs, daughter of Rhea and Saturn, ſiſter to Ceres and Juno. She is often confounded by the mythologiſts with Rhea, Ceres, Cybele, Proſerpine, Hecate, and Tellus. When conſidered as the mother of the gods, ſhe is the mother of Rhea and Saturn; and when conſidered as the patroneſs of the veſtal virgins and the goddeſs of fire, ſhe is called the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Under this laſt name ſhe was worſhipped by the Romans. Æneas was the firſt who introduced her myſteries into Italy, and Numa built her a temple where no males were permitted to go. The Palladium of Troy was ſuppoſed to be preſerved within her ſanctuary, and a fire was continually kept lighted by a certain number of virgins, who had dedicated themſelves to the ſervice of the goddeſs. (Vid. Veſtales.) If the fire of Veſta was ever extinguiſhed, it was ſuppoſed to threaten the republic with ſome ſudden calamity. The virgin by whoſe negligence it had been extinguiſhed was ſeverely puniſhed, and it was kindled again by the rays of the ſun. The temple of Veſta was of a round form, and the goddeſs was repreſented in a long flowing robe with a veil on her head, holding in one hand a lamp, or a two-eared veſſel, and in the other a javelin, or ſometimes a Palladium. On ſome medals ſhe appears holding a drum in one hand, and a ſmall figure of victory in the other. Heſiod. Theog. v. 454.—Cic. de leg. 2, c. 12. Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 296.—Diod. 5.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, Triſt. 3.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Plut. in Num.—Pauſ. 5, c. 14.

VESTĀLES, prieſteſſes among the Romans, conſecrated to the ſervice of Veſta, as their name indicates. This office was very antient, as the mother of Romulus was one of the veſtals. Æneas is ſuppoſed to have firſt choſen the veſtals. Numa firſt appointed four, to which Tarquin added two. They were always choſen by the monarchs, but after the expulſion of the Tarquins, the high prieſt was entruſted with the care of them. As they were to be virgins, they were choſen young, from the age of ſix to ten; and if there was not a ſufficient number that preſented themſelves as candidates for the office, twenty virgins were ſelected, and they upon whom the lot fell were obliged to become prieſteſſes. Plebeians as well as patricians were permitted to propoſe themſelves, but it was required that they ſhould be born of a good family, and be without blemiſh or deformity in every part of their body. For thirty years they were to remain in the greateſt continence; the ten firſt years were ſpent in learning the duties of the order, the ten following were employed in diſcharging them with fidelity and ſanctity, and the ten laſt in inſtructing ſuch as had entered the noviciate. When the thirty years years were elapſed they were permitted to marry, or if they ſtill preferred celibacy; they waited upon the reſt of the veſtals. As ſoon as a veſtal was initiated, her head was ſhaved, to intimate the liberty of her perſon, as ſhe was then free from the ſhackles of parental authority, and ſhe was permitted to diſpoſe of her poſſeſſions as ſhe pleaſed. The employment of the veſtals was to take care that the ſacred fire of Veſta was not extinguiſhed, for if it ever happened, it was deemed the prognoſtic of great calamities to the ſtate; the offender was puniſhed for her negligence, and ſeverely ſcourged by the high prieſt. In ſuch a caſe all was conſternation at Rome, and the fire was again kindled by glaſſes with the rays of the ſun. Another equally particular charge of the veſtals was to keep a ſacred pledge, on which depended the very exiſtence of Rome, which according to ſome, was the Palladium of Troy, or ſome of the myſteries of the gods of Samothrace. The privileges of the veſtals were great, they had the moſt honorable ſeats at public games and feſtivals, a lictor with the faſces always preceded them when they walked in public, they were carried in chariots when they pleaſed, and they had the power of pardoning criminals when led to execution, if they declared that their meeting was accidental. Their declarations in trials were received without the formality of an oath, they were choſen as arbiters in cauſes of moment, and in the execution of wills, and ſo great was the deference paid them by the magiſtrates, as well as by the people, that the conſuls themſelves made way for them, and bowed their faſces when they paſſed before them. To inſult them was a capital crime, and whoever attempted to violate their chaſtity was beaten to death with ſcourges. If any of them died while in office, their body was buried within the walls of the city, an honor granted to few. Such of the veſtals as proved incontinent were puniſhed in the moſt rigorous manner. Numa ordered them to be ſtoned, but Tarquin the elder dug a large hole under the earth, where a bed was placed with a little bread, wine, water, and oil, and a lighted lamp, and the guilty veſtal was ſtripped of the habit of her order, and compelled to deſcend into the ſubterraneous cavity, which was immediately ſhut, and ſhe was left to die through hunger. Few of the veſtals were guilty of incontinence, and for the ſpace of one thouſand years, during which the order continued eſtabliſhed, from the reign of Numa, only 18 were puniſhed for the violation of their vow. The veſtals were aboliſhed by Theodoſius the Great, and the fire of Veſta extinguiſhed. The dreſs of the Veſtals was peculiar; they wore a white veſt with purple borders, a white linen ſurplice called linteum ſupernum, above which was a great purple mantle which flowed to the ground, and which was tucked up when they offered ſacrifices. They had a cloſe covering on their head, called infula, from which hung ribbands, or vittæ. Their manner of living was ſumptuous, as they were maintained at the public expence, and though originally ſatisfied with the ſimple diet of the Romans, their tables ſoon after diſplayed the luxuries and the ſuperfluities of the great and opulent. Liv. 2, &c.—Plut. in Num. &c.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 30.—Flor. 1, &c.

VESTĀLIA, feſtivals in honor of Veſta, obſerved at Rome on the 9th of June. Banquets were then prepared before the houſes, and meat was ſent to the veſtals to be offered to the gods, millſtones were decked with garlands, and the aſſes that turned them were led round the city covered with garlands. The ladies walked in the proceſſion, bare-footed, to the temple of the goddeſs, and an altar was erected to Jupiter ſirnamed Piſtor. Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 305.

VESŬVIUS, a mountain of Campania, about ſix miles at the eaſt of Naples, celebrated lebrated for its volcano, and now called Mount Soma. The antients, particularly the writers of the Auguſtan age, ſpoke of Veſuvius, as a place covered with orchards and vineyards, of which the middle was dry and barren. The firſt eruption of this volcano was in the 79th year of the Chriſtian era under Titus. It was accompanied by an earthquake, which overturned ſeveral cities of Campania, particularly Pompeii and Herculaneum, and the burning aſhes which it threw up, were carried not only over the neighbouring country, but as far as the ſhores of Egypt, Libya, and Syria. This eruption proved fatal to Pliny the naturaliſt. From that time the eruptions have been frequent, and there now exiſts an account of twenty-nine of theſe. Veſuvius continually throws up a ſmoke, and ſometimes aſhes and flames. The perpendicular height of this mountain is 3780 feet. *Dio. VICTOR SEXT. AURELIUS, a writer in the age of Conſtantius. He gave the world a conciſe hiſtory of the Roman emperors, from the age of Auguſtus to his own time, or A. D. 360. He alſo wrote an abridgement of the Roman hiſtory, before the age of Julius Cæſar, which is now extant, and aſcribed by different authors to C. Nepos, to Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, &c. Victor was greatly eſteemed by the emperors, and honored with the conſulſhip. The beſt edition of Victor is that of Pitiſcus, 8vo. Utr. 1696; and that of Artnzenius, 4to. Amſt. 1733.

VICTŌRIA, one of the deities of the Romans, called by the Greeks Nice, ſuppoſed to be daughter of Titan and Styx. The goddeſs of victory was ſiſter to Strength and Valor, and was one of the attendants of Jupiter. She was greatly honored by the Greeks, particularly at Athens. Sylla raiſed her a temple at Rome, and inſtituted feſtivals in her honor. She was repreſented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm-tree in her hand. A golden ſtatue of this goddeſs, weighing 320 pounds, was preſented to the Romans by Hiero king of Syracuſe, and depoſited in the temple of Jupiter, on the Capitoline hill. Liv. 22. —*Varro de L. VIPSANIA, a daughter of M. Agrippa, mother of Druſus. She was the only one of Agrippa's daughters who died a natural death. She was married to Tiberius when a private man, and when ſhe had been repudiated, ſhe married Aſinius Gallus. Tacit. A. 1, c. 12. l. 3, c. 19.

VIRBIUS, (qui inter viros bis fuit) a name given to Hippolytus, after he had been brought back to life by Æſculapius, at the inſtance of Diana, who pitied his unfortunate end. Virgil makes him ſon of Hippolytus, Æn. 7, v. 762.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 544.

PUBL. VIRGĬLIUS MARO, called the prince of the Latin poets, was born at Andes, a village near Mantua, about 70 years before Chriſt, on the 15th of October. His firſt years were ſpent at Cremona, where his taſte was formed, and his riſing talents firſt exerciſed. The diſtribution of the lands of Cremona to the ſoldiers of Auguſtus, after the battle of Philippi, nearly proved fatal to the poet, and when he attempted to diſpute the poſſeſſion of his fields with a ſoldier, Virgil was obliged to ſave his life from the reſentment of the lawleſs veteran, by ſwimming acroſs a river. This was perhaps the beginning of his greatneſs, he repaired to Rome, where he ſoon formed an acquaintance with Mecænas, and recommended himſelf to the favors of Auguſtus. The emperor reſtored his lands to the poet, whoſe modeſt muſe knew ſo well how to pay the tribute of gratitude, and his firſt bucolic was written to thank the patron, as well as to tell the world that his favors were not unworthily beſtowed. The ten bucolics were written in about three years. The poet ſhewed his countrymen that he could write with graceful ſimplicity, with elegance, delicacy of ſentiments, and with purity of language. Some time after, Virgil undertook the Georgics, a poem the moſt perfect and finiſhed of all Latin compositions. The Æneid was begun, as some suppose, at the particular request of Augustus, and the poet, while he attempted to prove that the Julian family was lineally descended from the founder of Lavinium, visibly described in the pious and benevolent character of his hero, the amiable qualities of his imperial patron. The great merit of this poet is well known, and it will ever remain undecided, which of the two poets, either Homer or Virgil, is more entitled to our praise, our applause, and our admiration. The writer of the Iliad stood as a pattern to the favorite of Augustus. The voyage of Æneas is copied from the Odyssey, and for his battles, Virgil found a model in the wars of Troy, and the animated descriptions of the Iliad. The poet died before he had revised this immortal work, which had already engaged his time for 11 successive years. He had attempted to attend his patron in the east, but he was detained at Naples on account of his ill health. He however went to Athens, where he met Augustus in his return, but he soon after fell sick at Megara, and though indisposed, he ordered himself to be removed to Italy. He landed at Brundusium, where a few days after he expired, the 22d of September, in the 51st year of his age, B. C. 19. He left the greatest part of his immense possessions to his friends, particularly to Mecænas, Tucca, and Augustus, and he ordered as his last will his unfinished poem to be burnt. These last injunctions were disobeyed, and according to the words of an ancient poet, Augustus saved his favorite Troy from a second and more dismal conflagration. The poem was delivered by the emperor to three of his literary friends. They were ordered to revise and to expunge whatever they deemed improper; but they were strictly enjoined not to make any additions, and hence, as some suppose, the causes that so many lines of the Æneid are unfinished, particularly in the last books. The body of the poet, according to his own directions, was conveyed to Naples, and interred with much solemnity in a monument erected on the road that leads from Naples to Puteoli. The following modest distich was engraved on the tomb, written by the poet some few moments before he expired:

Parthenope: cecini pascua, rura, duces.

The Romans were not insensible of the merit of their poet. Virgil received much applause in the capital, and when he entered the theatre, he was astonished and delighted to see the crouded audience rise up to him as an emperor, and welcome his approach, by reiterated plaudits. He was naturally modest, and of a timorous disposition. When people crouded to gaze upon him, or pointed at him with the finger with raptures, the poet blushed and stole away from them, and often hid himself in shops to be removed from the curiosity and the admiration of the public. The most liberal and gratifying marks of approbation he received were from the emperor and from Octavia. He attempted in his Æneid to paint the virtues, and to lament the premature death of the son of Octavia, and he was desired by the emperor to repeat the lines in the presence of the afflicted mother. He had no sooner begun O nate, &c. than Octavia burst into tears; he continued, but he had artfully suppressed the name of her son, and when he repeated in the 16th line, the well known words Tu Marcellus eris, the princess swooned away, and the poet withdrew, but not without being liberally rewarded. Octavia presented him ten sesterces for every one of his verses in praise of her son, the whole of which was equivalent to 2000l. English money. As an instance of his modesty, the following circumstance has been recorded. Virgil wrote this distich, in which he compared his patron to Jupiter,

Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet, and placed it in the night on the gates of the palace of Augustus. Enquiries were made for the author by order of Augustus, and when Virgil had the diffidence not to declare himself, Bathyllus, a contemptible poet of the age, claimed the verses as his own, and was liberally rewarded. This displeased Virgil; he again wrote the verses near the palace, and under them with the beginning of another line in these words

Hos ego versiculos feci, tulit alter honores;

Sic vos non vobis,

four times repeated. Augustus wished the lines to be finished, Bathyllus seemed unable, and Virgil at last, by completing the stanza in the following order—

Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves;
Sic vos non vobis vellera fertis oves;
Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes;
Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves.

proved himself to be the author of the distich, and the poetical usurper became the sport and ridicule of Rome. In the works of Virgil we can find a more perfect and satisfactory account of the religious ceremonies monies and cuſtoms of the Romans, than in all the other Latin poets, Ovid excepted. Every thing he mentions is founded upon hiſtorical truth, and though he borrowed much from his predeceſſors, and even whole lines from Ennius, yet he has had the happineſs to make it all his own. He was uncommonly ſevere in reviſing his own poetry, and he uſed often to compare himſelf to a bear that licks her cubs into ſhape. In his connections, Virgil was remarkable, his friends enjoyed his unbounded confidence, and his library and poſſeſſions ſeemed to be the property of the public. Like other great men he was not without his enemies and detractors in his life time, but from their aſperſions he received additional luſtre. Among the very numerous and excellent editions of Virgil, theſe few may be collected as the beſt; that of Maſvicius, 2 vols. 4to. Leovardiæ, 1717; of Baſkerville, 4to. Birmingham, 1757; of the Variorum, in 8vo. L. Bat. 1661; of Heyne, 4 vols. 8vo. Fratr.*

VIRGĬNIA, a daughter of the centurion L. Virginius. Appius Claudius, the decemvir, became enamoured of her, and attempted to remove her from the place where ſhe reſided. She was claimed by one of his favorites as the daughter of a ſlave, and Appius, in the capacity, and with the authority of judge, had pronounced the ſentence, and delivered her into the hands of his friend, when Virginius, informed of his violent proceedings, arrived from the camp. The father demanded to ſee his daughter, and when this requeſt was granted, he ſnatched a knife and plunged it in Virginia's breaſt, exclaiming, This is all, my deareſt daughter, I can give thee, to preſerve thy chaſtity from the luſt and violence of a tyrant. No ſooner was the blow given, than Virginius ran to the camp with the bloody knife in his hand. The ſoldiers were aſtoniſhed and incenſed, not againſt the murderer, but the tyrant that was the cauſe of Virginia's death, and they immediately marched to Rome. Appius was ſeized, but he deſtroyed himſelf in priſon, and prevented the execution of the law. Spurius Oppius, another of the decemvirs who had not oppoſed the tyrant's views, killed himſelf alſo, and Marcus Claudius, the favorite of Appius, was put to death, and the decemviral power aboliſhed, about 449 years before Chriſt. Liv. 3, c. 44, &c.

VIRGINIUS, the father of Virginia, made tribune of the people. Vid. Virginia. ——A tribune of the people who accuſed Q. Cæſo the ſon of Cincinnatus. He increaſed the number of the tribunes to ten, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſeditions againſt the patricians.——Another tribune in the age of Camillus, fined for his oppoſition to a law which propoſed going to Veii.—— An augur who died of the plague.—— Caius, a pretor of Sicily, who oppoſed the entrance of Cicero into his province, though under many obligations to the orator. Some read Virgilius.——A tribune who encouraged Cinna to criminate Sylla.——One of the generals of Nero in Germany. He made war againſt Vindex and conquered him. VIRIĀTHUS, a mean ſhepherd of Luſitania, who gradually roſe to power, and by firſt heading a gang of robbers, ſaw himſelf at laſt followed by a numerous army. He made war againſt the Romans with uncommon ſucceſs, and for 14 years enjoyed the envied title of protector of public liberty in the provinces of Spain. Many generals were defeated, and Pompey himſelf was aſhamed to find himſelf beaten. Cæpio was at laſt ſent againſt him, but his deſpair of conquering him by force of arms, obliged him to have recourſe to artifice, and he had the meanneſs to bribe the ſervants of Viriathus to murder their maſter, B. C. 40. Flor. 2, c. 17.—Val. Max. 6, c. 4.

VIRIDOMARUS, a young man of great power among the Ædui. Cæſar greatly honored him, but he fought at laſt againſt the Romans. Cæſ. bell. G. 7, c. 39, &c.

VIRIPLACA, a goddeſs among the Romans who preſided over the peace of families, whence her name, (virum placare). If any quarrel happened between a man and his wife, they generally repaired to the temple of the goddeſs, and came back reconciled. Val. Max. 2, c. 1.

VIRRO, a fictitious name introduced in Juvenal's 5 Sat.

VIRTUS, all virtues were made deities among the Romans. Marcellus erected two temples, one to Virtue and the other to Honor. They were built in ſuch a manner, that to ſee the temple of Honor it was neceſſary to paſs through that of Virtue; a happy allegory among a nation free and independent. The principal virtues were diſtinguiſhed, each by their attire. Prudence was known by her rule, and her pointing to a globe at her feet; Temperance had a bridle; Juſtice held an equal balance; and Fortitude leant againſt her ſword; Honeſty was clad in a tranſparent veſt; Modeſty appeared veiled; Clemency wore an olive branch, and Devotion threw incenſe upon an altar; Tranquillity was ſeen to lean on a column; Health was known by her ſerpent, Liberty by her cap, and Gaiety by her myrtle.

VISTULA, a river falling into the Baltic, the eaſtern boundary of antient Germany.

VITELLIA, a Roman colony on the borders of the Æqui. Liv. 5, c. 29.

VITELLIUS Aulus, a Roman raiſed by his vices to the throne. He was deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families of Rome, and as ſuch he gained an eaſy admiſſion to the palace of the emperors. The greateſt part of his youth was ſpent at Capreæ, where his willingneſs and compliance to gratify the moſt vicious propenſities of Tiberius, raiſed his father to the dignity of conſul and governor of Syria. The applauſe he gained in this ſchool of debauchery, was too great and flattering to induce Vitellius to alter his conduct, and no longer to be one of the votaries of vice. Caligula was pleaſed with his ſkill in driving a chariot. Claudius loved him becauſe he was a great gameſter, and he recommended himſelf to the favors of Nero by wiſhing him to ſing publicly in the crouded theatre. With ſuch an inſinuating diſpoſition, it is not to be wondered that Vitellius became ſo great. He did not fall with his patrons, like the other favorites, but the death of an emperor ſeemed to raiſe him to greater honors, and to procure him freſh applauſe. He paſſed through all the offices of the ſtate, and gained the ſoldiery by donations and liberal promiſes. He was at the head of the Roman legions in Germany when Otho was proclaimed emperor, and the exaltation of his rival was no ſooner heard in the camp, than he was likewiſe inveſted with the purple by his ſoldiers. He accepted with pleaſure the dangerous office, and inſtantly marched againſt Otho. Three battles were fought, and in all Vitellius was conquered. A fourth however, in the plains between Mantua and Cremona left him maſter of the field and of the Roman empire. He feaſted his eyes in viewing the bodies of the ſlain and the ground covered with blood, and regardleſs of the inſalubrity of the air, proceeding from ſo many carcaſes, he told his attendants that the ſmell of a dead enemy was always ſweet. His firſt care was not like that of a true conqueror, to alleviate the diſtreſſes of the conquered, or patronize the friends of the dead, but it was to inſult their misfortunes, and to intoxicate himſelf with the companions of his debauchery in the field of battle. Each ſucceſſive day exhibited a ſcene of greater extravagance. Vitellius feaſted four or five times a day, and ſuch was his exceſs, that he often made himſelf vomit to begin his repaſt afreſh, and to gratify his palate with more luxury. His food was of the moſt rare and exquiſite nature, the deſerts of Libya, the ſhores of Spain, and the waters of the Carpathian ſea, were diligently ſearched to ſupply the table of the emperor. The moſt celebrated of his feaſts was that with which he was treated by his brother Lucius. The table, among other meats, was covered with two thouſand different diſhes of fiſh, and ſeven thouſand of fowls, and ſo expenſive was he in every thing, that above ſeven millions ſterling were ſpent in maintaining his table in the ſpace of four months, and Joſephus has properly obſerved, that if Vitellius had reigned long, the great opulence of all the Roman empire would have been found inſufficient to defray the expences of his banquets. This extravagance which delighted the favorites, ſoon raiſed the indignation of the people. Veſpaſian was proclaimed emperor by the army, and his miniſter Primus was ſent to deſtroy the imperial glutton. Vitellius concealed himſelf under the bed of the porter of his palace, but this obſcure retreat betrayed him, he was dragged naked through the ſtreets, his hands were tied behind his back, and a drawn ſword was placed under his chin to make him liſt his head. After ſuffering the greateſt inſults from the populace, he was at laſt carried to the place of execution, and put to death, with repeated blows. His head was cut off and fixed to a pole, and his mutilated body dragged with a hook, and thrown into the Tiber, A. D 69, after a reign of one year, except 12 days. Suet.—Tacit. Hiſt. 2.—Eutrop.—Dio.—Plut.—Lucius, the father of the emperor obtained great honors by his flattery to the emperors. M. VITRUVIUS Pollio, a celebrated architect in the age of Auguſtus, born at Formiæ. He is known only by his writings, and nothing is recorded in hiſtory of his life or private character. He wrote a treatiſe on his profeſſion, which he dedicated to Auguſtus, and it is the only book on architecture now extant, written by the antients. In this work he plainly ſhews that he was maſter of his profeſſion, and that he poſſeſſed both genius and abilities. The beſt edition of Vitruvius is that of De Laet, Amſt. 1649.

ULYSSES, a king of the iſlands of Ithaca, and Dulichium, ſon of Anticlea and Laertes, or according to ſome, of Siſyphus. [Vid. Siſyphus & Anticlea.] He became, like the other princes of Greece, one of the ſuitors of Helen, but as he deſpaired of ſucceſs in his applications, on account of the great number of his competitors, he ſolicited the hand of Penelope, the daughter of Icarius. Tyndarus, the father of Helen, favored the addreſſes of Ulyſſes, as by him he was directed to chuſe one of his daughter's ſuitors without offending the others, and to bind them all by a ſolemn oath, that they would unite together in protecting Helen if any violence was ever offered to her perſon. Ulyſſes had no ſooner obtained the hand of Penelope, than he returned to Ithaca, where his father reſigned him the crown, and retired to peace and rural ſolitude. The rape of Helen, however, by Paris, did not long permit him to remain in his kingdom, and as he was bound to defend her againſt every intruder, he was ſummoned to the war with the other princes of Greece. Pretending to be inſane, not to leave his beloved Penelope, he yoked a horſe and a bull together, and ploughed the ſea ſhore, where he ſowed ſalt inſtead of corn. This diſſimulation was ſoon diſcovered, and Palamedes, by placing before the plough of Ulyſſes, his infant ſon Telemachus, convinced the world, that the father was not mad, who had the providence to turn away the plough from the furrow, not to hurt his child. Ulyſſes was therefore obliged to go to the war, but he did not forget him who had diſcovered his pretended inſanity. [Vid. Palamedes.] During the Trojan war, the king of Ithaca was courted for his prudence and ſagacity. By his means Achilles was diſcovered among the daughters of Lycomedes, king of Scyros, [Vid. Achilles.] and Philoctetes was induced to abandon Lemnos, and to fight the Trojans with the arrows of Hercules. [Vid. Philoctetes.] He was not leſs diſtinguiſhed for his activity and valor. With the aſſiſtance of Diomedes he murdered Rheſus, and ſlaughtered the ſleeping Thracians in the midſt of their camp, [Vid. Rheſus & Dolon,] and he introduced himſelf into the city of Priam, and carried away the Palladium of the Trojans. [Vid. Palladium.] For theſe eminent ſervices he was univerſally applauded by the Greeks, and he was rewarded with the arms of Achilles, which Ajax had diſputed with him. After the Trojan war Ulyſſes embarked on board his ſhips to return to Greece, but he was expoſed to a number of misfortunes before he reached his native country. He was thrown by the winds upon the coaſts of Africa, and viſited the country of the Lotophagi, and of the Cyclops in Sicily. Polyphemus, who was the king of the Cyclops, ſeized Ulyſſes with his companions, five of whom he devoured, [Vid. Polyphemus,] but the prince of Ithaca intoxicated him and put out his eye, and at laſt eſcaped from the dangerous cave where he was confined by tying himſelf under the belly of the ſheep of the Cyclops when led to paſture. In Æolia he met with a friendly reception, and Æolus gave him, confined in bags, all the winds which could obſtruct his return to Ithaca, but the curioſity of his companions to know what the bags contained, proved nearly fatal. The winds ruſhed with impetuoſity, and all the fleet was deſtroyed, except the ſhip which carried Ulyſſes. From thence he was thrown upon the coaſts of the Læſtrygones, and of the iſland Æea, where the magician Circe changed all his companions into pigs for their voluptuouſneſs. He eſcaped their fate by means of an herb which he had received from Mercury, and after he had obliged the magician by force of arms to reſtore his companions to their original ſhape, he yielded to her charms, and made her mother of Telegonus. He viſited the infernal regions, and conſulted Tireſias how to regain his country in ſafety; and after he had received every neceſſary information, he returned on earth. He paſſed along the coaſts of the Sirens unhurt, by the directions of Circe, [Vid. Sirenes.] and eſcaped the whirlpools and ſhoals of Scylla, and Carybdis. On the coaſts of Sicily his companions ſtole and killed ſome oxen that were ſacred to Apollo, for which the God deſtroyed the ſhips, and all were drowned, except Ulyſſes, who ſaved himſelf on a plank, and ſwam to the iſland of Calypſo, in Ogygia. There, for ſeven years, he forgot Ithaca, in the arms of the goddeſs by whom he had two children. The gods at laſt interfered, and Calypſo, by order of Mercury, ſuffered him to depart after ſhe had furniſhed him a ſhip, and every thing requiſite for the voyage. He had almoſt reached the iſland of Corcyra, when Neptune, ſtill mindful that his ſon Polyphemus had been robbed of his ſight by the perfidy of Ulyſſes, raiſed a ſtorm and ſunk his ſhip. Ulyſſes ſwam with difficulty to the iſland of the Phæacians, where the kindneſs of Nauſicaa, and the humanity of her father, king Alcinous, entertained him for a while. He related the ſeries of his misfortunes to the monarch, and at laſt, by his benevolence, he was conducted in a ſhip to Ithaca. The Pheacians laid him on the ſea ſhore as he was aſleep, and Ulyſſes found himſelf ſafely reſtored to his country, after a long abſence of 20 years. He was well informed that his palace was beſieged by a number of ſuitors, who continually diſturbed the peace of Penelope, and therefore he aſſumed the habit of a beggar, by the advice of Minerva, and made himſelf known to his ſon, and his faithful ſhepherd Eumæus. With them he took meaſures to re-eſtabliſh himſelf on his throne, he went to the palace, and was perſonally convinced of the virtues and of the fidelity of Penelope. Before his arrival was publicly known, all the importuning ſuitors were put to death, and Ulyſſes reſtored to the peace and boſom of his family. [Vid. Laertes, Penelope, Telemachus, Eumæus.] He lived about 16 years after his return, and was at laſt killed by his ſon Telegonus, who had landed in Ithaca, with the hopes of making himſelf known to his father. This unfortunate event had been foretold to him by Tireſias, who aſſured him that he ſhould die by the violence of ſomething that was to iſſue from the boſom of the ſea. [Vid. Telegonus.] According to ſome authors, Ulyſſes went to conſult the oracle of Apollo after his return to Ithaca, and he had the meanneſs to ſeduce Erippe, the daughter of a king of Epirus, who had treated him with great kindneſs. Erippe had a ſon by him whom ſhe called Euryalus. When come to years of puberty, Euryalus was ſent to Ithaca by his mother, but Penelope no ſooner knew who he was, than ſhe reſolved to deſtroy him. Therefore when Ulyſſes returned, he put to immediate death his unknown ſon, on the crimination of Penelope his wife, who accuſed him of attempts upon her virtue. The adventures of Ulyſſes in his return to Ithaca from the Trojan war are the ſubject of Homer's Odyſſey. Homer. Il. & Od.—Virg. Æn. 2, 3, &c.—Dictys. Cret.

UTĬCA, now Satcer, a celebrated city of Africa, on the coaſt of the Mediterranean, on the ſame bay as Carthage, founded by a Syrian colony above 287 years before Carthage. It had a large and commodious harbour, and it became the metropolis of Africa, after the deſtruction of Carthage in the 3d Punic war, and the Romans granted it all the lands ſituate between Hippo and Carthage. It is celebrated for the death of Cato, who from thence is called Uticenſis, or of Utica. Strab. 17.—Lucan. 6, v. 306.—Juſtin. 18, c. 4.—Plin. 16, c. 40.—Liv. 25, c. 31.—Sil. 3, v. 242.

VULCANĀLIA, feſtivals in honor of Vulcan, brought to Rome from Præneſte, and obſerved in the month of Auguſt. The ſtreets were illuminated, fires kindled every where, and animals thrown into the flames, as a ſacrifice to the deity. Varro de L. L. 5.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Columell. 11.—Plin. 18, c. 13.

VULCĀNI INSULA, or Vulcania, a name given to the iſlands between Sicily and Italy, now called Lipari. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 422. They received it becauſe there were there ſubterraneous fires, ſuppoſed to be excited by Vulcan, the god of fire.

VULCANIUS, Terentianus, a Latin hiſtorian, who wrote an account of the life of the three Gordians, &c.

VULCĀNUS, a god of the antients who preſided over fire, and was the patron of all artiſts who worked iron and metals. He was ſon of Juno alone, who in this wiſhed to imitate Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brains. According to Homer, he was ſon of Jupiter and Juno, and the mother was ſo diſguſted with the deformities of her ſon, that ſhe threw him into the ſea as ſoon as born, where he remained for nine years. According to the more received opinion, Vulcan was educated in heaven with the reſt of the gods, but his father kicked him down from Olympus, when he attempted to deliver his mother, who had been faſtened by a golden chain for her inſolence. He was nine days in coming from heaven upon earth, and he fell in the iſland of Lemnos, where, according to Lucian, the inhabitants ſeeing him in the air, caught him in their arms. He however broke his leg by the fall, and ever after remained lame of one foot. He fixed his reſidence in Lemnos, where he built himſelf a palace, and raiſed forges to work metals. The inhabitants of the iſland became ſenſible of his induſtry, and were taught all the uſeful arts which could civilize their rude manners, and render them ſerviceable to the good of ſociety. The firſt work of Vulcan was, according to ſome, a throne of gold with ſecret ſprings, which he preſented to his mother to avenge himſelf for her want of affection towards him. Juno no ſooner was ſeated on the throne, than ſhe found herſelf unable to move. The gods attempted to deliver her, by breaking the chains which held her, but to no purpoſe, and Vulcan alone had the power to ſet her at liberty. Bacchus intoxicated him and prevailed upon him to come to Olympus, where he was reconciled to his parents. Vulcan has been celebrated by the antient poets for the ingenious works and automatical figures which he made, and many ſpeak of two golden ſtatues, which not only ſeemed animated, but which walked by his ſide, and even aſſiſted him in the working of metals. It is ſaid, that at the requeſt of Jupiter he made the firſt woman that ever appeared on earth, well known under the name of Pandora. [Vid. Pandora.] The Cyclops of Sicily, were his miniſters and attendants, and with him they fabricated, not only the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but alſo arms for the gods and the moſt celebrated heroes. His forges were ſuppoſed to be under mount Ætna, in the iſland of Sicily, as well as in every part of the earth where there were vulcanos. The moſt known of the works of Vulcan which were preſented to mortals are, a collar given to Hermione the wife of Cadmus, and a ſceptre, which was in the poſſeſſion of Agamemnon king of Argos and Mycenæ. The collar collar proved fatal to all thoſe that wore it, but the ſceptre, after the death of Agamemnon, was carefully preſerved at Cheronæa, and regarded as a divinity. The amours of Vulcan are not numerous. He demanded Minerva from Jupiter, who had promiſed him in marriage whatever goddeſs he ſhould chuſe, and when ſhe refuſed his addreſſes, he attempted to offer her violence. Minerva reſiſted with ſucceſs, though there remained on her body ſome marks of Vulcan's paſſion, which ſhe threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool. [Vid. Eriſichthonius.] This diſappointment in his love was repaired by Jupiter, who gave him one of the Graces. Venus is univerſally acknowledged to have been the wife of Vulcan; her infidelity is well known, as well as her amours with Mars, which were diſcovered by Phœbus, and expoſed to the gods by her own huſband. [Vid. Alectryon.] The worſhip of Vulcan was well eſtabliſhed, particularly in Egypt, at Athens, and at Rome. It was uſual in the ſacrifices that were offered to him to burn the whole victim and not reſerve part of it as in the immolations to the reſt of the gods. A calf and a boar pig were the principal victims offered. Vulcan was repreſented as covered with ſweat, blowing with his nervous arm the fires of his forges. His breaſt was hairy, and his forehead was blackened with ſmoke. Some repreſent him lame and deformed, holding a hammer raiſed in the air, ready to ſtrike; while with the other hand he turns, with pincers, a thunderbolt on his anvil. He appears on ſome monuments with a long beard, diſhevelled hair, half naked, and a ſmall round cap on his head, while he holds a hammer and pincers in his hand. The Egyptians repreſented him under the figure of a monkey. Vulcan has received the names of Mulciber, Pamphanes, Clytotechnes, Pandamator, Cyllopodes, Chalaipoda, &c. all expreſſive of his lameneſs and his profeſſion. He was father of Cupid, by Venus; of Cæculus, Cecrops, Cacus, Periphetes, Cercyon, Ocriſia, &c. Cicero ſpeaks of more than one deity of the name of Vulcan. One he calls ſon of Cœlus, and father of Apollo, by Minerva; the ſecond he mentions is ſon of the Nile, and called Phtas by the Egyptians; the third was ſon of Jupiter and Juno, and fixed his reſidence in Lemnos; and the fourth who built his forges in the Lipari iſlands was ſon of Menalius. Vulcan ſeems to have been admitted into heaven more for ridicule than any other purpoſe. He ſeems to be the great cuckold of Olympus, and even his wife is repreſented as laughing at his deformities, and mimicking his lameneſs to gain the ſmiles of her lovers. Heſiod. Theog. & in Scut. Herc.—Apollod. 1, c. 3, &c.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 57. & l. 15, v. 18. l. 11, v. 397, &c. —Diod. 5.—Pauſ. 1, c. 20. l. 3, 17.—Cic. de Nat. De. 3, c. 22.—Herodot. 2 & 3.—Varro de L. L.—Virg. Æn. 7, &c.

VULCĀTIUS, a Roman knight, who conſpired with Piſo againſt Nero, &c. Tacit.——A ſenator in the reign of Dioclefian, who attempted to write an hiſtory of all ſuch as had reigned at Rome, either as lawful ſovereigns or by uſurpation. Of his works nothing is extant but an account of Avidius Caſſius, who revolted in the eaſt during the reign of M. Aurelius, which ſome aſcribe to Spartianus.

VULSO, a Roman conſul who invaded Africa with Regulus.——Another conſul. He had the provinces of Aſia while in office, and triumphed over the Galatians.

XANTHIA Phoceus, a Roman whom Horace addreſſes in his 2. od. 4, and of whom he ſpeaks as enamoured of a ſervant maid.

XANTHĬCA, a feſtival obſerved by the Macedonians in the month called Xanthicus, the ſame as April. It was then uſual to make a luſtration of the army with great ſolemnity. A bitch was cut into two parts, and one half of the body placed on one ſide and the other part on the other ſide, after which the ſoldiers marched between, and they imitated a real battle by a ſham engagement.

XANTHIPPE, a daughter of Dorus. Vid. Xantippe.

XANTHIPPUS, a ſon of Melas, kiled by Tydeus. Vid. Xantippus.

XANTHO, one of Cyrene's attendant nymphs. Virg. G. 4, v. 336.

XANTHUS, or XANTHOS, a river of Troas in Aſia minor. It is the ſame as the Scamander, but according to Homer, it was called Xanthus by the gods and Scamander by men. [Vid. Scamander.]——A river of Lycia, antiently called Sirbes. It was ſacred to Apollo, and fell into the ſea near Patara. Homer. Il. 6, v. 172.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 143.—Mela. 1, c. 15.——One of the horſes of Achilles, who ſpoke to his maſter when chid with ſeverity, and told him that he muſt ſoon be killed. Homer. Il. 19.——One of the horſes given to Juno by Neptune, and afterwards to the ſons of Leda.——An hiſtorian of Sardes in the reign of Darius.——A Greek hiſtorian of Lydia. Dionyſ. Hal.——A king of Leſbos.——A king of Bœotia, who made war againſt the Athenians. He was killed by the artifice of Melanthus. [Vid. Apaturia.]——A Greek poet.——A philoſopher of Samus, in whoſe houſe Æſop lived ſome time as ſervant.——A town of Lycia on the river of the ſame name, at the diſtance of about 15 miles from the ſea ſhore. The inhabitants are celebrated for their love of liberty and national independence. Brutus laid ſiege to their city, and when at laſt they were unable longer to ſupport themſelves againſt the enemy, they ſet fire to their houſes and deſtroyed themſelves. The conqueror wiſhed to ſpare them, but though he offered rewards to his ſoldiers, if they brought any of the Xanthians alive into his preſence, only 150 were ſaved much againſt their will. Appian. 4.—Plut. in Brut.

XANTĬCLES, one of the leaders of the 10,000 Greeks, after the battle of Cunaxa.

XANTIPPE, a daughter of Dorus who married Pleuron, by whom ſhe had Agenor, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 7.——The wife of Socrates, remarkable for her ill humour and peeviſh diſpoſition, which are become proverbial. Some ſuppoſe that the philoſopher was acquainted with her moroſeneſs and inſolence before he married her, and that he took her for his wife to try his patience, and inure himſelf to the malevolent reflections of mankind. She continually tormented him with her impertinence; and one day, not ſatisfied with uſing the moſt bitter invectives, ſhe emptied a veſſel of dirty water on his head, upon which the philoſopher coolly obſerved, after thunder there generally falls rain. Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 10. l. 9, c. 7. l. 11, c. 12.—Diog. in Socrat.

XANTIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian general who aſſiſted the Carthaginians in the firſt Punic war. He defeated the Romans, 256 B. C. and took the celebrated Regulus priſoner. Such ſignal ſervices deſerved to be rewarded, but the Carthaginians looked with envious jealouſy upon Xantippus, and he retired to Corinth after he had ſaved them from deſtruction. Some authors ſupport, that the Carthaginians ordered him to be aſſaſſinated, and his body to be throwa into the ſea as he was returning home; while others ſay that they had prepared a leaky ſhip to convey him to Corinth, which he artfully avoided. Liv. 18 & 28, c. 43.—Appian. de Pun.——An Athenian general who defeated the Perſian fleet at Mycale with Leotychides. A ſtatue was erected to his honor in the citadel of Athens. He made ſome conqueſts in Thrace, and encreaſed the power of Athens. He was father to the celebrated Pericles by Agariſte the niece of Cliſthenes, who expelled the Piſiſtratidæ from Athens. Pauſ. 3, c. 7. l. 8, c. 52.——A ſon of Pericles who diſgraced his father by his diſobedience, his ingratitude, and his extravagance. Xenŏcles, a tragic writer, who obtained four times a poetical prize in a contention in which Euripides was competitor. The names of his tragedies which obtained the victory were Œdipus, Lycaon, Bacchæ, Athamas Satyricus, againſt the Alexander, Palamedes, Trojani, and Siſyphus Satyricus, of Euripides. His grandſon bore alſo the name of Xenocles, and excelled in tragical compoſitions. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 8.——A Spartan officer in the expedition which Ageſilaus undertook againſt the Perſians.——An architect of Eleuſis.——A friend of Aratus.——One of the friends of Cicero.——A celebrated rhetorician of Adramyttium. Strab. 13.

Xenocrătes, an antient philoſopher born at Calchedonia, and educated in the ſchool of Plato, whoſe friendſhip he gained, and whoſe approbation he merited. Though of a dull and ſluggiſh diſpoſition, he ſupplied the defects of nature by unwearied attention and induſtry, and was at laſt found capable of ſucceeding in the ſchool of Plato after Speuſippus, about 339 years before Chriſt. He was remarkable as a diſciplinarian, and he required that his pupils ſhould be acquainted with mathematics before they came under his care, and he even rejected ſome who had not the neceſſary qualification, ſaying that they had not yet found the key of philoſophy. He did not only recommend himſelf to his pupils by precepts, but more powerfully by example, and ſince the wonderful change he had made upon the conduct of one of his auditors, [Vid. Polemon.] his company was as much ſhunned by the diſſolute and extravagant, as it was courted by the virtuous and the benevolent. Philip of Macedon attempted to gain his confidence with money, but with no ſucceſs. Alexander in this imitated his father and ſent ſome of his friends with 50 talents for the philoſopher. They were introduced, and ſupped with Xenocrates. The repaſt was ſmall, frugal, and elegant, without oſtentation. On the morrow, the officers of Alexander wiſhed to pay down the 50 talents, but the philoſopher aſked them whether they had not perceived from the entertainment of the preceding day, that he was not in want of money: Tell your maſter, ſaid he, to keep his money, he has more people to maintain than I have. Yet not to offend the monarch, he accepted a ſmall ſum, about the 200th part of one talent. His character was not leſs conſpicuous in every other particular, and he has been cited as an inſtance of virtue from the following circumſtance: The courtezan Lais had pledged herſelf to forfeit an immenſe ſum of money, if ſhe did not triumph over the virtue of Xenocrates. She tried every art, aſſumed the moſt captivating looks, and uſed the moſt tempting attitudes to gain the philoſopher, but in vain; and ſhe declared at laſt, that ſhe had not loſt her money, as ſhe had pledged herſelf to conquer an human being, not a lifeleſs ſtone. Though ſo reſpected and admired, yet Xenocrates was poor, and he was dragged to priſon, becauſe he was unable to pay a ſmall tribute to the ſtate. He was delivered from confinement by one of his friends. His integrity was ſo well known, that when he appeared in the court as a witneſs, the judges diſpenſed with his oath. He died B. C. 314, in his 82d year, after he had preſided in the academy for above 25 years. It is ſaid, that he fell in the night with his head into a baſon of water, and that he was ſuffocated. He had written above 60 treatiſes on different ſubjects, all now loſt. He acknowledged no other deity but heaven, and the ſeven planets. Diog.—Cic. ad Attic. 10. ep. 1, &c. Tuſc. 5, c. 32.—*Val. Xenodŏchus, a Meſſenian crowned at the Olympic games. Pauſ. 4, c. 5.——A native of Cardia, &c.

Xenophănes, a Greek philoſopher of Colophon,

Colophon, disciple of Archelaus, B. C. 535. He wrote several poems and treatises, and founded a sect which was called the Eleatic, in Sicily. Wild in his opinions about astronomy, he supposed that the stars were extinguished every morning, and rekindled at night; that eclipses were occasioned by the temporary extinction of the sun; that the moon was inhabited, and 18 times bigger than the earth; and that there were several suns and moons for the convenience of the different climates of the earth. He further imagined that God and the world were the same, and he credited the eternity of the universe, but his incoherent opinion about the divinity, raised the indignation of his countrymen, and he was banished. He died very poor when about 100 years old. Cic. quæst. 4. c. 37. de div. 1. c. 3. de Nat. D. 1, c. 11.—Lactant. Div. Inst. 3, c. 23.——A governor of Olbus, in the age of M. Antony. Strab. 14.——One of the ministers of Philip, who went to Annibal's camp, and made a treaty of alliance between Macedonia and Carthage.

Xenophĭlus, a Pythagorean philosopher, who lived to his 170th year, and enjoyed all his faculties to the last. Val. Max. 8, c. 13.——One of Alexander's generals. Curt. 5, c. 2.——A robber of whom Aratus hired some troops.

Xenŏphon, an Athenian, son of Gryllus, celebrated as a general, an historian, and a philosopher. In the school of Socrates he received those instructions and precepts which afterwards so eminently distinguished him at the head of an army, in literary solitude, and as the prudent father of a family. He was invited by Proxenus, one of his intimate friends, to accompany Cyrus the younger in an expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, king of Persia; but he refused to comply without previously consulting his venerable master, and enquiring into the propriety of such a measure. Socrates strongly opposed it, and observed, that it might raise the resentment of his countrymen, as Sparta had made an alliance with the Persian monarch; but, however, before he proceeded further, he advised him to consult the oracle of Apollo. Xenophon paid due deference to the injunctions of Socrates, but as he was ambitious of glory, and eager to engage in a distant expedition, he hastened with precipitation to Sardis, where he was introduced to the young prince, and treated with great attention. In the army of Cyrus, Xenophon shewed that he was a true disciple of Socrates, and that he had been educated in the warlike city of Athens. After the decisive battle in the plains of Cunaxa, and the fall of young Cyrus, the prudence and vigor of his mind were called into action. The ten thousand Greeks who had followed the standard of an ambitious prince, were now at the distance of above 600 leagues from their native home, in a country surrounded on every side by a victorious enemy, without money, without provisions, and without a leader. Xenophon was selected from among the officers, to superintend the retreat of his countrymen, and though he was often opposed by malevolence and envy, yet his persuasive eloquence and his activity convinced the Greeks that no general could extricate them from every difficulty, better than the disciple of Socrates. He rose superior to danger, and though under continual alarms from the sudden attacks of the Persians, he was enabled to cross rapid rivers, penetrate through vast deserts, gain the tops of mountains, till he could rest secure for a while, and refresh his tired companions. This celebrated retreat was at last happily effected, the Greeks returned home after a march of 1155 parasangs, or leagues, which was performed in 215 days, after an absence of 15 months. The whole perhaps might now be forgotten, or at least but obscurely known, if the great philosopher who planned it, had not employed his pen in describing the dangers which he escaped, and the difficulties which he surmounted. He was no sooner returned from Cunaxa, than he sought new honors in following the fortune of Agesilaus in Asia. He enjoyed his confidence, he fought under his standard, and conquered with him in the Asiatic provinces, as well as at the battle of Coronæa. His fame, however, did not escape the aspersions of jealousy, he was publicly banished from Athens for accompanying Cyrus against his brother, and being now without a home, he retired to Scillus, a small town of the Lacedæmonians, in the neighbourhood of Olympia. In this solitary retreat he dedicated his time to literary pursuits, and as he had acquired riches in his Asiatic expeditions, he began to adorn and variegate by the hand of art, for his pleasure and enjoyment, the country which surrounded Scillus. He built a magnificent temple to Diana, in imitation of that of Ephesus, and spent part of his time in rural employments, or in hunting in the woods and mountains. His peaceful occupations, however, were soon disturbed, a war arose between the Lacedæmonians and Elis. The sanctity of Diana's temple, and the venerable age of the philosopher, who lived in the delightful retreats of Scillus, were disregarded, and Xenophon, driven by the Elians from his his favorite ſpot, where he had compoſed and written for the information of poſterity, and honor of his country, retired to the city of Corinth. In this place he died in the 90th year of his age, 359 years before the Chriſtian era. The works of Xenophon are numerous: He wrote an account of the expedition of Cyrus, called the Anabaſis, and as he had no inconſiderable ſhare in the enterprize, his deſcriptions muſt be authentic, as he was himſelf an eye witneſs. Many however have accuſed him of partiality. He appeared often too fond of extolling the virtues of his favorite Cyrus, and while he deſcribes with contempt the imprudent operations of the Perſians, he does not neglect to ſhow that he was a native of Greece. His Cyropædia, divided into eight books, has given riſe to much criticiſm, and while ſome warmly maintain that it is a faithful account of the life and the actions of Cyrus the Great, and declare that it is ſupported by the authority of ſcripture; others as vehemently deny its authenticity. According to the opinions of Plato and of Cicero, the Cyropædia of Xenophon was a moral romance, and theſe venerable philoſophers ſupport, that the hiſtorian did not ſo much write what Cyrus had been, as what every true good and virtuous monarch ought to be. His Hellenica were written as a continuation of the hiſtory of Thucydides; and in his Memorabilia of Socrates, and in his apology, he has ſhewn himſelf, as Valerius Maximus obſerves, a perfect maſter of the philoſophy of that great man, and he has explained his doctrines and moral precepts with all the ſucceſs of perſuaſive eloquence and conſcious integrity. Theſe are the moſt famous of his compoſitions, beſides which there are other ſmall tracts, his eulogium given on Ageſilaus, his œconomics, on the duties of domeſtic life, the dialogue intitled Hiero, in which he happily deſcribes and compares the miſery which attended the tyrant, with the felicity of a virtuous prince; a treatiſe on hunting, the ſympoſium of the philoſophers, on the government of Athens and Sparta, a treatiſe on the revenues of Attica, &c. The ſimplicity and the elegance of Xenophon's diction have procured him the name of Athenian muſe, and the bee of Greece, and they have induced Quintilian to ſay, that the graces dictated his language, and that the goddeſs of perſuaſion dwelt upon his lips. His ſentiments, as to the divinity and religion, were the ſame as thoſe of the venerable Socrates; he ſupported the immortality of the ſoul, and exhorted his friends to cultivate thoſe virtues which enſure the happineſs of mankind, with all the zeal and fervor of a chriſtian. He has been quoted as an inſtance of tenderneſs and of reſignation on providence. As he was offering a ſacrifice, he was informed that Gryllus, his eldeſt ſon, had been killed at the battle of Mantinea. Upon this he tore the garland from his head, but when he was told that his ſon had died like a Greek, and given a mortal wound to the enemy's general, he replaced the flowers on his head, and continued the ſacrifice, exclaiming that the pleaſure he derived from the valor of his ſon, was greater than the grief which his unfortunate death occaſioned. Xerxena, a part of Armenia. Strab. 11.

Xerxes 1ſt, ſucceeded his father Darius on the throne of Perſia, and though but the ſecond ſon of the monarch, he was preferred to his elder brother Artabazanes. The cauſes alledged for this preference were, that Artabazanes was ſon of Darius when a private man, and that Xerxes was born, after his father had been raiſed on the Perſian throne, of Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus. Xerxes continued the warlike preparations of his father, and added the revolted kingdom of Egypt to his extenſive poſſeſſions. He afterwards invaded Europe, and entered Greece with an army, which together with the numerous retinue of ſervants, eunuchs, and women, that attended it, it, amounted to no leſs than 5,283,220 ſouls. This multitude, which the fidelity of hiſtorians have not exaggerated, was ſtopped at Thermopylæ, by the valor of 300 Spartans, under king Leonidas. Xerxes, aſtoniſhed that ſuch a handful of men ſhould dare to oppoſe his progreſs, ordered ſome of his ſoldiers to bring them alive into his preſence, but for three ſucceſſive days the moſt valiant of the Perſian troops were repeatedly defeated in attempting to execute the monarch's injunctions, and the courage of the Spartans might perhaps have triumphed longer, if a Trachinian had not led a detachment to the top of the mountain, and ſuddenly fallen upon the devoted Leonidas. The king himſelf nearly periſhed on this occaſion, and it has been reported, that in the night, the deſperate Spartans fought, for a while, the royal tent, which they found deſerted, and wandered through the Perſian army, ſlaughtering thouſands before them. The battle of Thermopylæ was the beginning of the diſgrace of Xerxes; the more he advanced, it was to experience new diſappointments, his fleet was defeated at Artemiſium and Salamis, and though he burnt the deſerted city of Athens, and truſted to the artful inſinuations of Themiſtocles, yet he found his millions unable to conquer a nation that was ſuperior to him in the knowledge of war and maritime affairs. Mortified with the ill ſucceſs of his expedition, and apprehenſive of imminent danger in an enemy's country, Xerxes haſtened to Perſia, and in 30 days he marched over all that territory which before he had paſſed with much pomp and parade in the ſpace of ſix months. Mardonius, the beſt of his generals, was left behind, with an army of 300,000 men, and the reſt that had ſurvived the ravages of war, of famine, and peſtilence, followed their timid monarch into Thrace, where his ſteps were marked by the numerous birds of prey that hovered round him, and fed upon the dead carcaſes of the Perſians. When he reached the Helleſpont, Xerxes found the bridge of boats which he had erected there, totally deſtroyed by the ſtorms, and he croſſed the ſtreights in a ſmall fiſhing veſſel. Reſtored to his kingdom and ſafety, he forgot his dangers, his loſſes, and his defeats, and gave himſelf up to riot and debauchery. His indolence, and luxurious voluptuouſneſs offended his ſubjects, and Artabanus, the captain of his guards, conſpired againſt him, and murdered him in his bed, in the 21ſt year of his reign, about 464 years before the Chriſtian era. The perſonal accompliſhments of Xerxes have been commended by antient authors, and Herodotus obſerves that there was not one man among the millions of his army, that was equal to the monarch in comelineſs or ſtature, or that was as worthy to preſide over a great and extenſive empire. The picture is finiſhed, and the character of Xerxes completely known when we hear Juſtin exclaim, that the vaſt armament which invaded Greece, was without a head. Xerxes has been cited as an inſtance of humanity. When he reviewed his millions from a ſtately throne in the plains of Aſia, he ſuddenly ſhed a torrent of tears on the recollection that the multitude of men he ſaw before his eyes, in one hundred years, ſhould be no more. His pride and inſolence have been deſervedly cenſured, he ordered chains to be thrown into the ſea, and the waves to be whipped becauſe the firſt bridge he had laid acroſs the Helleſpont had been deſtroyed by a ſtorm. He cut a channel through mount Athos, and ſaw his fleet ſail in a place which before was dry ground. The very rivers were dried up by his army as he advanced towards Greece, and the cities which he entered reduced to want and poverty. Herodot. 1, c. 183. l. 7, c. 2, &c.—Diod. 11.—Strab. 9.—Ælian. 3, *V. ZADRIS, a town of Colchis.

ZAGRÆUS, a ſon of Jupiter and Proſerpine, the ſame as the firſt Bacchus, of whom Cicero ſpeaks. Some ſay that Jupiter obtained Proſerpine's favors in the form of a ſerpent in one of the caves of Sicily, where her mother had concealed her from his purſuits, and that from this union Zagræus was born.

ZAGRUS, a mountain on the confines of Media and Babylonia. Strab. 11.

ZALATES, an effeminate youth brought to Rome from Armenia as an hoſtage, &c. Juv. 20, v. 164.

ZALEUCUS, a lawgiver of the Locrians in Italy, and one of the diſciples of Pythagoras, 550 B. C. He was very humane, and at the ſame time very auſtere, and he attempted to enforce his laws more by inſpiring ſhame than dread. He had wiſely decreed, that a perſon guilty of adultery ſhould loſe both his eyes. His philoſophy was called to a trial, when he was informed that his ſon was an adulterer. He ordered the law to be executed; the people interfered, but Zaleucus reſiſted, and rather than violate his own inſtitutions, he commanded one of his own eyes, and one of thoſe of his ſon, to be put out. This made ſuch an impreſſion upon the people, that while Zaleucus preſided over the Locrians, no perſon was again found guilty of adultery. *Val. ZAMEIS, a debauched king of Aſſyria, ſon of Semiramis and Ninus, as ſome report. He reigned 38 years.

ZAMOLXIS, or ZALMOXIS, a ſlave and diſciple of Pythagoras. He accompanied his maſter in Egypt, and afterwards retired into the country of the Getæ, which had given him birth. He began to civilize his countrymen, and the more eaſily to gain reputation, he concealed himſelf for three years in a ſubterraneous cave, and afterwards made them believe, that he was juſt raiſed from the dead. Some place him before the age of Pythagoras. After death he received divine honors. Diog.—Herodot. 4, c. 19, &c.

ZANCLE, a town of Sicily, on the ſtraits which ſeparate that iſland from Italy. It received its name from its appearing like a ſcythe, which was called ζαγκλον, in the language of the country. It fell into the hands of the Samians, 497 years before the Chriſtian era, and three years after it was recovered by Anaxilaus, the Meſſenian tyrant of Rhegium, who gave it the name of

of his native country, and called it Meſſana. It was founded about 1058 years before the Chriſtian era, by the pirates of Cumæ in Italy, and peopled by Samians, Ionians, and Chalcidians. Strab. 6.—Diod. 4.—Ital. 1, v. 662.—*Ovid. Zelasium, a promontory of Theſſaly. Liv. 31, c. 46.

Zeles, a town of Spain.

Zelus, a daughter of Pallas.

Zeno, a philoſopher of Elia or Velia in Italy, the diſciple, or, according to ſome, the adopted ſon of Parmenides, and the ſuppoſed inventor of dialectic. His opinions about the univerſe, the unity, incomprehenſibility, and immutability of all things, were the ſame as thoſe of Xenophanes and the reſt of the Elatic philoſophers. It is ſaid, that he attempted to deliver his country from the tyranny of Nearchus. His plot was diſcovered, and he was expoſed to the moſt excruciating torments to reveal the name of his accomplices, but this he bore with unparalleled fortitude, and not to be at laſt conquered by tortures, he cut off his tongue with his teeth and ſpit it into the face of the tyrant. Some ſay that he was pounded alive in a mortar, and that in the midſt of his torments he called to Nearchus, as if to reveal ſomething of importance; the tyrant approached him, and Zeno, as if willing to whiſper to him, caught his ear with his teeth and bit it off. Cic. Tuſc. 2, c. 22. de Nat. D. 3, c. 33.—Diod. in Frag.—Val. Max. 3, c. 3.—Diog. 9,——The founder of the ſect of the ſtoics, born at Citium in the iſland of Cyprus. The firſt part of his life was ſpent in commercial purſuits, but he was ſoon called to more elevated employments. As he was returning from Phœnicia a ſtorm drove his ſhip on the coaſt of Attica, and he was ſhipwrecked near the Piræus. This moment of calamity he regarded as the beginning of his fame. He entered the houſe of a bookſeller, and to diſſipate his melancholy reflections he began to read. The book was written by Xenophon, and the merchant was ſo pleaſed and captivated by the eloquence and beauties of the philoſopher, that from that time he renounced the purſuits of a buſy life, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy. Ten years were ſpent in frequenting the ſchool of Crates, and the ſame number under Stilpo, Xenocrates, and Polemon. Perfect in every branch of knowledge, and improved from experience as well as obſervation, Zeno opened a ſchool at Athens, and ſoon ſaw himſelf attended by the great, the learned, and the powerful. His followers were called Stoics, becauſe they received the inſtructions of the philoſopher in the portico called στοα. He was ſo reſpected during his life time, that the Athenians publicly decreed him a brazen ſtatue and a crown of gold. His life was an example of ſoberneſs and moderation, his manners were auſtere, and to his temperance and regularity he was indebted for the continual flow of health which he always enjoyed. After he had taught publicly for 48 years, he died in the 98th year of his age, B. C. 264, a ſtranger to diſeaſes, and never incommoded by a real indiſpoſition. He was buried in that part of the city called Ceramicus, where the Athenians raiſed him a monument. The founder of the ſtoic philoſophy ſhone before his followers as a pure example of imitation. Virtue he perceived to be the ultimate of his reſearches. He wiſhed to live in the world as if nothing was properly his own; he loved others, and his affections were extended even to his enemies. He felt a pleaſure in being kind, benevolent, and attentive, and he found that theſe ſentiments of pleaſure were reciprocal. He ſaw a connection and dependence in the ſyſtem of the univerſe, and perceived that from thence aroſe the harmony of civil ſociety, the tenderneſs of parents, and filial gratitude. In the attainment of virtue the goods of the mind were to be preferred to thoſe of the body, and when that point was once gained, nothing could equal our happineſs and perfection, and the ſtoic could view with indifference health or ſickneſs, riches or poverty, pain and pleaſure, which could neither move nor influence the ſerenity of his mind. Zeno recommended reſignation, he knew that the laws of the univerſe cannot be changed by man, and therefore he wiſhed that his diſciples ſhould not, in prayer, deprecate impending calamities, but rather beſeech Providence to grant them fortitude to bear the ſevereſt trials with pleaſure and due reſignation to the will of Heaven. An arbitrary command over the paſſions was one of the rules of ſtoiciſm, to aſſiſt our friends in the hour of calamity was our duty, but to give way to childiſh ſenſations was unbecoming our nature. Pity, therefore, and anger were to be baniſhed from the heart, propriety and decorum were to be the guides in every thing, and the external actions of men were the beſt indications of their inward feelings, their ſecret inclinations, and their character. It was the duty of the ſtoic to ſtudy himſelf; in the evening he was enjoined to review with critical accuracy the events of the day, and to regulate his future conduct with more care, and always to find an impartial witneſs within his own breaſt. Such were the leading characters of the ſtoic philoſophy, whoſe followers were ſo illuſtrious, ſo perfect, and ſo numerous, and whoſe effects were productive of ſuch exemplary virtues in the annals of the human mind. Zeno in his maxims uſed to ſay, that with virtue men could live happy under the moſt preſſing calamities. He ſaid, that nature had given us two ears, and only one mouth to tell us that we ought to liſten more than ſpeak. He compared thoſe whoſe actions were diſſonant with their profeſſions to the coin of Alexandria, which appeared beautiful to the eye, though made of the baſeſt metals. He acknowledged only one God, the ſoul of the univerſe, which he conceived to be the body, and therefore he believed that thoſe two together united, the ſoul and the body, formed one perfect animal, which was the god of the ſtoics. Amongſt the moſt illuſtrious followers of his doctrine, and as the moſt reſpectable writers, may be mentioned Epictetus, Seneca, the emperor Antoninus, &c. Cic. Acad. 1, c. 12. de Nat. Ann. 2, c. 56.——A native of Lepreos, crowned at the Olympic games. Pauſ. 6, c. 15. ——A general of Antiochus.——A philoſopher of Tarſus, B. C. 207.——The name of Zeno was common to ſome of the Roman emperors, on the throne of Conſtantinople, in the 5th and 6th centuries.

Zenobia, a queen of Iberia, wife to Rhadamiſtus. She accompanied her huſband when he was baniſhed from his kingdom by the Armenians, but as ſhe was unable to follow him on account of her pregnancy, ſhe entreated him to murder her. Rhadamiſtus long heſitated, but fearful of her falling into the hands of his enemy, he obeyed, and threw her body into the Araxes. Her cloaths kept her up on the ſurface of the water, where ſhe was found by ſome ſhepherds, and as the wound was not mortal, her life was preſerved, and ſhe was carried to Tiridates, who acknowledged her as queen. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 51.——Septimia, a celebrated princeſs of Palmyra, who married Odenatus, whom Gallienus acknowledged as his partner on the Roman throne. After the death of her huſband, which, according to ſome authors, ſhe is ſaid to have haſtened, Zenobia reigned in the eaſt as regent of her infant children, who were honored with the title of Cæſars. She aſſumed the name of Auguſta, and ſhe appeared in imperial robes, and ordered herſelf to be ſtiled the queen of the eaſt. The troubles which at that time agitated the weſtern parts of the empire, prevented the emperor from checking the inſolence and ambition of this princeſs, who boaſted to be ſprung from the Ptolemies of Egypt. Aurelian was no ſooner inveſted with the imperial purple than he marched into the eaſt, determined to puniſh the pride of Zenobia. He well knew her valor, and he was not ignorant that in her wars againſt the Perſians, ſhe had diſtinguiſhed herſelf no leſs than Odenatus. She was the miſtreſs of the eaſt; Egypt acknowledged her power, and all the provinces of Aſia Minor were ſubject to her command. When Aurelian approached the plains of Syria, the Palmyrean queen appeared at the head of 700,000 men. She bore the labors of the field like the meaneſt of her ſoldiers, and walked on foot fearleſs of danger. Two battles were fought, the courage of the queen gained the ſuperiority, but an imprudent evolution of the Palmyrean cavalry ruined her cauſe; and while they purſued with ſpirit the flying enemy, the Roman infantry ſuddenly fell upon the main body of Zenobia's army, and the defeat was inevitable. The queen fled to Palmyra, determined to ſupport a ſiege. Aurelian followed her, and after he had almoſt exhauſted his ſtores, he propoſed terms of accommodation, which were rejected with diſdain by the warlike princeſs. Her hopes of victory however ſoon vaniſh-ed, and though ſhe harraſſed the Romans night and day by continual ſallies from her walls, and the working of her military engines, ſhe deſpaired of ſucceſs when ſhe heard that the armies which were marching to her relief from Armenia, Perſia, and the eaſt, had partly been defeated and partly bribed from her allegiance. She fled from Palmyra in the night, but Aurelian, who was apprized of her eſcape, purſued her, and ſhe was caught as ſhe was croſſing the river Euphrates. She was brought into the preſence of Aurelian, and though the ſoldiers were clamorous for her death, ſhe was reſerved to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. She was treated with great humanity, and Aurelian gave her large poſſeſſions near Tibur, where ſhe was permitted to live the reſt of her days in peace, with all the grandeur and majeſty which became a queen of the eaſt, and a warlike princeſs. Her children were patronized by the emperor, and married to perſons of the firſt diſtinction at Rome. Zenobia has been admired not only for her military abilities, but alſo for her literary talents. She was acquainted with every branch of uſeful learning, and ſpoke with fluency the language of the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Latins. She compoſed an abridgment of the hiſtory of the oriental nations, and of Egypt, which was greatly commended by the antients. She received no leſs honor from the patronage ſhe afforded to the celebrated Longinus, who was one of her favorites, and who taught her the Greek tongue. She has alſo been praiſed for her great chaſtity, and her conſtancy, though ſhe betrayed too often her propenſities to cruelty and intoxication when in the midſt of her officers. She fell into the hands of Aurelian about the 273d year of the Chriſtian era. Aur. Vict.—Zoſ. &c.——A town of Syria, on the Euphrates.

Zenobii insulæ, ſmall iſlands at the mouth of the Arabian gulf.

Zenodōrus, a ſculptor in the age of Nero. He made a ſtatue of Mercury, as alſo a coloſſus for the emperor, which was 110 feet high, and which was conſecrated to the ſun. The head of this coloſſus was ſome time after broken by Veſpaſian, who placed there the head of an Apollo ſurrounded with beams. Plin. 34, c. 7.

Zenodōtus, a native of Trœzene, who wrote an hiſtory of Umbria. Dion. Hal. 2.——A grammarian in the age of Ptolemy Soter, by whom he was appointed to take care of the celebrated library of Alexandria. He died B. C. 245.

Zenothemis, a Greek writer. Ælian. V. H. 17, c. 30.

Zephyrium, a promontory of Magna Græcia towards the Ionian ſea, whence, according to ſome, the Locrians are called Epizephyrii.——A town of Cilicia. Liv. 33, c. 20.——A cape of Crete, now San Zuane.——Of Pontus, &c.

Zephўrum, a promontory in the iſland of Cyprus, where Venus had a temple built by Ptolemy Philadelphus, whence ſhe was called Zephyria. It was in this temple that Arſinoe made an offering of her hair to the goddeſs of beauty.

Zephyrus, one of the winds, ſon of Aſtreus and Aurora, the ſame as the Favonius of the Latins. He married a nymph called Chloris, or Flora, by whom he had a ſon called Carpos. Zephyr was ſaid to produce flowers and fruits by the ſweetneſs of his breath. He had a temple at Athens, where he was repreſented as a young man of delicate form, with two wings on his ſhouiders, and with his head covered with all ſorts of flowers. He was ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the weſt wind. Heſiod. Theog. 377.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 135. l. 2, v. 417. l. 4, v. 223, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 64. l. 15, v. 700.—Propert. 1, el. 16, v. 34, &c.

Zethes, Zetes, or Zetus, a ſon of Boreas, king of Thrace and Orithya, who accompanied, with his brother Calais, the Argonauts to Colchis. In Bithynia, the two brothers, who are repreſented with wings, delivered Phineus from the continual perſecution of the Harpyes, and drove theſe monſters as far as the iſlands called Strophades, where at laſt they were ſtopped by Iris, who promiſed them that Phineus ſhould no longer be tormented by them. They were both killed as ſome ſay, by Hercules during the Argonautic expedition, and were changed into thoſe winds which generally blow before the dog-ſtar appears, and are called Prodromi by the Greeks. Their ſiſter Cleopatra married Phineus king of Bithynia. Orpheus Arg.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 15.—Hygin. fab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 716.—Pauſ. 3, c. 18.—Val. Flacc.

Zetta, a town of Africa, near Thapſus, now Zerbi. Strab. 17.—Hirt. Afr. 68.

Zetus, or Zethus, a ſon of Jupiter and Antiope, brother to Amphion. The two brothers were born on mount Citharon, where Antiope had fled to avoid the reſentment of her father Nycteus. When they had attained the years of manhood, they collected a number of their friends to avenge the injuries which their mother had ſuffered from Lycus, the ſucceſſor of Nyc-teus on the throne of Thebes, and his wife Dirce. Lycus was put to death, and his wife tied to the tail of a wild bull, that dragged her over rocks and precipices till ſhe died. The crown of Thebes was ſeized by the two brothers, not only as the reward of this victory, but as their inheritance, and Zethus ſurrounded the capital of his dominions with a ſtrong wall, while his brother amuſed himſelf with playing on his lyre. Muſic and verſes were diſagreeable to Zethus, and, according to ſome, he prevailed upon his brother no longer to purſue ſo unproductive a ſtudy. Hygin. fab. 7. —Pauſ. 2, c. 6, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 5 & 10.—Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 41.

Zeugma, a town of Meſopotamia, on the weſtern banks of the Euphrates, where was a well known paſſage acroſs the river. It was the eaſtern boundary of the Roman empire, and in Pliny's age, a chain of iron was ſaid to extend acroſs it. Plin. 5, c. 24. —Strab. 16.—Curt. 3, c. 7.—Tacit. An. 12, c. 12.——A town of Dacia.

Zeus, a name of Jupiter among the Greeks.

Zeuxidămus, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was father of Archidamus, and grandſon of Theopompus, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Archidamus. Pan. 3, c. 7.

Zeuxidas, a prætor of the Achæan league, depoſed becauſe he had propoſed to his countrymen an alliance with the Romans.

Zeuxippe, a daughter of Eridanus, mother of Butes, one of the Argonauts, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 15.——A daughter of Laomedon. She married Sicyon, who after his father-in-law's death became king of that city of Peloponneſus, which from him has been called Sicyon. Pauſ. 2, c. 6.

Zeuxis, a celebrated painter, born at Heraclea, which ſome ſuppoſe to be the Heraclea of Sicily. He floriſhed about 468 years before the Chriſtian era, and was the diſciple of Apollodorus, and contemporary with Parrhaſius. In the art of painting he not only ſurpaſſed all his contemporaries, but alſo his maſter, and became ſo ſenſible, and at the ſame time ſo proud of the value of his pieces, that he refuſed to ſell them, obſerving that no ſum of money, however great, was ſufficient to buy them. His moſt celebrated paintings were his Jupiter ſitting on a throne, ſurrounded by the gods; his Hercules ſtrangling the ſerpents in the preſence of his affrighted parents; his modeſt Penelope; and his Helen, which was afterwards placed in the temple of Juno Lacinia, in Italy. This laſt piece he had painted at the requeſt of the people of Crotona, and that he might not be without a model, they ſent him the moſt beautiful of their virgins. Zeuxis examined their naked beauties, and retained five, from whoſe elegance and graces united, he conceived in his mind the form of the moſt perfect woman in the univerſe, which his pencil at laſt executed with wonderful ſucceſs. His conteſt with Parrhaſius is well known; [Vid. Parrhaſius,] but though he repreſented nature in ſuch perfection, and copied all her beauties with ſuch exactneſs, he often found himſelf deceived. He painted grapes, and formed an idea of the goodneſs of his piece from the birds which came to eat the fruit on the canvaſs. But he ſoon acknowledged that the whole was an ill executed piece, as the figure of the man who carried the grapes was not done with ſufficient expreſſion to terrify the birds. According to ſome, Zeuxis died from laughing at a comical picture he had made of an old woman. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 1. —Plut. in Par. &c.—Quintil.

Zipætes, a king of Bithynia who died in his 70th year, B. C. 279.

Ziza, a town of Arabia.

Zōĭlus, a ſophiſt and grammarian of Amphipolis, B. C. 259. He rendered himſelf known by his ſevere criticiſms on the works of Iſocrates, and the poems of Homer, for which he received the name of Homeromaſtic, or the chaſtiſer of Homer. He preſented his criticiſms to Ptolemy Philadelphus, but they were rejected with indignation, though the author declared that he ſtarved for want of bread. Some ſay, that Zoilus was cruelly ſtoned to death, or expoſed on a croſs, by order of Ptolemy, while others ſupport, that he was burnt alive at Smyrna. The name of Zoilus is generally applied to auſtere critics. The works of this unfortunate grammarian are loſt. Ælian. V. H. 11, c. 10.—Dionyſ. Hal.—*Ovid. de Rem. Zopȳrion, a governor of Pontus, who made war againſt Scythia, &c. Juſtin. 2, c. 3.

Zopȳrus, a Perſian, ſon of Megabyzus who, to ſhew his attachment to Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, while he beſieged Babylon, cut off his ears and noſe, and fled to the enemy, telling them that he had received ſuch a treatment from his royal maſter becauſe he had adviſed him to raiſe the ſiege, as the city was impregnable. This was credited by the Babylonians, and Zopyrus was appointed commander of all their forces. When he had totally gained their confidence, he betrayed the city into the hands of Darius, for which he was liberally rewarded. The regard of Darius for Zopyrus could never be more ſtrongly expreſſed than in what he uſed often to ſay, that he had rather have Zopyrus not mutilated than twenty Babylons. Herodot. 3, c. 154. &c.—Plut.—Juſtin. 1, c. 10.——An orator of Clazomenæ. Quintil. 3, c. 6.——A phyſician in the age of Mithridates. He gave the monarch a deſcription of an antidote which would prevail againſt all ſorts of poiſons. The experiment was tried upon criminals, and ſucceeded.——A phyſician in the age of Plutarch.——An officer of Argos, who cut off the head of Pyrrhus. Plut.——A man appointed maſter of Alcibiades, by Pericles. Plut.——A phyſiognomiſt. Cic. de fat. 5.——A rhetorician of Colophon. Diog.

Zoroanda, a part of Taurus, between Meſopotamia and Armenia, near which the Tigris flows. Plin. 6, c. 27.

Zoroaster, a king of Bactria, ſuppoſed to have lived in the age of Ninus, king of Aſſyria, ſome time before the Trojan war. According to Juſtin, he firſt invented magic, or the doctrines of the Magi, and rendered himſelf known by his deep and acute reſearches in philoſophy, the origin of the world, and the ſtudy of aſtronomy. He was reſpected by his ſubjects and contemporaries for his abilities as a monarch, a lawgiver, and a philoſopher, and though many of his doctrines are puerile and ridiculous, yet his followers are ſtill found in numbers in the wilds of Perſia, and the extenſive provinces of India. Like Pythagoras, Zoroaſter admitted no viſible object of devotion, except fire, which he conſidered as the moſt proper emblem of a ſupreme being; which doctrines ſeem to have been preſerved by Numa, in the worſhip, and ceremonies he inſtituted in honor of Veſta. According to ſome of the moderns, the doctrines, the laws, and regulations of this celebrated Bactrian are ſtill extant, and they have been lately introduced in Europe in a French tranſlation. The age of Zoroaſter is ſo little known, that many ſpeak of two, three, four, and even ſix lawgivers of that name. Some authors, who ſupport that two perſons only of this name floriſhed, deſcribe the firſt as an aſtronomer, living in Babylon, 2459 years B. C. whilſt the era of the other, who is ſuppoſed to have been a native of Perſia, and the reſtorer of the religion of the Magi, is fixed 589, and by ſome 519 years B. C. Juſtin. 1, c. 1.—Auguſt. de Civ.—Oroſ. 1.—Plin. 7, &c.

Zosĭmus, an officer in the reign of Theodoſius the younger, about the year 410 of the Chriſtian era. He wrote the hiſtory of the Roman emperors in Greek, from the age of Auguſtus to the beginning of the 5th century, of which only the five firſt books and the beginning of the ſixth are extant. In the firſt of theſe he is very ſuccinct in his account from the time of Auguſtus to the reign of Diocletian, but in the ſucceeding he became more diffuſe and intereſting. His compoſition is written with elegance, but not much fidelity, and the author ſhowed his malevolence againſt the Chriſtians in his hiſtory of Conſtantine, and ſome of his ſucceſſors. The beſt editions of Zoſimus are that of Cellarius, 8vo. Jenæ 1728, and that of Reitemier, 8vo. Lipſ. 1784.

Zoster, a town, harbour, and promontory of Attica. Cic. ad Att. 5, ep. 12.

The Grecian ſquare meaſures were the plethron or acre, containing 1,444, as ſome ſay, or as others report 10,000 ſquare feet; the aroura, which was half the plethron. The aroura of the Egyptians was the ſquare of 100 cubits.

The Roman ſquare meaſure was the jugerum, which, like their libra and their as, was divided into twelve parts called unciæ, as the following table ſhows:

N. B. The Actus Major was 14400 ſquare feet, equal to a Semis. The Clima was 3600 ſquare feet, equal to a ſeſcuncia, or an uncia and a half, and the actus minimus was equal to a ſextans.

The Roman as or æs, was called ſo becauſe it was made of braſs.

The Greeks divided their obolus into chalci and ſmaller proportions; ſome into ſix chalci, and every chalcus into ſeven ſmaller parts, and others divided it into eight chalci, and each chalcus into eight parts.

The Roman gold coin was the aureus, which generally weighed double the denarius. The value of it, according to the firſt proportion of coinage, mentioned by Pliny, was — — — — — l. 1 s. 4 d. 3 q. 3

	l.	s.	d.	q.
Or according to the proportion of coinage at preſent — — — — —	1	0	9
According to the decuple proportion mentioned by Livy and Julius Pollux — — — —	0	12	11
According to Tacitus, as it was afterwards valued and exchanged for 25 denarii — — —	0	16	1	3

The

The value of coin underwent many changes during the exiſtence of the Roman republic, and ſtood, as Pliny mentions it, as follows:

In the reign of Servius	—	The as weighed of braſs	1 pound	A. U. C. 485 — —	The denarius exchanged for 10 aſſes
A. U. C. 490	—		2 ounces	A. U. C. 537 — —	16 aſſes
A. U. C. 537	—		1 ounce	A. U. G. 547, a ſcruple of gold was worth 20 ſeſtertii; coined afterwards of the pound of gold, 20 denarii aurei; and in Nero's reign of the pound of gold, 45 denarii aurei.
A. U. C. 586	—		½ ounce

N. B. In the above tables of money, it is to be obſerved, that the ſilver has been reckoned at 5s. and gold at 4l. per ounce.

A talent of gold among the Jews was worth 5475l. and one of ſilver 342l. 3s. 9d.

The greater talent of the Romans was worth 99l. 6s. 8d. and the leſs 60l. or as ſome ſay 75l. and the great talent 1125l.

The value of the Roman pondo is not preciſely known, though ſome ſuppoſe it equivalent to an Attic mina, or 3l. 4s. 7d. It is uſed indifferently by antient authors for æs, as, and mina, and was ſuppoſed to conſiſt of 100, or 96 denarii. It is to be obſerved, that whenever the word pondo is joined to numbers, it ſignifies the ſame as libra, but when it is uſed with other words it bears the ſame ſignification as the σταθμη or ολκη of the Greeks, or the pondus of the Latins. The word nummus, when mentioned as a ſum of money, was ſuppoſed to be equivalent to a ſeſtertius, and though the words ſeſtertius and nummus are often joined together, yet their ſignification is the ſame, and they intimate no more than either does ſeparately.

We muſt particularly remark, that in reckoning their ſeſterces, the Romans had an art which can be rendered intelligible by the obſervation of theſe rules: If a numeral noun agreed in caſe, gender, and number, with the word ſeſtertius, it denoted preciſely as many ſeſtertii, as for example, decem ſeſtertii was ten ſeſtertii. If a numeral noun of another caſe was joined with the genitive plural of ſeſtertius, it denoted ſo many thouſand, as decem ſeſtertiûm ſignifies ſo many thouſand ſeſtertii. If the adverb numeral was joined, it denoted ſo many hundred thouſand, as decies ſeſtertiûm was ten hundred thouſand ſeſtertii. If the numeral adverb was put by itſelf, the ſignification was not altered, therefore decies, vigeſies, &c. in a ſentence, imply as many hundred thouſand ſeſtertii, or hundred ſeſtertia, as if the word ſeſtertiûm was expreſſed.

The denarius, which was the chief ſilver coin uſed at Rome, received its name becauſe it contained denos æris, ten aſſes.

The as is often expreſſed by an L. becauſe it was one pound weight; and the ſeſtertius, becauſe it was equivalent to two pound and a half of braſs, is frequently denoted by H. S. or by L. L. S.

The Roman libra contained twelve ounces of ſilver, and was worth about 3l. ſterling.

The Roman talent was ſuppoſed to be equivalent to twenty-four ſeſtertia, or nearly 193l. ſterling.
